Naturally, the final incident began with a dare. My co conspirators and I had puzzled over the same mystery Catholic students everywhere were dying to solve: what do they wear under there? Being the borderline incorrigible in the group, I snuck up behind a tall, black figure - - a stern - faced, blue - eyed nun we called Sister Sana - - grabbed the bottom of her habit with both fists and heaved. For a fleeting glimpse of Sister Sana's cotton bloomers, we were banished to public school forever.

Despite this smudge on my record, I was considered a decent kid by most adults. I was a Boy Scout in Lorenzo Garcia's troop 262, an altarboy at St. Margaret's, and a bit actor in school plays. Public school suited me better, anyway. I felt I was actually learning something useful, rather than wasting the day reciting prayers in a squeaky counterpoint to the nuns' devout voices. Now I was home safe, ready to give thanks. I learned the value of prayer again in the foxholes, longing to join the villagers when their church bells sang each morning. I was ready to pray now. St. Jude stared down at me placidly, wrapped in his gold trimmed robes and clutching his staff. The cavernous shrine, a gray stucco arch where thousands of pilgrims had silently rubbed rosary beads, glowed with the muted light of a hundred white candles. We stopped at the pew and kneeled as a family again, bowing our heads. My mother cleared her throat, breaking the spell as she led us in prayer: "Gracias a Dios, por entregar me lo todo completo. " Thank you, God, for bringing him back to me in one piece.

By the time the waitress slid a huge steak in front of me at the restaurant an hour later, I was convinced I was dreaming. Real beef. Real ice cream. My mother, my father, my sisters talking happily around me. Cloth napkins. At any moment, I expected the whump of a shell to wake me up back in Vietnam, shaking and alone.

I lived in my old room at home for a year. The family routine had not changed. It was as if I had walked out the front door one day, then come through the back door the next. My mother still cooked flour tortillas every morning, my sisters still wore the dresses she fashioned from the floral -print flour sacks, my father still trooped to the slaughterhouse every Saturday for his grinning cow's head. And that first night home, the 10 o'clock Southern Pacific rattled down the tracks as I pulled the blanket from my bed and tried to find a comfortable spot on the floor.

The bronze star came a few weeks later. It expressed my country's gratitude for some unnamed gallantry performed in the line of duty in March, 1972. 1 knew it was for something I had done with the sniper team Cambodia. My father refused to believe me when he pressed for details and I responded with a blank look, then replied, "I'm not sure."

Slowly, my life began to find the well-worn groove I left behind. It never fit perfectly again. That summer, I enrolled in criminology courses at Pan American University in Edinburgh, a short drive from home. I looked up a few old friends, but found we no longer had anything in common. I drove around town, looking at the same buildings and streets and faces with new eyes. I dated a few girls, but never got serious. I was 22 years old and had my life before me. I was taking nothing for granted.

I became a loner, seeking out other Vietnam survivors. I joined the Army Reserve, then the National Guard, where fellow vets congregated, sprinkled among young men finishing the six-year stints they started when the shadow of Vietnam loomed over them. For some reason, I had to remain a soldier. It would be four years before I could let go and quit the Guard.

Before long, all my friends were veterans. They were the only people who understood. At home, I brushed off my family's lingering questions about the war with vague answers until they surrendered in frustration. With fellow vets, I could remove the veil and talk about what I had seen through the crosshairs.

I did not consider myself scarred by Vietnam. I was proud to have served my country. I paraded around campus in my fatigues, strutting like a gang member in his colors, my dappled green fatigues blending into a growing throng of student/ veterans.

There were hundreds of Vietnam vets on campus, like me, taking advantage of the GI bill. Without it, most of us could never have dreamed of a college degree. With boots and backpacks, we roamed the place like a veterans' mafia.

I joined the veteran's organization at Pan American and became part of its student government ticket. My interest in politics was minimal, but with an eye on a law enforcement career, I ran for the attorney general seat. I won easily. The job was a natural for me. I was the campus election officer, enforcing election codes, making sure the candidates followed the proper procedures, and sitting in on the occasional campus meeting to see that parliamentary procedures were honored. I also threw my limited clout behind student body president Eddie de la Garza, who would later become a state representative, to fight for more student loans and scholarship money.

The anti -war movement never really took hold in the Rio Grande Valley. We read about the protests in Washington and other distant cities with astonishment. The Valley has always sent more than its share of young men to fight for America. When American troops fired shots anywhere in the world, the Valley wore its patriotism on its sleeve.

The most overt anti-war demonstrations came from the brown berets, members of La Raza Unida who gained most of their Chicano power from the farm workers. They despised virtually anything Uncle Sam did, staging marches to take their case to a largely indifferent public.

I spent that summer rebuilding my life, carving an island of serene sanity for myself as I pushed Vietnam memories to the furthest reaches of my mind. In time, they came only at night. I attended class by day, and at night I worked the I I -to-7 shift w a dispatcher for Edinburgh Police Department -- my summer internship.

I worked like a demon and landed a permanent dispatcher job the following summer. I was on a mission. When I was forced to choose between work and school, or sleep, or women, work always won. It was expected.

As a teenager, I became a workaholic in my father's image. If I wanted school clothes or a car, they came out of my pocket. With work scarce for Valley teens, I looked north. Each summer starting in junior high school I boarded a bus to Chicago, where I worked in a restaurant called The Coffee Shop my aunt Bea Cerrato managed in O'Hare Airport. We were up at 4:30 every morning, trudging into the restaurant to the smell of the day's first pot of coffee. I bussed tables, washed dishes, and helped out in the kitchen. During the school year, I worked stocking shelves for minimum wage at the Winn's department store ten miles away in Hidalgo, a little town hugging the Rio Grande.

As 1974 melted into 1975, everything was coming together. I drank in every detail of my criminology lectures, figuring how to apply my lessons to the streets when the time came. I paid particular attention to any mention of drug laws. When I became a federal agent, they would be my weapons.

In January, 1975, after six months as a dispatcher, I jumped to a patrol car. I was 25 years old. Becoming a cop seemed natural after being a soldier. I loved the discipline, the order. My father supported my decision, watching my progress like a man gazing into a time warped mirror. My mother, as I expected, could not understand why I sought out such a dangerous job after surviving the war. She could also see my father's blood pushing me along his footsteps, and it frightened her.

After training with a veteran officer for a few days, I was alone on the streets, taking the next step toward what I hoped would be a career cracking down on the drug trade.

I bought into the image of a Texas cop: Spit -shined boots, a nickel -plated .357 magnum pistol tucked into a holster on my hip, and a lead foot. I was determined to be the most aggressive cop the department had. I considered it a personal failure if another officer beat me to a crime scene, no matter what part of town. More often than not, the first badge the victim saw was number 122.

There was a reason the older cops took their time. The job quickly became mundane. We worked small town crime: burglaries, mostly, with a steady flow of auto accidents, speeding tickets, and drunk husbands beating their wives and kids. My Vietnam instincts helped. On burglary in progress calls, I parked a block away from the address and crept toward the house, just as I had done with the guards at Cam Ranh Bay. Running over level ground with nobody shooting at me, it was almost easy. It got to the point where I could catch them in the house, still picking through the valuables.

Still, I enjoyed my work. The Valley was a quiet, conservative farm belt, studded with endless rows of citrus trees, onions, cotton, cabbage and other cash crops thriving on the rich alluvial deposits from the Rio Grande. Gangs, murders and drug abuse were almost unheard of. The sparkling sands of South Padre island were a short drive to the east, where salty winds swept over the Gulf of Mexico to beat back the relentless heat. My father and I spent many mornings hi p -deep in the shallow bay between the island and the mainland, casting for speckled trout and redfish. In the autumn, I pulled on my fatigues and picked through the cactus and mesquite, hunting dove. In the winter, I stalked white -tailed deer. Valley life was nothing exciting, but it was the kind of place where you could raise a family.

The weeks and months blurred into one another. Watergate, the Paris agreement ending the war, and the fall of Saigon in 1975 all slid by like summer clouds, casting a brief shadow before blowing away.

Then I met Noe on a warm night in Reynosa, the sprawling Mexican city across the river from McAllen. When she walked up to me and introduced herself, I recognized her immediately. Noelia Rodriguez worked at the Sonic on University Drive in Edinburgh, a drive -up burger stand popular with cops for its cheap burgers and chili dogs. I stopped there occasionally for dinner as my shift started, calling my order into the little speaker, and then watching Noe hop from car to car filling orders. She had a delicate face and beautiful auburn-tinged hair, short and straight, with the creamy brown skin we called "perlada. " When we bumped into one another at the Reynosa nightclub, I immediately asked for her phone number. The next day, I called and invited her to the movies.

She was 17 when we started dating. Her parents hated the idea of their daughter dating a cop, but Noe refused to listen. She was a head-strong, take-charge girl. We saw each other every chance we could, catching movies at the PanAm Drive-In across from campus, lazing on the beach or dancing at The Rose Monaco, a local disco. Before I realized it, I had stopped seeing other women. I was in love for the first time in my life. We were nearly inseparable for the next two years.

Shortly before I met Noe, the department promoted me to CID - the criminal investigations division. I became a detective sergeant, with a dramatic increase in my workload to go along with the jump in rank * Patrolmen can go home at the end of a shift; investigators work around the clock. I would arrest someone at midnight, then drag myself into court early the next morning for the arraignment. The criminal would get a few hours sleep in jail. I didn't. Although I missed the instant gratification of patrol, I appreciated the meticulous work of picking apart a crime scene. We were jacks of all trades, experts in fingerprinting, interrogations, photography, and interviewing witnesses.

Even better, the promotion gave me a chance to go after dopers.

Marijuana, cocaine, and heroin - - the big three at the time roared through Edinburgh every day on their trek north. The city straddled U.S. Highway 281, one of only three routes out of the Valley. It was also the most direct route from the Reynosa, Mexico, area to San Antonio, Dallas, and the rest of America. From time to time, the dispatcher's phone would ring with a tip about another shipment headed from Mexico. We would jot down the license number and the time the load departed and lie in ambush.

If it sounded like a major load, we called in the drug cavalry. The Texas Department of Public Safety and the local Sheriff's office both had effective drug units, but I leaned toward the Drug Enforcement Administration, a relatively new federal agency created specifically to stop the kind of senseless death I had witnessed day after day in Vietnam, and was beginning to see in my hometown as the traffickers fed and expanded their small clique of users.

Whenever I got a tip on a big load, I called Chema Cavazos and jesse Torrez at the DEA office in McAllen. In exchange, they let me work the case with them. Both were senior agents: Cavazos, a former Customs officer who was now a DEA group supervisor, was light skinned and heavy- set with thick glasses. Torrez was dark complexion and slim, with short, wavy hair. Both wore guayaberas, the open -necked shirts favored by many men in the hot climate, which gave them the look of a border Laurel and Hardy team. They seemed eager to work with a young local police officer who showed an interest in their work. I had more than a passing interest. I wanted to jump to the DEA as soon as possible.

Working drug cases in Edinburgh did not require much creative detective work. There was one major hotel, the Echo, where most of the out-of-town traffickers conducted their business. We spent many nights in the parking lot, watching them come and go as we waited to get enough evidence to pounce. We knew who most of them were, anyway. The drug network in the Rio Grande Valley was small, as were the amounts transported. Two hundred pounds of marijuana or two kilos of cocaine was considered a big seizure. Ten years later, seizures that size would become routine.

By then, I had a good network of informants throughout the community. I spent a lot of time on the street where people could see and talk to me. It was a simple arrangement. They were typically ordinary citizens with knowledge of drug activity, and a strong desire to rid their community of it. When they learned of a shipment, they called me and I arrested the dopers. No money changed hands. I kept my part of the bargain by simply keeping their identities secret.

Working on the border meant dealing with the Mexican police. Cavazos and Torrez were experts. When my informants fed me information about a load coming over the river, they immediately called the Mexican federal police and set up an appointment.

Crossing the bridge into Reynosa left no doubt you were leaving the United States and entering Mexico. The narrow streets of old Reynosa zigged past rows of low slung stucco and concrete block houses.

On the weekends, tourists and teenagers streamed across the river to fill the gift shops, liquor stores, and bars crowding the Zona Rosa a few blocks from the bridge. Wherever they went, they attracted a scraggly train of hawkers and children selling gum. They also attracted the police, a largely corrupt network Of squads who saw tourists as an easy target for bogus traffic stops and extra cash.

The Mexican federales were a bunch of cowboys, no discipline whatsoever.

The first time I trailed the DEA agents into the Mexican feds' office, they invited us along on a raid. It was my initiation into their version of border drug enforcement.

The raid was a controlled delivery. The federales waited until the load of hashish reached the target house, owned by a customs broker across the bridge in Hidalgo. We burst into the house, - the Mexicans forced the seven men inside to the floor. They cracked the top off a wooden crate d the hash, smiling to each other.

The federales suddenly turned ugly, kicking and punching their captives mercilessly. I looked at Cavazos with an incredulous expression. He held up a silent hand. We were their guests.

One of the federales called to a little boy in the street-' handed him a rumpled handful of pesos and said "Bring me a six pack of Topo Chico. " The boy looked at him for a moment. I looked at Torrez, wondering why the Mexicans were ordering mineral water in the middle of a bust. He Offered no clues.

"Hot or cold?" the boy asked with a quizzical look.

"It doesn't matter. Go! "

By the time the boy returned with the bottles, the suspects' hands and feet were tightly bound. The federales led them hopping into the courtyard behind the house, then separated one from the group and positioned him below the ceiling beams jutting from the side of the house. One of the officers heaved a rope over the stout beam, quickly threading the other end through the man's bound feet.

Two of the Mexican officers grabbed the dangling end of the rope and grunted, yanking the squirming prisoner upside down until his head swayed three feet off the ground like a pendulum. I glanced around the group. The captives were wide-eyed and silent. The Mexican police smiled coldly. Nobody in the street could see what was about to happen behind the high walls of the tiny courtyard. The officer who had ordered the water swung the dangling figure toward him, squeezing the man's head between his knees so he could not move. He popped the top off one of the bottles, shook it vigorously with his thumb over the opening, then shot the foaming soda down the suspect's nose, where it burned its way into his sinuses.

The federales looked at one another with sardonic smiles as the man choked, writhing in pain. The water ran from his nose and mouth. He moaned, "Please don't kill me."

The questioning began. "Who does the hashish belong to? Who imported it for you? What was its destination?" The hanging captive cooperated fully, as did most of his comrades. The two who decided to keep their mouths shut received the same treatment. They talked too. They were all locals, traffickers who ran hash and marijuana across the border by bribing customs officials at the bridge.

After a few trips to Mexico, I realized torture was standard police procedure with dopers. The unlucky and the uncooperative were hung from a beam, doused with water and jolted with a battery powered cattle prod, which buzzed menacingly before biting into their damp skin. The police called it "chicharra. " The cicada.

I applied for a job with DEA in 1977, almost immediately after receiving my criminology degree from Pan American. The agency had not hired anyone from South Texas in years, I was told, and to make matters worse, the government was in the midst of a hiring freeze.

I had almost forgotten about the application when the call came, nearly three years later. I was told to report to San Antonio to appear before their board for an oral exam. Several hundred applicants were vying for a couple of spots with the agency, I discovered as I sat nervously outside the conference room. About 30 of us had been chosen to take the oral boards, including several other Mexican -Americans. Rumor had it DEA was under pressure to hire more Hispanics. That did not make me feel any better.

I never liked quotas. l just wanted the chance to compete equally with everyone else. Some of the other hopefuls compared notes

I was flying by the seat of my pants, hoping my military and police background would give me an edge.

Chema called a few weeks later, on New Year's Eve, 1979 with the good news. I rushed to his Edinburgh office, where h swore me in at his desk. There were no trumpets blaring, n ceremony, but in my mind, my real drug war had begun.

In the weeks before I was to enter DEA school in Washing ton D - C - 9 1 threw myself into my new job, once again trying t be the first cop at the scene. I was quickly given the opportunity to prove my dedication.

One of the agents approached me in the office with a manila folder.

We've got a case you can help us with. We've been watching a guy from Edinburgh for a while. Looks like a trucker turned trafficker, and he's getting big. He's been picking up heroin and cocaine in Las Milpas, then taking it to Chicago. in his trucks. I was eager to get to work.

"What's his name?" I asked.

"Martinez. He's Your girlfriend's stepfather. "

My stomach lurched. Noe never said a word to me about her stepfather being involved with narcotics.

I confronted Noe the next day. She spilled the entire story almost relieved to shed her burden. She said her stepfather was' freebasing cocaine, becoming more paranoid and abusive. He thought he was being watched, so he pulled Noe, her mother, and her sister into his web, insisting they drive to Victoria, 240 miles away, to pick up bundles of cash. On another trip, he told Noe and her sister to drive to Illinois with a load of contraband. Her sister concealed the package in her clothing until they reached the buyer's house in Peoria.

"Why didn't you come to me?" I asked.

"He said if he was busted he would invent some story and have us thrown in jail too. "

I was livid. Noe never even took aspirin for headaches, much less used drugs. Her stepfather had been running heroin and coke for years, she said. His illicit sideline became the family's darkest secret. They were trapped by fear and shame.

I wanted to take him down myself. I could not fathom a father involving his own wife and stepdaughter in trafficking. I called the office to explain the situation.

Although I built the case against Noe's stepfather, my fellow agents insisted on keeping my name out of the reports, explaining DEA rules prohibited agents from working cases involving their loved ones. I was nervous about the whole investigation: I had no intention of getting fired after my first month. My boss reassured me and asked me to keep feeding information to Bobby Clark, the agent in charge of the investigation. Clark continued writing his reports as if he were receiving the information directly. My eagerness would come back to haunt me.

In the end, Elias Martinez was betrayed by the family he betrayed. He was arrested, jumped bail, and became a fugitive, never suspecting Noe and her mother had brought the DEA to his door. In fact, he called them from his hiding place. A few days later, he was arrested in Victoria and delivered to prison.

I was ready to pack my bags for DEA school immediately. The longer I worked in McAllen, the less I liked what I saw.

The McAllen office had fractured into two cliques whose members tolerated each other in good times and refused to speak in bad times. One formed loosely around Chema Cavazos, the other around an agent named Terry Bowen. I was amazed at the depth of the resentment in the office, something I never sensed as an outsider working with the agents.

I was also shocked at some agents' disregard for some of the basic street rules I learned behind a police badge. They frequently burned their informants. I watched in disbelief as agents busted traffickers just minutes after the informant had made the buy, rather than waiting so the doper could not put two and two together and figure out who had snitched on him. Patience was a vital tool in drug busts: Informants were too valuable to bum, and there was always a next time.

Sometimes the operations degenerated into pure comedy.

I was with Cavazos and his group one night as we set up a perimeter around a K-Mart parking lot. Ten of us sat quietly in our vehicles, waiting for the undercover agent to make the buy Cavazos had orchestrated. Everyone was in position, waiting for the doper to arrive when Cavazos jumped out of his car and jogged across the parking lot.

I squinted through the darkness and saw a familiar face. Then two. Three. They were agents from our office, sitting in their vehicles and squinting back at us. I looked around at the other agents in my group, who returned my puzzled expression.

Everyone met in the middle of the parking lot as Cavazos hunted down the other group's supervisor.

"What the hell are you doing here?" the supervisor asked Cavazos.

"Buying. What are you doing?"

"Selling. "

We had set each other up for a bust, two groups of DEA agents, ready to arrest one another as dopers.

DEA school in Washington D.C. was boot camp all over again. Fifteen weeks of running every other day, climbing stairs ' shooting at silhouettes on the firing range, boxing, and whacking each other with padded sticks. In the classroom, we crammed like college seniors on federal drug laws, surveillance techniques, report writing, undercover work, and all the minutiae of being a soldier in the escalating drug war.

Some of the instructors wanted me to quit. They never said so directly, but they did not have to. Their eyes and voices revealed their true feelings: I had seen the same lightly masked disdain in the eyes of some of my teachers in the Valley, and again in the Army. I could sometimes overhear the instructors talking among themselves, punctuating their gripes with "goddamn Mexicans. " There were several other Hispanics in the class, all receiving the same unspoken messages. Extra laps for no apparent reason. Sudden orders to drop and do push - ups. A surly undertone when we were addressed. A couple of them dropped out in disgust.

It didn't bother me. I was in still in good shape, and the Army accustomed me to racist drill sergeants with volatile personalities. A few extra push - ups were a small price to pay for a DEA job. I finished, standing proudly with the class at the graduation ceremony as Kika de la Garza, my hometown Congressman, watched from the audience. I was ready to prove myself.

Just before graduation, my DEA counselor called me into his office. The agency was sending me to New York City for my first assignment. "Are you sure you have the right Castillo?" I asked, thinking he had confused me with the other Castillo in our class. He showed me the papers.

He launched into a speech about what a wonderful opportunity I was receiving from the agency. I was skeptical. There were a dozen places I thought I would be assigned, but New York was nowhere on the list. My counselor smiled, his eyes searching my face for a reaction. I had my marching orders. I shook his hand and swallowed my doubts.

Back in McAllen, I spent every spare moment with Noe, promising her I would come back. I had no intention of letting her go. Just before I left town, one of my informants called with information about a two kilo cocaine deal about to take place at the Hilton. I reached for the phone to call my office, then set it back in the cradle. I did not trust them. I found the number of a DPS narcotics agent I knew would protect my informant.

I hoped things would be better in New York.

Four

The Planet Manhattan

New York City - 1980

I hated New York immediately. After landing at La Guardis Airport, I took a taxi through choking traffic to a hotel in Queens, where I would live until I found my own nook in the concrete canyons. The next morning, my first crowded subway ride took me to 555 West 57th Street, where the DEA office was located in the Ford Building. In less than a day in the big city, I was overwhelmed. Not even in Vietnam had I felt so lost and alone. Nobody seemed to give a damn about anyone else as they elbowed their way through the throng. Every blaring car horn and sour glance reinforced my aversion to the city I did not work. I wanted to go home.

I had asked to be assigned somewhere with a large Mexican American community, where I could put my language and cultural knowledge to work. Instead, I was going to be the first Mexican American in the DEA's New York City Division Office. I was like a lost child, gawking at the towering landscape as I approached the office on the west side of Manhattan, a block from the Hudson River.

The people crammed into the elevator gave me a peculiar look as I pushed my way inside. The men wore shirts and ties, the women skirts and conservative blouses. It was the dawning of the Reagan era: The federal government was Republican territory again. I looked like a Carter holdover in my best boots, a straw cowboy hat, and jeans. I locked my eyes on the doors until they parted.

The receptionist directed me to the office of Jeffrey Hall, the supervisor for Enforcement Group 6. My new family, I thought sarcastically. He invited me into his office with a college bOY's smile and a firm grip. Hall was a Harvard graduate, a short, baby - faced former collegiate wrestler who looked like he got lost on the way to the dorms. He wore jeans, tennis shoes with no socks, and a maroon Harvard T-shirt with a hole in the side.

I looked around the spartan office for a moment. There were no plaques or photos on the walls. The office contained little more than a desk and window looking out on the city.

Jeff got straight to the point. "The first thing you have to do is get rid of that hat," he said. "The only people who wear cowboy hats here are queers."

Something inside snapped like a brittle twig. I tossed my badge and my gun on his desk. "I'm quitting. I'm going back home. "

He cocked his head and studied me for a moment, then rolled his eyes toward the window. "Why?"

"This is New York City. What the hell am I going to do here? I've got no relatives, I've got no friends..."

Jeff squinted at the skyline again. "I'll tell you what. Take off. Go find a place to live, and come back when you're ready to work. "

I suddenly felt ridiculous. I sheepishly collected my belongings from his desk. "Shit, you're right. I've come this far. I guess I'll give it a try. "

For days, I walked through Queens, trying to find a studio apartment I could afford on my small salary. I finally found a matchbox apartment on the top floor of a brownstone near Shea Stadium. I took it without even inspecting it. It was not a wise decision. I could have fit the entire $600 - a - month apartment into a garage and still had room for my car. The kitchen was barely large enough for one person. My legs almost stuck out the bathroom door when I sat on the toilet. I moved in my few belongings: a small twin bed, a small TV, a dining table with four wooden folding chairs, a few dishes, and my clothes.

I immediately called home, longing for a familiar voice. I told my father of my urge to flee the city. He sided with Jeff , using his stern officer's tone. "You worked so hard to become a federal agent, and now you're a federal agent and you're going to quit? You go out there and try, and if you don't like it, then you come home. 9' There was no discussion.

As I hung up, the building shook. I threw open the back window and watched the tail of a Long Island Railroad trail disappear down the tracks. I groaned. The trains rocked the room every hour for the rest of the night as I stared at the ceiling, trying to fight my anxiety, trying to sleep.

A week after our first meeting, I knocked on Jeff 's door. H studied me with an approving nod. I had swapped my boots for; tennis shoes and stuffed my hat in the closet.

"Are you ready to go to work?" he asked with a boyish grin*n.

"Yeah. I guess I am. "

DEA's New York office was the largest in the country, with nine enforcement groups, an intelligence section to keep us patched in with other parts of the country, and a task force made up of DEA agents, New York Police Department narcotics agents, and state police. I was impressed. We had a seemingly unlimited supply of money for surveillance, undercover work, and busts. We had a huge network of talented informants. Our bosses wanted to prove America was winning the drug war. I wanted to help prove them right.

The 15 or so agents in our group were known as "Jeff's Raiders, " a nickname that reflected Hall's reckless abandon. The other group members considered him 6 6 an agent's agent," the highest compliment DEA grunts can give a supervisor. They also considered him certifiably nuts, swapping stories of Jeff storming into buildings, taunting drug dealers, and otherwise ignoring good sense. I found him odd at the very least, breaking off a thought in mid -sentence, then glancing around the room as if I had suddenly become invisible. But he was one of the most intelligent people I had ever met. He had a prejudiced streak: Jeff did not like female or minority agents. I think my work ethic impressed him we were both workaholics. So we became friends.

It took me six months to get over the culture shock of New York. I spent my first few weekends alone in my apartment, running up the phone bill with lonely calls to my family and to Noe, whose voice magnified my urge to go home. During one late-night conversation, a light clicked on. I realized then I ,wanted to marry her, as soon as I could . Meanwhile, I was trapped in a tiny box inside a steel maze. In time, I surrendered to the city. I took my new DEA car exploring. On Sundays, I ate breakfast at some small diner, or treated myself at the Tavern on the Green in Central Park, then basked on the grass with The New York Times. After a movie in Manhattan, I would drive home to Queens. As I became more adventurous, I caught Broadway plays, sampled Radio City Music Hall, and watched movie stars flash into theaters for world premieres.

I slowly made friends and developed the love-hate relationship with New York so common among long -time residents. I learned to drive like a predator. I went to cop bars and cop parties with Puerto Rican and Cuban friends from DEA and NYPD. I fell in love with the food: Cuban dishes at Victor's Cafe in Manhattan, Puerto Rican feasts at a hundred little neighborhood cafes, real Chinese food in Chinatown. I went to the same little deli every morning for a fresh ham, egg and cheese bagel sandwich. I even learned to like coffee.

My first partner, Louis Diaz, was famous in New York law enforcement circles for his role in busting Nicky Barnes, Jr., " the black Al Capone. " Barnes was the biggest doper in Harlem before Diaz helped send him away for life. Diaz was a jumble of contrasts: He was a gentleman, raised by Spanish parents in a tough Brooklyn neighborhood, who went on to roam the streets armed with a psychology degree and an impressive amateur boxing record. He taught me how to think, talk, and dress like a New York agent. I settled into a rhythm, driving to his house every morning for bagels and eggs with his family before we set Out for my next on-the-job lesson.

After a few weeks, when I learned enough to survive on the streets, Jeff's Raiders welcomed me into their fold. I wanted to see if the group fit its swash buckling nickname. For weeks, the other agents tried to make me squirm, shaking their heads sullenly when they learned I had become a member of Group 6. "1 hope You've got good insurance, " one agent said with sarcastic drama. "Wear your vest. "

Group 6 was the embodiment of the Reagan-style drug war. The new president wanted action, he wanted results, and he wanted them quickly. Drug treatment programs were gutted in favor of more interdiction .Our budget increased. Our D chiefs welcomed the largess, but on the Street, we were pressured to repay the favor with numbers. I soon discovered why the Raiders were the most productive unit in the New York office. Quality had become a slave to quantity.

Everything I learned in DEA school went out the window This was the real thing; lock and load your weapons and hunting for dopers. We were every drug dealer's nightmare, angry pack of federal agents wrapped in flak jackets, carrying Smith & Wesson .357 revolvers. Jeff always led the charge kicking doors open and screaming "Hit the floor! " as a river navy DEA windbreakers poured into the room. We once scared doper's pet Chow so badly it jumped through a window an dropped six stories to its death.

We operated like a Vietnam platoon, conducting search and destroy operations on the streets. More dopers always followed, instantly filling in the gaps. For important cases, we di things by the book. For the minor Junkies, traffickers, an dealers, most of them illegal aliens who would not complain about their civil rights, we made their lives hell to shut them down for the night. There were just too many of them and too few of us,

I remember Jeff telling me, "The system doesn't work. You'll arrest those bastards and they'll be out the next day, back on the streets. " We made up new rules as we barreled through the dark streets, crashing into dopers' houses and apartments. We did away with reading their rights. We conducted illegal searches and seizures. We didn't care about prosecutions. We simply tossed them in jail for a night and took another ounce or kilo off the streets.

The internal affairs office was always watching, but we were protected by the cluster of New Yorkers in DEA's Washing ton headquarters. They were known in the agency as the "New York Mafia," and they made sure no messy internal investigations got in the way of the numbers. We were connected.

Cocaine was king in New York, bursting back from relative obscurity to become yet another lucrative underworld business. It came by land, by sea, by air, spreading ecstasy and anguish and money, so much money. Colombians were bringing it into America any way they could, feeding their new cash cow and milking it for dollars. The powder washed away class distinctions.

We were busting weak, watery-eyed junkies along with the silver spoon set who came to crave coke.

The poorest neighborhoods of New York soon became a sort of coke-crazed Dodge City. Dominican gangs perfected a new technique to deliver more bang for fewer bucks. They mixed powdered cocaine with baking soda or "comeback," a chemical similar to the prescription anesthetic lidocaine, then cooked the mixture until it formed solid, rock-like cocaine crystals. Crack was born.

With cocaine now affordable to the masses, the Dominicans, supplied by the Cali cartel in Colombia, conquered block after block with the city's hottest new high. Everyone wanted a piece of the action, and the neighborhoods where turfs collided became war zones. NYPD drug busts jumped by nearly half my first year in the city. Between 1980 and 1985, the number would triple. It was Prohibition all over again, machine guns blazing from screeching cars and rival gang members bleeding in the streets. The rum runners of the 1920s would live again in the crack lords of the '80s. The Jamaicans turned the savage cottage industry into a nationwide conquest, sending street-wise entrepreneurs across America to establish crack houses. Thousands of lives would be shredded in the process.

Cocaine was like an old starlet, making a comeback in trendy clothes. But smack remained New York's darling.

Shortly after I arrived, the agency placed a new emphasis on heroin. In the late '70s, the drug had made a leap out of the ghettos into the trendy disco circuit. Suddenly, DEA wanted heroin numbers. Naturally, Jeff's Raiders became the best damn heroin-busters in town. I thought back to the soldier I watched die, squirming, in a foxhole in Vietnam. I wanted to be the point man again.

We descended on Harlem's heroin network, lining up informants and greasing palms for names and addresses. The heroin dens were easy to spot. Shuffling addicts came in shifts for their fix, sharing needles in back rooms before shuffling back into the street, their hands swollen like balloons from collapsed veins. I saw young runaways with big -city dreams turned into toys for Harlem heroin dealers.

One undercover bust still bothers me. I was about to b from one of Harlem's typically flashy dealers, a huge black m decked out in gold and silk, when I asked the standard question "Is this good stuff?" He grinned and tilted his head back, calling to the back room. Two emaciated girls emerged. Neither look older than 14. "These are the girls who test my stuff, " he said handing them syringes. The girls stripped from the waist do smiling in anticipation. My jaw went slack as they plunked do in chairs and spread their legs, expertly guiding needles to t large vein in their groins. Their heads lolled dramatically as th testified to the heroin's quality with thick tongues. After I mad the buy, I told the other agents what had happened. They took th pusher down hard, taking special pains to leave their mark on hi as the girls were carted off to a shelter.

The scene was repeated a dozen times as we rampage through Harlem. My conscience screamed at me every time cracked the hinges off another door. I had always done everything by the book. Here they ripped out the pages and stomped on them I remember Jeff taking me aside one night and saying: "Look, Cele, this is the way we do things. We're a real close-knit group we keep to ourselves. " This is not right, I thought. But I didn't question his methods. I had a duty to uphold. I was a rookie, getting the best experience DEA had to offer, absorbing more in a few months than an agent in McAllen would learn in a career. And I was finally wreaking havoc in the narcotic good on the vow I made in Vietnam. I loved it.

My first big solo case Went down on May 1, 1981, when I broke Elvia Garcia's heart. Elvia (not her real name) had become something of a legend among the agents in the task force, who tried to bust her for more than two years. She quietly became the neighborhood Pusher, selling cocaine out of her small house in Flushing. Elvia stayed in business with old-fashioned street smarts: She refused to sell to Anglos, blacks, or Puerto Ricans. She knew they could be cops. That left her a healthy pool of customers from other Latin American countries. In a city where Puerto Ricans, Salvadorans, and just about every other variety of Latin American could be found by the blockful, Mexicans were rare. I asked if I could try to wiggle past her defenses. A South American informant took me to her small row house and introduced me to the grand dame of the neighborhood. She came to the door in a conservative dress, a thin, old woman with pinned gray hair and delicate hands. I felt like I was about to bust my grandmother. She invited me in, leading me to the kitchen as she ran me through a polite cross-examination. In a thick Mexican accent, I told her I was a Mexican businessman traveling through the area. Strictly pleasure, I added with a smile. She relaxed.

Elvia reached into her purse, retrieving a small plastic bag packed with cocaine. The powder had j ust come in from Colombia, she said. Very high quality. I bought four ounces for $7,500, thanked her, and left. She welcomed me like a lost son when I returned a few weeks later for the big score: two kilos. The coke was waiting for me, neatly wrapped on the kitchen counter like a gift. I almost hated to bust her. I shook off the thought, telling her I needed to run out to my car to get the money. I gave the signal as soon as I reached the yard, disappearing before the task force agents stormed in. I did not want to see her led away in handcuffs. The agents also arrested another elderly woman who handled the books for their cocaine business. My stock rose immediately in the office.

I had less pity for Romero and Maria Moreno (not their real names), a Puerto Rican couple who ran an international cocaine smuggling operation out of the Bronx. They were the targets of a new DEA technique. Our bosses had explained the "reverse," and we were eager to try it. The reverse turned agents into dealers: Instead of posing as buyers, we began selling drugs to the bad guys, using seized cocaine to lure them into jail. The technique moved us higher up the drug food chain, busting the people who sold larger quantities. I was one of the first DEA agents to pull it off.

A Puerto Rican informant introduced me to the Morenos in the Holiday Inn on West 57th Street, a few blocks from our Offices. We found a booth in the bar and got down to business.

They were an attractive couple, a pair who would blend well in Manhattan's art galleries and charity balls. Moreno was the tall - dark and- handsome type, a friendly man who was written up in the local press for spending $20,000 at a public television auction. The writers called Rosado and his first wife 6 4 enthusiastic, streetwise entrepreneurs. " They did not know how accurate they were. Now he had a new wife, Maria, who was their maid before he dumped his wife, and a growing cocaine operation.

He started the conversation with a warning. "If you're a cop, " he said with a slight grin, "then I'm talking to a dead cop. " I smiled. It was a common technique dopers used to measure prospective partners. Maria, an attractive, dark -skinned woman, immediately cut in: "If I don't like you, we don't do business. " Now I had two egos to contend with. I turned on the charm, showering her with compliments about her clothes and jewelry. She purred.

Moreno said his organization was strapped for cocaine. His supplier had dried up. He needed a couple of kilos to keep his customers happy. They wanted to buy one kilo at a time, but I insisted on delivering both kilos together. Making two deliveries increased my risks, I argued. I knew two kilos would keep them in business for at least three months. They could cut it with enough sugar to make six kilos, each yielding a thousand one-gram packets they could sell on the street for $100 each.

"If you trust me, you trust me, " I said, standing to leave. "If you don't, we don't do business. " After a couple more meetings, they agreed to buy two kilos for $ 100, 000.

On June 6, 1981, 1 drove to their apartment in a low-rent Puerto Rican neighborhood in the Bronx. They obviously wanted to cloak their wealth in the drab high-rise. Inside, the place looked like a Park Avenue penthouse, full of new electronic toys and expensive furniture.

Moreno took me to the bedroom and picked up a stack of documents from the bed. "This is how I stay ahead of the cops, " he said, leafing through the papers. They were intelligence reports from the FBI, CIA, and New York Police Department. I clenched my teeth, wondering if he had a mole in DEA and was preparing to kill me. Instead, he asked me to meet him at the Holiday Inn at a quarter to one that afternoon. I stifled a sigh of relief.

They arrived at exactly 12:45 in their blue Datsun. Maria clutched a blue bag containing a scale and a bottle of bleach, which drug runners used to test the purity of cocaine. I was waiting at the bar with our informant, who met the pair outside, took a peek at the money, then returned to his stool. "They only have $50,000, " he said. They wanted to sample the coke before they produced the other half of the money.

The rest of Jeff's Raiders were scattered throughout the hotel and on the street, waiting. Half will have to be good enough this tine, I thought as I gave the signal. After the agents arrested the pair, we searched the car and found

A $48,000 in a bag in the trunk, along with a safe deposit box key. Search warrant in hand, we opened the box and found another $49,000. By the time we wrapped up the case, we had seized $131,000 in cash, $21,000 in jewelry, the Datsun, and a loaded revolver Maria was carrying. Romero and Maria went to prison. After this success, the reverse became standard procedure throughout New York.

Everything changed when Jeff got married. He found some sanity and lost his erratic aggressiveness. There were new house rules: He wanted us home with our families if we were not on the street. He also started what we came to call "Federal Fridays. " The office was almost deserted on Fridays. Cases were put off until Monday, and everyone was gone by 3 p.m. to beat the traffic. I stayed late anyway. I had nothing to go home to.

As the Moreno investigation wound down, I began working with Gerald Franciosa, a veteran New York agent who specialized in organized crime. Where Luis epitomized the urbane Latino gentleman, my new partner fit my image of a Mafioso perfectly: a tall, solid Italian with a mustache and dark haircombed straight back toward the collar of his expensive suit.

We became a team. In our street dramas, Gerry was the Italian mobster from out of town looking to buy or sell cocaine. I was his "South American connection." We began working undercover, busting minor Mafia types. Although every don in the city threatened their soldiers with death if they were caught dealing narcotics, neither the dons nor their men obeyed the decree. We had plenty of work. I was the quiet half of the pair, letting Gerry negotiate, stammering in broken English when I was forced to speak. We thought we had our act down perfectly. It would have to be perfect. We were about to perform for a much more discriminating audience.

After a long stretch in prison Louis Boyce did not want to go back. Boyce emerged from his cell a grizzled old wolf, drooping at the chin and graying at the temples. He had just started dabbling in heroin when we nailed him.

DEA received court permission to tap Boyce's phone, so our agents knew when he planned to pick up his next delivery. They were waiting at the drop spot in Brooklyn when he picked up a brown paper bag with about a half pound of heroin. Faced with what could be his final trip to the penitentiary, the aging gangster decided to talk. He was actually quite pleasant about the whole thing. I expected bitterness and deception. Boyce gave us cheery cooperation.

In law enforcement jargon, Boyce had "flipped. " In the tightlipped underworld, Boyce turned snitch. He helped Gerry infiltrate a major heroin operation run out of East Harlem by two major crime families, the Luccheses and Bonannos. With Boyce paving the way with handshakes, Gerry met two of the operation's main men: Oreste "Ernie Boy" Abbamonte and Joseph "Joe the Crow" Delvecchio.

Boyce also betrayed his source, a Puerto Rican named William "Crazy Willie" Irizarry. He was the main distributor, the man who received the shipments and broke the heroin into kilos, which Ernie Boy and Joe the Crow then sold. DEA rushed to the judge and tapped Crazy Willie's phones immediately, only to hit a brick wall: Nobody could understand a word Crazy Willie said. I was called in to break his code. His messages to his wife, who set up his deals, were an unintelligible jumble, like Spanish poured into a blender. I had never heard anything like it.

Gerry and Boyce did all the undercover work. I was selected to play their driver, steering the big rented Cadillacs while they rode like royalty in the leather back seat. Gerry was going through his courtship, earning the gangsters' trust with each meal and glass of wine, chipping away at their inbred suspicion to cement the deal. Luckily, the gangsters trusted Boyce. They called him several times to make sure Gerry was okay. As we listened through the tapped lines, he reassured them his new connection could deliver.

I kept my mouth shut and drove, waiting in the car most of the time. While Gerry talked, waving his hands, I waited, watching for other mobsters. I studied our prey. I thought Gerry looked more gangster -like, but I knew they were the real item. Delvecchio was 38 and slim, a shade under six feet tall, with brown hair framing the beaked nose which inspired his nickname. His DEA sheet was impressive: 33 files documenting his heroin activities. Abbamonte was five years younger and the smaller of the two, with curly hair and a pronounced Adam's Apple. He was more prolific, with 38 DEA files bearing his name for the same heroin racket.

Ernie Boy and Joe the Crow preferred to do business in the city's best restaurants, high - dollar clubs, or over cards in Atlantic City. I shelled out a good portion of my paycheck to look the part. DEA was willing to pick up the tab for meals, drinks, and small gambling excursions, but we had to buy our own costumes. My mother would have fainted at the sight of me: raccoon fur coat, a thick gold bracelet with "Anthony, " my alias, written in diamonds, two cashmere suits, $500 shoes, and hundred-dollar ties.

The investigation began eating more and more of my time. When I was not driving Gerry and Boyce around, I was in the van helping with surveillance or listening to tapes of Crazy Willie's gibberish. I was working around the clock, wobbling in after long nights of surveillance to write my reports, a job Gerry detested. Thomas Cash, the assistant agent in charge, finally grabbed Gerry and literally locked him in his office for two days. He deputized an unsuspecting agent to stand guard, refusing to let Gerry out until he finished his backlogged reports.

The wiretaps brought new leads and more work. Every Phone call was analyzed until we had the names and addresses of a heroin network stretching across the metropolitan area. We filled in another vital link in the heroin chain: Lorenzo "Enzo" Di Chiara, who was in frequent contact with Joe the Crow and Ernie Boy. Di Chiara was the trans-Atlantic middleman, who made sure the heroin leaving Sicily reached New York safely.

After weeks of frustration, a Puerto Rican informant helped me break Crazy Willie's maddening code. His suggestion sounded too simple, but after I listened to the tapes again suddenly, the gibberish untangled itself into clear messages Crazy Willie was speaking Spanish Pig Latin, cutting off the beginning of each word and slapping it on the end, creating bizarre but simple code. I translated the tapes and pieced together his role in the operation. Crazy Willie was taking delivery of th heroin at his home, turning it into a warehouse for Joe the Cro and Ernie Boy and their gang of peddlers. Our list of names grew.

The investigation took 18 months. As the information from Gerry's meetings and our wiretaps mounted, we realized we were untangling the biggest heroin ring our eight -year-old agency had seen. By the fall of 1982, it seemed everyone in the office was working on some aspect of this case.

Jeff Hall was transferred to Washington D.C. as the case reached critical mass. He was replaced by John Land, an Arizona supervisor on the eve of retirement. Land had been investigated by DEA's Office of Professional Responsibility, then exiled to New York to serve his last year. OPR, our internal Gestapo, wanted to put him out to pasture. Instead, he was about to leave DEA in a burst of glory.

On October 20, 1982, Gerry got his first nibble. As I watched from a DEA taxi, posing as a cabby, Ernie Boy delivered three kilos of heroin in front of a diner, taking $150,000 as a down payment. Gerry promised to deliver the remaining $390,000 soon. Eight days later, they met again in Queens. Gerry asked for more time to pay the balance. Ernie Boy became a little annoyed and refused, claiming he had a man from Buffalo flying in to pick up the money. Gerry pushed, telling him he would get his $390,000 on November 3. Ernie Boy's eyes narrowed. Gerry quickly poured some sugar on the deal. If Ernie Boy could hold out until the third, Gerry would also bring $1.5 million in cash.

It was time to close the big deal they had negotiated for months.

Gerry let the image of stacked dollars dangle in front of the gangster, then yanked. Ernie Boy was hooked. He could wait a few more days for payment. On the third, he promised to bring 17 kilos to the Market Diner at 11th Avenue and 43rd Street. He would take the $1.5 million as a partial payment. The heroin would cost $3.06 million.

I could not imagine that much heroin and money in one place. Seventeen kilos. Almost 35 pounds of pure heroin, enough to kill every junkie in New York if you let them at it.

The deal went down November 3 as planned. It started out as planned, anyway. I was in a rental car with another agent, following Gerry's burgundy Cadillac to the diner. Gerry seemed almost at ease. I could feel myself sweating lightly, knowing half of $1.9 million from the U.S. Treasury was locked in a suitcase in the trunk. I looked around to find my bearings and locate the car with the other half of the money. Every move was choreographed earlier, in the DEA conference room. Dozens of agents surrounded us, ' monitoring every move. I saw familiar faces trying to look nonchalant in rental cars, taxis, and on the sidewalk.

Taking down Ernie Boy and Joe the Crow was the main event. The plan was simple: Gerry would tell them the money was in another car, ready to be called in as soon as he saw the heroin. When they showed him the smack, we would move in and arrest them. Then the money would be rushed back to the office for safekeeping as teams of agents fanned through the New York area to bust the other members of the ring. Everything had to happen quickly, before someone sounded the alarm. If the other members were tipped off to the raid, we would chase shadows the rest of the night. Abbamonte and Delvecchio shook Gerry's hand as they scooted into a booth. I rolled down the car window. A light breeze stirred the air, carrying the scent of rain. Cold front moving in, I thought absently. I felt the pistol press against the small of my back, then made eye contact with the agents behind me in the rearview window. Everyone was ready, tense.

Suddenly, Ernie Boy and Joe the Crow were jumping back into their Cadillac. Something was wrong. They were moving the deal. Gerry looked at me for a nervous instant and tipped his head. Follow now. The gangsters left in a hurry, with Gerry revving his engine behind them. I yelled to one of the agents in a taxi, who tossed me the keys to the cab and jumped into the rental. I floored the accelerator, looking for Gerry's taillights.

In the next 30 seconds, everything broke down. As maneuvered through traffic and locked a space behind Gerry's Cadillac, the other agents simply vanished. My head whipped around as I tried to keep an eye on Gerry, read the street sig blurring by, and search for the other agents. I could hear the chattering excitedly on the radio, saying they had his Cadillac sight. So where the hell are you, I thought desperately.

The realization hit me hard. They were following the wrong car. Somehow, they had latched onto another burgundy Cadillac

A horn blared at me as another cab veered into my Iane trying to squeeze past a double-parked car. Gerry was pushing the Caddie faster to keep up with Ernie Boy. Gerry probably loves this, I thought as we ran red lights and careened around come toward the east side. I screamed into my radio, reading off cros streets. By the time I convinced the other agents they had th wrong car, I was halfway across town.

Ernie Boy turned a comer and parked in the middle of block between two high - rises. I stopped at the comer and read off the intersection, stifling the urge to scream into the radio again. We were in a Puerto Rican neighborhood, a low- rent block I had worked before.

The street was lit up like a stage, yellow streetlights shining off windshields and pouring onto the pavement. Three car doors slammed. Gerry walked slowly toward the gangsters as they popped the Cadillac's trunk. Gerry reached into the space and straightened, hefting two tightly- wrapped packages in his hands. That was the signal.

I searched the street for the tenth time and saw no one. fumbled for the radio. "He's giving the goddamn signal. Do you want me to take them down?"

A voice crackled over the speaker. "Stay where you are. We're on our way. " I waited, the seconds stretching out into infinity.

Joe the Crow walked slowly toward me. The taxi's motor was still idling. He was suspicious. He stopped in the middle of the street, scanning the dark neighborhood like a snake tasting the air for danger. Ernie Boy and Gerry kept talking. Joe the Crow took a few more steps, studying the cab. I leaned backward a few inches, searching for safe darkness. If he recognized me, Gerry would die quickly.

I jerked open the door and found a dark patch of sidewalk between two streetlights, cupping my hands to my mouth. ."Carmen, get your ass down here. I'm not going to wait all night," I yelled at the nearest brownstone. I repeated it in Spanish, making a show of exasperation.

A few people on the street looked up for a moment, then dismissed me. Joe the Crow scowled. I paced below the brownstone, trying to keep my back to him.

"What do you want with Carmen?"

I whirled around to face an older woman leaning halfway through a third -floor window. Just my luck, I thought, there's actually a Carmen in the building.

"I'm waiting for her, " I called back. The head disappeared into the dark room.

Joe the Crow looked at the window a moment, then started back toward Gerry and Ernie Boy. I relaxed.

He got halfway there when the commotion began. The cavalry was here.

A human wave swept down the block, surrounding Gerry and Ernie Boy. Joe the Crow's face froze as he whirled to face the onslaught. I pulled my pistol from the small of my back and hurdled the taxi's front fender, catching him from behind. "We're federal agents," I said, pushing the barrel into his face. "You're under arrest. Don't fucking move or I'll kill you."

The shock lasted only a moment, followed by a stony stare of recognition. "I'm going to fucking kill you, you fucking spic, " he growled. I almost laughed. I was in a damn gangster film, and Joe the Crow hit his line perfectly.

I led him toward the cars, where Gerry was frisking Ernie Boy inside a circle of cocked pistols. "I'm looking at a dead man, " he said as Gerry spun him around and cuffed him. It was a threat he would later deny making when it showed up in the papers. Gerry looked almost amused. We searched their car. Inside was $23,000 cash and a loaded .38 revolver.

It was after midnight, but the operation was just beginning. We broke into teams and scattered through the city, rounding up the other targets on our list. Gerry and I arrested five more low level gangsters in Little Italy, Brooklyn, and Staten Island. By daybreak, 13 members of one of the city's biggest heroin rings were in jail.

The bust hit every major paper in the country. DEA estimated the network was responsible for smuggling as much as 50 pounds of heroin into the city each week, much of it funneled through Sicily. The next day, FBI Director William Webster held a press conference at DEA headquarters in Washington to heap on the praise, calling our bust "a major blow" to narcotics trafficking by organized crime. It was a great public relations image: the mob, heroin, high-speed chases, multiple arrests. And numbers. Wonderful numbers. We took 20 pounds of heroin estimated $20 million. The DEA avoided comparing the operation to the French Connection in the early '70s, but placed it among the largest busts in recent history.

The 13 were charged with conspiracy to distribute heroin. The agents present at the arraignment silently celebrated as the judge set bail: Crazy Willie, $3 million. Ernie Boy, $1.5 million. Lorenzo Di Chiara, $1 million. Joe the Crow, $1 million. During the arraignment, Ernie Boy swiveled in his chair to search out Gerry. When he found our seats in the back, he cocked his finger, pointed it at Gerry and pulled the trigger. He was later sentenced to 25 years and fined $75,000. Joe the Crow got 20 years and an $80,000 fine. We got our victory. I had a lot to celebrate. Two months after the bust, when Noe flew to New York for a brief visit, I proposed. We immediately set a date for the wedding and began making plans. I was flying.

Crazy Willie was sent to the federal penitentiary in Terre Haute, Indiana, where he continued running his street operation through the pay phones. We would have never known, but Di Chiara flipped as soon as he reached his jail cell. Lorenzo, as I soon started calling him, was an overweight, amusing Sicilian in his early 40s. As with many of the aging gangsters I saw, his hair made its retreat over his scalp as his belly charged forward. He left Sicily 15 years earlier after robbing a bank, finding his niche in New York's crime families. His ties to the old country made him the perfect middleman for Crazy Willie's heroin ring. And the perfect informant for us. He was the first Sicilian DEA had ever flipped, which made him something of a treasure. I was assigned to guard Di Chiara and his family at their spacious Brooklyn home while he fed us information about the Bonanno family and the inner workings of the heroin trade. In return, his bail was lowered by a quarter of a million dollars. Later, the judge gave Di Chiara a 15 -year suspended sentence and three years probation. The sentence set off alarm bells throughout the underworld.

After a few weeks of round - the - clock duty, I came to like the man. He had a gorgeous wife and two little girls, whom he treasured. I felt bad for them. It seemed almost unreal this tightly- knit family could walk under such ominous clouds. Still, I had trouble listening to him jovially describe his heroin business while my mind played tortured images of people destroyed by his product. "It's what I do for a living," he told me. "We export it like we export olive oil." He was a businessman. Nothing personal.

Di Chiara knew his former partners wanted him dead, but he showed no signs of stress, cracking jokes and showering me with hospitality. We offered to put them in the witness protection program, but Di Chiara's wife stubbornly refused to leave their home. He was not about to argue with her.

We protected him as best we could. When we were forced to pull out a few weeks later, he took his family to the relative safety of their upstate cottage. Gerry and I visited them a few times a week to make sure they were okay. I looked forward to having dinner with his family, sampling bottles from his wine cellar while Di Chiara cooked for us. His daughters began calling us "Uncle Cele" and "Uncle Gerry."

I saw them for the last time in the spring of 1983. The agency was sending me to Terre Haute, Indiana, with about 15 other agents. Armed with reliable information from Di Chiara, we were going to bust Crazy Willie. Again.

With a local judge's blessing, the prison's public phones were all tapped by the time we arrived, waiting for us to settle into our new home in the Terre Haute post office and slip on our headphones. We monitored the phones 24 hours a day, taking shifts and listening for Crazy Willie's coded messages. Di Chiara was right. Willie was running his heroin operations over the phone, calling East Harlem to make the deals and direct his remaining forces. For the next four months, we listened.

I took a room in the Ramada Inn a couple of miles from the post office. I was always on alert. Nobody else could understand Crazy Willie's Spanish Pig Latin, so the other agents rousted me at all hours when his voice came on the line. I felt like a volunteer firefighter in a town full of arsonists. Curious postal workers followed me with their eyes as I shuffled in and out of the second floor storage room. They knew the feds were up to something, but they didn't know exactly what.

Every day, Willie was on the phone with his wife, who slipped through our first net and continued coordinating his deals. He wasted no time building a miniature syndicate in the penitentiary. We frequently heard the voice of his new lieutenant, a prisoner called Fat Gigi. Other prisoners were recruited to work the phones when he was occupied. We jotted notes in our post office cubby, identifying each suspect by voice. Our intelligence went straight to New York, where other agents tracked down Crazy Willie's East Harlem cronies.

As we closed up shop in Terre Haute that summer, another wave of New York agents arrested more than a dozen of Crazy Willie's heroin runners, this time including his wife. In Indiana, Crazy Willie, Fat Gigi, and their budding prison syndicate were arraigned in jail, where a judge tacked a healthy stretch onto each of their sentences. I wondered if we had finally fulfilled the FBI director's boast and "immobilized" the mob's heroin ring. I began to doubt. The sense of triumph I felt after we arrested Ernie Boy and Joe the Crow had slowly dripped away as I listened to Crazy Willie chatter his twisted orders from prison. Watching him arraigned for a second time, I felt like we were fighting a Medusa, chopping off one head while another slithered around to bite us on the ass.

Noe and I were married that July in McAllen. We put the wedding together ourselves, watching every dime. The simple ceremony was performed by a justice of the peace in the lobby of the Hilton where Noe worked. None of it mattered when we exchanged our vows. Noe looked beautiful, our families were there to share the moment with us, and Gerry was at my side as the best man. Noe and I had put away as much money as we could for the honeymoon. We spent a week in Cancun, the booming resort town on the tip of Mexico's Yucatan peninsula. For the first time in three years, we had an entire week to ourselves, no worries, no responsibilities. We swam in the Caribbean, toured the ancient ruins nearby, ate, shopped, made love. On the seventh day, we returned to New York.

The agency did not give its blessing. As soon as headquarters heard of our nuptials, they launched an internal investigation on me. OPR decided my relationship with Noe during the investigation of her stepfather constituted "poor judgment" on my part. When I explained my difficult position at the time - - a rookie agent eager to please his bosses, who wanted to bend the rules to nab a doper - - they listened patiently, then stuck a warning letter in my personal file. It was a slap on the wrist, but it stung. The reproach did not bother me for long. I had a new life to build. Noe moved into my studio in the autumn of 1983, filling the place with her energy. We walked for hours through the city as I played tour guide, showing her my favorite haunts. A month later, she came into the room smiling. She was pregnant. I was going to be a father.

I was having trouble just being a husband. I was working too many hours and too many weekends, jumping out of bed at odd hours at the ring of the phone. After a few precious months together as husband and wife, Noe and I agreed she would go home until the baby came. She needed to be with family through her pregnancy. Meanwhile, I put in for a transfer to Peru, where a spot would soon open. I did not want to raise a child in New York.

With Noe gone, the days seemed to crawl. Winter arrived with howling winds and snowdrifts, making me long for Texas again. The luster had faded from the job. Group 6 disintegrated. Gerry transferred to a new post in Italy, departing New York a legend. He was presented the Attorney General's Award for his role in the Lucchese/Bonanno heroin bust. I asked to be assigned to JFK International Airport, searching for a new challenge and a change of scenery. On February 1, 1984, Lorenzo Di Chiara's hogtied body was found in the trunk of his black Mercedes near the Canarsie Pier. He had been strangled.

Discrimination, subtle and otherwise, came with the job, but I gave it little thought until another Hispanic agent approached me one day with a proposition. Jesus Muniz was leading a legal attack on DEA for barricading us from the better jobs. If I wrote a check, I could join the class action suit.

Every Hispanic agent I knew fell into the same trap. The agency assigned us to surveillance, wiretap monitoring, and translation duty while other agents got the plum assignments required to climb the DEA ladder. We worked long hours helping our Spanish -challenged counterparts build cases against Puerto Ricans and Dominicans, then stood in the shadows while they received the credit and the promotions.

That did not bother me as much as the problems Hispanic agents found when a non-Spanish speaker tried to back us up during an undercover bust. We could go over the plans and the "bust word" a hundred times, but busts never went down as planned, and the language confused Anglo agents trying to pick out a single word from our rolling chatter. Several times I found myself improvising to suspicious dopers after my backup failed to catch the bust word.

I filled out a check and joined the class action suit with about 200 other Hispanic agents. We all agreed it was time to fight the favoritism that gave the paper- pushers the rewards while we put our tails on the line every day. I could hear other agents muttering under their breath, raking me with suddenly hostile glances. Jeff , who put in for a Special Achievement Award for me after the big heroin bust, then resubmitted the form after DEA ignored the first request, was pragmatic: "you guys do what you have to do. " He understood.

I spent the spring of 1984 with the DEA enforcement group at JFK, helping U.S. Customs and immigration officials separate the dopers from the throngs of passengers. We watched the international flights closely, scrutinizing Colombian passengers who fit our profiles of traffickers. Every week we caught someone trying to carry cocaine into the country in their baggage or strapped around their waist. I became an expert in spotting false bottomed suitcases, studying the lining for signs of tampering. The traffickers, mostly poor people recruited as mules for the growing cartels, preferred tough Samsonite luggage. We kept a small power drill in the office, which we used to poke holes th rough the hide of the suitcase. More often than not, the bit came out with a stream of white powder. The mules were easy to flip. We staged controlled deliveries, following them to their drop points and arresting anyone who showed up to claim the cocaine.

Some airport employees ran their own ring. The traffickers would put a suitcase full of coke on an Avianca flight, sending it to New York without an owner. After the baggage handlers locked it up in the unclaimed luggage cage, a supervisor would sneak in at night and carry it away for delivery.

They were not the only officials to tap into the river of drug money. For the first time, I witnessed corruption within DEA ranks. The mules were easy targets. Some agents could not resist shaking them down, pocketing jewelry and cash, then warning the frightened captives to keep their mouths shut if they wanted to avoid jail. I gritted my teeth and kept quiet. A few more months and I was out of there.

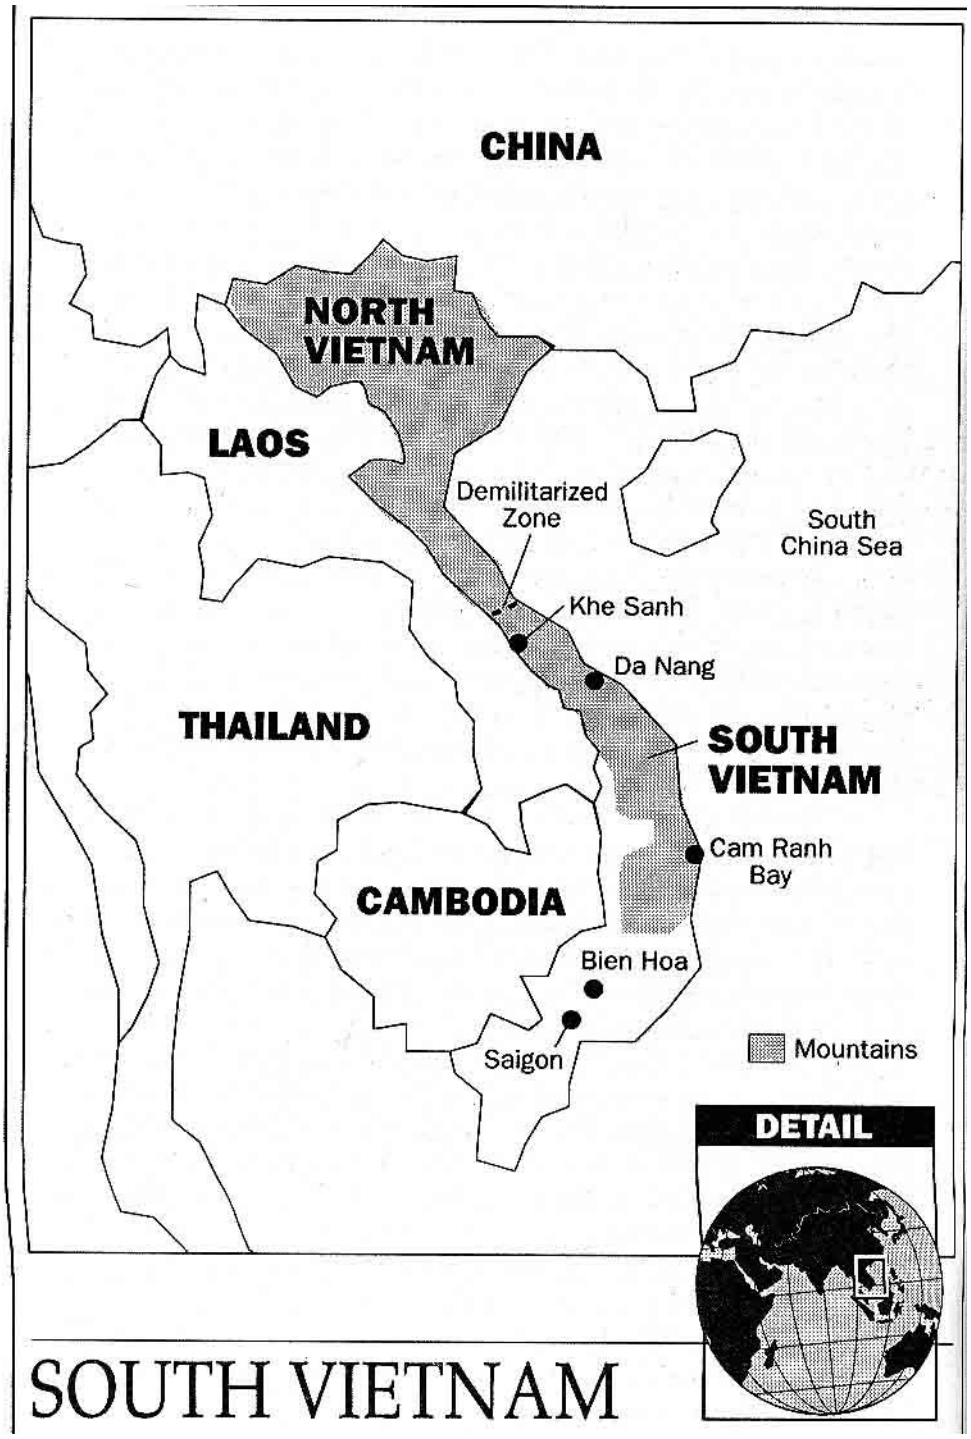
The job quickly became routine: Coke from Colombia, Nigerians carrying heroin, Jamaicans with marijuana. Once I picked up the smuggler's tricks, I could almost unconsciously spot the mules as they streamed through the gates. I waited for word from headquarters on my transfer, calling Noe constantly to assure her we would be together soon, listening to her describe the tiny life growing inside her.

Crystal Bianca was born April 7, 19 84 in a McAllen hospital as I paced nervously in the waiting room. Noe picked Crystal, her favorite character from the TV show Dynasty. I chose Bianca, a South American name, as a tribute to our new life together. My transfer to Peru was approved. I was ready to go back to the jungle, where I would be at home. And after four years of wrenching narcotics from the streets of New York, I wanted to attack the source.



SOUTH VIETNAM

The Monitor
McAllen, Texas
Thur., Oct. 14, '71 Pg. 15A

IN VIETNAM — Sgt. Celerino Castillo, III, son of Mr. and Mrs. Celerino Castillo Jr. of Pharr, has recently been assigned to the 544th Replacement Co., Guard Force at Cam Ramh Bay, Vietnam. He received his basic training at Fort Lewis, Wash., and graduated from non-commisioned officers school at Fort Benning, Ga. Sgt, Castillo is a 1970 graduate of Pharr-San Juan-Alamo High School.,

Above: Celerino Castillo in Viet Nam

Left: Celerino Castillo

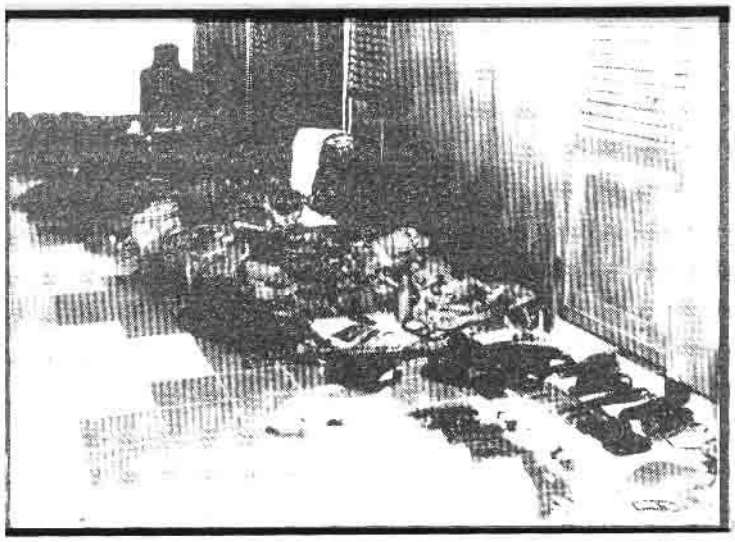
Below: Cele in brown vest, with Guardia de Hacienda in the Sierra Mountains between Mexico and Guatemala. We lost 6 Guardias in said operation.

Above: Celerino Castillo and George Bush. Jan. 14, 1986

Below: Jimmy Carter and Celerino Castillo

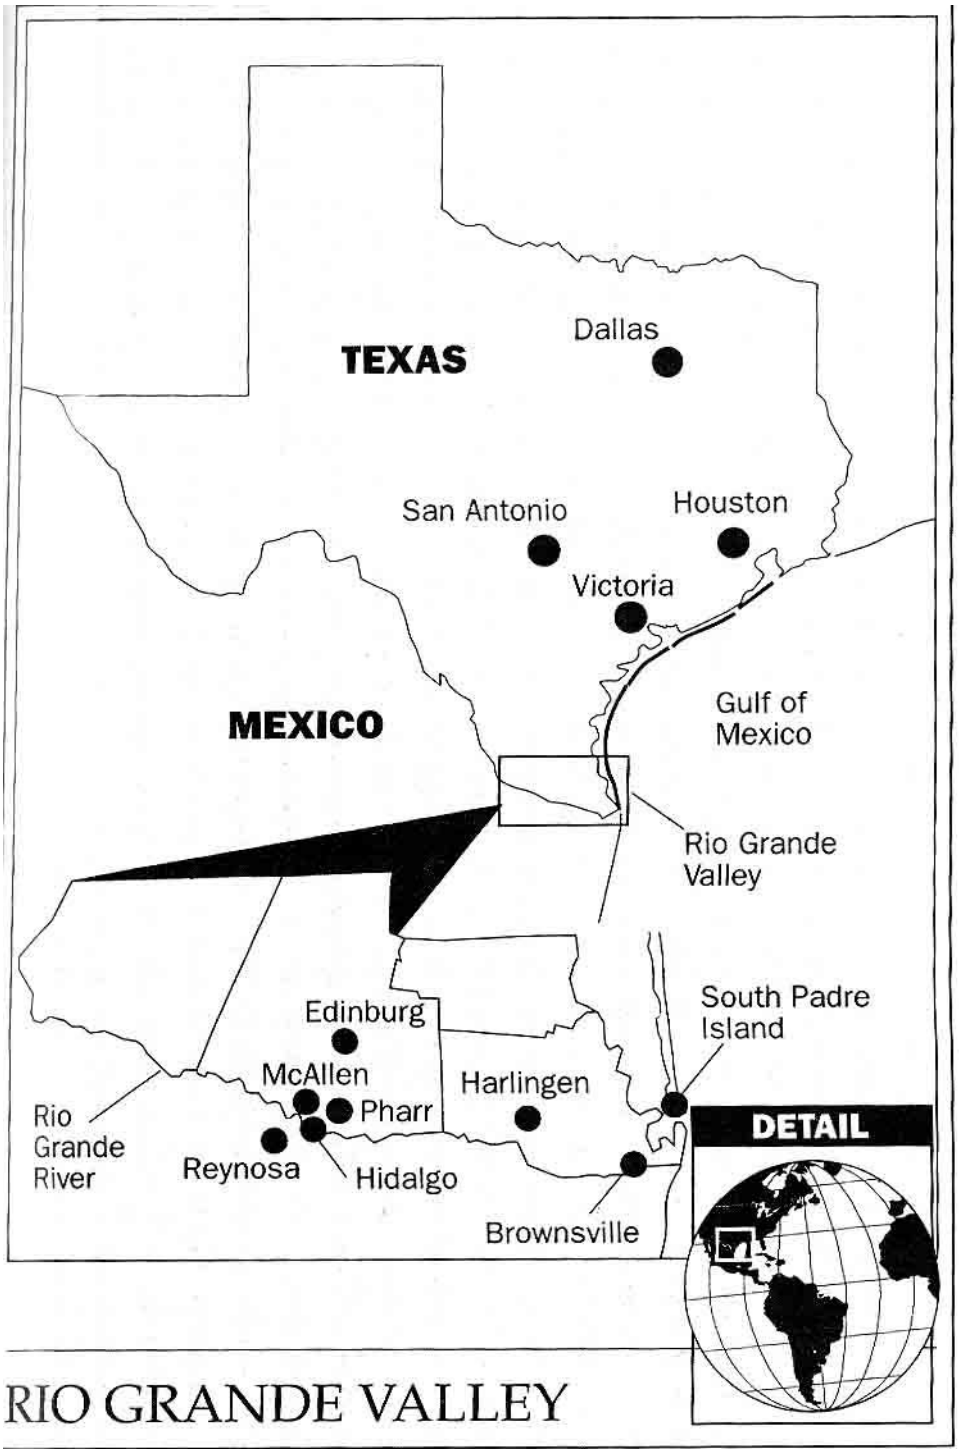
Left: Dan Quail in El Salvador 1989

Below: Celerino Castillo in Guatemala



Above: Military Gear sized from Wally's Residence.

Below: Celerino Castilllo's DEA I.D. with gun and cuffs



RIO GRANDE VALLEY

Five

Riding the Condor

Lima, Peru - August, 1984

My first weeks in Peru were a honeymoon. Noe, Crystal, and I finally became a family. We found a house in El Molino, an upper crust subdivision clinging to the foothills of the towering Andes mountains. Here, South American suburbanites could live in the undulating hills, blissfully ignorant of the social upheaval in their country. Lima's teeming millions were on the other side of the hills, on a thin strip of coastline sandwiched between the ice-capped 18,000foot peaks and the Pacific Ocean.

Noe and I unpacked boxes, smiling to each other as Crystal scurried around the house like a cat, inspecting every comer. Our one-story white stucco house was a true hacienda: Red-tiled roof, fireplace, garden, and a backyard swimming pool, all surrounded by a high wall. A maid and a gardener reported for duty as we settled in. The U.S. government paid for everything. I paced the back yard in my bare feet, breathing deeply, feeling the tension from my last months in Manhattan drain away. It was a peaceful island in an uncertain country. For the next two years, this would be home.

I preferred the view of the craggy peaks to the Lima skyline. The sun warmed this side of the mountains, while Lima seemed wrapped in a perpetual blanket of ocean fog, called garua by the city's roughly 5 million inhabitants. The mist rolled off the Humboldt Current, a 200- mile wide river of cold Antarctic water that acted as a massive air conditioner, moderating Lima's climate as it sliced past the Peruvian coast on its way north. It almost never rained in Lima, but the Humboldt provided ample moisture, pumping its clammy mist into the city's pores.

The fog could not shroud Lima's suffering. The City of Kings, founded by the Spanish conquistador Francisco Pizarro after he vanquished the Incas in 1534, was now the City of Beggars. As Noe and I carried Crystal through the former seat of Spain's New World empire, I could not shake my feeling of melancholy. The proud cathedrals and broad plazas seemed lost in the tide of humanity washing into the capital by the thousands. The city poured over its old boundaries and rotted at the edges, ringed by endless, reeking barrios. Like every former Spanish colony in the Americas, Peru's pecking order flowed along bloodlines: The light - skinned descendants of the Spaniards jealously guarded their power, money, and land, while the descend ants of the natives worked the earth and filled the slums. The mixed blood mestizos held the middle ground, edging into the ranks of those above and below.

The country teetered between democracy, dictatorship, and chaos: Peru has had all three in the 20th century, as the military and civilians oust one another in a seesaw battle of elections and coups. In 1980, the poor found a fist in Sendero Luminoso, or Shining Path, a Maoist guerrilla movement led by Abimael Guzman, a former philosophy professor. A student of Mao Tse Tung's Chinese cultural revolution, Guzman launched his attacks on the government from the mountains of the Ayacucho district, calling himself the "fourth sword of Marxism," after Marx, Lenin, and Mao.

President Fernando Belaunde Terry beefed up the military's rural outposts to fight the rebels, but generations of animosity between the rich and poor helped Sendero Luninoso tighten their ideological grip on the remote villages. From their mountain strongholds, the guerrillas periodically crept into Lima to detonate reminders of their discontent. Every week, another Puff of smoke floated above the skyline, followed by the echoes of the blast.

Suddenly, Manhattan seemed like a good neighborhood.

I knew the dangers when I put in for the transfer. DEA assured me living overseas would bring my family under the government's security blanket. In New York, agents and their families faced the same urban hazards everyone else did. Here, we joined the small, privileged diplomatic class, ostensibly protected from Peru's dark side. Our house was surrounded by an eight-foot concrete wall topped with broken bottles embedded in the cement-like spikes. Serious -looking security guards, provided by the U.S. Embassy, roamed our small compound 24 hours a day.

I watched Crystal with a mixture of wonder and awe, marveling at how she grew in the months I was away. I felt like a father for the first time. As Noe put the finishing touches on the house, I took Crystal into the backyard pool, supporting her tiny body as she splashed and kicked. She giggled, then coughed out a mouthful of water. It was sink-or- swim time. When I pulled my hands from under her, she sank for a moment, then reflexively closed her mouth and fought her way to the surface.

The Incas discovered cocaine long before Pizarro discovered the Incas. The coca leaf held a treasured position in Peruvian civilizations for centuries. Peasants chewed it to ward off the symptoms of poverty: fatigue, hunger, depression. The leaves gave them endurance working at high altitudes. The jungle tribes used it to dress wounds. Inca priests and nobles believed chewing the leaves brought them closer to the Sun God. The priests fed it to their human sacrifices, numbing them to the icy winds as they slowly froze to death on some lonely Andean peak.

But when the Spaniards discovered the intoxicating leaves the savages were munching, coca went commercial. When Europeans mixed it with wine, "Vin Mariani" became literally a sensation. Bavarian soldiers used it in the 1880s to fight off fatigue. Sigmund Freud took it as he worked. It was the active ingredient in Coca-Cola when the soft drink debuted in 1886; cocaine gave the drink its stimulating effect until the government cracked down on it and convinced the company to switch formulas in 1906.

In Peru, the government conceded the leaf's ancient place in society. Everywhere I looked, peasants sold and munched legally grown coca leaves. It seemed the entire adult population walked through life with a wad of green in their mouths, which produced a milder high than snorting powdered coke. For centuries, the Peruvians grew enough coca to satisfy their needs. Then Americans came to crave the powder. Peru would never be the same.

Peru was the world's top producer of coca leaves. A thousand mile long coca belt stretched along the Andean lowlands through the center of the country, where the Peruvian government estimated peasants illegally grew and harvested about 125,000 acres of the tall, innocent -looking coca plants. The U.S. government's estimate was almost three times higher. In reality, counting Peru's illegal coca fields was as difficult as estimating how many Americans grew marijuana in their closets. No one doubted Peru's position as the king of South America's cocaine crescent, which arced across Colombia, Bolivia, and Peru. From these remote, hostile jungles, some of the world's poorest people grew the world's richest crop. They were mining white gold.

We were sent to stop them.

DEA's Peru office consisted of a cluster of offices in the bowels of the heavily- armored U. S. embassy building in down town Lima. Guards appeared everywhere you turned, patrolling the tall, iron -barred fence jutting between the American diplomats and the encircling Peruvians. Cement - filled drums squatted at the gate to prevent car bombs from hurtling into the compound. The embassy bore numerous political scars. A mob attacked it in 1925 when Calvin Coolidge tried to arbitrate a border dispute between Peru and its arch rival, Chile. Now the United States wanted to make war on cocaine, which pumped more than half a billion dollars into Peru's ailing economy, tainting all but the most resolute officials. We were prepared for more violence.

When I joined DEA's Peru office, it was staffed with five agents and an intelligence specialist. Our boss, country attache Peter Rieff, did not pretend to speak the native tongue. Gene Castillo, a short, fortyish agent from New Mexico, spoke a patchy, Americanized Spanish. I wondered how he worked undercover in Lima with such an accent. Another agent, who apparently landed the job through connections in the DEA brass, spoke just enough to order a decent meal. Speaking fluent Spanish obviously was not a prerequisite for the job.

The atmosphere within the department reminded me of McAllen's internal rift. An unspoken tension drifted through the office, carried in the agents' tone of voice and occasionally surfacing in hostile innuendo. Some agents refused to work with others because of personal spats or philosophical differences. The two Spanish -speaking agents already there carried much of the workload, in addition to serving as perpetual translators for the other agents.

To make matters worse, one of the veteran agents refused to work undercover. Fred Villarreal, a cigar-smoking Mexican-American, told me he was finished putting his life on the line fot DEA. His attitude shook me. Villarreal started out like me, a young, aggressive Hispanic ready to shake up the narcotics underworld. Over the years, a combination of age, family responsibilities, and a steady diet of slights and abuse from DEA convinced him to leave the dangerous stuff to the younger guys. The more we talked, the more I felt like Ebeneezer Scrooge, receiving a visit from the ghost of Christmas future and wondering if I could change my fate.

After a week in Lima, I kissed Noe goodbye, packed a duffel bag, and flew Air Peru 250 miles northeast to the center of the coca crescent, eager to start my hunt for the clandestine labs and airstrips hidden throughout the forbidding Amazon Basin. Rieff sent me off with instructions to make contact with the Guardia Civil, Peru's national guard. DEA could not spare another agent to work the jungle with me. The Guardia would be my backup.

I chose Tingo Maria as my base. The jungle town, hugging a wide spot in the Huallaga River, had charmed generations of tourists with its frontier allure and lush scenery. This was the Huallaga Valley, cupped between low mountain ranges in the eastern lowlands, where the Amazon jungle pawed at the feet of the Andes. Fifteen years before, the valley supported sustenance fanning and small villages. Now, in 1984, it was the heart of coca country. The valley alone was believed to produce enough raw coca leaves to feed half of America's cocaine habit. Tingo Maria was its capital, the place known as the "White City. "

I found the Guardia's headquarters just outside of town, a tall green building ringed by guards. Their commander welcomed me warmly before whisking me to the offices of their U.S. trained anti narcotics unit, the Unidad Movil de Patrullaje Rural (Mobile Rural Patrol Unit), who patrolled the jungle searching for small cocaine labs. In theory, UMOPAR was to wipe out the valley's processing network, while a government program dubbed "Eradication and Control of Coca Leaf Planting in the Huallaga Valley" attacked the fields, whose workers yanking the coca plants out by the roots. I discovered a very different reality.

The cocaine lab was close. Our informant assured us we would find it soon. The camouflaged figures behind me traded sarcastic comments, their irritation growing with every mile. The sun pulled the sweat through our skin, stinging our exposed, sunburned necks. I glanced at my watch. Four hours of hiking and no lab in sight. The informant sensed my doubt. He checked over his shoulder every few yards, as if expecting us suddenly to turn back. He picked his way through the branches reaching across the faint jungle trails, ducking and weaving like a boxer. Very soon, he said. The lab was just ahead. After only a couple months in Peru, I realized I could spend my entire career pushing through the vines in search of small huts scattered throughout the valley.

I had traded my sneakers and New York street clothes for jungle gear, tucking my jeans into an old pair of boots I kept from Vietnam. It felt good to haul an M - 16 through the trees again, covered in camouflage, listening to the jungle speak. MYUMOPAR companions carried nasty-looking FAR rifles, unconsciously sweeping the barrels across the path. They swore to themselves quietly, waving away the mosquitoes zeroing in on their exposed necks. For the next kilometer, the only sounds cutting through the damp air were the wet smacks of hands against skin and the warning cries of monkeys and birds announcing our arrival.

Our target, a small coca lab, lay tucked in the far reaches of this green hell the Peruvians called "la montana". The labs we discovered up to this point followed the same blueprint: Wooden shacks or open-air labs reeking of kerosene, stuffed with cut coca leaves ready for conversion into paste. The peasants who built these crude structures formed the second broad level in the cocaine pyramid. They were the poseros, or processors, who purchased piles of coca leaves from the hundreds of cocaleros, the peasant growers who converted their small plots into coca farms.

The poseros needed more than a hundred pounds of the thumb -sized green leaves to make one kilo of paste, which they sold to Colombian runners in light planes. The system allowed the valley's poor to earn a decent living for the first time in their lives. The rural farmers must have shook their heads in amazement when they discovered the new cash crop. By converting their fields to coca, they could easily double, triple, even quadruple their annual income. The plants matured in a few years, yielded as many as six crops a year, repelled pests naturally, and grew in poor soil. They did not even have to take their crop to market: The Colombians and poseros went door-to-door, leaving stacks of dollars in their wake.

The Colombians cartels finished the refining process in scattered clandestine labs, using nearly four kilos of paste to make a kilo of pure, white cocaine hydrochloride for american nostrils. For every dollar they paid Peru's coca farmers and processors, the cartels earned more than twenty dollars from American buyers.

Suddenly, the informant stopped, searching the wall of latticed vegetation for the path. Locating it, he held the branches aside and motioned us ahead. The telltale smell of kerosene led us to the lab, a few dozen yards off the main trail. The Peruvians, young recruits looking for jungle glory with UMOPAR, circled the flimsy structure once before peeking inside. The hut contained the typical posero's starter kit. Several plastic jugs filled with kerosene and other chemicals lined the back of the hut, next to a huge pile of green coca leaves. Two waterproof sacks bulged with finished coca paste ready for delivery.

In front of the shack, a large trench lined with a plastic sheet held a leafy soup of coca and kerosene spiked with sulfuric acid. The poseros stirred and mashed the soup constantly, helping the chemicals leach the narcotic from the leaves to produce paste. It had to be the world's most lucrative cottage industry. From these tiny labs sprung Peru's top export.

One of the UMOPAR men pulled out a half -empty jug of kerosene, sloshed it around the base of the hut, then touched his lighter to the damp wood. We stood like boys at a campfire, mesmerized by the climbing flames. When the thin walls buckled in a cloud of sparks, we turned and filed back to the main path, cursing the return trip in advance. Another small victory in the drug war, I mused. Not the dagger to the center of Peru's cocaine heartland I ached to deliver, but another tiny nick to annoy the cartels.

After spending some time in the Huallaga Valley, I learned to measure my progress in small increments. I was a guppy in a piranha tank.

The Colombians owned Tingo Maria. Its quiet farming traditions, its institutions, and its morals crumbled like dry clay as residents jumped into the coca economy. The leaf touched every member of the community, from the adolescent coca paste couriers to the shop owners who suddenly found a market for high-dollar electronics at the edge of the jungle. New pickup trucks rumbled over the dirt streets, clearly identifying villagers on the cartels' payroll. The national currency, the sol, was nowhere to be found. The town ran on dollars, attracting cash hungry bankers from Lima who flew in to buy U.S. currency.

The Colombians knew they had a DEA agent in their midst. When I passed them on the streets, they greeted me with arrogant smiles. If I made too much trouble, they could swat me like a mosquito. Thugs armed with sharp machetes would gladly hunt down a man for pocket change. They obviously did not consider me a threat. Their rule was absolute.

The cartels played both sides by shoveling cash into the jaws of prospective enemies. They purchased the loyalty of Tingo Maria's military officers, who declared a truce with the traffickers. On Sundays, I wandered past the soccer fields and watched Peruvian soldiers playing football with the Colombians. Snubbing the government's periodic efforts to wage war on coca, the military insisted its sole responsibility in the valley was protecting the peasants from Marxist subversives. Cracking down on the local coca farmers and traffickers, they argued, would drive the peasants into the arms of Sendero Luminoso.

The military, sent into the valley by President Belaunde to fight the guerrillas, opened their new base in Tingo Maria just a month before I arrived in Peru. It quickly became the most Popular post in the country. Most of the soldiers at the base bribed their way into Tingo Maria. It was a small investment, given the payoffs. By the time they rotated home, they could earn enough coca-tainted dollars to retire on. Most of them just blew their money in the cantinas and shops, learning the meaning of conspicuous consumption. Some seemed to do nothing more than cruise the streets in their new Nissan and Toyota pickups, like high school boys angling for girls.

Sendero Lwninoso quietly accepted the dollars as well, using the protection money to arm its guerrillas. I laughed at the irony of a Marxist movement selling out to such brazen capitalists. With only the Guardia to worry about, the Colombians new into any one of dozens of clandestine airstrips, picking up loads of coca paste and occasionally returning with AK-47s and other weapons for the rebels.

The Guardia and UMOPAR hurled themselves against this wall of corruption, taking me along for the ride as they rolled through the countryside in their four-wheel -drive trucks, hunting for coca. We destroyed the labs we found, dousing them with kerosene and setting them aflame. Any poseros caught at the scene went to jail, or what passed for a jail. The Guardia warehoused them in a long bank of concrete holding cells with hand -welded bars. The police took their frustration out on the prisoners, tossing hissing sticks of dynamite near the cells and laughing as the prisoners flattened themselves against the bare walls. The shaking peasants were processed, then sent to the tin-topped corral the Guardia called a prison.

I never saw a Colombian arrested in the valley. They counted their profits while the peasants swallowed the punishment, paying for their sins with large chunks of their lives.

I traveled to Tingo Maria every other week, slicing through the jungle for days at a time. A new stress tugged at the back of my mind. I was falling into selfish habits again, throwing myself into the job at the expense of my family. I pushed the guilt aside, promising myself I would spend more time with them. Tomorrow. Next week. But this assignment was too important. I was convinced my tour in Peru would become the highlight of my career. Noe seemed to be adjusting well. The disappearances were part of my job, I explained, more for my own benefit than hers. Noe said she understood. I was not so sure.

When I was home, I spent as much time as I could with Crystal. I took turns with Noe, groaning out of bed in the middle of the night to change diapers, or heat formula on the gas stove, or carry her around the dark house until she cried herself back to sleep. Our guard watched, an amused expression visible over his coffee mug. I wondered if any of us could protect her if the cartels decided I was too deep into their business. I glanced at the broken Coke bottles filled with stagnant water atop the cement wall. I felt vulnerable.

Rieff was no help, grumbling at me every time I walked into the office after another extended absence. He wanted regular phone calls to make sure the cartels had not had me chopped into pieces. There were no phone booths in the jungle, I argued, and the phones at my little hotel in Tingo Maria never worked when it rained. I assured him I could take care of myself.

Rieff seemed to think I could work the Huallaga Valley from Lima, ducking into Tingo Maria once a week to talk to informants, then maybe jump into the trees to look for a lab. I knew better. We depended on the Guardia Civil totally. As foreign agents, the Peruvian government had us on a short leash, with no power of arrest, no permission to interrogate, and only an advisory role in anti narcotics operations. DEA could never make a dent in the valley's coca economy without a constant presence: mine. The cartels' money could quickly wash away any progress we made, buying off our allies and placing our missions at risk.

I got in the habit of presenting my friends at the Guardia with small gifts. I picked up liquor and American cigarettes at the U. S. Embassy commissary, or brought them jungle knives, trying to show my appreciation. I presented an old Vietnam flak jacket of mine to a stocky, raw-mouthed major who prided himself on his toughness. He immediately pulled it on and ordered one of his men to shoot him. The man grinned. He was not about to pass up the opportunity to plug an officer. He wasted no time, leveling a small -caliber pistol at the major and pulling the trigger.

The stocky major grimaced as the shot spun him sideways, buckling his knees. He removed the vest and pulled the flattened slug from the shoulder, grinning and rubbing what promised to be a world class bruise. After that, the major wore the 30-pound vest everywhere. I frequently spotted him jogging around the base with it bouncing on his bare chest. "It's good exercise, " he said, clapping me on the shoulder.

Many of the Guardia resisted the drug money and mounted a real effort to flush the cartels out of their country. We stepped up the patrols, following every lead the informants brought in. The Guardia seemed energized when I accompanied them on their raids. My presence gave them a measure of protection. "The military and the Colombians would not think twice about eliminating us if we make too much trouble," an UMOPAR officer told me during one patrol. "With an American, they'll be more careful. " I considered that small comfort. With the military and the guerrillas blasting each other across the valley, my death could easily be explained away as an unfortunate attack by the rebels.

Every lab we hit shook the web. More and more peasants complained to the Colombians, who finally took their problem to the military. They wasted no time placing the Guardia under de facto house arrest, forbidding anymore patrols into the jungle. To justify confining the Guardia to their base, the Army claimed the guerrillas now infested the entire valley. Allowing anti -narcotics patrols would be too dangerous, they said. I wondered to whom they referred.

After twiddling their thumbs for a few days, the Guardia changed tactics. With a lone Cessna and tips from informants, they pounced on the cartels' airborne couriers skimming the treetops. They took me along on many of these missions, pointing excitedly when they sighted a drug plane. The surprised dopers ignored their orders to land. They assumed the Guardia was putting on a show. After all, the bribes were already paid to assure them safe passage to

Colombia.

During one airborne chase, our pilot swooped down on the Colombian bird with the sun at his back, broadcasting his orders to land before the cartel pilot realized he had company. We were close enough to see the Colombian flipping us off. We maneuvered on top of the Colombian plane, dropping to within 50 yards of the dopers as they tried to figure out where the invader was. The Guardia pilot yelled a suggestion to the UMOPAR members inside, who nodded and raised the side windows. They poked their rifles through the windows and rattled off a dozen rounds at the Colombian plane's wings, puncturing its fuel tanks. We followed the crippled plane until it sputtered and crashed, ripping a scar in the jungle canopy. The UMOPAR gunners returned to their seats with satisfied smiles. It was the first of several one-sided air battles I watched. All ended in the fiery deaths of cartel pilots and runners.

Despite these small victories, I became restless. I felt mired in quicksand, pumping my legs frantically but getting nowhere.

We could bum coca huts and shoot down loads of paste until I retired without crippling the valley's coca trade. Throwing a cocalero in jail affected the cartels about as much as arresting a corner pusher in New York. They were replaceable, interchangeable pawns. We needed to attack the Colombians' big investments. The Guardia estimated the valley contained 43 clandestine airstrips and a number of major labs. I wanted to know where the hell they were.

The men in UMOPAR feigned ignorance. I turned to informants, who insisted many of the Guardia officers were also on the cartels' payroll. It made sense. The Colombians were loading too many planes. There was no way the small-time labs we destroyed could produce enough paste to keep the cartels supplied. The Guardia was tossing me bones, guiding me to the poseros' tiny kerosene labs while protecting the Colombians' cocaine factories.

The next time I visited the UMOPAR, I tracked down the commander. "Where the hell are the big labs?" I demanded. He shrugged. "We know where they are. But the military won't let us patrol in those areas. They claim those are Sendero strong holds, which is their jurisdiction."

I finally called Rieff, explaining my predicament. I hoped we could convince someone in the State Department to convince the Peruvians to intervene and throw the balance more to our favor. He told me to forget it, obviously not wanting to make waves. The Colombians, satisfied after a couple months of quiet, allowed the military to allow the Guardia to resume their patrols. I tagged along, feeling like a damn puppet.

On February 2, 1985, Noe and I climbed to the top of a low mountain overlooking the city and watched a sea of Peruvians gather below. Hundreds of thousands stood shoulder to shoulder, hoping for a glimpse of Pope John Paul 11, who stopped in Lima as part of a 17 city tour of South and Central America. We sat in the sun, holding hands as Peru forgot its horrors for a day.

Four days later, Noe told me she was pregnant again. The warmth spread over me. Crystal had become the center of my world, my greatest treasure. This time, I secretly wished for a boy. I lingered at home for a few days, playing with my daughter and trying to cram a month's worth of attention into a every hour. I began to consider staying in Lima. I could work out of the office; spend more time at home; make hamburgers every Friday. It didn't last. I returned to Tingo Maria the following week.

In mid - February, I ventured into the hills with a column of nine or ten Guardia officers. Our informant said he could guide us to a lab he discovered the week before. An hour into our march, we ran across a small camp, a rough assembly of wooden huts topped with palm fronds and aluminum. It looked abandoned. We approached slowly, looking for signs of life. Each hut bore a red hammer and sickle symbol, clearly identifying its owners: Sendero Lwninoso. The informant looked at me. I looked at the commanding officer. He looked at the huts for a moment , then motioned us to move on. Some of his men clearly wanted to turn back rather than risk stumbling upon a Sendero patrol. As we passed, the faces of women and small children appeared like phantoms in the darkened doorways. Everyone checked their weapons.

The smell reached us first, a rancid musk floating on the heavy air. Then the drone of the flies. Something had died.

Then we saw the bodies. An arm reached from the brush. A bloodied leg lay nearby, bent at an unnatural angle. We dragged six of them from the foliage, covering our nostrils with bandannas. Some of the bodies had their arms bound behind them with cord. Others were butchered, their arms neatly hacked off. One was decapitated. Genitals were missing, eyes gouged out, tongues sliced from mouths.

One of the new UMOPAR recruits scrambled away and retched loudly. The informant made the sign of the cross. He was in shock. "That's my uncle," he muttered, motioning to a bloated corpse. He pointed to the next body. "That's my cousin. " He continued down the row, identifying all six bodies. All were male relatives of his. They were hanged. The rope left serrated red marks where it chewed into their necks. I hoped they were dead before the mutilation began.

We turned back, forgetting the lab. We knew we were one wrong move from joining the mutilated men we left behind on the trail. The informant could hardly think. He babbled along the trail, wondering aloud if they simply ran into the wrong people at the wrong time, or were butchered as a warning to him.

I thought about my family. After that, I tried to spend more time in Lima, but it was never enough. The guilt struck at odd times, reminding me how many hours I worked, how many nights my wife and baby slept alone, wondering where

I was, wondering if I would emerge from the jungle again. Noe commented on how much energy I poured into my work. She did not finish the statement: I was neglecting her and Crystal. She didn't have to. I reminded myself every day. I closed my eyes, trying to purge the image of the mutilated bodies from my mind. I had to get my family out of Peru.

The news rippled through DEA, carried by phone, cables, and office memos. On March 6, 1985, the bound, broken body of DEA agent Enrique "Kiki" Camarena was discovered wrapped in plastic in Vista Hermosa, Mexico. Four armed men had forced Camarena into a car February 7, after he left the U.S. Consulate in Guadalajara. DEA held its breath for a month as the Mexican police searched for Camarena. They found him just off a road in an area swept earlier by the police. The Mexican drug traffickers decided he had become too much trouble and assassinated him, along with a Mexican pilot who occasionally worked for him. Both were tortured before they died. I felt suddenly empty and paranoid. It could have been me. It could have been a lot of us.

At the end of March, I flew to New York to testify at the trial of one of the minor organized crime figures I helped bust during my tour with Gerry Franciosa. While I was in town, I attended a special mass for Camarena at St. Peter's Cathedral in Manhattan. Camarena's wife and son were there. Somber, uniformed men and women filled the pews. It looked like the entire DEA office and half the New York police force attended. The questions filled my head: Is this "war" worth a man's life? Why are we risking everything and accomplishing so little?

I could see similar questions lingering in the eyes of my old friends as I searched them out after the mass. Everyone was upset about Camarena's death, for the loss of a good man as well as the crossing of some unconscious line. In DEA's small, insular world, Camarena's assassination triggered a roiling anger that coursed through the agency like a current. The consensus among the agents was DEA waited too long to apply the necessary pressure on the Mexicans. From what we heard, the Mexican police could have located and freed Camarena before the traffickers executed him. Camarena warned the DEA brass things were getting dangerous in Guadalajara. The agency ignored him.

The story sounded chillingly familiar. On my way back to Lima, I thought of the bodies lying next to the dirt path, hacked and scattered like broken toys. I had a lot in common with Camarena. So did a lot of agents stationed abroad. DEA simply was spread too thin to fulfill its political dreams across the globe. As my plane headed into Lima, I wondered how Camarena's death would change DEA's policies in Peru, Mexico, and a dozen other countries. I also wondered how his death would change me.

After Camarena's murder, Noe was in my thoughts constantly. I wanted to stay in Peru, but this was no place for a pregnant woman. I feared for her safety in Lima, as well as four unborn baby's. The water was horrible; milk was in short supply; the guerrillas constantly knocked out power to the city. The area shook every few days with faint tremors. My brain played What If in a constant loop: What if we could not find a decent doctor? What if Sendero

Luminoso launched an attack on the suburbs?

What if I was abducted?

Noe worried too. Our wealthy Peruvian neighbors traveled with armed bodyguards. She knew if I shook the web too hard, the cartels would take revenge on my family. I could do little to comfort her. That Easter, when we all flew home for a brief vacation, I returned to Lima alone. Noe and Crystal stayed in McAllen without me. It was better that way, I told myself.

In July, 1985, Peruvians elected a new president, 36-year old populist Alan Garcia. Young and immensely popular, Garcia took a special place in Peruvian history by becoming the first civilian president to succeed another civilian president since 1945. Garcia stoked the nation's hope by vowing to raise wages and play hardball with foreign bankers to defer payments on the country's $13.5 billion debt.

To an outsider, it looked like JFK sweeping into town on inauguration day: A young, charismatic leader claiming the city as his aging predecessor departed. The explosions broke the spell. One bomb, packed inside an orange Volkswagen, erupted two blocks from the U.S. Ambassador's residence on the eve of the inauguration. The military occupied the city for the ceremonies, filling the air with the accumulated noise of helicopters, sirens, and shouting. The guerrillas still wiggled through. They marked the occasion by setting off a series of car bombs across the city. That night, they hit the electrical towers, blacking out entire sections of the city.

It was a particularly violent month in the drug war as well. In Colombia, five gunmen casually walked up to a taxi caught in rush hour traffic and pumped 13 bullets into Judge Manuel Castro, killing him instantly. Castro's execution followed his effort to bring charges against 16 people connected to the drug related slaying of Rodrigo Lara Bonilla, Colombia's justice minister. On the July 24, a cocaine lab belonging to alleged drug lord Reynaldo Rodriguez Lopez exploded in Lima. The DEA investigation of Rodriguez, which I participated in following the blast, led us to a travel agency he owned. There, we found a stamping machine. For a fee, Rodriguez could stamp your passport with any visa you wanted. Inside his fire -stained man sion, police found an 84 - line switchboard with direct connections to the Mexican consulate and the homes of a number of Peruvian police detectives.

The new Peruvian president wanted fast action against the cocaine cartels operating in his country. Immediately after taking office, Garcia approved the operation his predecessor rejected: Operation Condor was on.

DEA, CIA, and the Guardia Civil came up with Condor. After prodding, CIA provided us satellite photos of the jungle to help us spot labs. The Colombian national police told us the remote area concealed a number of cocaine labs.

I flew to Leticia, Colombia, the country's only toehold on the Amazon. A contingent of Guardia Civil officers accompanied me, dressed in their best uniforms. We had an appointment with the Colombian national police to plan the first joint anti-narcotics operation ever attempted by the two countries. The Colombians and Peruvians called it Operacion Condor, in honor of the massive vulture Peruvians adopted as a national symbol. DEA dubbed it Relampago, the Spanish word for Lightning.

We met at the Colombian national police headquarters outside Leticia. The two groups took to each other instantly, quickly becoming a unified team. The Peruvians needed the Colombians. Despite Garcia's purges - - he dismissed 37 generals in his first two months in office - - the Guardia still received no cooperation from the Peruvian military. The Colombians had the airplanes and equipment the operation would need. They knew cooperation meant more U.S. aid.

Our target was one hour from Leticia, deep in the Peruvian jungle in an area known as Callaru. Satellite photos supplied by the CIA revealed a huge dirt airstrip, more than a mile long. The strip, located near the Rio Tigre, was the hub for the area, where the jungle hid an estimated I 10 airstrips and an untold number of clandestine labs. Neither the Peruvians nor DEA had ever worked the area. It was virgin territory. I circled the mile -long airstrip with a red pen. Phase I would begin there.

I became more and more wrapped up in the operation, losing track of the days. Noe and I talked on the phone constantly throughout her pregnancy. I missed her and Crystal terribly. I could not bear to think about Crystal growing up without me. I worked harder, exhausting myself to keep the thoughts from taking hold of my mind.

For several weeks, we exchanged cables with the Colombians and met in Leticia to plan strategy. As a cover story, we told everyone we were conducting joint drug enforcement training. Even the Colombian anti -narcotics unit did not know exactly where we planned to strike. We kept them out of the loop, fearful of cartel spies within their ranks. But Leticia was a traffickers' stronghold. Word leaked out the two countries were planning a big raid. When our informants told us of the leak, we pushed up the timetable. We knew we had to move fast before the dopers could react.

On August 13, 1985, two Bell helicopters filled with adrenaline pumped Colombian and Peruvian police lifted from Leticia, bound for the target airstrip. I sat in the second chopper, next to Colonel Zarate, the Peruvian officer in charge of the operation. He was one of the most honorable men I met in any uniform, a young, energetic officer from Lima. After this operation, he would become a general. I peered into the eager eyes around me. None of these men had participated in an air assault. I hoped they could keep their heads if the dopers attacked.

The trip brought me back to Vietnam. We flew at treetop level, the skids almost brushing the green carpet. Thousands of macaws, disturbed by the thumping rotors, erupted from the trees and flew below us in a red, blue, and green cloud. They were so close I was tempted to reach through the open hatch to touch one.

After 45 minutes, the strip suddenly appeared below us. It was a beautiful sight, 50 yards wide and a mile long. Five small planes sat at one end of the brown ribbon, next to a low building.

The lead chopper landed at the far end of the runway, dropped off its half -dozen passengers, then lifted and banked for the return trip to Leticia, where the remainder of the force waited.

The shooting started immediately. The traffickers, flushed from the building by the choppers, aimed and fired, too far away to do any damage. The Colombians and Peruvians returned fire. I silently cursed, willing them to hold their trigger fingers until they closed the distance. My chopper banked and circled over the river. We spotted two sleek cigarette boats, one blue, the other red, cutting a foaming wake through the murky water. One dashed straight for the overhanging branches near the bank, disappearing from sight. The other tried to outrun us. We could see three men inside, one at the wheel, the other two watching the approaching helicopter and shouting instructions to the driver. The chopper pilot banked for better angle, tipping us sideways. A Guardia officer gripped the edge of the hatch, took careful aim and fired a burst from his assault rifle. Smoke poured from the boat's wounded engine. The driver yanked the wheel violently, pointing the boat toward the shrouded bank.

We broke off our pursuit to back up the first team. Our feet hit the packed dirt a moment after the skids touched. We quickly divided, leap - frogging down the airstrip.

We caught up with the first team at the far end of the runway. The traffickers were gone. They obviously decided against a pitched battle and fled into the trees. I took a quick head count. No one was hit.

With several men posted to watch for the dopers, the rest Of us cautiously surrounded the wooden building at the edge of the runway. I spotted a hand painted sign nailed to the wall: Casa Brava. Inside, several picnic tables lined the wooden floor, holding half eaten plates of steak, chicken, and soup. The screened -in front room also held a few rickety cots, a big Sony TV, and a VCR. A large generator hummed behind the building. To the left, a large kitchen contained a deep freezer with enough steak and chicken to feed a platoon. Open - faced shelves held rows of insecticide, canned food, condiments, and burlap sacks of rice. Against the opposite wall, large plastic barrels brimmed with fresh water.

Across the runway from the building, the dopers erected stout posts supporting huge sheets of black plastic. The crude hangars were large enough to shield two planes. Drums of aviation fuel flanked the hangars in neat rows. I tried to imagine how many plane loads of cocaine departed from this compound every day.

By the time the helicopters completed their shuttle service for the night, 30 men milled around the isolated strip, gaping at the traffickers' lair. We spotted a bulldozer and several other buildings, but it was too dark for more than a cursory inspection. As dusk settled over the jungle, we saw figures scurrying across the center of the runway. The dopers were regrouping. We divided into teams and prepared for another assault.

I organized the perimeter, placing a pair of men every 10 yards around the building and up both sides of the runway to form a U -shaped defense line. When they settled in, Colonel Zarate assigned a team of men to cook a meal. The men rotated from their posts to feast on the traffickers' stocks. I passed from one station to the next, urging them to stay alert and sleep in shifts through the night. If the dopers returned with more men, we needed every eye and ear tuned to the trees.

An hour later, we heard a voice crying from the darkness. "Ayudanze, estoy herido. " Help me, I'm wounded.

The perimeter broke into excited chatter. Probably an ambush. I moved toward the treeline, turning to ask for a volunteer. The conversation stopped. Finally, Colonel Zarate drafted one of his men to accompany me. I whispered a few instructions, then we dropped to our knees, crawling through the undergrowth with flashlights and M- 16s.

The voice continued, a low moan in the darkness. "Ayudan-me, por favor. "

If this is an ambush, they've found a convincing actor, I thought. I whispered to the Peruvian, "Watch out around us for movement. " He nodded. We crept the last few yards.

The man lay sprawled on his stomach at the base of a huge tree. The beam of my flashlight played over his prone body. He looked about 25, with a medium build and light complexion. His striped shirt was covered in mud. Blood stained his dress pants a deep crimson. I hissed at him, ordering him to identify himself. He was a pilot, shot in the ass as he fled the assault.

We crawled back toward the airstrip, dragging him behind. I still had not ruled out an ambush. We reached the perimeter, facing a line of gun barrels. Two Peruvians immediately yanked the pilot to his feet and began slapping him around. Then the Colombians joined them. A real show of cooperation, I thought sadly as they aimed kicks at his wound. The pilot was close to tears. He claimed he just arrived at the airstrip and was waiting for his load. He said he did not know anything about the traffickers' operation. The answer brought more fists from the unconvinced police. They assigned two guards to the pilot and made him sit upright in the dirt the rest of the night. 'the shooting started around 9 p.m. First one rifle, then two, then a dozen opened up, muzzles flashing in the darkness as men yelled and branches snapped. I broke into a running crouch, looking for the team who started the shooting. I reached them, screaming a cease fire order for the tenth time. The guns fell quiet. The pair stood shoulder to -shoulder, squinting at the treeline.

"I saw them," the first man whispered, pointing into the dark jungle.

"They're out there, " his companion added, nodding vigorously.

"Did they return fire?" I asked.

"No. ' ~

"Then don't fire unless you're fired upon, " I said sharply. I was annoyed. If one side of the perimeter aimed the same direction as the other, they could kill each other in the crossfire. I trudged back to Casa Brava.

An hour later, the perimeter erupted again, rifles chattering into the stillness. The officers insisted someone was out there, but no one could be sure where. I repeated my warning.

At dawn, I crept through the trees around the perimeter until I reached the area where the shooting began. Four bullet riddled bodies lay scattered among the broken branches. I summoned the men from that section of the perimeter. The pair who started the shooting stared wide-eyed at the bodies. Their buddies burst into fits of laughter.

The monkeys never had a chance.

We spent the morning inspecting the area. The compound was huge, with buildings tucked into the foliage. We followed well - worn footpaths about 50 yards into the jungle and discovered a sign painted with a skull and crossbones: "Peligro. No fumar. " Danger. No smoking. We had found the lab. The large wooden lab sat at the center of a cluster of buildings, all joined by screened walkways. Blue plastic protected the roof of every building.

The first thing I saw were the vats, huge metal containers straight out of the Frankenstein movies, with gauges and tubes snaking between them. Kilo-size cardboard boxes lay scattered everywhere. Rows of heat lamps suspended from a large board served as cocaine dryers. We found generators, drums of coca chemicals, an electric mixing vat with revolving arms, and testing equipment.

This was no coca paste operation. They were producing cocaine hydrochloride. Col. Zarate looked simultaneously excited and troubled. This was unheard of in Peru. We always assumed Peru made all the paste and Colombian labs churned out the finished product. This place turned the conventional wisdom on its ear. A new, two-story refinery under construction near the lab alarmed the colonel even more. If the traffickers completed it, the new lab contained equipment to make an even stronger, purer product. One hundred percent pure cocaine.

Next door, a wooden building was labeled "deposito. " The lab's cocaine warehouse. It was empty. If there was cocaine here when we landed, they moved it quickly.

Each path ended at another building. We discovered six dormitories stacked with enough bunks to house 600 people. A rough hut sat on the banks of the river, where most of their supplies obviously arrived by boat from Leticia. One shack held nothing but 55 -gallon chemical drums. Next to the lab, another shack contained 15 bunks shrouded by mosquito netting. A sign tacked to the wall read " Guardia. " The lab had its own security force. There was even a rough-cut shrine made of three wide boards nailed into a triangle. The makeshift shelter, mounted atop a thick post, looked like a tiny A - frame house. It shielded a small statue of the Virgen de Loreto, the guardian of this sprawling Amazon district. A wooden cross was nailed to the peak of the shrine.

The wounded pilot insisted he knew nothing about the whereabouts of the paste. But he rattled off anything else he could think to tell us. He said Casa Brava usually employed about 25 people, who served as the ground crew, cooks, and guards for the busy drug hub. He explained the cartels' rigidly compartmentalized operation. Neither the pilots nor the Casa Brava staff were allowed into the rest of the compound, which was run by a different crew. The guards who slept behind the mosquito netting next to the lab would shoot a nosy pilot as quickly as an invading police officer.

We found a number of radios in the guards' shack and clicked them on. Somewhere in the jungle, the traffickers were carrying on a conversation. "They'll never find the stash," one voice reassured another. "It's too well hidden."

We knew they could not have taken the product far, but after a lengthy search of the compound, we were about to give up. Then a shotgun blast ripped through the trees. A Peruvian Guardia member aimed and fired again, whooping as he chased a large toucan. The panicked bird hopped from branch to branch, desperately trying to flap a shattered wing. I asked the Peruvian what the hell was going on. He said he wanted to eat the bird. I was not about to question another country's eating habits.

He continued the chase as we watched. The bird stopped, exhausted. The Peruvian crouched, aimed carefully, and pulled the trigger. The shotgun kicked, followed by the sound of splitting wood. The toucan disappeared in a cloud of feathers, which fluttered to the ground as the bird dropped like a stone.

We heard a yell and turned toward the toucan hunter. He was gone. The ground had swallowed him. We rushed to the edge of the hole and peered in. He thrashed about in a puddle of water. All around him lay bulging white sacks covered in leaves and shards of rotten wood. The stash.

In the days following the raid, the compound became a zoo. General Walter Andrate, the head of the Guardia Civil, flew in with Rieff, who suspended his eternal state of distress over my jungle disappearances to congratulate me. Our DEA counterparts from Colombia showed up with a video camera to film the entire area. Peruvian and Colombian officials descended on the site like press hungry vultures, gesticulating and posturing for the international and local media.

People milled around the compound like ants, oblivious to our gentle requests not to move anything. It was total chaos. The joint leader insisted on unlimited access for the cameras. They wanted the pens to scribble and the shutters to click. It looked good for the United States, which financed the operation. It looked good for the Colombians, who knew they were considered the world's cocaine Wild West. Most of all, it looked good for Peru's new president, who could boast of his country's victory over the traffickers. I avoided the cameras as best I could. For an undercover agent, exposure meant failure. I huddled with my paperwork, writing endless reports and filling dozens of clipboard pages with an inventory of the compound.

A few days later, the South American newspapers published multi - page articles on the raid, repeating the numbers: Four tons of coca paste seized from a lab capable of churning out 500 kilos of pure cocaine a day. The Peruvian government estimated the compound's value at $500 million. It was the biggest cocaine lab capture in South American history.

We seized five planes, three with Colombian registration, one Bolivian, and one American. We never found the wounded cigarette boat or any of the Colombians who fled into the night. We captured assault weapons, military uniforms, boxes of ammunition, and a firing range with hand-drawn silhouettes, pocked with bullet holes. We later discovered the lab belonged to Arcesio and Omar Ricco, members of the Cali cartel.

For the rest of the week, I supervised phase Il of the operation, buzzing over the treetops in search of other buildings and airstrips. We discovered another hut a half mile from the main compound, a communications center jammed with radio equipment. We found six smaller airstrips in the immediate area, one made of cement. The crude compounds, none approaching the size of the first, were dynamited, disappearing in a shower of splinters. We arrested a few young Colombian pilots at the airstrips. They were flown to Colombian jails.

When I wandered into the Lima office a week after the raid, I picked up a local paper left on my desk and almost choked on my coffee. My photo, snapped by a Reuters photographer with a telephoto lens, took up a quarter of the page. Luckily, I was wearing a large pair of sunglasses, but the DEA insignia on my camouflage jacket was unmistakable. A number of other papers published the photo in their spreads on the operation, with headlines screaming "Contra narcotraffico." Against narcotrafficking. Wonderful.

After Operation Condor, the dollars flowed into Peru at an unprecedented rate. The Peruvian government rewarded the Guardia by allowing them to use the confiscated planes for their anti narcotics operations. DEA rewarded the Peru office with a new base in the Huallaga Valley, named Santa Lucia. The agency built a runway and barracks in the jungle, then sent more agents down with three Hueys to increase the pressure on the cartels.

I flew home in late September, arriving just before Noe went into labor.

My son was born in the same McAllen hospital where his sister arrived. We named him Celerino Castillo IV. I immediately nicknamed him C4.

Back in Lima, Rieff was irate when he saw my photo in the papers. When I returned from McAllen, he insisted my tour be cut short, claiming my safety could not be guaranteed now that my picture was undoubtedly tacked to the cartels' bulletin boards. I shrugged it off and flew back to Tingo Maria. UMOPAR gave me a much warmer welcome, crowding around to congratulate me on Condor's success. Rieff remained obstinate, muttering I was going to get killed, or, worse, get someone else killed. I was beyond caring anymore. The cartels knew who I was. They surely saw my photo. But after a year in the Huallaga Valley, I knew the jungle better than their men did. I had spun my own small web, connecting strands throughout the valley to warn me of trouble. I trusted my Guardia friends, I trusted my informants, and I trusted my instincts.

I was not the only one receiving unwanted media attention.

On August 11, 19 85, an article appeared in The Washington Post described how the Nicaraguan rebels fighting the Sandinista government were sustained after U.S. funding ran out the previous May. The article exposed the man who held the Contras together almost single-handedly: Lt. Col. Oliver L. North.

Through September, I spent as much time as ever in the valley, running over the trails with UMOPAR. I avoided Tingo Maria, just in case the cartels decided to use me as an example. Ironically, both Rieff and the traffickers feared a repeat of the Camarena tragedy. Rieff knew his career would suffer a major blow if an agent under his command was killed by dopers. The cartels knew the wrath of two governments would descend on them if another DEA agent died in the line of duty. Neither wanted the kind of debacle then playing out in Mexico.

The real reason my boss wanted me out of the country, I thought, was my relationship with the Guardia and UMOPAR. Instead of consulting with Rieff, the generals and colonels came straight to me for advice about anti -narcotics tactics. They knew I spent most of my time in coca country. They trusted my instincts. Rieff resented that.

The word came at the end of September. Rieff called me into his office to tell me I would be transferred to Guatemala on temporary duty, or TDY. In addition, he refused to recommend me for promotion to the next level. I could not believe what I was hearing. When I first arrived in Peru, he told me the promotion was automatic after spending a year in the country. I looked at him, the irritation showing in my eyes. He gave me a half - hearted shrug. I just had not paid my dues, he explained.

Six

Tightrope

Guatemala City, Oct. 10, 1985

As Copa flight 313 droned north over the jungle, I ran down my mental checklist on Central America. Leftist rebels, a permanent fixture in the region, had locked the military governments in Guatemala and El Salvador into bloody wars of attrition, while the poor multitudes in both nations, as usual, absorbed the crossfire. War would complicate my job considerably. To a government fighting for control in its own backyard, everything else becomes a distraction. But Uncle Sam's aid bought hospitality for the State Department's political operatives, a jungle playground for the U. S. Marines, and a tiny beachhead for DEA.

In Guatemala, the locals would be hostile. The government carried a lingering bitterness toward the United States since the Carter Administration cried human rights violations and yanked U.S. military aid in 1978. The Israelis quickly moved into the power vacuum to take care of the Guatemalans, training the security forces, financing the war machine, and running covert operations against leftist movements in Nicaragua and other republics. Under Reagan, a trickle of U.S. military aid resumed by 1985, but the Guatemalan government had new friends and was slow to warm to U.S. intelligence and drug agents poking around their jungles. I knew from working with Israeli intelligence in Peru they could give me all the information I needed to sort through the chaos. I made a mental note to look them up as soon as I got settled.

As we moved into Guatemalan airspace, another leadership shuffle was taking place below. The country had a new democratically - elected government, headed by Marco Vinicio Cerezo Ar6valo, a Christian Democrat still gloating over his triumph at the ballot boxes. The long - suffering Guatemalans had endured a string of military dictatorships that stretched back, virtually unbroken, to 1954, the year the CIA toppled Jacobo Arbenz Guzmin. Arbenz had the audacity to legalize the local Communist Party and launch an agrarian reform movement, passing out 400,000 acres of uncultivated land to the peasants. Unfortunately for the would -be reformers, some of the idle land belonged to the United Fruit Company. At the time, Senator Joe McCarthy's red hunting was burning in the public mind, the Soviets had the Bomb, and the CIA was a budding agency looking to connect its first body punch against the Communist threat. The CIA called their pet coup "Operation Success, " and declared it a victory over Communism in Uncle Sam's back yard. But Arbenz had helped seal his fate by playing Robin Hood with a U. S. company's land, and the lesson had not been lost on the Guatemalan establishment.

We became the protective uncle in Guatemala, installing Carlos Castillo Armas as president in 1955. Our policy settled into a comfortable, conservative groove. The United States wanted stability in Guatemala, and backed every right -wing regime that came down the power alley, looking the other way as they crushed any opposition and wiped tens of thousands of their people off the face of the earth. Three decades later, not much had changed. Although the Guatemalan Christian Democrats traced their birth to 1955, after Arbenz fell, and carried the banner of moderate reform, the party forged blood bonds with the military as it ascended. Cerezo would assume the presidency in January, but he would need the okay from the men with the medals and the gold braid before he so much as broke wind in his new office.

My ears popped, breaking my train of thought as the plane dropped into its landing pattern. I leaned from my aisle seat to take in the view. In the dusky glow of a dying sun, Guatemala's famous volcanoes filled the landscape, lined up like sentinels along the spine of one of the world's most unstable areas - - the perfect symbol for a land forever erupting, both geologically and politically. The Guatemalans had named two of them Volcan de Fuego and Volcan de agua - fire and water. Steam hissed from the cone of Volcan de Fuego. Fire ruled Guatemala's horizon.

The tires yelped against the tarmac, and the airliner taxied into Aurora International Airport, where my new boss would be waiting. I knew Bob Stia, the country attache to Guatemala, from New York, where we had both worked as agents. We never had more than a passing conversation, and I remembered nothing more than general impressions: a tall Italian guy with straight gray hair and a mild personality. My DEA friends told me Stia had connections in Washington who pulled strings to get him the Guatemalan job. I shook my head. It was crazy to send someone like Stia to Central America. He had three strikes against him as soon as he hit Guatemalan soil: he was Anglo, his Spanish was abysmal, and he didn't know the culture. At least he wasn't out in the field trying to build cases. Hell, it's just TDY - - temporary duty, I thought as the center aisle filled with passengers. Myjob was catching dopers, not puzzling over policy. I reached the gate and picked my way through the crowd, searching e semi-circle of faces. Stia walked up and extended his hand, smiling. "Wel come to Guatemala," he beamed.

The next hand I shook belonged to Russell Reina, a short, stocky Mexican -American with aclose-trimmed beard and black hair combed straight back. Everything about Reina cried out for attention. Gold everywhere - - pinky rings, bracelets, and a 50peso gold medallion hanging around his neck. His money clip, fashioned out of a 20-peso gold piece, probably set him back $300. He favored guayaberas, not the familiar Mexican shortsleeved variety, but the Panamanian style with long sleeves, cufflinks and embroidered fronts. He looked like a Class One doper. Reina carried what we called a "fag bag," a satchel Mexican men sometimes carry that looks like an oversized purse. His 9mm automatic would be tucked in there along with everything a man normally carries in his wallet. At first I thought Reina had just come from an undercover assignment and left his doper clothes on, but I soon realized it wasn't an act - - he really dressed that way.

At the time, Reina was the DEA's lone agent in the Guatemala office, which covered four countries: Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras and Belize. As country attache, Stia performed mostly administrative functions and served as a liaison between the U.S. Federal agencies and local law enforcement authorities. I could not imagine one agent covering four countries, especially when two of them had become major political hot spots. Enrique Camarena's murder in Mexico underscored the need for DEA agents to back up one another in unstable countries, and Guatemala and El Salvador made Mexico look tame. I was only on TDY, but the agency planned to take advantage of the sudden doubling of their manpower. Stia put me in charge of the aerial eradication program: reconnaissance missions over the marijuana fields and the opium poppy plantations spreading across the Guatemalan highlands. Some creative genius had named the operations Olive Oyl and Popeye.

As we walked toward the exit, Stia turned to me and said, "You're in a different world now. I'm going to take you to our local cathouse. " I grinned. Temporary duty would be interesting here. I later discovered the bordellos had become a first-day ritual for most U.S. agents setting foot in Guatemala City - - CIA, DEA, State Department, or military. We piled into Stia's brand new DEA Volvo and drove to the Hotel El Dorado, half a mile from the airport.

The El Dorado carried a five -star rating, and stayed plump from a steady diet of North American businessmen on expense accounts. I checked in at the desk, flashed my diplomatic passport to get the discount rate given to embassy staff, and the clerk handed me a key to a comer room on the sixth floor. I rode the elevator up and turned the lock. A king -sized bed dominated the room, across from the necessities: a desk and cable TV with CNN. Parting the drapes, I took in the view.

By pure luck, the room made the perfect agent's perch. I could read the identification numbers on planes coming and going from the airport, and the large picture windows offered a clear view of the front of the hotel and down one side. I threw my suitcase on the floor and took the elevator down to the lobby where Stia and Reina were waiting.

We drove down Avenida de las Americas, the busy thoroughfare that bisected Guatemala City and cut through the wealthier neighborhoods. The four-lane road was split by a broad esplanade dominated by tall trees and landscaped shrubs. The greenery halted at major intersections to leave room for huge statues of Spanish conquistadors and Mayan rulers locked forever in circling traffic. At the end of the avenida, we stopped at a large, one - story brick home where a security guard slouched in front of an iron fence. Stia parked in the street, and the guard finally recognized the norte americanos and waved us through he gate. He assured Stia the car would be in good hands while we were inside.

The three of us looked like bit players in a bad detective show - - Reina in his flashy gold, Stia in his conservative suit, and me in my usual boots and jeans. Stia knocked. Right out of that same bad detective show, a small panel slid open in the steel door, and the brown eyes framed in the opening flashed recognition. The little panel clacked shut and the door opened. If those eyes had seen police uniforms, the owner would have made a hasty appearance to inform the officers who they should call to confirm the required bribe, or mordida, had been paid. A heavy square lock would hold back anyone trying to throw a shoulder at the door, and inside, a couple of stout sliding bolts would stop any uninvited guests without a battering ram.

The house looked like any cookie - cutter suburban dwelling you would find in the States, except for the nouveau - Graceland decorating. A huge living room to the right held blue and maroon velvet sofas and velvet drapes sweeping down to dark plush carpeting. Paintings of women in provocative poses adorned the walls. Beautiful ladies in evening gowns reclined on the wall -to wall sofa, awkwardly mimicking the classical poses on the wall. This was Maruja's, named after the madam who ran the place. Stia and Reina told me the house was legendary in Guatemala for its expensive women. As we crossed into their den, the women - girls, really, none of them looked older than 18 -- sat up expectantly, waiting for a signal to do business. A waiter in black tails sauntered over, a white cloth draped over his cocked left arm, and steered us to the next room. More girls filled the J-shaped bar in calm anticipation. A bartender in a white smoking jacket busily mixed drinks in front of the full-wall mirror.

A couple of the girls immediately joined us for drinks. They asked me to choose a companion, and I pointed to a Chinese girl with long black hair. She quietly joined me at the bar and I ordered drinks. Her black silk dress cut into a low V in front, showing her bare breasts when she leaned forward. In perfect Spanish, she introduced herself as Li. She looked about 16. As we chatted, she told me she had come to Guatemala from Taiwan a few years before, and the cash she earned at the cathouse supported her parents and several brothers and sisters.

We spent a good two hours at the house, making small talk with the girls over drinks. Reina told me I could lay for an hour, or spend a little more, about $25, to bring her back to my room for the night. I passed. I had been away from my wife for six months, with no indication the separation would end, but I was too tired for anything but sleep. Stia and Reina wanted me to become familiar with their haunts. Like the hotel, the cathouse held eyes and ears that could be prodded into divulging information we needed. The girls knew we worked for the U. S. Embassy, and they could tell us when Nicaraguans and Colombians hit town. I wondered if the information flowed the other wayas well.

Stia and Reina dropped me off at the hotel. I watched the news for a while ' flipped through the Miami Herald's Latin American edition, and collapsed into bed. I had a good feeling about Guatemala. The capital throbbed with the energy of milling masses, and after more than a year in Peru, I needed some time away from the jungle. I clicked off the light, and promised myself I would visit the McDonald's I had spotted from the air.

Stia briefed me on Guatemala during breakfast the next morning in the hotel restaurant. The Guatemalan military, he said, was giving up the government on paper, but would always hold the real power in the country. Despite Cerezo's popular election, minister of defense Hector Alejandro Gramajo called the important shots from his position at the center of the Council of Commanders, a tight ring of military leaders whose decisions overshadowed any of the ostensibly democratic decisions made by the president or the congress. The Guatemalans knew they had to put a democratic face on their Draconian system to stay on Washington's good side, and Cerezo had shown no indication he would test his leash. As far as DEA was concerned, we operated at the at teh pleasure of the military.

After breakfast, Stia shuttled me to the DEA offices, located within the U. S. Embassy. I received an embassy 1. D. and met Ambassador Alberto Martinez Piedra, a diminutive CubanAmerican, for a 10-minute welcome -to- Guatemala briefing. He never mentioned, and seemed completely uninterested in, the DEA's Central American drug program.

Stia guided me through the embassy compound to the cluster of rooms where the United States government masterminded its strategy to rid more than 8,000 square miles of foreign territory of narcotrafficking. My office held a desk, a chair and a file cabinet, with a large window overlooking Avenida de las Awricas. The thick bulletproof glass had been gouged by a slug. The natives constantly peppered the building with automatic weapons, our elderly secretary explained wearily. The U.S. government had long ago surrounded its diplomats in Guatemala with a stout iron fence anchored in cement, with concrete -filled steel drums ringing the front entrance. If the55 gallon speed bumps didn't stop the occasional car bomber, the flock of security guards pacing the grounds would open up with automatic weapons. It was just like Peru. The shit was flying, and Americans were on constant alert.

Stia brought me into his office to continue my briefing. He switched to El Salvador, where I would be spending much of my time. The United States had bought and paid for the country. We chose the presidents, scheduling elections when the previous puppet wore out his welcome. This year, Christian Democrat Jos6 Napole6n Duarte had beaten Roberto d'Aubisson, who was linked to the country's rightwing death squads. The election should have been a turning point, but the ruling elite and the military had a chokehold on the republic that no mere politician could pry loose.

Despite the ongoing reign of terror against the peasants, the dollars kept coming. A republic the size of Massachusetts absorbed $1.5 million a day in U.S. aid - - more than $ 100 for every man, woman and child - - yet the military government still could not exterminate the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, or FMLN, the leftist guerrillas who pestered them from the suburbs and the mountains. They both hung on, dragging the civil war into its sixth year and making terror and gratuitous violence a part of every Salvadoran's existence.

Three days after my arrival in Central America, Duarte would walk unarmed into the war zone and plead with the guerrillas to release his daughter. The rebels had snatched her a month earlier, hammering home the reality that no one was immune to El Salvador's incestuous enmity. Death squad killings had slowed since Duarte took office, but that was like telling mothers in Florida to take heart because the number of alligator attacks on children had declined.

The military/political storm troopers of both sides continued snatching people from their homes, and while the Salvado air force dropped bombs on guerrilla positions, the guerrilla knocked down power lines, mined roads, and kidnapped mayors Whoever pulled the trigger, ordinary people died. The GuatemaIan government harbored some resentment toward the Unit States, but at least they maintained some measure of control; the only constant in El Salvador was insanity.

DEA had never worked the country, and we were hoping establish some contacts and land our first seizure. I soon realize they didn't expect much more than recruiting informants and documenting any drug activity their eyes and ears picked up, actually busting a trafficker and grabbing his shipment would b6 gravy, as far as Stia was concerned. Later, as I leafed through the files, I discovered the drug war in this corner of the globe amounted to piles of reports documenting traffickers' identities and movements, but few seizures and arrests. We were playing traffic cop, taking down the license numbers of speeders, but never writing any tickets. Stia maintained a we're-doing-the best-we -can attitude. As he continued the briefing, it became obvious that the agency's priorities here mirrored those in Peru. First, stay out of trouble with the locals. Second, don't make the U.S. government look bad. Third, try to make life difficult for the traffickers.

Then Stia nonchalantly brought up the subject that would dominate the remainder of my DEA career: the Contra resupply operation. He described the covert U.S. operation to the Nicaraguan rebels, run out of Ilopango air base near San Salvador by Marine Lt. Colonel Oliver North. Stia said the National Security Council, where North worked, picked up where the CIA left off after our government cut off aid to the Contras.

The third of five Boland Amendments prohibiting U.S. assistance to the rebels had been in effect for a year at this point, and in April, 1985, the House of Representatives had rejected $14 million in non-military aid to the Contras, despite President Reagan's energetic lobbying for his favorite rebels:

As you know, the Sandinista dictatorship has taken absolute control of the government and the armed forces. It is a Communist dictatorship, it has done what Communist dictatorships do: created a repressive state security and secret police organization assisted by Soviet, East German and Cuban advisers; harassed and in many cases expunged the political opposition, and rendered the democratic freedoms of speech, press and assembly, punishable by officially sanctioned harassment, and imprisonment or death.

I truly believe - - the history of this century forces me to believe - - that to do nothing in Central America is to give the first Communist stronghold on the North American continents a green light to spread its poison throughout this free and increasingly democratic hemisphere.

Change the nationality of the advisers, and the President's speech would have described our allies in Guatemala and El Salvador perfectly. Nicaragua was not about to let its neighbors show them up, however; the day I arrived in Central America Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega Saavedra suspended civil rights, such as free expression, the right to assemble publicly and privacy of mail and home. Ortega said "the brutal aggression by North America and its internal allies has created an extraordinary situation. "

Its " internal allies" were the Contras and their sympathizers, who made life difficult for the Sandinistas. Under the CIA's tutelage, these internal allies sabotaged oil facilities at Puerto Sandino, torched an oil storage facility, and planted magnetic mines in Nicaraguan ports. The Reagan administration made no secret of how badly it wanted to thump the Sandinistas.

"Be careful what you do up there," Stia said, referring to North's covert venture. "Don't interfere in their operation." Reports of drug smuggling by North's operation had trickled into our office, but Stia said DEA had not pursued the matter. He wanted to do his time in Guatemala, then pack up and return to upstate New York with his wife and kids. He wasn't about to throw rocks at a hornet's nest.

I had learned a hard lesson in Peru, and I wanted to lay out my personal philosophy up front. I told Stia, "If I receive intelligence the Contra operation is trafficking, I'll investigate and report it.,, Stia laughed. If I tried to take down North' Operation, he said, the DEA brass would waste no time find some excuse to pull me out of the country.

I made up my mind right there I Would check out Ilopango. I didn't care who was running dope; if I confirmed they we smuggling, I would move in. Stia assumed I would salute and play the good soldier. From his statements, I could read his logic: I w a Vietnam veteran. I spent eight months in the jungles tr

: shoot Communists, and watched my buddies die in the process. In Central America, the Sandinistas gave the Reagan Administration an Opportunity to banish the ghosts of Vietnam forever. Reagan, like Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon before him, had used Cold War Communist fears and the domino theory to persuade America we could finally slay the dragon on a small Third World stage. I despised Communism, but I joined the DEA to fight another war, and Stia had no idea how many comrades I watched die in the clutches of heroin in Vietnam.

I fell in love with Guatemala. I ate fresh vegetables, lobster, steaks. The people somehow remained friendly and polite, although their eyes revealed a hard edge honed by war. My only complaint was the weather. Even in October, it felt like springtime, making sweaters a necessity at night. I still preferred pounding beat. I found plenty of U.S. fingerprints on the ancient Mayan homeland. On the crowded streets, old American cars jockeyed for position, many of them bearing Texas plates. The homesick U.S. businessmen from Akron got their fast food fix at McDonald's or Pizza Hut, and Wendy's was opening soon.

My ears picked up the local brand of Spanish on the streets, and I worked on scrubbing the Mexican signature from my speech. My border Spanish would only raise eyebrows here. It didn't take long for me to pick out the differences between the Guatemalan and Salvadoran dialects. The Salvadorans had a singsong tone, and used very correct Spanish. The Guatemalan elite prided themselves on their correct Spanish, but the poorer people tended to cut the end off their words and spiced their conversation with slang. With each conversation, I took on more of the local vernacular.

My mission was redefined after I found out Stia and Reina had a lock on most of the aerial eradication work. They both wanted to get enough time in the sky to qualify for their pilots' licenses. They were always flying. Nobody was ever on or off duty here. Reina liked zooming over the poppy and pot fields, but face-to-face encounters with the bad guys were not part of his plan. As much as Reina looked the part of a trafficker, he refused to work undercover - - he never had the instincts for it. He just wanted to have fun. Stia always teased him for working "kiddie dope," and rubbed it in by telling him he wasn't shit until he worked New York.

Five days after I arrived in Guatemala, Reina's passion for flight almost got us both killed in the Guatemalan mountains.

Reina and I met early that Tuesday and drove to Aurora for an aerial reconnaissance mission, my first poppy field hunt. Since DEA didn't have its own aircraft and pilots, we used a Bell 212 Turbo helicopter piloted by P6rez, a contract pilot and a good friend of Reina's. P6rez guided the chopper along the ragged spine of the mountains to San Marcos, the westernmost of Guatemala's 22 departments. We picked up a Guatemalan soldier, a member of the Guardia de Hacienda, at Tacana, a little village near the Mexican border - - guerrilla country. He guided us to a spot in the mountains where the poppy fields glowed against the foliage. The poppy fields looked beautiful from the air, red streaks against a green canvas.

Mexicans owned the crops, and taught local farmers how to grow opium poppies for a cash crop more lucrative than anything they could plant. The Mexicans taught the locals how to score the hard pods with a blade, let the white sap ooze out, then scrape it off and knead it into a ball. The sap turned chocolate brown, and in short order became heroin for American junkies. Long streaks of red and white along the mountainside proved how quickly the poppy trade spread. The Guatemalan police generally left them alone. They didn't want to risk running into a guerrilla stronghold while trying to destroy a bunch of flowers. We landed on the. side of a mountain, in the middle of a poppy field, and took a few plants as samples.

Ironically, the Guardia officer told me, the fields were frequently guarded by the Guatemalan Civilian Self -Defense Patrols, the rural indians organized and armed by the military who were supposed to be keeping the guerrillas busy. When General Efrain Rios Montt took power in 1982, he organized the patrols to spearhead his counterinsurgency war in the mountains and Pressed close to a million civilians into service within two years.

Now here they were, guarding the poppies. I could sympathize With them to some extent . They were very poor people who sided With the military for protection.

The Guatemalan guerrillas also fed off the hopelessness of the Indians, Who formed the base Of what they saw as an inevitable and massive peasant uprising against the ruling elite. They took names like the Guerrilla Army of the Poor and Organization of People in Arms, fighting from the rugged jungles of Huehuetenango and Pet6n in the northern part of the country. The guerrillas spent most of their energy ambushing army patrols, and the military responded with reflexive thumpings of any village suspected of aiding the guerrillas. I wondered how these simple villagers decided between the military and the rebels, with both sides threatening to kill them if they chose the other. It reminded me of the fable about the lady or the tiger, except the unfortunate indians could count on finding a tiger behind either door.

The Guardia officer said he never heard of the civilian patrols shooting a guerrilla. But they were always shooting at the DEA planes and helicopters with their MI rifles, and the planes frequently returned with bullet holes.

Every trip to the mountains was a risk.

Once we had our Poppies, we dropped the Guardia officer in Tacana and headed north to Huehuetenango for the next leg of the mission. That's when Reina took over the chopper's controls. He wanted to learn how to fly a helicopter, and P6rez just smiled and let go of the stick. Reina didn't have much trouble until we got to Cuilco, the little Village where we were going to meet with Guardia officials to chart more Plantations. But as we reached the Point where an experienced pilot would instinctively cut back his airspeed to prepare for landing, Reina continued bearing down.

I waited for Reina to let UP On the stick. By the time I said something, it was too late. I yelled to P6rez over the intercom, "We're coming in too fast. " Reina yanked on the stick and the helicopter lurched upward until we were looking straight up into the sky. As he tried to bring it back down, I could see a soccer field, a clump of trees, and a school. A hard stone formed in my gut. Drawn by the sound of the rotors cutting the air, the children were streaming out of the tiny adobe and concrete school.

Reina panicked and let go of the controls. "You take it," he yelled to P6rez. P6rez grabbed the stick, but Russ had slammed one of the foot pedals to the steel, sending the chopper into a spin. ,,I can't control it," P6rez screamed. The Bell spun into the ground, snapping off the left ski before the chopper bounced back off the the turf. As the door on my side flew open, my mind flashed back to Vietnam, to the thump of the grenade exploding through a pack of men, to the chopper blades slicing through panicked soldiers as they tried to escape the wounded bird. I froze. P6rez said, "I've got to lay her down. " He nudged the Bell on its side, and dirt showered the metal skin as a blade buried itself in the ground.

In helicopter crashes, usually the next blade slices through the helicopter's body, taking out anyone unlucky enough to be sitting in the wrong place. But somehow, the chopper broke free of the blades, ripping out the transmission and pouring hot fluid all over me. I thought it was blood. We seemed to float for a moment, then the fuselage crumpled into the ground.

I crawled up to the opposite door and pulled myself out, knowing the wreckage could explode if sparks hit the fumes filling my nose. I yanked open the cockpit door and shouted to Russ. He looked at me in a daze over his dangling sunglasses. He glanced down at his lap, where the belts held him at a right angle to the ground, then at P6rez, who was clawing like a caged lion trying to escape a fire. Reina unbuckled his belt and dropped on top of P6rez with a thud. P6rez let out a yell that knocked Russ out of his daze, and the two finally untangled themselves and climbed out of the shattered Bell.

We stood silently near the wreckage, bruised and bleeding from numerous scrapes and cuts, as a mob of children watched from a respectful distance. Class had obviously been dismissed due to a helicopter crash in the soccer field. Russ tried to light a cigarette and failed miserably; his shaking hands couldn't work the lighter. A little wide-eyed Mayan girl walked up with a handful of oranges and said "Eat these, they will calm you down. " Reina took an orange and wolfed it down, skin and all.

I lit his cigarette for him. P6rez was shaking too, but out of anger rather than fear. The first words out of his mouth were "No fuckin' insurance. " He had turned a $500,000 helicopter into a schoolyard scrap heap.

The tiny military post in Cuilco radioed their headquarters in Guatemala

City and told them about the crash, and theit commander called the U. S. Embassy, who scrambled a helicopter to beat the guerrillas to the school. The CIA pilot who pulled us out swore he thought we were dead when he saw the wreckage~ The embassy, he said, went ballistic when someone radioed in that the guerrillas had shot down two DEA agents on a recon mission.

Damage control began immediately, and I got a quick lesson in Guatemalan palm greasing. P6rez stood to lose his license for letting Reina fly the helicopter, so he paid off the FAA investigator, and the heat blew away. Stia instructed me to write a cable explaining the crash, omitting the fact that Reina's hands were on the stick when we lost control, and stating "it has not been determined what caused the malfunction and crash. " I didn't like it, but Stia made it clear he didn't want headquarters bringing the hammer down on us for Reina's blunder.

Stia and Reina later accompanied me to San Salvador for the obligatory introductions. We flew into Ilopango, a sprawling air base used by military and civilian aircraft.

In El Salvador, the tension level had been slammed up a few notches. You could feel it, an oppressive mixture of fear, hostility and suspicion that permeated every glance, every movement. The base bristled with security. We drove to the U. S. Embassy, where I met Edwin Corr, the U. S. ambassador to El Salvador. I told Corr we received intelligence about large quantities of narcotics passing through El Salvador, and I would be DEA's point man in his domain. Corr struck me as a mild -mannered, affable guy, and unlike his counterpart in Guatemala, he seemed genuinely interested in assisting the DEA. Over the following months, Corr became one of my strongest allies; the one U.S. official I could count on for support as my investigations pushed into sensitive areas.

After the near miss in the helicopter, I decided to work on the ground for a while, and Stia introduced me to a few of our best informants, the people who would ultimately determine the success or failure of my undercover operations. If they could give me accurate information and introduce me to the right people, we could make a dent in the trafficking. If they turned on me, I could be dead. Stia first introduced me to Luis Aparecio, a heavyset Guatemalan businessman in his 40s the agency knew officially as informant number STG - 81 - 0013 - - meaning he had worked for the DEA since 1981, and was the thirteenth informant signed up in Guatemala that year.

I pegged Aparecio as a con artist the minute I met him. He talked fast and smooth, and could easily lure you into a trap with his bullshit. He spoke perfect English, and had lived in San Francisco for many years, where he headed the Hispanic Lions Club.

In San Salvador, he owned a coffee shop. Four months before I arrived in Guatemala, a group of guerrillas with machine guns had driven by the cafe in two pickup trucks and killed four U.S. Marines as they sat outside. Aparecio told me the guerrillas chased one of the marines inside the restaurant and shot him as he cringed on the floor near the bathroom. It was no big deal to Aparecio; those things happened on San Salvador's streets. The Salvadoran military caught up with the guerrillas and arrested or killed all of them, although rumors spread they had nabbed the wrong men in their rush to placate the U.S. government.

Despite its bloodstained reputation, the cafe still drew Americans, probably because of its prime location in San Salvador's club district, the Zona Rosa. By the time I arrived, American servicemen and diplomats had a curfew after which they were not to be in public. But that never stopped the Marines I watched from getting drunk, falling in love with whores, and shooting off their rifles.

Our relationship started on a tense note. I discovered why Aparecio left San Francisco: he was a doper, a fugitive from justice in the United States. In addition to his civic - minded Lions Club activities, Aparecio led an organized crime syndicate in San Francisco, a group of Central Americans running large quantities of cocaine into the United States. The DEA had filed charges against him for CCE, Continuous Criminal Enterprise, and narcotics trafficking under the RICO law. They just couldn't catch him. In San Francisco, he gained a reputation for his guile; DEA reports showed the frustration of agents who tried to tail Aparecio, only to lose him when he suddenly shot the wrong way down a one -way street. Because the United States didn't have an extradition agreement with Guatemala, the DEA couldn't touch him. Aparecio told me later that a DEA agent once called in the Guatemalan police to kidnap him and put him on a plane to the United States - a popular technique for extraditing criminals from countries with no extradition agreement with the United States When they busted through the front door, he jumped out the window in his underwear and hid in a neighbor's house. He called his military friends, and they grabbed the agent in Guatemala City and brought him to Aparecio, who politely asked him to back off. The agent probably felt lucky to escape with his life, but they didn't harm him. Aparecio hated violence, and refused to carry a gun in a place where bullets were the ultimate arbitrator in m disputes.

We had a Class One cocaine violator in our sights with RICO warrants out for him and nobody could touch him. I realized then we were sleeping with the enemy. But I had little choice but to use him; he was our top informant in El Salvado and we wanted to log our first bust there. Like it or not, we we a team. I checked up on him periodically, asking locals I trustd if he had returned to trafficking. They assured me he was out of the business.

He might have been a con artist, but Aparecio proved Iiimself as an excellent informant. He liked my determination' and I learned I could rely on his information. I had the undercover expertise, and he was the guy who showed me around and set up the meetings. His contacts consistently amazed me. Aparecio seemed to go anywhere and speak to anyone in El Salvador. His networking stemmed from his role in the Nationalist Republican Alliance, or ARENA, a union of politicians and military men who seized the country in a 1979 coup. Aparecio endeared himself to ARENA's top echelons through his skills as a mediator and organizer. He could bring the right people together, and with hil Silver tongue and waving arms, Aparecio could settle most personal and political disputes in short order.

Aperecio married a Canadian, who fled San Francisco with him. Ironically, the wife of the doper became a hopeless junkie, hooked on the product that bought them the trappings of the elite. disgusted, he shipped her back to Canada. I knew Aparecio was a user and trafficker, and I set down the ground rules immediate]Y. If he started in the business again, I would lock him up. He agreed, probably because we paid him well. The DEA gave him about $1,000 a month a lot of money in Central America. Plus bonuses of $2,000 to $3,000 if his work led to a big bust. He knew I could see through his facade, and his disposition changed around me.

As we began working El Salvador, my dependence on Aparecio grew. I had no one else to turn to. After Camarena's torture and murder in Mexico, DEA administrator Jack Lawn said no American agent was to travel or work alone in a foreign country. But with two agents to cover four countries, DEA had no choice.

Aparecio had a girlfriend, a very attractive Salvadoran who worked as a prostitute. He had fallen for her after meeting her at one of the local cathouses, and they had lived together off and on ever since. He even opened a boutique for her next to his cafe, and she struggled for a while to sell women's clothes. Meanwhile, she continued her night job and fed Aparecio a lot of information about the Colombians who bounced in and out of San Salvador. I used her as a sub -source, and time after time her information proved reliable. Later, she would provide a few more entries in a growing list on the Contra operation.

I took over the undercover operations and began organizing and training anti-narcotics units, the "Teach a man to fish" approach to interdiction. The State Department had earmarked money for us, and I wanted to put the cash to use. I visited the different police forces in Guatemala, interviewing men and women, talking to their supervisors as I searched for those with the quickest minds and the best street smarts. The country had plenty of security to choose from, thanks to generations of turmoil.

The masses were kept in check by overlapping webs of muscle. The Treasury Police and the Guardia de Hacienda, who guarded the National Palace, fell under the 11,000-member national police. The military boasted almost 40,000 troops, with its own sub -groups. I soon learned the members of the different forces refused to work together. They all answered to different chiefs, and openly despised one another, so I had to choose one force and recruit from it exclusively. I started with 25 or 30 members of the national police, then formed a second squad within the Guardia de Hacienda within a year.

One security organization I avoided was G2, the intelligence/counter -intelligence unit of the Guatemalan military and the most feared organization in the country. They held the big power, reinforced by a reputation for stone - faced cruelty. More than 1,000 people disappeared each year at the hands of G2, which Guatemalans referred to ominously as La Dos - - "the two. " La Dos ran the death squads, and favored nondescript white vans for their sinister work. Some of the unlucky victims dragged from their homes turned up later as mutilated carcasses, but most simply vanished, joining the legions of desaparecidos - the disappeared. The snatchings were so widespread that relatives of the disappeared formed their own organization, the Mutual Support Group. Of course, that made them subversives as well, and the death squads began making return house calls on some families. The G2 goons were experts, trained by United States and Israeli intelligence and fed with American tax dollars. They learned their lessons well, and used techniques I would later see first-hand. Their interrogations always brought results; unlike the CIA, G2 didn't worry about red tape or bureaucrats. They would simply extract the information they wanted, then kill their victim and blame it on "death squads. " The vans often took their quivering captives to a bridge close to a neighborhood where all the military brass lived. La Dos drove their quarry - - students, opposition party members, professionals, clergy, and peace corps types - - into small sheds under the bridge. People in the area could hear the screams at night.

After a few weeks in Guatemala, I developed a twisted admiration for the local security forces. They got results, while we wallowed in a quagmire of futility. "El Coyote" personified our impotence. Luis Montoya earned his nickname by setting up a service to smuggling Cubans who lacked documentation in and out of Central America. He also flew all types of contraband on his trips, including narcotics. He neglected to pay off Bahamian officials during one trip, and they arrested him with a plane full of marijuana. The Colombians had given him cash for bribes, but he kept it, thinking he could sneak past the Bahamians,. The Colombians went back and got the load back, which was the only reason they spared his neck. ,

He flew for Reina as a contract pilot, and as their friendship blossomed, Reina signed him up as an informant. He sucked money out of the DEA, feeding Reina information about the cocaine he flew for the Colombians to Florida and Texas. Reina set up "controlled deliveries, " to catch the cartel members on the receiving end. We would help Montoya refuel at small Guatemalan airstrips, then call our DEA offices in the U. S. to bust whoever showed up to collect the powder. In theory, El Coyote would be arrested for show, then set free while the bad guys went to jail and the agency weighed the cocaine for the press releases. Or Montoya could give the Columbians directions to a certain parking lot where the coke would be stashed in a DEA van, which would promptly run out of gas and leave the stranded Colombians easy prey for our agents.

But El Coyote never landed at the right airstrip. Each time, he explained the Colombians had changed the destination at the last minute, or offered some other excuse for leaving our counterparts brooding in the dark at some barren Florida airstrip. Reina usually asked me to go undercover on these operation, which totaled about 50 flights by the time I quit counting. I posed as a maintenance worker, refueling the Cessnas and Caravans as I checked out the loads. Most flights carried 300 to 500 kilos of cocaine, and I knew Montoya charged them $500 per kilo for delivery, plus expenses. He had a sweet arrangement, taking money from us for information on the cartels, then making as much as a quarter million dollars delivering loads that yielded not a single arrest or seizure. After realizing we were in effect refueling narcotics flights while the trafficker pointed us to the wrong landing strip, I protested to Reina. El Coyote had duped us every time, I said. Reina just shrugged. They e friends.

In Guatemala, friendships were everything. If I wanted to make any progress, I would have to work with the military - despite my disgust with their methods. I met with every military commander I could find, and even paid a courtesy call on the G2 office in the Palace. They seemed eager to work with me. They confided their distaste for the CIA, who supplied them with the high-tech gizmos they loved, but tried to dictate how they worked. After running the country for three decades, the military was not about to take orders from anyone. They saw me as an asset, someone who could melt into the countryside and bring back information on the guerrillas in exchange for their support in the drug war. After a few informal visits, I compiled an extensive list of military contacts, and within a month I sealed their trust with information on Cerezo.

Corruption had rotted Guatemala from the top down, and MY growing network of contacts brought the extent of the decay into focus. I talked to customs agents at Aurora, bartenders and waitresses at the Camino Real and El Dorado hotels, U.S. embassy domestic workers and relatives of government officials. Everyone told the same story. The pilots who worked in Aurora talked about the cocaine shipments that frequently passed through on both private and commercial flights. The bartenders and waitresses had served Guatemalan officials during their meetings with Colombian cartel members. The customs workers occasionally caught government officials smuggling bags onto U. S. commercial flights without going through inspection. They had looked the other way because the men carried government credentials. The officials recruited people in U.S. airports who would pick out the marked bags and take them to a scheduled drop point where cartel runners picked them up.

In short, Guatemala had become a major hub connecting the cartels to their customers in the United States. Back in the office, I began running the names of Cerezo's top lieutenants through our computer, and almost every name came back with a black mark. The list read like a flowchart of the Guatemalan power structure. Among the Guatemalan high command documented as traffickers were the president's brother, Milton Cerezo-Garcia; Claudia Arenas, a top aide; and two members of the Guatemalan congress: former interior minister Alfonso Cabrera-Hidalgo and Carlos Ramiro Garcia de Paz.

I leaned back in my chair, trying to absorb the enormity of what I stumbled upon. Our government had leaned on the Guatemalan military for elections and trumpeted the birth of a government whose top officials were involved in narcotrafficking. Somewhere, our priorities had become skewed, hopelessly mired in the residual shame of Vietnam and Korea while a new monstrosity feasted on our minds and bodies. We spent billions trying to beat down an ideology in Central America, while the cartels rented nations as transit routes. After fighting both wars I knew which posed a greater menace to America. Communism had accomplished little within our borders, but drugs were quickly turning our inner cities into war zones and choking our prisons, hospitals and morgues with empty husks. In New York, I watched the drug culture grow, throb, and metastasize to the streets. In South America, economies had surrendered to the most powerful growers the continent had ever seen. Now, I had evidence Guatemala's infant government was addicted to cocaine. Winning our narcotics war in Guatemala would mean taking down a good portion of their government, and that would never fly in Washington.

Warily, I took my information to Stia, who had heard about it already from informants. As usual, he had chosen not to follow up. I held my tongue; Guatemala's high officials didn't seem concerned about hiding their drug activity, so it was only a matter of time before I gathered hard evidence on them.

The Guatemalan military proved a better judge of Cerezo's true character than the Reagan Administration. They had vigorously persecuted Cerezo years before, and one of my informants discovered Cerezo never forgot his trip into exile.

Enrique, a Colombian-bom informant who ran a clothing business in Costa Rica, gave me an intimate look at the political side of Cerezo's inner circle. One of Enrique's good friends was a well placed Guatemalan official, and I asked him to feed me anything he heard about the men on my trafficking list. Enrique's friend took him to a surreptitious meeting in downtown Guatemala City where a high Government official, met with two Cubans, a Russian and several Nicaraguans.

Enrique said they spent the evening discussing how to overthrow the Guatemalan military.

I wrote my report and gave it to Stia and the CIA. The CIA didn't believe me, so I called G2. Two of their officers rushed to my office for a quick briefing. It was hot information, and they were stunned. Captain Fuentes (whose full name I never learned), was clearly impressed. "Someone tipped us about the meeting, but our friends within Cerezo's government could not discover the location in time to act, " he said. Fuentes pressed for the name of my source, but I balked. He didn't know how to react. Glaring at me, he told his lieutenant I probably worked for the CIA, and it took me a while to convince him drugs and politics were so intertwined I gathered good political intelligence with almost every drug case I worked. He thought for a few minutes, then dropped his interrogation and thanked me for the tip.

their respect.

I shut the door behind them, feeling strangely secure. I had

One of our informants worked for both the Guatemalan government and the Contras, and his loose tongue gave me my first concrete intelligence about the rumors Stia had mentioned. Everyone knew him as Sofi. Socrates Amaury Sofi -Perez was a Bay of Pigs veteran, a short, thin Cuban with a big nose, glasses and a receding hairline. Despite his vague resemblance to Gandi, Sofi had his fingers in every illegal and immoral activity in the region, including the government's death squads. He carried G2 credentials, but essentially worked as a free agent, leading the squads and dabbling in narcotics on the side. Like Cerezo, he surrounded himself with bodyguards, massive men he handpicked from G2.

Sofi never tried to hide his connections to the death squads. Accountability barely existed in Guatemala, and he had all the connections he needed with the military, the government and the ruling elite. They kept Sofi and his fellow commanders very busy. A British human rights group estimated 100 Guatemalans were killed for practicing the wrong politics each month, and another 10 people disappeared each week. I knew those anonymous white vans could pluck me off the street at any point. I couldn't touch Sofi.

One of his tentacles reached into the Contra operation, and as Sofi bragged about his connections with the rebels, he shed more light on North's shadowy operation. He told me the small Contra air force at Ilopango smuggled drugs as well as war materiel, and drug money helped feed their crusade against the Sandinistas.

"We have to support the Contras fully," Sofi often told me. "Nicaragua must be liberated from the Sandinistas at any cost, and if trafficking provides the means to that end, so be it. " Like Stia, he considered me trustworthy because I was a Vietnam veteran, a fellow traveler in his eyes. Like so many Bay of Pigs refugees loitering around Central America, he lived to battle Castro and Communism. By sharing the details of the operation, he wanted my implicit approval of their activities.

Sofi owned a shrimp company in Guatemala City he used to launder narcotics profits for the Contras. He played the role of trafficker and banker, picking up cocaine in Colombia, hiding it in shrimp bound for Miami, then turning over the profits to the rebels. He paid off a U.S. Customs agent who would receive the cocaine/shrimp shipment and hurry it past inspection, arguing it would spoil. I wondered what Bob Stia would say if he found out the cases of frozen shrimp Sofi brought him were part of a smuggling operation.

Sofi told me he had started double -dealing, piggybacking big cocaine loads from Guatemala to Miami for the same Guatamalan government officials I had on my list. I had never met a man so adept at exploiting chaos. Sofi's only loyalty was to himself, but he sold his services simultaneously to Cerezo, the Guatemalan military, DEA, and even the CIA. I later discovered he was double - dealing on the DEA as well, monitoring our activities and reporting to the Contras. He asked too many questions about my intelligence on Ilopango, always pestering me to run computer checks to find out if DEA had opened any files on certain pilots or Contra operatives.

One incident Sofi passed along revealed how badly President Reagan wanted to keep the resistance alive. North had negotiated with the Guatemalan government to receive a shipment of surface-to-air missiles bound for the Contras, in exchange for a generous increase in U.S. aid. On the way to the Contra base, the missiles were seized by the Hondurans. A hasty phone call from Reagan convinced President Roberto Sauzo Cordoba of Honduras to release the shipment, and North later revealed Washington's reward: additional aid. The Guatemalans obviously reaped their own quid pro quo for their part in the transfer; the following year, U.S. military aid to Guatemala increased from $500,000 to $5.4 million.

Sofi maintained his sales pitch for the rebels, but I wasn't buying. I admired the Contras for their tenacity and their ideals, but I suspected Sofi's surreptitious seafood scam was just a sample of their drug involvement. I repeated the pledge I made to Stia - - if I caught them running dope, I was going to report it. Sofi looked as if I had slapped him. His questions persisted, but he stopped volunteering information on his activities for the Contras.

After a month in Guatemala, I shifted to El Salvador to repeat the networking process. I spent a lot of time with Aparecio, drinking in everything be knew about contraband in the country.

He was a walking encyclopedia on everything from Colombian trafficking in El Salvador to the black market baby trade.

I told him what I learned about Sofi's shrimp connection, and he filled in more blanks on the Contras. The military gave them carte blanche use of Ilopango, with the blessing of Juan Rafael Bustillo, head of the Salvadoran air force. Ramiro said they were indeed running narcotics out of Ilopongo. He said a bay of Pigs veteran named Max Gomez - - which I later discovered was the nom de guerre for Felix Rodriguez headed the operation and reported to Oliver North.

Ramiro said everybody who spent any time around Ilopango or the Salvadoran military knew about the operation, and the people running the show didn't bother to hide anything. To his air force officer friends, there was nothing covert about the operation. It meant more U.S. aid, and they supported it enthusiastically.

I added Aparecio's statements to my files on the Contra operation, which included careful notes of everything Sofi spilled. As soon as I could accumulate enough intelligence to make a strong case, I planned to drop the hornet's nest in Stia's lap.

The goal of every investigation was to get the doper out of Central America and into a U.S. court for trial. Unfortunately, we too often turned our handcuffed prizes over to a Byzantine system. Central American justice had a way of misplacing well connected narcotics violators, or releasing them for lack of evidence. The locals saw the drug trade as a huge cash pipeline that could be tapped into almost at will, and it was standard practice in many countries to hold cartel operatives and their drug loads for ransom. As flawed as American justice might be, the drug lords feared it like nothing else, and we had several techniques for getting otherwise unextraditable offenders into our system. On November 10, Reina called me to back him up on one of these rule-bending busts.

Counterintelligence experts in Belize had maintained a wiretap on Johnny Zabaneh, a DEA fugitive and banana baron living in Orange Walk, Belize. Zabaneh was fat, Lebanese, and the biggest doper in the country. The U.S. government wanted him for conspiracy to import and distribute marijuana. Reinahad been trying to bust him for a year. Without an extradition treaty, we had to wait for him to leave the country, and when the Belizian eavesdroppers heard Zabaneh planning a trip to Guatemala to purchase some sort of equipment, they called Reina with the flight number and time. We detained him at Aurora, then asked our friends with the Guatemalan police to kick Zabaneh out of the country as an undesirable. It was a poor substitute for an extradition treaty, but it worked.

The Guatemalans knew the drill, and grinned when they told Zabaneh he would be returning to Belize - - via Houston. I bought two tickets and called DEA in Houston to send someone to collect a fugitive. As the 8:30 a.m. Aviateca flight left Guatemala City, Zabaneh still looked puzzled. The Guatemalans had evicted him, but he was not sure how that translated into a trip to the United States. He figured it out when I read him his rights from the airplane seat as we approached Intercontinental Airport.

"I'm placing you under arrest for narcotics trafficking," I said. Zabaneh didn't make a sound as I led him off the plane. My DEA counterparts collected him at the gate, and I turned around and reboarded the plane for the two-and-a-half hour return flight to Guatemala City. High Times, a famous dopers magazine, wrote about the incident in August, 1986, and I saved a copy for my scrapbook. We had broken rules to nail a trafficker, and he would actually go to prison for his crimes. For the first time since I came to Guatemala, I was proud.

My phone in the El Dorado rang constantly as our eyes and ears at Aurora discovered I would respond in a few minutes when they had a tip. Three days after the Zabaneh bust, one of our informants called when a group of Libyans passed through his security checkpoint. They carried Libyan and Bolivian passports, and the suspicious security team pulled them over for closer scrutiny. They insisted they were tourists, but a search turned up an ominous cache of documents: addresses, phone numbers of contacts, and crude torture diagrams, with the human body's lethal points circled in red.

I pulled on my boots and rushed to the airport. Five minutes later, I confronted the Libyans. They stuck to their tourist story in animated English. If they had landed five months later, when President Reagan ordered the retaliatory bombing of strongman all over the isthmus. I called Manny Brand, a cuban CIA agent based in Guatemala City, and told him about the group. Manny told me not to get excited - - they were probably trying to come in as illegal aliens, and I should take down all the information I could and call him the next day. They had not broken any laws, so I followed his instructions. The Libyans were released.

Muammar al Qaddafi's house, their presence would have sent off warning bells

I could not drive the red circles out of my mind. As soon as I reached my office the next day, I turned the information over to the FBI's Central American attache, then called Manny with the Libyans' names. Manny called back shortly, panic -stricken. The CIA computer listed them as terrorists. Manny said Jack McCavett, chief of station for the CIA in Guatemala, had previously worked in Libya, and Qaddafi threatened to assassinate him. The ominous tourists were now a hit squad, and Manny was going crazy trying to find them. The CIA wanted every shred of information they could find, and sent a Learjet from Langley to Panama to catch up with the FBI attache I had briefed.

The next day, the morning traffic into Guatemala City hummed past the bodies of the libyans. Manny had called LaDos, and it took their best predators one day to hunt down the Libyans and kill them.

On November 18, 1 flew to New Orleans for Zabaneh's hearing. He was furious, claiming we had kidnapped him. I couldn't stifle my smile when the judge said he didn't care how Zabaneh got there, as long as he was arrested when he hit U.S. soil. He was going to jail, and we had another small victory in our futile war.

My euphoria disintegrated when my wife called from McAllen. There had been an accident, and Crystal Bianca was injured. I jumped on the next flight to McAllen, feeling helpless. When I last saw her in October, Crystal didn't want me to leave - - I could see her standing at the airport waving goodbye. I could also picture the accident Noe described, a car coasting through a stop sign and smashing broadside into my wife and daughter. The images swirled through my head until I rushed home and opened the front door. Crystal had a gash on her head, but nothing serious. She smiled at me with her bandaged head, and almost broke my heart. "Daddy, I didn't think you were going to make it. I I on my way back to Guatemala, I took advantage of a stopover in Miami to stock up on gifts for my friends. I picked up a bottle of Dom Perignon at a liquor store for the Guatemalan police who evicted Zabaneh. It always paid to reward the people who came through with reliable intelligence. I always brought them bottles of American booze, expensive champagne, and cartons of Marlboros. The men loved giving their girlfriends boxes of candy I brought back for them.

I could afford it; the DEA gave me danger pay for every trip to El Salvador and covered my expenses while I was in the field - which was almost every day. My personal expenses shriveled to almost nothing, so I could play Santa Claus to my network. Friendships were everything.

By December, I was confident enough in my feel for El Salvador to start working undercover. On December 5, 1 picked up Sofi in my DEA Volvo and followed Highway I through the mountains surrounding Guatemala City before picking up High way 8 to the Salvadoran border. The two -lane road cut through beautiful rolling farmland, but its reputation for bloody accidents forced me to catch only glimpses of the scenery as I concentrated on the traffic. We stopped at the Las Chimanas checkpoint between the two countries, where Sofi had set up the meeting with Leonel Gaitan-Gaitan, a Salvadoran trafficker who moved large quantities of cocaine for the Medellin cartel.

I didn't trust Sofi, and he became a little annoyed when I repeatedly ran through how I wanted everything done. He never liked being told what to do. I was in no mood to deal with his ego. Working undercover in El Salvador with Sofi as my only backup was plain stupid. If our Salvadoran friend became spooked, I half expected Sofi to scurry under the nearest car, or worse, blow our cover and get us both killed. When I asked Reina to come along, he begged off; he was tied up with his aerial missions in Belize. We met Gaitan-Gaitan in the parking lot of a restaurant just inside the Guatemalan line. Sofi and I began sweating, only partly out of nervousness; El Salvador was always an oven compared to Guatemala City's cool mountain air. Sofi introduced me as Carlos de Cordova, a Mexican buyer looking for a new supplier. I borrowed the alias from my friend Tony Cordova, a Texas Department of Public Safety trooper. Gaitan - Gaitan was almost as relaxed as he was sloppy. His rumpled slacks and dress shirt hung limply on a short, beefy frame, and he had unbuttoned the top of his shirt to reveal gold ropes Reina would have been proud to own.

My nervousness melted away when Gaitan- Gaitan took the initiative, eagerly chattering about his unique access to the Colombians. He looked and sounded like a used car salesman trying to hit his monthly quota. I told him how many kilos I needed, and promised to call him later to set up the deal.

I smiled as we shook hands. I saw no trace of suspicion in his face, no threatening eyes watching from the perimeter, no signals to hidden associates. Undercover work, the deceptive art of gathering evidence and building a case, simply didn't exist here. The local authorities had no use for it; they grabbed their man, extracted their information, and often decided the punishment on the spot. The idea that I was anyone other than who I claimed had never occurred to Gaitan-Gaitan.

On January 14, Vice President George Bush visited Guatemala City to put the U.S. stamp of approval on Cerezo's inauguration. I met Bush at the obligatory cocktail party at the ambassador's residence. Embassy personnel and Guatemalan dignitaries elbowed through the crowd, jockeying for floor space near the Vice President. I was standing alone, watching the steel faced secret service agents watching everyone else, when Bush approached. He read the tag on my lapel identifying me as a member of the U.S. embassy, and asked what I did. As he shook my hand, someone snapped a photo. I told him I was a DEA agent assigned to Guatemala. He said, "Well, what do you do? " I knew it wasn't wise to bring up the Contras - - this man was part of the Administration, and Reagan had even declared himself a Contra.

I just blurted it out. "There's some funny things going on with the Contras in El Salvador. "

Bush didn't reply. He simply smiled and walked away, seeking another hand to shake. After that exchange, I knew that he knew.

In Washington, the Contra public relations machine continued its mission to scrub the Contras' image in the eyes of Congress and the American public. Years later, Congressional pressure forced the declassification of documents outlining how taxpayer money paid for the Administration's PR campaign on Capitol Hill. In 1983, National Security Advisor William Clark created the Office of Public Diplomacy for Latin America and the Caribbean (S/LPD). "The President has underscored his concern that we must increase our efforts in the public diplomacy field to deepen the understanding of and support for our policies in Central America," Clark wrote in a July 1, 1983 memo.

By 1985, the public relations firm hired by S/LPD to handle the Contra's image referred to their efforts as a I 'White Propaganda" operation. In an "eyes only" memo from one spin master to another, Johnathan Miller of International Business Communications alerted Pat Buchanan to several negative news pieces and outlined their media counterstrikes. " I will not attempt in the future to keep you posted on all activities since we have too many balls in the air at any one time and since the work of our operation is ensured by our office's keeping a low profile, " Miller wrote.

In the winter of 1985, the blitz even reached McAllen, where retired Gen. John Singlaub appeared at the McAllen Public Library with Mario Calero, brother of United Nicaraguan Opposition leader Adolfo Calero. Singlaub, head of the United States Council for World Freedom, claimed he was raising money from ordinary folks to support the Contras. Later, the truth would come out. I happily noted Singlaub didn't get a dime from the ordinary folks in McAllen fundraising was against library rules.

Four days after Singlaub's McAllen visit, the first hint of the Contras' drug connection appeared as a blip in the national news. On December 21, an Associated Press article appeared, quoting unnamed U.S. investigators and American volunteers working with the rebels: "Nicaraguan rebels operating in north em Costa Rica have engaged in cocaine trafficking, in part to help finance their war against Nicaragua's leftist government. "

Thirteen months later, another story on the Contra drug connection would appear on the front page of The New York Times. Quoting anonymous Administration officials, the story outlined a DEA investigation at Ilopango. It would be the closest my reports ever came to exploding in the White House.

With Bush's visit still echoing in my head, I wrote a report on the Contras based on more than three month's worth of intelligence from Sofi and Aparecio. I gathered up my notes and wrote the main report, then individual reports under each inform ant's number to show what signed them and dropped the information came from whom. em on Stia's desk. He read them slowly, carefully, shaking his head. His discomfort wa obvious, sign. and for a moment I was afraid he would refuse to s

"This is too big, and it's going to come back and bite us in the ass if we don't report it, " I argued. It didn't take long to convince him - if he didn't sign the reports, I was ready to send a cable out to t~e El Paso Intelligence Center, which coordinated and dissected intelligence from all over the world on narcotics trafficking. Stia knew he was covering his ass, and scribbled his name on the reports.

From Stia's desk, they were forwarded to the DF-A Latin American Desk in Washington. If this had been any other operation, I knew our foreign office would cut loose a few intelligence agents on temporary duty to help Out - I waited for a reaction from Washington. Nothing.

Meanwhile ' our appointment with Gaitan - Gaitan arrived, and I called the Salvadoran national police to help Aparecio and me make the bust. Sofi Is role was finished,, and I always tried to keep my informants from meeting. The Police, however wanted to beat us to the scene, and they exploded into the filthy San Salvador house with a gang of men. When Aparecio and I arrived the Salvadorans were searching the house as they led their' Prisoners outside. When Gaitan Gaitan emerged, he squinted at me through a swelling eye and silently shook his head

His mouth didn't look as though it would function' anyway. The police were energetically knocking them around, screaming for the location of the hidden cash. With their thumbs tied together behind their backs, the men groaned helplessly as the Police delivered swift kicks to their midsection and swatted them across the face With thick San Salvador Phone books. somehow, they held their tongues.

The police looked about half finished stripping the house of all valuables. I started to object when the phone rang. I picked up the receiver and the voice on the other end asked for Leone]. He said he was calling from Bogota. I switched to my Salvadoran accent and told him I was Carlos, Leonel's right-hand man. "He's at the store, I I I said. "He should be back in a minute. "

The line was silent for a moment. Finally, the voice from Bogota decided to believe me. "Tell him our friend is going to arrive tonight with 25 aparatos. " The word meant apparatus, a good non specific term for a kilo. He gave me the flight number of a plane arriving in San Salvador that night and said we should make sure our friend arrived without any problems. I assured him I would personally wait for the flight. He described the passenger briefly and hung up.

The mad scramble continued throughout the house, and I could barely control my anger. The Salvadorans picked over the place with greedy fingers, hunting for the still undiscovered cash. The 30 kilos they seized from Gaitan - Gaitan lay forgotten on a table as they hurried to their vehicles with televisions, stereo equipment, and whatever else struck their fancy. On a lucky hunch, I picked up a large stereo speaker as Aparecio reached for its twin. We grunted with the effort - - they were almost too heavy to lift. Aparecio grinned as we tore open the back panels and found them packed with brown paper bags full of cash.

The Salvadorans watched intently as we wrapped the money with tape, marking it to show signs of tampering. I felt better when we arrived at the police station, where I searched out my regular contacts and enlisted about 15 police officers to help count the cash. It came to $800,000 in worn U.S. dollars, which we turned over to their commanders.

From the police station, I drove to El Salvador International Airport to meet our visitor, whom the man on the phone had identified as Nivias. Aparecio had stayed at police headquarters to make sure the money didn't disappear, so I needed some backup for the meeting. I called Victor Rivera, an advisor to the president of El Salvador.

The CIA had hired Rivera as a contract agent and advisor to Duarte, and he and I quickly become good friends. His street skills could help any operation. He was one of a half - dozen Venezuelans training the Salvadoran security police in counterinsurgency techniques. Changing political tides had forced them out of Venezuela, and the Salvadorans generously donated an office in national police headquarters in exchange for their expertise. Sharing grisly techniques had become a thriving cottage industry in El Salvador, and Rivera and his cohorts found cozy positions with both the Salvadoran government and the CIA, who paid Victor a reported $5,000 a month for his work.

Victor met me in front of the airport, and we quickly fanned out among our contacts in customs and immigration so Nivias could bring his apparatus into the country unchallenged. I spotted him waiting at the baggage carousel and introduced myself. He shot me a quizzical look and asked, "Where's Gaitan?" I had rehearsed my excuse: Gaitan was at the house taking care of the money. He relaxed. I asked if he had the stuff, and he picked up the suitcase and handed it to me.

"Are we going to do it like the last time?" he asked. I had no clue what he was talking about, so I blurted, "Yeah, we're just going to take it out the front door. " I grunted as I picked up the big Samsonite, and Victor shot me a wry smile. My arm felt like it was being yanked from its socket. I asked Nivias for his passport and handed it to one of my contacts at immigration, who stamped and returned it with a blank stare.

We walked to Victor's Toyota Celica, and Victor plunked the suitcase in the trunk and popped the clasps. The kilos were packed tightly inside, wrapped in brown tape. I turned to Nivias and told him he was under arrest. Victor cuffed him, and a plainclothes Salvadoran national police sergeant took the wheel of the Toyota. Victor and I got in the back seat, cramming Nivias between us. We had a 45-minute drive from the airport to the capital, plenty of time to question our guest. Victor and I played bad cop/bad cop, asking him how many shipments he had delivered to El Salvador, who he paid off at customs, and other details about his smuggling. Nivias refused to answer. "I don't know what you're talking about, " he insisted.

After a few failed attempts, Victor snapped. He swiveled in the cramped back seat and lashed at Nivias with a hard -muscled arm. The punch mashed Nivias' chin with a crack and continued through, smacking me in the face. Victor apologized briefly and continued working on our stubborn captive. After another 15 minutes, he lost his patience and told the sergeant to pull onto a side road. Victor grabbed Nivias by the hair, threw him to the ground, and growled, "I'm tired of this bullshit. If you don't cooperate I'll kill you here like a dog. " He pulled his Glock 9mm, snapped a round into the chamber, and aimed the barrel at Nivias' head.

Nivias pulled himself to his knees, begging. "Please don't kill me, I have a family. " Victor lowered the Glock to Nivias'face and fired. I looked away, convinced he had killed the man. He was that crazy. I began sweating, wondering if Victor would turn the gun on me to eliminate witnesses.

I heard Nivias whimper, then Victor's deep laugh. He had pulled the Glock to the right and fired a round next to Nivias' ear, missing him completely. Victor was laughing, and Nivias remained sprawled on the dirt, breathing in fits with his eyes tightly shut. Between gasps, Nivias said he was ready to talk. We took him to the police department in San Salvador, where he dictated a signed, sworn statement claiming to be a member of the Colombian terrorist group M 19. He said the smuggling had gone on for years. The cartels hired him and other gofers to carry cocaine past paid -off officials. The risk, he added, was minimal.

Everybody was excited about the bust. The Salvadorans could point to the bust with one hand and extend the other to Uncle Sam for more anti -narcotics money. In light of Nivias' confession, the Salvadorans tried to paint it as a terrorist organization smuggling narcotics to support the rebels. Naturally, the dollars followed. Later, the State Department released money for an anti - narcotics squad in El Salvador. My workload again doubled, and for a few weeks, the Contras slipped into the back of my mind.

By mid-February, TDY had become permanent duty. I knew the area, had a big bust under my belt, and they needed the help. Stia asked if I wanted the job, and I jumped at it. I returned to Peru to pick up my household goods, and moved into the embassy transit apartments in Guatemala City's zone 10.

About this time, I recruited a Salvadoran who put the hard evidence I needed on the Contras at my fingertips. Hugo Martinez worked at Ilopango, writing flight plans for the private planes streaming in and out of the airport's civilian side. That included my flights in and out of the airport, and we talked frequently as my presence in El Salvador increased. Hugo impressed me with his pro-American and anti-drugs sentiments, and his strategic position at Ilopango made him a perfect candidate for intelligence -gathering. Recruiting him was easy; he had worked for us indirectly for months. Hugo occasionally fed Aparecio information as a sub - source, and he cemented his reputation with a tip that led to a 500-kilo cocaine bust.

During one of my visits to Ilopango's civilian side (I could never get access to the military side where North's operation was based), Hugo confided he had become unhappy with the arrangement. He had originally balked at becoming a documented informant because he feared getting caught. Emboldened by success, he was no longer happy with taking whatever cut Aparecio chose to pass along. His disgust with the drug trade, plus his addiction to the intrigue of spying, had him hooked. I said, "You're giving us this information, you might as well get paid for it." He readily agreed, and I gave him his informant number. From that point on, I paid him about $200 every time he gave me intelligence.

Hugo wanted to prove his value, and unleashed a flood of documentation on narcotics smuggling out of the air base. Suddenly, my reports contained not only the names of traffickers, but their destinations, flight paths, tail numbers, and the date and time of each flight. Hundreds of flights each week delivered cocaine to the buyers and returned with money headed for the great isthmus laundering machine in Panama. I could have started a weekly newsletter: Ilopango Doper. Still, our seizures didn't increase much; the traffickers usually airdropped the cocaine before landing in Florida or the Bahamas, swooping low as some poor grunt in the back kicked the bundles out of the cargo hold into the waves below. Waiting speedboats would fish the cocaine out of the water and race to shore undetected.

Many of the loads found their way to the streets through the skills of George Morales, a three-time world champion speedboat racer who smuggled millions of dollars worth of marijuana and cocaine from the Bahamas to Florida before he was caught and convicted in Florida. In his testimony before the U. S. Senate Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics and International Operations, chaired by Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Morales said he paid off Bahamian officials so his powerboats and airplanes could operate unmolested.

When I asked Hugo about the Contras, his eyes lit up, and by the time he finished talking I knew we were in over our heads.

He explained the operation in detail. The Contra planes flew out of hangars four and five, and Hugo could identify their planes by the black cross painted on their tail. The CIA owned one hangar, and the National Security Council ran the other. I knew the CIA, like DEA, had a long history of hiring men with less than stellar reputations. In this case, they were narcotics traffickers. Hugo said the pilots often brought the drugs to Ilopango from either numerous private airstrips in Costa Rica, or the U.S. military base in Panama. They flew weapons, cash, and cocaine from these safe havens, taking the powder to the United States.

Ilopango reminded me of O'Hare Airport in Chicago, bustling at all hours of the day and night. Murga was one of the busiest men on the base, tending to a continuous line of pilots waiting for their flight plans. Like Aparecio, Hugo had no trouble picking up incriminating information; many times pilots told him outright they were taking cocaine to the United States. The CIA had hired them, they boasted, and nobody could touch them. Hugo would quietly jot down their names after they left. Most of the time, Hugo simply poked his balding head into the planes as he made his rounds. When he spotted the tightly wrapped kilos, the pilot's name joined the others on his list.

As Hugo described it, every pilot had his own preferred technique for getting his illegal payload to U.S. soil. Some liked the John Wayne approach, flashing their CIA credentials at Florida airfields and unloading the drugs in plain view. Those who wanted to maintain a lower profile shipped the kilos out in innocuous cargoes like towels, seafood, frozen vegetables or auto parts. Many landed at military bases around the United States, knowing no one would inspect a Contra plane. The air drops were probably the least risky and the most popular, since many of the pilots had plenty of experience dropping bundles in the Bahamas or off the Florida coast.

They returned with cash to Ilopango. Hugo said some of the pilots flew the money to Panama for deposit in the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, later indicted for money laundering and bribery. From Panama, the money was wired to a Costa Rican bank account held by the Contras. They used the money for supplies and arms, completing the cycle.

When I ran Hugo's list of names through the computer, they all came back as narcotics traffickers in DEA files. Little wonder the Contras used them, I thought. Nobody knew the terrain like drug pilots, and their dive-and-dump flying skills perfectly matched the job description for covert operations.

When I realized how deeply Hugo had probed into the Contra's small air force, I increased my presence in El Salvador, checking in with Hugo and Aparecio constantly. The Contra supply operation had clearly become a link in the cartels' smuggling operations, with Ilopango as the main hub between Colombia and the United States.

We began tracking the drug flights out of hangars four and five. I used pages ripped from Hugo's log book to jot down the date, time, flight number, tail number, destination, and the names and passport numbers of each pilot and co -pilot. Finally, I had concrete evidence.

I wrote a string of reports on the Contras through the end of March with the stream of intelligence Hugo and Aparecio generated. As Aparecio zoomed in on our target, his air force contacts in Ilopango shared their knowledge on the activities in hangars four and five. He had access to the military section of the airport, and he would visit with his military buddies every time he needed booze for his restaurant. The military had a monopoly on El Salvador's liquor sales, so they were the only source for all of the bars and restaurants in the country. Aparecio would go in every week to buy his whiskey and tequila and shoot the bull with the air force brass. They talked openly about the Contra operation. I updated my reports after every trip to El Salvador.

By this point, I was in El Salvador at least every other week, meeting with Aparecio and Hugo in my room at the Sheraton. Stia kept shaking his head and signing the reports. He figured the deed was done, and they couldn't come down on him too hard. He was just doing his job.

On March 16, 1986, President Reagan took another shot at the Sandinistas in a speech televised nationally. As Congress prepared for another vote on Contra aid, Reagan accused the Sandinistas of drug running. "I know that every American parent concerned about the drug problem will be outraged to learn that top Nicaraguan government officials are deeply involved in drug trafficking," Reagan said, then showed hidden camera footage of several men loading cocaine onto Barry Seal's plane near Managua in April, 1984. Seal, a burly Louisianian who headed the Medellin cartel's shipping operations, had become a DEA informant and was helping the agency infiltrate the cartel. One of the men loading the bundles onto Seal's C - 123 cargo plane was Federico Vaughan, who the President said was a top aide to Nicaraguan interior minister Tomas Borge. Seal's cover was blown the previous summer when his mission into Nicaragua was leaked to the press.

Before his name hit the papers, Seal planned to carry $1.5 million in drug money to Managua, where the cartel kingpins waited. Oliver North wanted it. On July 28, 1988, DEA officials told the House Subcommittee on Crime North had suggested the Sandinista drug money be diverted to the Contras. North did not get the money. Seal was murdered in Louisiana by two gunmen in February, 1986.

Despite his willingness to solicit for drug money, North, of course, dismissed any possibility of a connection between his Contras and the drug trade. In his autobiography, North tried to put the allegations to rest. After special investigator Lawrence Walsh spent millions of dollars in his probe, "If there was even a grain of truth to these stories, it surely would have come out. "

Hints of the truth surfaced in 1987 and 1988 as Kerry's subcommittee interviewed 27 witnesses and subpoenaed documents - including North's personal notebooks. The notebooks arrived heavily censored, but scores of references to narcotics or terrorism remained. One of the entries, for July 12, 1985, read "$14 million to finance came from drugs."

Morales, given a day pass from federal prison to testify before Kerry's subcommittee, revealed his involvement with the Contras. Marta Healey, ex-wife of Contra southern front military commander Adolfo Popo Chamorro, approached Morales in 1984 after his second arrest for smuggling and arranged a meeting with Chamorro and two other Contra leaders, Southern group air force chief Marcos Aguado and political head Octaviano Cesar. Aguado and Cesar told Morales they were CIA agents and asked for financial and military assistance.

As far as the Contras were concerned, whatever Morales lacked in scruples, he made up for in money and planes. In return, they promised to use their " personal knowledge " of Washington to help him with his indictment. The Contras needed to fly fabric for uniforms and 40,000 lbs of weapons out of Miami; Morales needed well-connected friends, and quickly. It was a perfect match.

That summer, Gary Betzner, Morales' best pilot, took off from Executive International Airport in Fort Lauderdale with a load of weapons Morales bought at a gunshop in southwest Miami. He landed in Costa Rica, where the weapons were unloaded and, as Morales testified, Betzner picked up a different cargo:

Senator Kerry: What were you expecting to have come back?

Mr. Morales: About 400 or so kilograms of cocaine.

Senator Kerry: Did you know where he was going to pick up those kilograms of cocaine?

Mr. Morales: It had been arranged. He had the nwp and the coordinates, and the airstrip appears on the Costa Rican air nwp. It is an American rancher's.

About two weeks later, Morales cleaned out the inventory at another Miami gunshop, and Betzner pushed his Panther off the runway at Opa-locka Airport with another load for the rebels. Again, he returned with cocaine.

As far as Morales could tell, the Contras fulfilled their end of the bargain. He was told the DEA and FBI offices in Miami knew of his involvement with the Contras, yet the flights continued. After one of Morales' deliveries to the Contras in 1985, an associate told Morales he overheard a conversation between a U.S. agent and an informant, outlining the details of an earlier shipment. "This is one of the reasons which has led me to believe that I was very well protected," Morales testified. "Otherwise, one of these agencies would have intervened. "

Morales rewarded the Contras handsomely, starting with $400,000 in cash and checks in October, 1984. By the end of 1985, the speedboat smuggler's cash contributions to the Contras totaled, by his estimate, $4 million or $5 million. Kerry asked him twice, just to make sure:

Senator Kerry: My question to you is, Was the majority of that money mostly drug money that you delivered to the Contras?

Mr. Morales: I would say that about 100 percent.

Senator Kerry: Except for the $100,000 or so that came from your company.?

Mr. Morales: Exactly.

Senator Kerry: The rest was illegal profits?

Mr. Morales: Yes, sir.

Kerry's committee also talked to the Contras, with Kerry flying to Costa Rica for depositions of Aguado, Cesar, and Karol Prado, who was Southern front commander Eden Pastora's second in command. The Contras corroborated Morales' story, and Cesar said when he told CIA officials at Ilopango about their relationship with Morales, they condoned it "as long as you don't deal in the powder. " The Contras said they loathed taking money from a drug trafficker and using his airplanes to transport supplies, but with the CIA money gone, their troops in southern Nicaragua slowly ran out of boots, clothes, medicine, and ammunition. "I'm not proud of having had this type of relationship," Cesar told Kerry during the deposition on Halloween, 1987.

Back in Guatemala, I was preparing for a long tenure. I returned to McAllen for Easter and helped my family pack for the move to Guatemala. Thankfully, the kids were too young to know what was happening. Crystal was two, and C4 was eight months and crawling enthusiastically. Although it meant leaving her family, Noe actually looked forward to the move. I was relieved; she was learning about the life of a diplomat's wife.

In mid -April, a cable arrived from Bobby Nieves, the agent in charge of our Costa Rican office. Nieves advised me to check hangars four and five at Ilopango; a very reliable informant gave them intelligence about large quantities of cocaine being smuggled from Costa Rica to El Salvador. The cable named two Costa Rican pilots who had been flying into Ilopango. It ended with a line that jumped off the page: We believe the Contras are involved in narcotics trafficking.

When I get back to San Salvador and tell Hugo and Aparecio, this will make their day, I thought. Word was getting around.

I immediately called Nieves and briefed him on everything I knew about Ilopango and the connection between the hangars and North's Contra operation. "That's what I thought," Nieves said. The same shit is going on in Costa Rica at a large private ranch, he said, with dope shuttling from the airstrips to Ilopango. We agreed to keep in touch, and share any new information we received.

I bolted from the office and jumped into the Volvo. I set a new personal speed record on Highway 8 to San Salvador, then burst into Aparecio's cafe with a copy of the cable in my fist. I asked him to drop by Ilopango and ask Hugo to check the pilots' names. He came back after sifting through the log books and handed me a list detailing each pilot's flights into Ilopango, along with their tail numbers. The pilots were flying out of hangars four and five.

The next day, I went to the U. S. Embassy in El Salvador and met with Robert Chavez, the counselor general for the U. S. State Department - - and the man who issued all visas from the embassy. Chavez told me the CIA had just requested a visa for Carlos Alberto Amador, a Nicaraguan pilot documented in the computer as a narcotics trafficker. Chavez said he thought Amador flew for the Contras. I checked with Hugo, who confirmed it. That added more fuel to the fire. Why would the CIA give a known trafficker a visa? Chavez was concerned. He knew approving the visa could come back to haunt him, and he asked me to do something about it.

I closed myself in my office and began forming a mental list of the people I needed to visit over the next few days. My reports on the Contras seemed to be falling into some sort of faceless, bureaucratic black hole. I wanted someone to look me in the eye and respond to the evidence.

It was time to get noisy.

Seven

Conspiracy of Denial

Guatemala City - April 1986

Moving provided a much - needed break, and rejoining my family washed away much of the stress that chewed at me since Noe and Crystal's car accident. We made a family trip of it, driving our Jeep Wagoneer from McAllen to Guatemala City and stopping wherever the urge struck during the three -day trek. We spent a night in Veracruz, along the Mexican Gulf coast. When we took our luggage to the car the next morning, Crystal stopped my heart, dashing ahead of us toward the street. Luggage clattered against the sidewalk as I chased after her. To this day I can see the brown taxi bearing down on her, the driver's jaw clenched as the old Chevy's tires locked. The taxi squealed to a halt five feet from Crystal, who stared in frozen dismay at the front bumper. She turned and gave me a helpless look, and I lifted her off the street as the taxi driver screamed at me to take better care of my kid.

He was right. That was the whole idea of moving to Guatemala- to take better care of my family, to soothe the pangs of guilt, to try to bridge the growing space between Noe and myself. Now, the doubts creeped back. Just one day out of McAllen, and Crystal had almost been run down. I thought about Duarte's daughter, kidnapped by the rebels in El Salvador. The president had traded a captured guerrilla leader for his child. I wondered if I could protect my kids from the chaos in Guatemala; and if someone snatched them, what did I have to offer the captors?

After driving through some of the world's worst human deprivation, our new home seemed like a palace. The two-story brick house was in zone 13, an upper -crust section of Guatemala

City. Our neighbors were the big landowners, business tycoons, government officials, and others at the top of the Guatemalan food chain. The mayor's residence was a few doors down, the most prestigious link in an unbroken row of connected dwellings.

Noe and the kids fell in love with the house the moment I unlocked the massive wooden double doors. The floors were paved with Italian tile, and a big fireplace separated the sunken living room from the dining room. Ceiling - to - floor glass doors overlooked a kidney- shaped pool fringed by tropical plants. A wooden spiral staircase dominated the vaulted entryway, and diffused sunshine streamed in through a glass dome in the roof. We hung stuffed tropical birds, including a huge peacock, in this airy space - - and constantly worried about the kids crawling over the low partition above and falling. After more than six months in a cramped hotel room, I felt like a kid on Christmas morning when we unpacked our belongings in this sparkling house. Unfortunately, the place lacked a heater, and I cursed the cold every morning as I left the warm bed and tiptoed over the frigid tiles to the bathroom.

I was receiving a lot of hazard pay and travel money for my field work, so we had enough to hire domestic help. We started with two housekeepers. Maria, a short, wiry woman in her 50s, arrived first and annexed the kitchen. She had neither a husband nor children, which probably made her somewhat of an oddity in the tiny coastal village where she grew up. Maria had worked in Guatemala City for several years, finding a special niche working for embassy employees. We gave her a room on the first floor, which she later shared with the second housekeeper, Ana. Maria quickly became like a live -in grandmother. I remember chasing C4, ready to give him a whipping for some indiscretion, when she pulled him to her chest and glared at me. "You are not going to spank him," she boomed, and marched to her room with him nestled in her bosom.

Ana was in her early 20s, and watched over the kids with a tomboy's energy. Somehow she kept up with C4, who had perfected his crawling skills and scrambled around the house on a perpetual Easter egg hunt. Ana had a mother's instincts for looming danger, and as a Guatemalan mother, her radar as c amplified several times. Ana saved little Cele's life twice: gone catching him as he chugged over the lip of the pool, and later, snatching him off the ground as an errant Fourth of July rocket zoomed between her legs.

Ana was from a poor Indian village in the mountains, and to her, death was a cold hand seeking an opportune moment to close around the innocent and the unprepared. The guerrillas killed her brother, and her parents stubbornly remained in the free - fire zone while she and her three children sought a better life in the city. Ana usually brought them with her to work. I think she actually enjoyed the knee-high pandemonium.

We also hired a handyman/gardener, Don Chavelo, to do odd jobs and care for the landscaping. He lived in the filthy ring of wood and tin squatters' camps around the city. The lost souls in these squalid settlements often lived literally on top of the city's garbage. People were continually picking through the rancid piles like ants. Don Chavelo knew the owner of our house, and when he appeared at our door looking for work, I hired him on the spot. He was a quiet, thick - muscled six - footer - - incredibly tall for a Guatemalan - - with an old man's grizzled face and snowy hair.

I never knew whether to judge his age by the etched lines around his eyes or his powerful grip. He was a tireless worker. He reached the house by catching one of the mini-buses, called micros, before sunrise each morning, then walking the remaining half mile to our neighborhood. By the time I finished my shower each day, Don Chavelo had washed the Jeep inside and out.

The neighborhood was both a haven and a target. Police patrolled the area constantly, yet people lived amid bodyguards and guns. We benefited from our proximity to the mayor, but the house was still armed with an expensive security system. Both Ana and Don Chavelo carried devices to trigger the screeching alarms.

We all knew what happened in these neighborhoods to the innocent and the unprepared: thugs from both sides of the conflict often kidnapped members of wealthy families for ransom. The cycle fed upon itself , with the rich worried about their safety, the right wing worried about threats to its ideology, and the poor worried about surviving another day. Nobody slept soundly in Guatemala.

The chasm between opulence and indigence glared at me from every comer of the city. On my way to work each morning, a little barefoot Indian girl sat on the comer selling newspapers. She was a happy kid, maybe four years old, hawking papers as her mother squatted nearby in numb silence. I bought a paper every day, and she learned to watch for me at the busy stoplight. She always rewarded me with a toothy smile, her perfect teeth clashing with the tattered skirt and blouse she wore every day.

In early June, I drove to San Salvador, where Hugo waited with with more intelligence from Ilopango. He had been watching hangars 4 and 5 closely, and gave me a detailed list of Contra planes and pilots hauling narcotics. He named Carlos Amador - the man for whom the CIA was seeking a U.S. visa - - as well as three other pilots who carried cocaine payloads. Another name caught my interest: Carlos Armando Llamos, El Salvador's honorary ambassador to Panama. Hugo had watched Llamos for a long time, and in November, 1985, Hugo said the Ambassador proudly showed him cardboard boxes containing $4.5 million in cash he was taking to banks in Panama, for laundering. Reading from his log book, Hugo ticked off corresponding tail numbers: TIANO, YS265 and N-308P.

Hugo also dug up more information on Transportes Aereos El Salvador, an Ilopango -based air transport company owned by two brothers named Gutierrez. Aparecio, always with the best connections, told me weeks earlier the brothers were trafficking. The DEA computer once again proved him right. Hugo said they had begun chartering planes to the Contra pilots, who used them to run dope and money. I took down another tail number, N82161.

As the names, dates and eyewitness reports accumulated, I collected my notes for another Contra report. When I had enough new intelligence, I planned to go office-hopping. I wanted to know if any of the bureaucrats would break ranks to help me take this information beyond the conspiracy of denial which seemed to include every U.S. official in El Salvador.

Early one Wednesday morning, the phone rattled me awake. Hugo's excited voice sent my feet to the cold floor immediately. Chico Guirola was making a run to the Bahamas. Hugo had watched Francisco Rodrigo Guirola -Beeche for weeks, hoping to help me bust one of the Contras' busiest pilots. Guirola's planes frequently carried dope and cash, so we made him a priority target. Like most Contra pilots, Guirola carried air force credentials signed by General Bustillo, making him an instant VIP in the Salvadoran air force. He was also one of the Gutierrez brothers' better customers, frequently renting planes from them.

Hugo went to great lengths to make friends with Guirola. He talked shop with " Chico "enough to gather plenty of incriminating information on his new buddy. When I ran Guirola's name in the computer, it popped up in 11 DEA files, detailing his South America to United States cocaine, arms, and money laundering activities. Business was obviously booming: In 1985, law enforcement officers in South Texas arrested Guirola with $5.5 million in cash.

"Guirola left for the Bahamas a few minutes ago with a load of cash," Hugo said with an excited edge in his voice. I looked at my watch; it was just after 7:45 a.m. Hugo hung up, and I quickly dialed the DEA office in the Bahamas. Just as I feared, the receiver buzzed in my ear. The Bahamian office did not open until 9 a.m. Nobody would be at the landing strip to meet Guirola. Not from our agency, anyway. As usual, the dopers got up a little earlier than we did.

We tried again a few days later. Aparecio and I set up surveillance on Guirola at Ilopango, watching him from the civilian section of the airport. He landed on the nearby runway, loaded several boxes into a red compact car, and raced off. Aparecio and I waited for the signal from Hugo. If Guirola was carrying narcotics or cash, Hugo was supposed to appear at the window and give us the thumbs-up sign. As Guirola zoomed away, we stared at the window. No signal. When I asked Hugo what happened, he threw up his hands. "Now Chico has credentials from President Christiani, identifying him as a presidential advisor. " Aparecio and I exchanged a grim look. Our best target joined the ranks of the untouchables.

I began to wonder if we would ever bust a pilot. The national police didn't want anything to do with a sting at Ilopango because the pilots carried Bustillo's air force credentials. If I could somehow convince someone to arrest a pilot, Bustillo would undoubtedly drop the charges for lack of evidence, then scream to Corr about my "illegal investigation. "

I wasn't sure how Corr Would react if I slapped an arrest report on his desk. Every time I visited his office in El Salvador, the Ambassador showed a genuine interest in my operations, and Offered his encouragement. Corr served as U.S. ambassador to Bolivia about the same time I was in Peru. He saw firsthand the kind Of Power drug organizations wielded across the Western Hemisphere. Corr obviously knew about North's resupply operation, and supported it was as a matter of policy, but I had a feeling that he did not agree with his methods.

On June 24, I wrote another Contra report, based largely on Hugo's detailed observations of the previous two weeks. The 'Port went through the usual channels, to be filed in the usual places with the usual results. Eventually, it landed in Washington with nary a ripple.

I was reaching my frustration threshold. The rules of the game here prevented me, or any DEA agent, from searching pilots and Planes. We could not arrest, interrogate or initiate an investigation without a member of the local police present. Later, when we organized an anti - narcotics group in El Salvador, even our recruits from the National Guard could not help me with the Contras; they needed official approval to snoop around Ilopango's military side. Bustillo would never allow it. Ambushing pilots when they landed proved fruitless as well. Knowing their flight plans didn't help - Like El Coyote, they never emerged at the right place at the right time, and most airdropped their cargo, then landed with nothing more incriminating than a sly grin.

I collected my notes and returned to El Salvador to begin building a Salvadoran anti - narco unit - - and visit a few Officials with my Contra evidence. Every time I worked in El Salvador, I was supposed to check in with the embassy to inform them of My plans. This time, I had a motherlode of information on the Contras. I was eager to see how they would react. I checked into the Sheraton, planning to stay a week.

Aparecio and I began our recruiting immediately, selecting about 15 energetic young conservatives from the national guard and other security forces. The process moved along much smoother than in Guatemala: the Salvadorans kept a tighter rein on their security forces, and tolerated no infighting. We called the task force FUCA, the Spanish acronym for United Anti-narcotics Force. I placed Aparecio in charge as the group's chief adviser. I resisted the urge to ask Aparecio if he saw the irony in placing a drug fugitive in charge of an anti -narcotics squad.

Money from the State Department, the Department of Defense and the CIA paid for training the group. FUCA's training consisted of lectures on the cartels, on narcotics trafficking techniques and investigations, and U.S. -style weapons training. Aparecio took center stage, transfixing the recruits with real - life tales from both sides of the drug war.

On May 27, Lt. Col. Alberto Adame, a U.S. military advisor to El Salvador and a fellow Texan, recommended one of his friends as a firearms instructor. When he introduced the short, middle -aged man, the name clicked in my head immediately. Dr. Hector Antonio Regalado, a San Salvador dentist, was a house hold name in the country's power corridors. I was shaking hands with " Dr. Death, " as he was known in U. S. political circles, the man reputed to be the Salvadoran death squads' most feared interrogator. In El Salvador, he was known simply as "El Doctor." Regalado's prestige among the right wing stemmed from his ability to extract teeth - - and information - without anesthesia.

I wanted no part of El Doctor. I asked Adame if the embassy had approved Regalado as an adviser. He said Col. James Steele, the U. S. Military Group commander in El Salvador, gave Regalado his blessing. The military obviously wanted this man aboard, human rights abuses and all. Regalado was hired, and we began spending a lot of time together. I saw him almost every time I visited the National Police headquarters, where the Salvadorans donated a group of dingy second -floor offices as classrooms for FUCA.

On the surface, Regalado was a friendly, genteel man. Underneath his gentle demeanor, though, he was the type who would shoot a man, then spit on him to make sure the point got across. He always carried a hair-trigger .45 pistol holstered at his side. El Doctor harbored a boiling hatred for anything associated with Communism or revolutionaries, and showed particular disdain for the clergy, who sympathized with the peasants.

Regalado was good. He could draw either of his two holstered pistols in an instant. One moment, you would be looking into his eyes. Suddenly, they were replaced by the cold, black eye of his .45. When I asked him how he did it, he looked around theatrically, as if about to reveal a coveted secret. "I oil the holsters, then rub wax inside so the gun slips out like a feather. "

He passed his tricks down to his teenage daughter, who sometimes accompanied him. She was almost as fast and accurate with a gun as her father. I tried to picture her when she was Crystal's age. She obviously had wasted little of her childhood playing dress -up and collecting dolls. Feminine innocence was a luxury she could not afford: her family was in constant danger from the FMLN, who wanted to perform their own crude surgery on her father, and end his bloodline if possible.

Regalado loved guns, which made him the perfect firearms instructor. He taught the recruits how to squeeze a trigger without jerking the weapon, and supplemented shooting practice with briefings on how to react in a life -or-death situation, "Can you kill someone? Can you actually pull the trigger if your life depended on it?" he asked, stalking between the rows. Most of the males immediately assured him they would have no problem. But looking at the recruits, who averaged about 22 years old, I could tell some would not know until the time came. El Salvador had bled as much as Vietnam, but unlike the war-hardened Vietnamese, these young men and women came from a reviled class shielded from the crossfire.

The FUCA recruits regarded Regalado with something bordering hero worship. When he entered the room, they fell silent and leaned into his soft voice. When he lectured, they furiously scribbled down every word. He treated the classroom like a stage, casting himself as a son of squat James Bond. Early in their training, the recruits learned a new trick from the old predator. Veering from his discussion on how to kill efficiently, Regalado repeated the mongoose maxim: The prey can always turn on you. "Never hesitate, " he said. "If You feel someone is after you, you have to move. You have to learn to run and shoot at the same time. "

Regalado pulled his .45 from its waxed nest, removed the clip, and smiled at the eager faces around him. Without saying a word, he ran straight at the wall, his eyes fixed on an imaginary assailants his left. The click-click-click of the empty.45 echoed in the room as Regalado ran up the wall and snapped into perfect backflip, landing on his feet. The recruits looked at each other, grinning. El Doctor knew how to get his point across.

Later that summer, El Doctor used us to send a message to the guerrillas. Col. Adame called one Sunday morning to ask me to accompany him and Regalado on a mission. When I met them at Adame's home in San Salvador, Ramiro had been summoned as well, and greeted me with a quizzical look as several men from the anti narco group piled into jeeps. Regalado explained we were to drive into the mountains and check out reports of a marijuana plantation hidden in the jungle. With El Doctor leading the charge, we rattled over winding dirt trails in the afternoon heat, only to abandon the jeeps when the road ended at the base of a mountain.

The operation made me nervous. We were in guerrilla territory, traveling on foot, in civilian clothes, with M16s slung over our shoulders. Any government troops in the area would undoubtedly mistake us for a rebel patrol and open fire. If the rebels happened upon us, one look at our American -made rifles and police gear would bring a barrage of AK-47 fire.

After a few hours, the plantation was nowhere to be found. "What the hell is going on?" I yelled. Regalado simply smiled and marched ahead. Finally, the trail opened onto a decrepit ranch carved out of the jungle. Regalado owned the ranch, Adame explained, and wanted to make a show of force to warn the rebels away. I didn't say anything to Regalado. It was part of the game, with everyone trying to use everyone else and avoid being used. And after everything I had seen, I wanted to keep El Doctor on my side.

Privately, Regalado told me the death squads were necessary to stop the spread of Communism in El Salvador. "Everything for the country" was his favorite saying: Todo por la patria. The elite and the country, of course, being one and the same.

Regalado painted a vivid picture of the death squads' modus operandi. After watching their intended victims for a few days to learn their movements, a dozen men in two vans would move in for the abduction. They preferred to strike away from the victim's home, bolting through sliding doors on both sides of the van and yanking the person off the street. As the torture began, they wrote down every name their victim cried out. Regalado practiced his impromptu dentistry on the unfortunate captives with a pair of pliers.

I could see these doomed, bleeding men, screaming names with the faint hope their pain would end if they fed their captors enough future victims. The pain usually ended with a bullet or the edge of a blade.

Regalado said he didn't do interrogations often, but when the death teams caught a particularly notable insurgent, El Doctor was in. I felt truly sorry for the men who drew Regalado from his lair.

Regalado was convinced the clergy were Communist infiltrators, trained in Cuba to undermine El Salvador. He considered them cowards, hiding behind the cloth as they spread their diseased doctrine to the peasants he loathed. He spoke of person ally directing the deaths of several outspoken priests.

Archbishop Oscar Amulfo Romero was the symbol of the church's new solidarity with the downtrodden. A conservative when he became archbishop, Romero rebuked the elite after witnessing the persecution of workers and peasants. In an act of high treason against the Salvadoran oligarchy, Romero called on President Carter to halt military aid to El Salvador. The right unleashed its fury on March 25, 1980, when a single bullet ripped through Romero's heart as he lifted the chalice in the chapel of San Salvador's Divine Providence Hospital. The following day, dozens of bombs rocked the capital as his supporters erupted in anonymous rage.

I learned Regalado was part of the assassination team from Aparecio, his good friend. Ramiro once told me about Regalado's role in the archbishop's killing. I didn't really believe him until I brought up the subject with Regalado and he did not deny the charge. After one training session, I casually mentioned Romero, and Regalado's eyes flashed with rancor. He spit the archbishop's name, calling him hijo de puta - - son of a whore.

"Did you kill him?" I asked. He looked at me with a faint smile. "What do you think?"

Deep down, El Doctor was afraid - - more for his family than for himself. Regalado said if the guerrillas caught him, he would accept his fate. Ironically, nothing scared the orchestrator of so many deaths more than the thought of a similar fate befalling his family. The prey could always strike back.

Inevitably, I met Regalado's superior, Roberto D'Aubisson, the most visible leader of the Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA), and the driving force behind the Salvadoran death squads. We met at the downtown San Salvador home of D'Aubisson's right-hand man, who I knew only as El Negro. Aparecio and I requested the meeting with D'Aubisson, to confront him with intelligence linking him with drug trafficking. He denied it. Because we lacked the proof to make a case, we let the matter drop. The accusation did not rattle him a bit, and D'Aubisson spent the next 45 minutes sharing his political dogma with us.

D'Aubisson had vowed to deliver El Salvador from Communism. His right -wing enforcers carried out the vow for him with a deadly blend of McCarthyism and Nazism: Root out the Communists, then slaughter them. As one ARENA official told the Albuquerque Journal, " If you investigate people like we did, you find everybody has some Communist ties if you look for them hard enough."

D'Aubisson's flamboyant personality was the polar opposite of Regalado's. D'Aubisson was bitter about the U.S. government "stealing the election" away from him. With Duarte in office, he planned to continue his purges until he could run for president again. He did not seem to realize his ties to the death squads made him a political leper in Washington, and his prospects were not likely to improve so long as he flaunted his human rights record. D'Aubisson told me he was proud of his involve ment in ridding the country of insurgents. Everyone the squads killed, in his mind, deserved to die.

Shortly after I turned in my contra report, Hugo briefed me on another Contra pilot, an American named William Brasher. He was ostensibly in Central America as a representative of a U.S. company selling night vision equipment to the military, but Hugo had uncovered his real vocation. Hugo reported Brasher was in charge of money, equipment, and training for the Contra opera tion. Brown had impressive connections with the embassy and the Salvadoran military. Like Guirola, he carried credentials signed by Bustillo. Hugo said Brasher regularly flew crates of weapons from the United States into Ilopango, which violated laws in both countries. But like the other pilots, he flew under the military's protective umbrella.

When I returned to Guatemala City, I typed Brasher's name into the computer. He was documented in seven DEA files for flying drugs and arms from South America to the United States via Ilopango. I called Aparecio and told him to grab a pen. We had a new special project.

That summer in Washington, North's "Project Democracy" hit the newspapers as reporters lapped up numerous leaks, and raced to put the details together first. Spurred by the publicity, members of Congress launched inquiries into the Administration's activities in Central America. They came back frustrated. North and his superiors threw disinformation at Congress to shake them off the trail, with apparent success: On June 25, 1986, the House of Representatives approved $100 million in lethal and non-lethal aid to the Contras, a stunning victory for the Reagan Administration.

By October 30, the legislation placing the rebels back under Uncle Sam's overt protection would become law. Before that, North was looking forward to retiring from the operation, and took inventory of Project Democracy's assets. He recommended they be turned over to the CIA when the time came. North did not know it, but the operation was about to explode in his face.

I began checking on Brasher during subsequent trips to El Salvador. I started with Adame, who was now part of my team. He knew Aparecio well, and often left his official quarters to stay at Aparecio's house when he was in the mood to carouse. Adame told me he was working with Brasher on the side, using his military contacts to help Brasher sell night-vision equipment to the Salvadorans. Adame also confirmed the link between Brasher and North. Like every other U.S. official in the area, he saw North's operation as a heroic gesture against Communism. He listened patiently to my concerns about their drug involvement, but clearly considered narcotics a subordinate issue. When I mentioned Brasher's name, he assured me "Willy" was a good guy. After all, he was helping the Contras. I brought Adame with me July 28, 1986, for a meeting with the State Department's political officer in El Salvador, Janis Elmore. We sat down in her tiny office in the embassy, and Elmore listened as I rattled off the intelligence I had accumulated linking the Contra's Ilopango operation with narcotics smuggling. She knew most of it already: She approved all DEA cables relating to El Salvador before they were forwarded to Washington.

I wasn't surprised when she replied with the party line:

That's a covert operation, and you should stay away from it. Elmore prided herself in having the best intelligence in El Salvador, which she usually did. Elmore said she knew the Contras were running drugs, but had to follow her own advice to keep her nose out of North's resupply operation. The pressure came from Washington. Elmore obviously didn't like it. She resented North giving the Ambassador orders, strutting around like he owned the place. Before we left her office, Elmore, too, confirmed Brasher worked for Oliver North. I wondered aloud who else may have Brasher on the payroll. " Cele, Willy doesn't work for the embassy, " she said. I wasn't convinced, and I told Elmore she would see Brasher's name on my next Contra report.

The next day, I took the Contra intelligence report to Robert Chavez, counselor general for the U.S. Embassy in El Salvador. Chavez looked at the list of names, and checked them against his computer database. They were hits his computer also listed the pilots as documented drug traffickers. Our com puters carried much of the same information, but I wanted to make sure Chavez knew these pilots were traffickers, so he could .block future visa requests. Chavez told me then that he knew about North's operation, and knew they were smuggling dope. As hard as he tried to stay out of it, the CIA's visa request for Amador drew him into the mess. Chavez did not want his name linked to this imbroglio. Instead of refusing the CIA's request personally, he wanted to use me as the bad guy: Hey, it wasn't me, Castillo nixed Amador because he's a trafficker. I knew Chavez would not back me up if I tried to expose the Contras' drug -running. Elmore, although more outspoken, would probably back away as well.

In August, one of my Guatemalan informants introduced me to a businessman named Bobby Castillo, whose family owned a brewery and the Coca-Cola factory in Guatemala City. He supplemented his income from Coke with a thriving side business in coke. The informant said Bobby was one of Guatemala's biggest cocaine connections, and probably the least cautious. I started working undercover on him, hoping for a break to turn my luck around. Booby and I talked by phone at first, and after several conversations, and a few lunch meetings at the Camino Real, I arranged to buy 200 kilos of cocaine from him, starting with a ten-kilo sample.

After arranging the meeting, I called our Guatemalan anti narco unit to help with surveillance. Up to this point, they helped me with several busts, never netting more than a few kilos from the small time Colombians and Guatemalans they arrested. This could lead to their biggest haul yet. We planned a simple buy bust: As soon as I saw the cocaine, the squad would move in to arrest Booby. They met me at the airport, then melted into the street, watching discreetly as they did their best impressions of passers-by.

Booby pulled up shortly in a Jeep Wagoneer, trailed by a Mercedes flanked closely by two more Jeeps. Booby's taste in clothing leaned toward casual American yuppie. As he walked up to me, he looked like one of those smiling, dark-haired models straight out of a department store catalog. Booby's smile quickly faded. "I don't want to talk here," he said. "Let's meet at the Camino Real. " I agreed, then motioned to the Mercedes. "Who's that?" I asked. Booby said he would explain when we got to the hotel. When their caravan pulled out of sight, I found the officer leading the anti -narcotics squad and explained the situation.

At the hotel, Booby was much more relaxed, greeting me with a hug. "I want you to meet my partner," he said, nodding to an older, heavyset man waiting a few paces away. As I shook his hand, Booby introduced him as el diputado Carlos Ramiro Garcia de Paz.

I froze. This was the Guatemalan congressman listed in DEA files as a drug trafficker. De Paz saw the shock in my eyes and smiled, pulling out his diplomatic credentials. "Don't worry, there's no DEA here, " he said. "And if you are with the police, you cannot arrest me. I have diplomatic immunity. " I heard myself tell him not to worry, as my stomach churned and my palms turned clammy. De Paz grabbed my arm and started to lead me to his Mercedes - - he wanted to do business right there in front of the hotel.

I stole a look down the street, searching for my backup.

Obviously, they had seen the congressman and scattered. Good. I changed tactics, explaining to the congressman I didn't do business out in the open. He patted me on the back, handing me his calling card. "Here's my address. Meet me at 2 o'clock at my residence, and we'll do business there. Nobody is going to rip anybody off." As I walked him to the Mercedes, I told him I needed to notify my people in California of the change.

As they drove off, the squad commander appeared. He looked worried after seeing De Paz, and seemed relieved the bust was cancelled. I hurried to the embassy and called Julio Caballeros, chief of the Guatemalan National Police, to ask if it was possible to arrest a member of congress. It was, he assured me, but only if he was caught with the cocaine in his possession. "Do you want to set it up?" I asked. Caballeros paused a moment. "No, thank you. "

I walked to Stia's office, where he was chatting with Reina, and told them about De Paz. The anti -narcotics unit wanted no part of the operation, I said. Caballeros would not cooperate, either. The Ambassador and his deputy in charge of missions were out of the country, so Stia called Larry Thompson, the third ranking State Department official at the embassy, to ask how I should proceed. Stia returned with Thompson's instructions: Drop the pursuit. We were not here to embarrass the Guatemalan government, he said. We were here to help them.

There was no time to argue. I called Booby to explain the deal was off - - my superiors in California feared I would get ripped off if I did business with a government official. I apologized, but Booby said he understood. Orders were orders.

A wave of depression washed over me. I slumped in my chair. All my work building narcotics squads, all the cultivating and coaxing of informants; all the groundwork we laid to strike at the top of the drug structure had come together beautifully. Finally, a big catch, only to watch our own leaders cut the line.

My losing streak continued. On August 15, 1 met with Jack McCavett, the mild -mannered CIA station chief in El Salvador. Again, I repeated my evidence against the Contras. McCavett denied any connection between the CIA and the Ilopango operation. As far as Brasher was concerned, McCavett said "He doesn't work for me. He works for the Contras and Ollie North, and we have nothing to do with that operation. "

Three days later, McCavett called me into his office and pulled $45,000 in cash out of his desk drawer. "I've got money left over from my budget I need to spend, " he said. "Take this for your anti narcotics group. Go buy them some cars. 9 ' McCavett didn't mention the Contras, but I suspected he was trying to buy me off. The CIA, to my knowledge, had never given the DEA this kind of gift. I wrote out a receipt and handed it to him, took the stack of bills, and gave it to Adame and Aparecio. They bought three much -needed vehicles for FUCA.

Near the end of August, I met with Ambassador Corr to brief him on the CIA's attempt to secure a U.S. visa for Amador. I told him what I had learned about Amador's connection to the Contras, as well as my information about Brasher. He knew about Brasher's ties to North's operation, and listened intently to the new evidence my informants had collected. I was desperate. After repeating the Contra speech over and over to many bureaucrats, Corr was the one U.S. official I thought would understand, and maybe give the investigation a push.

I'll never forget Corr's response. "It's a White House operation, Cele. Stay away from it. I I

Despite my disappointment, I understood his predicament. Corr was part of the administration. Despite Reagan's "Just say no" rhetoric, supporting the Contras would dominate every other U.S. initiative in Central America until the Sandinistas were crushed - - or until someone convinced Reagan the cartel chieftains were Communists.

I left Corr's office, and called Aparecio. He and some of the FUCA team had been watching Brasher carefully. I told him to move in when they had enough evidence to merit a raid. If my superiors would not support an investigation of the Contras, my only option was to bust a member of the resupply operation. If we could prove Brasher was smuggling drugs for the Contras, the bureaucracy would have trouble suppressing my investigation at Ilopango. Brasher's ties to North were well established, but so far, every U.S. agency in El Salvador denied any affiliation with Brasher. He was the bastard child nobody wanted.

COLOMBIA
ECUADOR
Leticia
Tigre River
Amazon River
Huallaga River
BRAZIL
Andes Mountains
Tingo María
PERU
CHILE
Lima Pacific Ocean
DETAIL

PERU

Above and Below*: Operation Condor in Peru

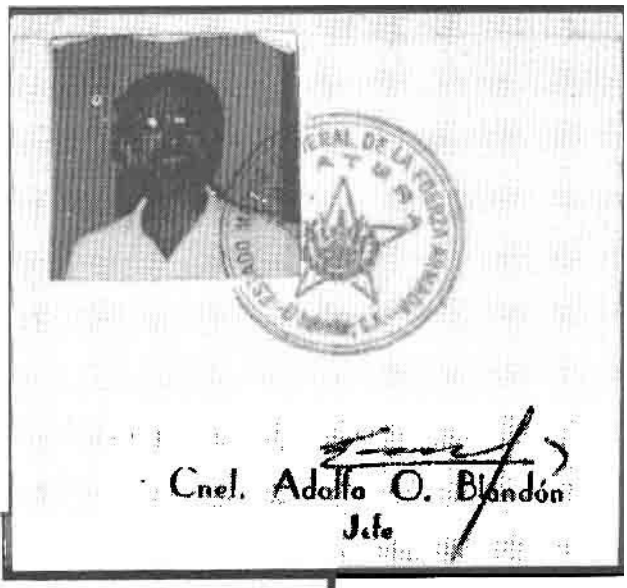
Above: Coca plantations in Peru

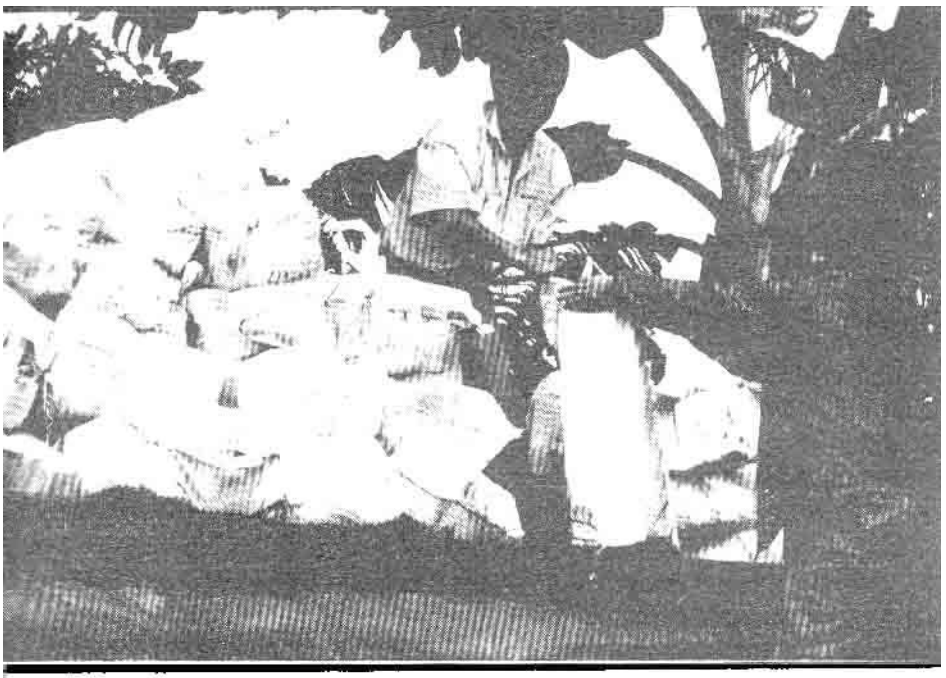
Below: Celerino Castillo with 300 kilos of Cocaine in Guatemala



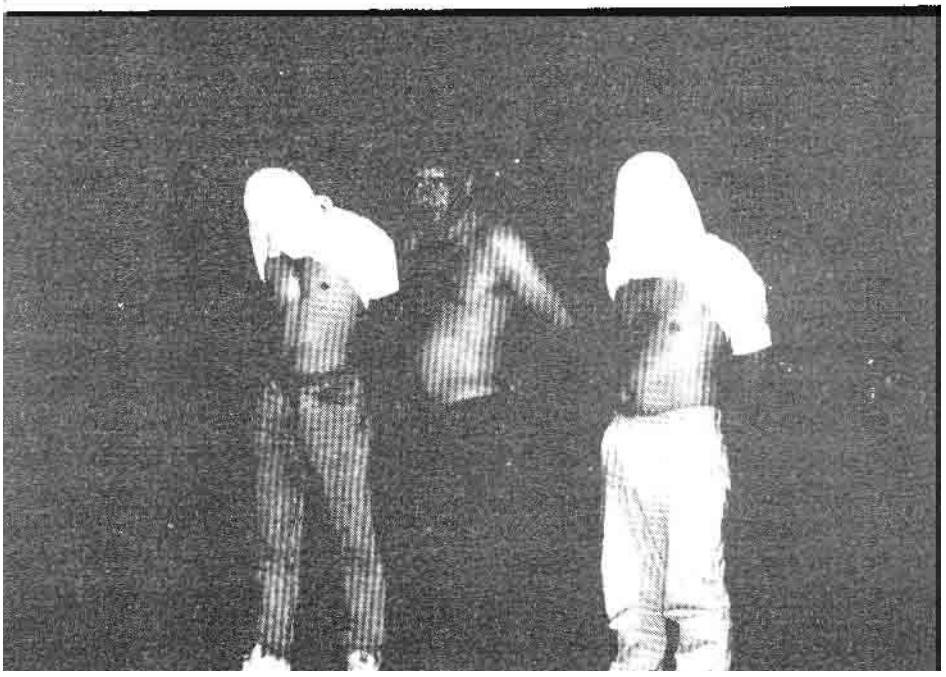
Above: Wally Grasheim Salvadoran Military I.D. He was only a civilian. He was Oliver North's right hand man in El Salvador.

Centre: Joseph Delvecchio "Joe the Crow" New York mobster arrested after the delivery of several kilos of Heroin

Bottom: Castillo undercover in San Francisco.



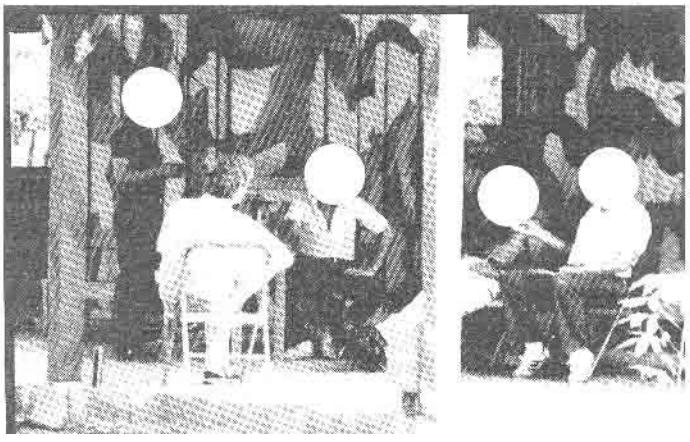
bove and Below: Colombian Pilots who were killed by Guatemala G2 uring operation. 300 kilos of cocaine were seized



Above: Colombian pilot who was killed by Guatemala G2 during operation. 300 kilos of Cocaine were seized.

Left: Carlos Ramirez member of the Medellín Cartel in Guatemala murdered by G2.

Below: DEA and Guatemalan G2 agents before the arrest of the 300 kilos of Cocaine.



U.S.A.
Gulf of Mexico CUBA
Carribean Sea
BELIZE
Belize City
HONDURAS MEXICO
Guatemala City
Tegucigalpa
NICARAGUA GUATEMALA
Managua
San Salvador
EL SALVADOR
San José
Panama City
COSTA RICA PANAMA
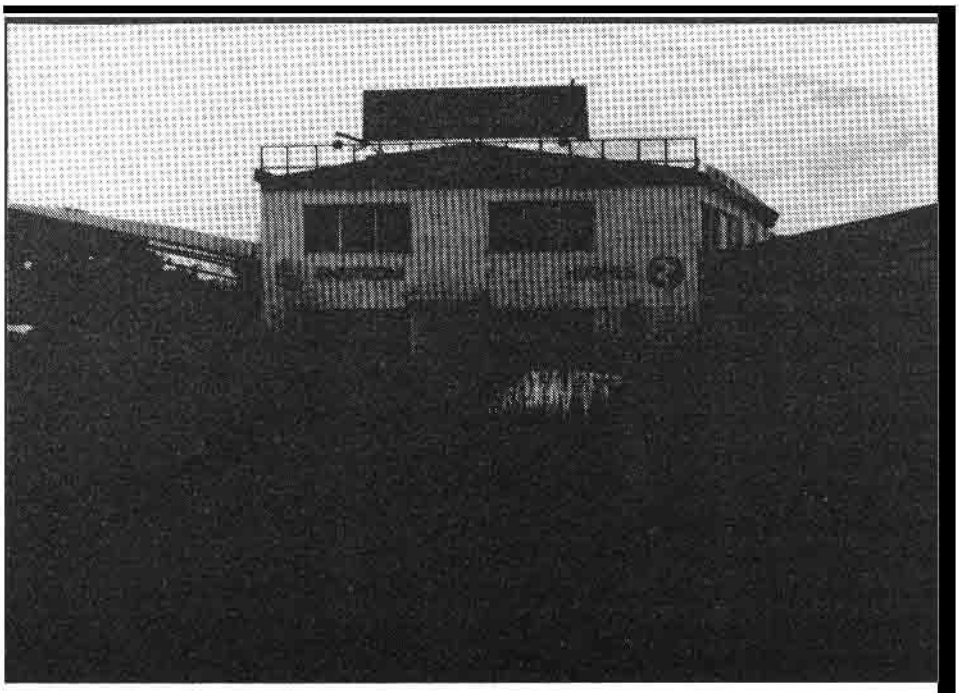
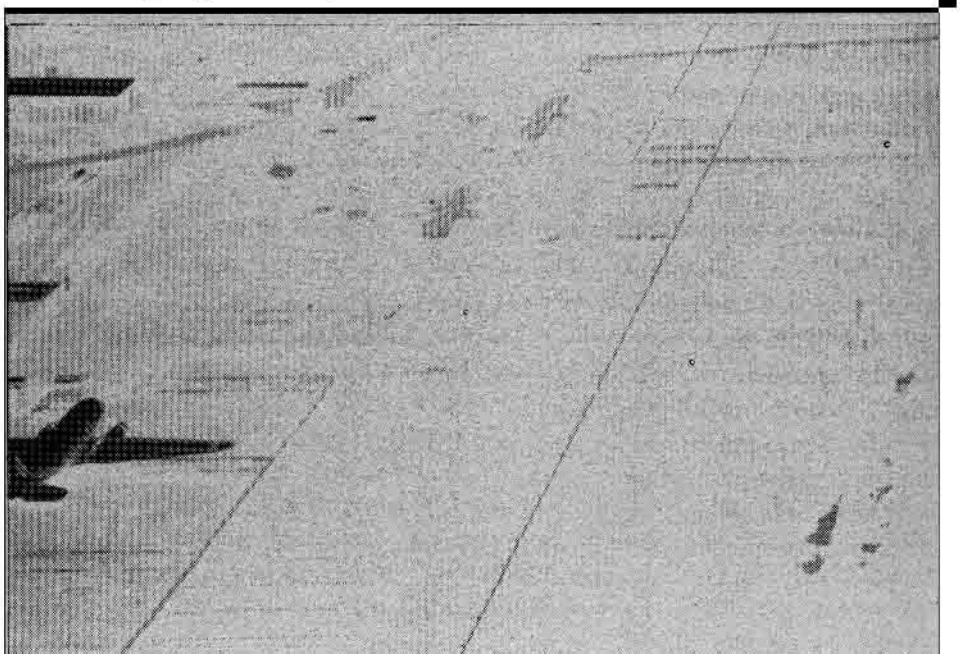
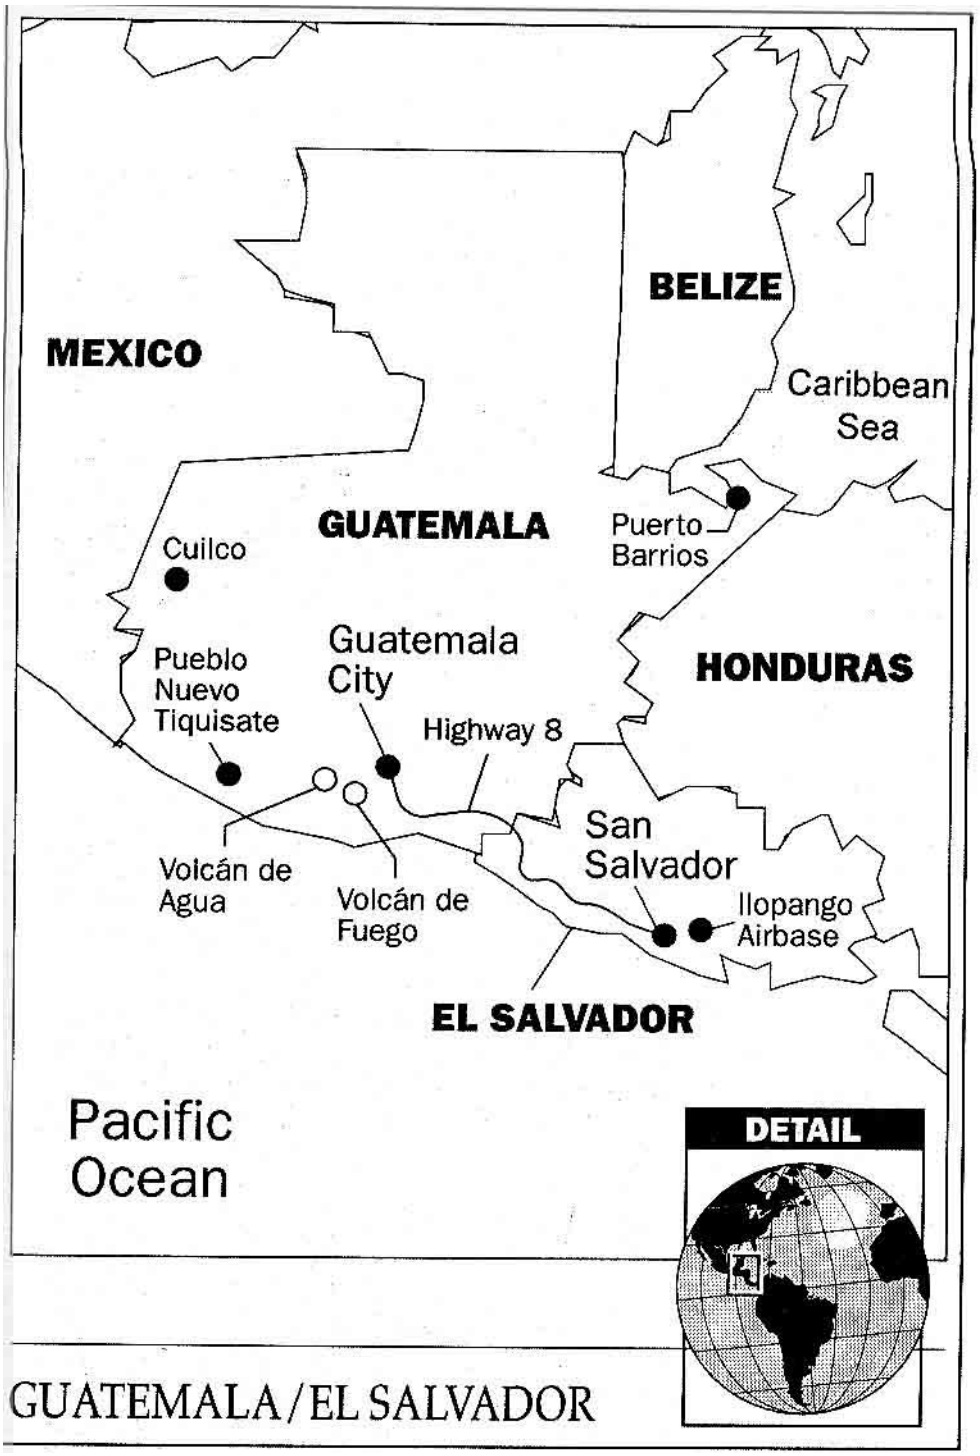
Pacific Ocean
DETAIL
CENTRAL AMERICA



Above: Illopango Military Base Office where flight plans were made by the Contras. Castillo's informant worked there.

Below: Illopango Military Base for the Contras.





GUATEMALA / EL SALVADOR

Eight

Contraband

San Salvador, September 1, 1986

William Brasher was in New York City when Aparecio and ten FUCA soldiers surged into his Salvadoran residence and blew open a link in the contra connection nobody thought we would touch.

FUCA had watched the house in the Lomas de San Francisco neighborhood for a week, while Aparecio drilled the squad On every phase of the raid. The intensity of the preparations told the recruits they were preparing for their first big bust. They Pounced bursting into the living room like a football team on fourth -and goal. Brasher's stunned guards didn't have time to react or argue. This was El Salvador: the "state of siege" dating back to 1980 meant the police could enter a home with all the subtlety of a fist between the eyes. No search warrant, no perfunctory Miranda recitals, just a stream of uniforms and your face against a wall.

I was in my office that Monday at 5 p.m. when Aparecio called. "We just hit Willy's place, and we found a whole bunch of shit. I think I might have put you in trouble with the embassy he said, spitting the words in his hybrid English/Spanish. ye better get your ass down here now. "

The flight from Guatemala City to San Salvador left at 7:30 the next morning. A few suddenly- serious FUCA recruits met me at the airport. "Where's Aparecio?" I asked the soldier at the wheel.

"He's waiting at Brasher's house, guarding our seizure, he said, jerking the wheel and screeching into traffic. When we pulled into Brasher's driveway, Aparecio yanked Open the car door and led me into the house. The recruits milled around outside, young faces etched with uncertainty.

The house was a mess, with clothes, dishes, and junk strew,, everywhere. I poked my head into several rooms. Bunk beds. No way these people are military, I thought. The place looked like a barracks for a pack of teenagers.

"Any drugs?" I asked Aparecio.

"Marijuana," he replied. "It looks like personal use. There's a few plants growing out back, and we found more than a pound wrapped in a brown paper bag. It's in the kitchen." ,,So what's all the excitement about?" I asked. He brought me running from Guatemala for this? Aparecio Pointed toward the back of the house. "Follow me."

He guided me through an enclosed patio and stood at the threshold of a side room, watching my face for reaction as I entered. Holy shit.

No wonder the recruits looked so distraught. Aparecio had mentioned finding some military hardware in the house, but I Was not expecting the arsenal piled before me. The room was filled with enough firepower to arm a platoon. We've intercepted . Contra military shipment, I thought, as my eyes roamed the stacks of weapons. A sniper rifle caught my eye first. It looked like a. So caliber, with a scope big enough to peek into a window half way across town. U.S. military field radios sat atop cases Of grenades and neatly packed C4 explosives. There was night vision equipment; M16s; helicopter helmets; Gerber combat knives; grenade launchers; compasses.

As we sorted through the piles, Aparecio held up boxes Of M 16 and M60 ammunition with a grim look. I ran my fingers Over a bundle of mottled green uniforms - - U - S . jungle fatigues.

"Somebody could do a lot of damage with this, I said hefting an RPG. The shoulder-fired rocket launcher somehow found its way from the Soviet bloc to William Brasher's back room.

We saved the file cabinets for last. Each folder was neatly labeled. I leafed through letters listing Payoffs to Salvadoran generals, colonels, and other high-ranking officers. Brasher certainly had connections. One letter promised a general a paid trip for two to New York, and suggested the general Pick up . complimentary fur for his wife while he was there. Brasher was obviously making sure he remained on their good side. Not a bad idea, I thought, I've heard about their bad side. In ten minutes, we found enough documents to prove Brasher's link to the Salvadoran military, the U.S. MilGroup and, as expected, the Contra operation. Col. Adame's business with Brasher was documented as well, with receipts of sales the colonel had secured for him.

I pulled a file bearing the name of Eden Pastora, head of the Contra's Southern Front in Costa Rica. The cables inside contained lists of military supplies, with corresponding delivery dates, times, and locations. I handed one to Aparecio. "That's probably where this cache was headed," I said.

The FUCA unit loaded everything into trucks and hauled it to National Police headquarters, where word of the seizure raced through the building. I saw curious faces poking around office doors as we walked the halls. The police had always regarded the unit as more of a concession to the norte americanos than a serious investigative force. The triumphant FUCA team strutted through the corridors, back - slapping each other like the Bad News Bears of the drug war.

When Aparecio spread out the arsenal for inventory, the procession began. Curious visitors filtered through our offices to gawk at our catch, and listen to the FUCA members recount every detail of the raid. Nobody could get any work done with all the traffic, so we set up tables in the hallway and laid out our haul like a deadly buffet table. The recruits took turns jealously guarding their prizes. Aparecio was not about to burst their balloon by revealing the two guards and the female housekeeper had surrendered without the hint of resistance.

One of Brasher's bodyguards later took a job with Aparecio in his cafe. He and his buddy confirmed Brasher used the house as a barracks for Contra pilots, and as a storehouse for U.S. military hardware bound for the Contras.

The FUCA group didn't yet realize the magnitude of the seizure. With Brasher's trafficking history, anyone we could link to the weapons would have to explain how their goodies had come into the possession of a known smuggler. As Aparecio and I began tracing the gear, we discovered one of the MI 6s belonged to Col. Steele, who had so emphatically denied any connection to Brasher. The connections were forming like the spokes of a wheel, with Brasher at the center. I had already drawn mental lines to Oliver North, Col. Adame, and Eden Pastora. Now Steele joined the circle.

The next name should not have surprised me. Aparecio ran a check on the license plates from Brasher's Jeeps. They came back registered to the U.S. Embassy. Corr. I thought back to our last conversation. It's a White House operation. I switched on one of the confiscated radios. It was tuned to the embassy frequency, and U.S. personnel chattered back and forth in English. Damn, I thought, they all looked me right in the eye and flat-out lied.

We needed help tracing the rest of the weapons. They were U.S. military issue. The serial numbers stenciled on the crates would guide us to their point of origin. I called Richard Rivera, a U.S. Customs agent in Mexico City. Col. Hugo Francisco Moran-Carranza, director of the president's anti-corruption unit, recommended Rivera after they worked a case together. Moran was impressed. "If anyone can find out where those weapons came from, it's Rivera, " he said. When I explained our situation over the phone, Rivera agreed to fly to El Salvador as soon as he could get free. I thanked him and hung up.

Good. After thrashing around in the darkness for so long, I could see a pinprick of light ahead. When the inventory was complete, we planned to call a press conference. An arrest warrant had been issued for Brasher, and I wanted to give him a big surprise when he returned from the States. I could see the cameras flashing as the police cuffed him and drove him to jail. As soon as the reporters scribbled down the details from the police, they would surely descend on the U.S. embassy and lie in ambush at the gate. Col. Steele, what connection does the U. S. Military Group have to Mr. Brasher? Where did a civilian obtain such a large cache of U.S. weapons?

I was still savoring the image when the FUCA lieutenant rapped on the door frame. His eyes spoke before he did. Some thing was wrong. "Col. Revelo just told me he received orders not to release the information to the press. "

A long minute ticked away on the wall clock as I rocked in my chair. I felt I had been drilled in the chest with an icicle.

Someone high in the chain of command had ordered Revelo, the chief of the national police, to cancel the press conference. The lieutenant drummed his fingers against the wood, waiting for instructions.

"What should we do?" he asked finally. It was more a challenge than a question. His brow dug a deep groove between his eyes. I suddenly felt sorry for him, for all of them. They knew nothing about the political storm their raid had unleashed, and I couldn't warn them. My initial shock congealed into a slow, rolling anger.

" Have someone bring a car around to the front I'm goin to talk to Corr. "

The CIA had already briefed the ambassador about the raid. I briefed him again, studying his face when I came to the part about embassy license plates gracing Brasher's Jeeps. Corr stared at me, the muscles in his jaw flexing.

"You just hit the Contra operation, " he said flatly.

"I told you I was going to hit Brasher," I shot back. "Explain to me what the hell a U.S. civilian in El Salvador is doing with this stuff. I told you this guy's a documented trafficker. He could be arrested as a terrorist.

Corr paused. The jaw flexed again.

"Cele, it's a covert operation, " he said, holding his palms out.

That didn't answer my question. I played my last card; Corr had always insisted North's orders came straight from the White House, the embassy had no involvement. He had just admitted Brasher worked with the Contras. I knew the license plates and radios we had seized could tie this mess around Corr's neck like an albatross.

I didn't want to back the ambassador into a comer, but a shadowy paranoia was crawling around the comers of my mind. Undercover agents live in a world of delicately woven deceit, the office - - in my case, the embassy - - is the one place they can peel off their underworld identities and confide in people they trust. Everything was being turned upside down; I was beginning to trust my informants more than my superiors. I wanted desperately to trust Corr. I needed answers.

"Why did he have U.S. Embassy radios? Why did he have embassy plates on his Jeeps? " I was close to losing my composure. "If you don't claim him, and Steele doesn't claim him, and Janis Elmore doesn't claim him, where did he get all this shit?"

The jaw clenched again. "We were ordered to give them all the cooperation they needed, " Corr said, rising from his chair. The conversation was over.

If our raid had somehow slipped past the diplomatic radar and hit the U.S. papers that September, Oliver North's cover might have evaporated sooner. U.S. -sponsored drug smuggling might have joined the list of deceptions later known as the Iran Contra Affair. While we wrestled against our strait jacket, a security breach in Costa Ricalater that month pushed the National Security Council's disinformation apparatus into overdrive.

On September 26, the Costa Rican Security Minister held a press conference that revealed the U. S. government's use of the Santa Elena airstrip in Costa Rica to supply the Contras. North shot off a top secret memo to his boss, National Security Advisor John Poindexter: "The airfield at Santa Elena has been a vital element in supporting the resistance. Built by a Project Democracy proprietary (Udall Corporation, S.A. - - a Panamanian company), the field was initially used for direct resupply efforts. " North went on to recommend Oval Office visits for Cerezo and Duarte to shore up their support for the Reagan Administration in Guatemala and El Salvador. Preventive dam age control. A short photo opportunity could buy them political insurance against future leaks. Referring to Duarte, North wrote: " Given the active support for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance provided by El Salvador, such a brief meeting is highly appropriate. "

He included a press guidance sheet with the memo, instructing the agency's spin doctors to say "no U.S. Government funds were allocated or used in connection with this site nor were any U.S. Government personnel involved in its construction."

It was just a day's drive away, but Costa Rica might have well been on the other side of the world. Its government relatively stable, its citizens relatively peaceful and prosperous, and its leaders were more likely to test Washington's grip than the Guatemalans or Salvadorans. They were tired of Uncle Sam using their country for its undeclared war against the Sandinistas. The press conference about the airstrip drove the point home. With El Salvador in firm U.S. control, we had no chance of finding a disgruntled official who Would expose simultaneous arms- and drug running by U.S. operatives in his country.

Two days after the raid, I returned to Guatemala City to write my report. As I copied down serial numbers, Aparecio called. "Some people from the embassy Just walked in and claimed the radios and license plates, " he said. "They took Col. Steele's M 16 too. 1,

At that moment, I knew the Brasher investigation was doomed. We were out of allies. The only reward the FUCA men Would receive would be a bottle of good american booze after my next trip to the States. But we had to finish out the ride, like a stunt driver who realizes in mid -air he added one car too many to the jump. Richard Rivera flew down from Mexico City, photographed the seized weapons, and took a list of serial numbers back with him. He promised to call as soon as he found something. Over the next month, Rivera made several more trips to El Salvador, talking to People, checking leads, trying to use the serial numbers on the Weapons to find the thread that would unravel the veil of secrecy over Brasher's activities. I didn't tell him he was our last hope.

I threw myself into other investigations, trying to push the raid to the back of my mind. I had a few new leads on the Guatemalan narco politicians, I desperately wanted another chance at exposing their activities. But the image of the stacked weapons and U.S. fatigues tugged at my thoughts like a impatient child. All the elements were lined up: Brasher's connection to the Contras and Oliver North was well established in the tight diplomatic loop in Central America; his drug exploits were documented in the DEA computer; we had caught him with marijuana and a huge cache of weapons. Yet every U. S. diplomat in sight was protecting Brasher, even though they clearly disliked the man. I decided to keep pushing. Something had to give.

When I returned to San Salvador, I dropped in on Steele and asked about the rifle. "I thought Brasher wasn't working for you," I said. Steele brushed the question away, claiming he gave Brasher the MI 6 a long time ago, before they had clashed - - over something he wouldn't discuss. He no longer talked to Brasher, Steele declared. End of discussion.

Later, as the Iran-Contra scandal unfolded, Steele's role was illuminated by Rafael "Chi-Chi" Quintero, a Cuban exile and Bay of Pigs veteran who had worked for the CIA as a Central American intelligence officer. When North recruited retired Air Force Major General Richard Secord to help run the Contra operation, Secord hired Quintero to ship arms to the rebels.

During North's 1989 trial for his role in the Iran-Contra affair, Quintero testified that North told him two men were responsible for decisions about weapons drops: in Costa Rica, CIA station chief Joe Fernandez; in El Salvador, he was to report to Col. James Steele.

As we chatted, Steele clearly wanted to distance himself from Brasher. "You know I'm going to have to include this in my report, " I said. In fact, it was already in the report, which had been sent up the line before I left Guatemala. Steele nodded, apparently unconcerned. I left, heading for Janis Elmore's office.

Elmore greeted my briefing with an I-told-you-so look. "Nothing's going to happen, " she said. "Willy works for Oliver North. "

On my way out, I stopped to chat with a Salvadoran secretary working for Adame. I wanted to find out what had thrown Brasher and Steele's relationship on the rocks. She and I had lunch occasionally in the embassy cafeteria. Like secretaries everywhere, she knew more about the goings-on in the office than her boss. She often supplemented the intelligence I obtained elsewhere with her own fly-on-the-wall insights. She had restless ears and an eye for detail.

She knew Brasher too.

'He's an asshole, " she said bluntly. I asked her what she knew about Brasher's other activities. "He's been running guns and drugs for the Contras, " she said. Yeah, no kidding, I thought as I rapped on Adame's door.

Adame told me Brasher had challenged Steele's authority in the Contra resupply mission. Brasher was trying to run the operation, but Steele had quashed his power play. I mentioned the incriminating documents in Brasher's file cabinets listing Adame' s extra-governmental sales activities with Willy. I was hoping to wring more information about Brasher out ofhim, but the colonel threw me a reassuring smile and said his arrangment with Brasher was purely business. Adame said he planned to make some real money while he was in Central America, and his association with Brasher had done the trick. The thought that someone might consider this immoral or illegal apparently never entered his mind.

Not that annyone worred about the rules anymore. The CIA which had ostentsibly turned over the Contras lethal supply line to North and his network, remained an active part of the operations .Rumors of this violation of the Boland Amendment whispered through the system for months, until it became so obvious the agency could no longer avoid action. By January, Joe Fernandez the CIA Coasta Rican station chief, was recalled when the rumors turned into allegations.

* * *

I had become good friends with Randy Kapasar , a CIA agent in Guatemala with whom I shared countless flights between Guatemala and El Salvador, He was an ex-Marine, balding and bearded, whose hands twitched and waved as if his body had chosen them to let off its excess energy His career took him throughout Latin America; he was an expert in covert operations and demolition. We partied together from time to time, and when he transferred to Miami, we threw Randy a huge going-away party.

He knew I was investigating the Contras, I knew he was helping them. I expected him to deny my evidence of the Contras' narcotrafficking, but he followed Sofi's reasoning: "Cele, how do you think the Contras are gonna make money? They've got to run dope, that's the only way we can finance this operation. '

"Arrogant bastard," said the DFA agent in Panama when I asked him about Brasher. The DFA computer mentioned a recent Brasher appearance at the DFA office in Panama. Yes, the agent said, Brasher had paid them a visit, demanding information on certain traffickers. ' 'He strutted in like he ran he place. We asked him for identification. He had credentials from DFA and CIA. He even had FBI credentials, ' , he said. While Brasher waited, they ran hia name through the computer. When they discovered his illustrious trafficking record, they happily bounced him out of the embassy. "Be careful with this guy", the agent said, "He's a little nuts."

On October 7, as I pored over paperwork in Guatemala City, a burly mid-westerner was led before a pack of reporters in Managua. I caught the newsconference on CNN at the office, and my jaw dropped. The prisoner loooked haggard, dressed in filthy jeans and a denim shirt. His Nicaraguan captors allowed him to make a single statement: "My name is Gene Hasenfus. I come from Marinette, Wisconsin. I was captured yesterday in southern NIcaragua.

Hasenfus and three other crew members --Americans Sawyer and William J. Cooper, plus an unidentified Contra operative --had lumbered off a runway at Ilopango on Sunday, October 5, with a load of munitions for the Contras.

They flew South, skirting the Nicaraguan coastline before veering into Costa Rica, then looped into Nicaragua. A few minutes later, as they they approached San Carlos, a surface-to-air missile slammed into the plane, and sent it hurtling to the Earth. Hasenfus was the only one with a parachute. As his comrades braced for their death, the lone survivor floated into history.

The unraveling had begun.

I recognized Hasenfus' name immediately. Aparecio' s prostitue girlfriend, had mentioned him as one of the regulars at the pilots' lair in the hills. They constantly invited her to the house and I had written reports based on her accounts of her encounters with the pi!ots. She described their parties, where cocaine, marijuana, and sex swirled around the house, punctuated by the rattle of automatic weapons fired into the air by juiced up pilots. She knew Hasenfus, Oliver North, Felix Rodriguez -the Cuban American who helped North with the Contra operation - and virtually every pilot who flew for Project Democracy out of Ilopango.

When he heard about Hasenfus, Aparecio headed straight to the house with a FUCA team, looking for evidence. He called 30 minutes later. "It was cleaned out completely," he said dejectedly.

The Nicaraguans recovered rifles, grenades, boots and 50,000 rounds of ammunition from the shattered C - 123. They also seized an 1. D. card identifying Hasenfus as a U.S. adviser to the Salvadoran Air Force. I thought about the documents in Brasher's files listing weapons and delivery dates for the Contras' Southern Front. Had the cargo on that C-123 been stored at Brasher's place? Had Eugene Hasenfus ever slept in one of the bunks in that filthy house?

The hornet's nest had broken open, and everyone was ducking for cover. Oliver North hurried back to Washington from Frankfurt, Germany, where he had been negotiating with the Iranians for the release of the American hostages held in Beirut. He immediately began shredding the paper trail connecting him to the Contras.

By then, Congress had approved $100 million in aid for the Contras, allowing North to shut down his operation to prepare for the CIA's return to the war. Hasenfus said he thought the CIA ran the operation; the Administration began circling the wagons. Secretary of State George Shultz issued a flat denial: "They had no connection with the U.S. government at all.

It was the first of a long string of lies.

The Reagan Administration tried to pin responsibility on Gen. Singlaub, the Contra cheerleader whose fund-raising had been prohibited in the McAllen Library. Singlaub also denied any knowledge Of the flight or its mission . Officials later admitted he had been used as a scapegoat.

As more details bubbled to the surface, the President lauded the efforts Of the private American citizens who chose to risk their lives to fight the Sandinista regime in their spare time. The Contras played their part in the farce: spokesman Bosco Matamoros assured the world the U.S. government had no connection to the downed C - 123. In response, the Sandinistas marched Hasenfus before the cameras and upped the ante. "Two Cuban naturalized Americans that work for the CIA did most of the coordination for the flights and oversaw all of our housing, transportation, also refueling and some flight plans," Hasenfus said.

As their role in the fiasco came to light, the first political tremors rumbled through the Salvadoran government. But they were dwarfed by the terror that struck five days after Hasenfus was captured. At 11:49 a.m., October 10, every living resident of San Salvador was united for an instant, their minds frozen in a flash of horror as the city lurched beneath them.

The earthquake measured 7.5 on the Richter scale. When the Cocos Plate slipped another notch under the isthmus, the long scar stretching through the city ripped open and claimed its victims. The city's landmarks crumpled: The Gran Hotel, the Ministry of Planning, and the 5 - story Ruben Dario office build ing,'Where the moans and cries of more than 300 trapped workers echoed through the twisted steel beams. More than three dozen child ten died in the San Jacinto neighborhood when Santa Catalina Elementary School shuddered and fell. As the day faded, the searchers and the stunned survivors milled over the remains of the City, their silhouettes black against the searchlights and names .

In Nicaragua, Hasenfus named the two Cuban-Americans who helped run the supply operation. One of them was Max Gomez. Vice President George Bush immediately hailed Gomez as "a patriot," and in a slip of the tongue, called him "Felix Gomez." Gomez, of course, was Felix Rodriguez.

The residents of San Salvador worked through the night, Pulling the dead and near-dead from the rubble, praying they Could reach the living in time. Sudden thunderstorms doused them as they clawed through the wreckage. In the shantytowns, refugees who had lost loved ones in the crossfire called out the names of relatives they would never see alive again.

The following day, the earthquake and Hasenfus dueled for space on the front pages. Elliott Abrams, the senior State Department official in charge of Latin America, appeared on CNN to repeat the party line on the Evans and Novak show:

Evans: Mr. Secretary, can you give me categorical assurance that Hasenfus was not under the control, the guidance the direction, or what have you, of anybody connected with the American government?

Abrams: Absolutely. That would be illegal. We are barred from doing that, and we are not doing it. This was not in any sense a U.S. government operation. None.

Novak: Now, when you say, gave categorical assurance, we're not playing word games that are so common in Washington. You're not talking about the N[SCI or something else?

Abrams: I am not playing word games.

Novak: National Security Council?

Abrams: No government agencies, none. They never thought the truth would wiggle out of their fists.

Only one of San Salvador's hospitals escaped damage, so wounded Salvadorans fought for medical attention as U.S. transport planes swooped into Ilopango with relief supplies and rescue teams. They brought dogs to sniff out the living, and tools to cut through the wreckage, now reeking from hundreds of damp, decomposing bodies. President Duarte estimated the death toll at 890, with 10,000 injured and 150,000 homeless. The American Embassy was a total loss: moments after Ambassador Corr stepped across the hall, the ceiling in his office collapsed.

Bush denied any connection to Max Gomez, or Felix Rodriguez, or Felix Gomez (depending on who you asked), but on October 12 he admitted Donald Gregg, his national security adviser, had some dealings with his favorite Contra patriot.

Hugo called from Ilopango: the pilots were scrambling out of the country, almost bumping into the reporters swarming into the air base. Not that the pilots had anything to fly anymore. The Contras' small air force at Ilopango was quietly flown to a remote airstrip and destroyed.

The earthquake's after shocks hit October 13, three days after the initial devastation, sending most of the city scurrying outdoors. Some remained in the streets hours after the last tremor. The death toll reached 976.

In the following days, the Salvadorans began laboriously reconstructing their capital, while America's most popular presidency in decades staggered with each new revelation. The Sandinistas discovered a business card on the C - 123 belonging to Robert Owen, North's main intermediary between himself and the Contras (according to Kerry's subcommittee probe, Owen's name was later discovered in an address book found on a DC-4 controlled by Frank Moss, a pilot who flew Contra missions and was investigated, but never indicted, by 10 different law enforcement agencies for narcotics offenses). And as Secretary of State George Schultz picked his way through San Salvador with Duarte, a dozen House Democrats asked the Justice Department to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate whether the White House had violated the Boland Amendment.

On October 21, 1 filed a follow-up cable on the Brasher raid, this one more detailed than the report I sent from El Salvador. The suits in Washington still had not responded to my first cable. By then I doubted the memo existed anymore.

John Martsh, head of the DEA's Latin American Section, surprised me with a call a week later. He had read my latest report, and he was not pleased. He insisted I use "allegedly" more when I described my investigation of the Contras and Brasher. "Head quarters is pretty upset about this, " he said. "Don't step on other people's toes, it could come back to haunt you. If DEA doesn't like your reports, they might reject your re-up." The shit was obviously hitting the fan, so now Washington was telling me to back off.

Despite the setbacks, I planned to put in for another two years overseas. I wanted to finish what I had started in Guatemala. Noe agreed to stay for another tour. She enjoyed the cocktail party atmosphere of the embassy social scene. She also landed a job as assistant manager in the embassy commissary. Now Martsh was telling me I might be yanked back to the States if I made headquarters squirm too much.

I scheduled an appointment with Gen. Bustillo, the ranking Salvadoran air force officer at Ilopango, to ask him why he allowed Brasher to run dope. It was a bluff, but Bustillo bit. The general said he was only following orders to help North's operation. He was confused. "I don't understand your government, " he said. " North comes down here and tells us he needs our help with his covert operation. Now you tell me what they're doing is illegal. " As far as he knew, Oliver North represented the White House. That was all the reassurance he needed.

I met with Corr at his residence on November 13. It had survived the earthquake, but the ambassador looked a little shaken when I arrived. "Guess who just left?" he said, then filled in the blank. "William Brasher. " Brasher had returned from the States in a rage. Corr told me Brasher had stormed in and threatened him: If I go down, you and half the MilGroup go down with me. He wanted his weapons back.

Corr advised him to get his ass out of town while he still could, then confiscated his embassy credentials as he left. Brasher would never get his guns back. We had donated the cache to the national police, who happily distributed it through the ranks; anything left at the house had been picked clean by the CIA. But Brasher would not go to jail, either. Officers at the national police told me they could not arrest him - - their superiors ordered them to leave him alone.

Corr wearily said he was taking heat from Washington because of my reports. "You're not the only one, " I replied. The DEA had sent a man from Washington to investigate my reports on Brasher. He repeated the orders to use "allegedly." Then he scolded me for poor grammar in my cables. Poor granvnar? That was a first.

A few days later, Brasher called me. He apparently had taken Corr's advice to leave the country. He was calling from Miami.

"You and I need to sit down over a cup of coffee. I want to meet you and find out who you are," Brasher said. "I need to straighten you out. " He was angry. I had messed up his operation, and he claimed my reports were false. I was in no mood for his abuse. By then, Brasher had threatened every diplomat in El Salvador, using North's name to throw weight behind his wrath. He repeated the threat to each one: If I go down, the whole show goes down.

The Contra operation was collapsing in a heap without Brasher, like the flimsy shantytowns in San Salvador during the earthquake. AcrossAmerica, the shock of leaming Reagan's staff was negotiating with the Iranians for the release of the hostages was followed by the inevitable aftershocks: North overcharged the Iranians to buy guns for a war we were no longer supposed to be supporting. If the Contra -drug connection had been added to the list of sins, it might have leveled anyone left standing. Instead, my own agency was trying to intimidate me, and this asshole was harassing me.

I thought back to his unceremonious eviction from the DEA office in Panama, despite his ample credentials. "Hey, you still have those FBI credentials?" I asked sarcastically. Brasher fumed. I hung up.

Nine

Death Squad Dance

San Salvador - January 16, 1987

It should have been just another brief flight from Guatemala City to San Salvador. The pilot adjusted the flaps, dropping the jet smoothly into its landing pattern. The whining engines competed with the murmur of passengers in the half -filled Copa jet. I sat in the front row, skimming over my work notes from the Previous week, a bottle of scotch for the FUCA commander tucked under my seat.

Suddenly, the plane lurched upward, pulling my stomach down to my belt. As the jet roared past the control tower, I peered through the oval window and spotted a white - shirted figure in the tower waving his arms back and forth, like a baseball umpire signaling "safe. " His grave expression indicated otherwise. Something was wrong. Flight 317 banked sharply, aiming toward~ the Pacific.

A flight attendant appeared, her face drawn and nervous.

She clicked the intercom and delivered the bad news with a halting Voice: The front landing gear was stuck halfway down. After jettisoning most of the fuel over the ocean, the crew planned to attempt a crash landing.

The woman across the aisle, a Nicaraguan who looked about eight months pregnant, prayed out loud, ignoring the effect Of her display on the two terrified little girls in the seat next to her. The flight crew instructed the passengers to move to the rear of the plane, but the pregnant woman refused, afraid to leave her seat. The flight attendant frowned for a moment, then patted her shoulder and joined the others in the rear.

I remained in the front with her and her daughters. Muttering my own quiet prayer, I pulled off my wedding band and locked it in my attache case, then jotted a quick note to my wife in my planner:

Noe, I love you and the kids. Guide them. I'm proud of you and I am sorry. Be brave. Tell my family I love them. Cele, 10:45. of all the

I closed the book and cursed to myself, thinking things I should have done. Always too busy. Too much work. TOO much stress. It should have been different.

The pilot's voice cracked over the intercom: "The front landing gear is still jammed. Prepare for every hard impact when the back wheels touch down. We're going to try to jar it loose when we land." A minute later, the plane dropped toward the runway, tail first. The rear landing gear smashed into the pavement, bouncing us in our seats like puppets. After a few terrifying moments, we heard a screech as the gear touched again. I closed my eyes, waiting for the sound of twisting metal. The airbrakes hammered on, dragging the jet to a slow stop. We were safe. I pried my fingers from the armrests, said a quick word of thanks to Saint Jude, then walked into the sunlight.

I had little time to dwell on the near miss. At the end of January, articles linking the Contra resupply operation with narcotics smuggling hit the U.S. media. The third secret was out.

The story surfaced in turbulent waters. Iran-Contra was a household word by the beginning of 1987, with new revelations smacking the public in the face every few days. When the Administration ran out of lies, it searched for scapegoats. President Reagan fired Oliver North and accepted the resignation of his boss, Vice Admiral John Poindexter, on November 25, 1986. The first bodies had dropped.

In December, during his weekly radio address to the nation, Reagan admitted "mistakes were made." He would change this comment to "serious mistakes were made" a month later. On December 4, the House and Senate agreed to form a select committee to probe deeper into those ,mistakes." On December 19, U - S. Attorney General Edwin Meese named Lawrence Walsh independent counsel to investigate the now- famous Iran -Contra Affair.

The third secret surfaced in The New York Times on January 20. Under the headline, "Contra Arms Crews Said to Smuggle Drugs," reporter Joel Brinkley wrote: Federal drug investigators uncovered evidence last fall that the American flight crews covertly ferrying arms to the Nicaraguan rebels were smuggling cocaine and other drugs on their return trips to the United States, Administration officials said today.

When the crew members, based in El Salvador, learned that Drug Enforcement Administration agents were investigating their activities, one of them warned that they had White House protection, the officials said.

The Times then quoted an anonymous U.S. official who said the crew member's warning, which came after DEA searched his San Salvador house for drugs, caused "quite a stir" at Ilopango. Brasher. Who else could it be? Someone at DEA leaked details of my investigation to The Times, I thought when I finally saw the article. The story described it in amazing detail.

Then, in Newsweek's January 26, 1987, issue, a headline asked "Is There a Contra Drug Connection?" The magazine quoted three drug smugglers: George Morales, the champion speedboat racer- turned -trafficker; Gary Betzner, one of Morales 'pilots; and an unnamed "FBI witness" who claimed to have seen contra planes loaded with cocaine in Colombia in 1985. Morales and Betzner, both interviewed in federal prison in Miami, accused the Contras of running drugs, claims they would repeat under oath before Sen. Kerry's subcommittee in 1988. The "FBI witness," who passed a lie detector test, said cocaine was packed aboard a Southern Air Transport plane in Barranquilla, Colombia, where other aircraft from North's supply network often landed. " Southern Air Transport is the shadowy company that has been implicated in Oliver North's network to supply arms to the contras, using funds from the Iranian arms deal. It also provided the Hasenfus plane, shot down by the Sandinistas on a contra airdrop run," the author wrote.

Then, another connection.

The Times article mentioned Southern Air Transport as well, saying "Colonel North had told the Federal Bureau of investigation last October to stop investigating Southern Air Transport ... At that time, Colonel North told the F. B. 1. that the investigation would jeopardize negotiations for the release Of the American hostages in Lebanon."

An anonymous former federal official - nobody wanted to talk about this on the record - told The Times reporter some senior government officials were "very, very worried that Ollie really had stopped that investigation, and this would be the next big scandal. "

From my vantage point, it was obvious the government did not want the drug issue to turn the scandal into the Iran-Contra Cocaine Affair. First, Rivera's weapons investigation was quietly snuffed.

Before the weapons could be traced, Rivera called, distraught. Customs suddenly decided to switch jurisdiction for Central America from Mexico City to their Panama office. His bosses ordered Rivera to pack up his investigations from Central America, particularly anything related to the Iran-Contra Affair, and ship them to headquarters, marked "Classified." Rivera boxed his files and sent them to Washington. We never learned what, if anything, happened to the Brasher investigation.

Then, two weeks after the Times article appeared, DEA sent a two -person team to Guatemala to investigate my Contra reports. Finally, someone is listening. Or so I thought. I did not know about the increasing publicity the Contras' drug connection was receiving.

I was in El Salvador when the intelligence team arrived. I hurried back, expecting a couple of grizzled veterans. Instead, Stia introduced me to a young, casually dressed man named Doug. His partner, a short woman with straight, shoulder-length dark hair, was a DEA rookie. She was also a diplomat brat whose parents, she said proudly, worked in the US Embassy in Costa Rica. I wondered why the agency would send an inexperienced analyst to investigate such a sensitive topic. She's probably the only Spanish speaker in her entire office, I thought.

After a brief meeting with the pair, I ducked into Stia's office, eager to discover what kind of questions they were asking.

Stia said when they interviewed him the previous day, he let them flip through my reports from Ilopango. He assured me he backed up everything in my reports. I nodded. I was going to need plenty of support.

On February 9, the analysts and I filed into Janis Elmore's office. Col. Adame was already there, sitting quietly with an eager-to please look on his face. I pulled up a chair, wondering if Elmore and Adame would verify my reports. I had my doubts.

The woman started by asking Elmore about the relationship between DEA and the State Department in Guatemala: Were there any problems Elmore would like to air now.? No, Janis said, the offices maintained an amicable relationship. She threw me a quick, puzzled glance. I shifted uncomfortably in my chair, which suddenly became cold and hard. The questions continued, edging closer to my actions in Central America. They seemed more interested in searching out criticism of my performance than learning the truth about the Contras. By the time they got around to asking about the Contras - - Doug seemed afraid to say the word, instead asking "What's going on at Ilopango?" - - Elmore seemed thoroughly irritated with their fishing expedition.

Elmore dodged the question, telling them everything at Ilopango was normal. She avoided the Contras altogether. Adame chimed in with his own reassurances: Nothing unusual to report at the airbase. Rumors had surfaced about some Contra pilots smuggling narcotics, he said, but he could assure them if the rumors were true, no U.S. personnel were involved. The woman nodded without looking up from her notebook.

When the female investigator asked to meet with Elmore in private, Elmore shook her head. "Anything you want to ask me, you can ask in front of them," she said. The woman stalked out with her teammate in tow. Elmore leaned toward me. "Be careful. This girl is looking for something to nail you guys on.

I nodded and walked out.

Any slim hope I harbored of Elmore and Adame verifying my Contra reports vanished as I left the office. I could not bring myself to be angry. They were avoiding turbulent water. Adame and Brasher, after all, were friends and business partners. He was not about to stab Brasher in the back, or admit the MilGroup allowed a U. S. sponsored operation to haul boxes of cocaine into the United States.

And whether or not Elmore knew it, the State Department shared some of the responsibility for placing the drug traffickers on the government payroll. The year before, the State Depart ment awarded contracts to four companies owned or operated by drug traffickers: SETCO Air, founded by a Honduran trafficker; DIACSA, an air freight company that doubled as the Miami headquarters for two convicted smugglers; VORTEX, an airplane leasing company whose vice president was a trafficker - turned DEA informant; and Frigorificos de Puntarenas, a Costa Rican seafood company owned and operated by two convicted traffickers.

Between January and August, 1986, the State Department paid the companies more than $800,000 to provide services to the Contras.

During the same period, the State Department calmly assured Congress that a government probe into Contra drug smuggling revealed only a "limited number of incidents in which known drug traffickers tried to establish connections with Nicaraguan resistance groups. " Individual members of the resistance may have dabbled in narcotics smuggling, the department stated, but they did so without the knowledge of Contra leaders. DEA9s investigation was equally superficial, and like the State Department's probe, came in the wake of news accounts linking the Contras to narcotics.

on January 10, the investigators headed to El Salvador. They paid a courtesy visit to Corr, but had not planned to interview him. When they told Corr the purpose of their visit, he hurried to assure them everything El Salvador was running smoothly.

Then, the main event: An interview with the two informants who made the investigation possible. We walked i~to Aparecio's cafe, where Aparecio and Hugo waited. I made the introductions. When everyone settled into their chairs, the female investigator flipped to a fresh page and leaned toward Hugo. She asked him if my reports from Ilopango were accurate. Hugo took a deep breath and rattled off everything he witnessed at Ilopango throughout the previous year. For the next hour, he recounted every detail: The cocaine, the cash, the pilots, even the black X on the tails of the Contra planes. She chatted with him in rapid fire Spanish, stopping every few minutes to translate for Doug.

She interrupted Hugo several times during his narrative to ask if I was taking good care of him, paying him good money. The insinuations woven through her questions tested my patience, but Hugo came to my rescue. Yes, he was happy with our relation ship. Aparecio spoke next, filling in the gaps from his own experience with the Contras and the Brasher raid. I held back the satisfied smile that wanted to spread across my face. Finally, the truth. Their accounts confirmed everything in my reports.

The analysts seemed unimpressed. The woman became excited only when Hugo revealed a shady airplane rental deal between Stia and Perez, who almost got me killed with his helicopter stunt in Cuilco. Hugo said Stia chipped in $5,000 to buy a plane with P6rez. Then the pair turned around and rented it to DEA, charging three times what we normally paid to lease planes from the Piper company. The woman furiously copied down every word. When Hugo returned to the Contras, her pen slowed to a crawl.

After three very similar days in Central America, the analysts returned to Washington and filed their report. Naturally, it echoed the government's well-rehearsed conclusions: Any narcotics trafficking by the Contras was the work of a few unorganized individuals, who snuck the contraband into the United States behind their leaders' backs. An angry Stia dropped the report on my desk, cursing to himself. Despite his initial reluctance to pursue the investigation, Stia dutifully signed all my reports on the Contras. His signature meant he considered my reports valid; his reputation was tied to this investigation as well. He shot off an angry cable to headquarters, asking them how the hell two investigators could reach conclusions about such a expansive subject after only a few days in Central America. He never got a reply. I read the analysts' report slowly and sighed. My feeling of abandonment and betrayal was total. Once again, when the drug war hit politically sensitive targets, DEA blinked. Confirming my reports meant heaping more embarrassment on the Reagan Ad ministration and making their "Just Say No" platitudes sound as completely hypocritical as they were. So DEA let me twist in the political winds. For the first time, I was ashamed of my own agency.

Shortly after the analysts left, Stia called me into his office to tell me the embassy wanted me to stay away from El Salvador. Stia said my Contra reports were stirring the waters in Washing ton. With Corr frequently out of the country as Iran-Contra sucked him into high - level Washington meetings, David Dlouhy the deputy chief of mission, stepped in to declare El Salvador off' limits to me. The country was too hot, with reporters nosing around everywhere asking about the Contras.

That was fine with me. With North's Contra base dismantled, my investigation was in limbo anyway. I could turn my attention back to Guatemala. I fished through my desk drawer, plucked out a manila folder, and spread the documents on my desk. My file on the Guatemalan government's drug ring was officially re- opened.

I needed a new angle on the case. Any hope of busting the drug -dealing diputado, Carlos Ramiro Garcia de Paz, vanished a few weeks earlier at a party thrown by the national police. When I walked into their headquarters, flanked by a group of embassy employees, Garcia de Paz's face jumped out at me from the huge crowd.

He sat at the front table next to Julio Caballeros, director of the national police. Garcia de Paz spotted me instantly and stared for a moment, puzzled, before wrapping an arm around Caballeros' shoulders and whispering a question into his ear. Caballeros glanced at me, then steered Garcia de Paz to a comer of the room for private consultation. I hoped Caballeros would not blow my cover. Then I watched the shock register on the diputado's face as Caballeros spoke. He scowled at me. I pointed my index finger at him like a gunbarrel and Pulled the trigger. The scowl deepened. I threw him my best cavalier smile. It was all I could think to do. My cover was blown.

In March, the investigation found a new breath Of life when Col. Moran, the Guatemalan officer in charge Of President Cerezo's anti-corruption force, agreed to help. Short slim, and balding, Moran could have starred in any Of those cheesy banana republic movies as the ramrod military dictator. But Moran was connected. Unlike the conservatives in the Military, Moran was loyal to Cerezo. I prayed he was not part of the government's drug conspiracy as well.

I had to trust him until he proved he could not be trusted. With the president's weight behind him, Moran would be my hammer. Now we needed a wedge.

We found it in Derek Mata, a man with an interesting set of alliances. According to intelligence I received from G2 and their ubiquitous wiretaps, Mata frequently flew drug missions for the Medellin cartel. He worked for Garcia de Paz. And he was the half brother of Gen. Roberto Enrique Mata - Galvez, the Guatemalan military's chief of staff and the head of security at the presidential palace.

Our first attempt to scare Mata into flipping to our side flopped. Mata agreed to meet with us in Moran's office, but when Moran and I tried to shake him with our knowledge of his criminal activities, he told us to go screw ourselves: His brother was the president's right hand man. Moran started to raise his voice, then thought better of it. He looked at me and shrugged. We needed a new approach.

Before I could gather any momentum, Stia and I came under DEA's internal affairs microscope. Less than a month before the Iran Contra hearings began, John Martsh, our Latin American chief, flew down from Washington on April 7, 1987 to conduct an OPR investigation of the Guatemala office. We expected an experience akin to a rectal exam. After grilling Stia about his questionable dealings with an informant, Martsh turned the microscope on me. Stia called me into his office soon after Martsh left: " Cele, they're coming after you because of the Contra thing and the reports you wrote. They're trying to get rid of you, but they're going to do it very discreetly."

Martsh was on a mission. He talked to Hugo. He interviewed Aparecio. He spent a day poking around the El Dorado Hotel, where one of my informants, a woman who worked at the desk, told me Martsh asked if we were having an affair. She blushed when she repeated his questions later, but assured me everyone I worked with in the hotel told Martsh I was clean. Her encouraging smile did not erase the ominous overtones of Martsh's visit. My head was on the chopping block. Sooner or later, I would duck too slowly slow to avoid the blade.

Martsh returned to Stia's office and dug through the files, asking if I ever paid Aparecio out of my personal funds. It was a calculated question. Paying informants out of pocket violated DEA policy, but the rule was routinely ignored on the front lines.

Out of sheer necessity, agents frequently opened their own wallets for informants. DF-A funds came in quarterly installments. The money usually dried up in October, and sometimes it was December or January before the next infusion. When the cash ran out, agents dug into their own pockets.

By the time Martsh got around to interviewing me, I knew what to expect. I answered each question knowing suspicious eyes in Washington would inspect every word later. Martsh looked like a disheveled high school teacher late for class, a heavy- set man wrapped in sloppy clothes peering through dark-rimmed glasses. He spoke with a cocky edge I instantly resented. He ticked off my misdeeds, passed along to him by the female analyst who visited two months earlier. Martsh said the female investigator was concerned with my relationship with Aparecio. He reminded me the line in the DEA manual stating "social or business contacts are expressly prohibited. "

I know the damn manual, I thought bitterly. I wanted to grab Martsh by his thick neck and explain the realities of working alone in a hostile country. I swallowed my anger and answered: Yes, Aparecio and I were friends. With no other agents available, I explained, Aparecio served as my backup. In the process, we developed what DEA considered a prohibited relationship.

Martsh shifted his weight and changed topics. He wanted to know about Stia's involvement with the plane.

"As far as I know, the plane is under Perez's name, said. The day before my meeting with Martsh, Stia asked me not to say anything about the $5,000 check he handed P6rez to buy the plane. I promised to keep my mouth shut. My answer was truthful. Stia made sure the plane was registered in P6rez, s name. I told Martsh I heard rumors about Stia writing a check for the plane, but I never saw the check. Also true.

Martsh frowned.

"Have you been paying Luis Aparecio Out of your own pocket?" he asked, studying me over the top of his glasses.

I paused. "I know it's against the rules, but every agent has to do it, " I said.

Martsh puckered his lips as he jotted the answer. He cocked his head again, like a teacher about to discipline a disruptive student. "You should be more careful about how you conduct yourself with informants," he said.

"Well, then you need to send us more agents. The rules also say you're supposed to have two agents present every time you pay an informant. That's impossible in El Salvador. There's nobody but me. "

Three weeks later, Martsh ordered me to fly to Washington. He spread the written statements out before me and handed me a pen. I studied the neatly typed summary of our conversation, then signed. A warning light flashed, but I overruled it. I had nothing to hide. Before I left, Martsh repeated his question about Stia's interest in the plane. I stuck to my previous answers. That seemed to trip his temper. He warned me again about my Contra reports. Reporters were asking questions, he said. I should keep my mouth shut.

In May, 1987, as the Iran - Contra hearings began flickering across American television sets, I retreated to the jungle, search ing out opium fields anchored in the mountains.

With help from the Guardia de Hacienda, I began feeling productive again. Squirting herbicides on opium plants was concrete and satisfying. You find the poppies, you spray them, they die. For a while, it did not even matter that the mountain peasants replaced their crops as quickly as we could spray. I was doing something.

When weather and crosswinds permitted, we sprayed the poppies from the air. When flying was impossible, we called the Guardia de Hacienda and humped up the mountains on foot to knock down the fragile plants with sticks and machetes. The risk increased every kilometer we climbed. The mountain villagers in Guatemala were switching to poppies as rapidly as their counterparts in Peru switched to coca. In Peru, the military and Sendero Luminoso swatted away anti -narcotics efforts. Here, they used the Civilian Self -Defense Patrols, the paramilitary groups forcibly recruited from the villages as counterrevolutionaries.

Oscar Diaz's blood pressure rose so quickly it looked like his eyeballs would burst. Diaz, the fiery new leader of the Guardia de Hacienda, pushed morale among the Guardia's roughly 2,000 men to new highs with his John Wayne bravado and hands-on leadership. Now six of his men were dead, tortured and shot somewhere in the mountains near Cuilco. Their informants insisted the Civilian Self -Defense Patrol murdered them when they climbed too close to an opium plantation with their machetes. Diaz rounded up about 125 men in Cuilco, then charged up the mountain in the dark, with me bringing up the rear with my M- 16.

The soldiers leading the column were natives of the area and scrabbled up the mountains like goats. My legs cramped up after a few hours of marching uphill in the thin air, bringing a few snickers from the young recruits. I returned the chuckles a few hours later when they started cramping too. When I started spitting blood, I realized how out of shape I had become. But at daybreak, I was rewarded with a breathtaking view. They called this part of the mountains Las Nubes: The Clouds. White, misty masses drifted just below us, parting around the rocky barrier before melting together on the other side.

We met a small Civilian Patrol squad just after sunrise. The half -dozen armed peasants confronted Diaz, belligerently ordering him off their mountain. Diaz looked like he had been slapped. They argued for a few minutes, then Diaz ended the discussion by spraying the ground around their feet with his automatic. They retreated, leaving the panting invaders to push upward.

Those same lanky men were waiting when we reached the opium plantation. They lifted small flute-like instruments to their lips and blew a few shrill notes. Suddenly, we were surrounded by what looked like every villager on the mountain. Hundreds of Indians lined a nearby ridge like Apaches in a western, watching the Guardia chop down their poppies. The sniper fire began as we hacked down the stalks. I yelled into my walkie -talkie, trying to find a friendly voice with an aircraft. A CIA helicopter found us, spotted the Indians, then lifted to a safe altitude and watched the villagers chase us all the way down the mountain. We reached Cuilco after eight hours, carrying soldiers with broken ankles and fractured legs. I passed out on a sidewalk, exhausted. The villagers made it very clear: Unless we marched into their plantations with an army, they were kings of this mountain.

In the fall of 1987, something finally went right.

On September 25, G2 picked up a conversation on their illegal wiretap of Garcia de Paz's phone - The Colombians planned to fly to Puerto Barrios, a port on the Guatemala's eastern coast to drop off a large cocaine shipment.

The four-month investigation leading up to his point tested my patience at every turn. We got our first break when I bluffed Derek Mata by threatening to extradite him on conspiracy charges. He spent the next three days spilling everything he knew about drug smuggling within the Guatemalan government. He named more than a dozen officials dealing with the Colombian cartels, including Garcia de Paz. Mata claimed his high -ranking half brother and President Cerezo knew about the trafficking, and allowed the narcotics to pass through Guatemala unmolested. Garcia de Paz, a number of other government officials, and several military officers loyal to Cerezo actually participated in the trafficking, Mata added.

The G2 stepped in soon after, unceremoniously ousting Col. Moran. They told me their wiretap on his phone confirmed their suspicions: Moran was feeding information about my investigation to Cerezo and Garcia de Paz. They also gave me a stem warning: The Colombians knew Derek Mata was an informant. I shook my head, suddenly depressed. Few investigations could survive one major security breach, much less two.

Throughout July and August, we watched and listened as the buyers and sellers came together. On July 22, a woman representing the Chicago buyers flew in for the first of several meetings with the Guatemalan minister of defense. I always suspected the military helped the traffickers. This seemed to confirm it. Cerezo's government, with their few loyal military officials, could not protect such a large trafficking operation. The dopers needed the more powerful right wing's cooperation as well.

Soon, the other side of the equation arrived: On July 27, three Colombians and a Mexican trafficker flew in to Guatemala to oversee a small cocaine shipment. We let it go through. It was a warm -up for the mother lode in September.

On September 25, everything was in place. Dozens of G2 soldiers crawled around the Puerto Barrios hotel where Garcia de Paz was staying with the Colombians and their Mexican partner.

The diputado arrived in his Mercedes. He was the middleman, personally ensuring the cocaine's smooth transfer from the Colombian sellers to the Chicago buyers. It was the most boring Friday night I could remember. I watched the hotel for hours, yawning and chatting with CIA agent Randy Kapasar as well as Derek Mata. The CIA sent Kapasar to get its new narcotics section's feet wet in Central America. G2 reluctantly agreed to allow Mata to come along only after I lobbied for him. He knew all the players and could identify them at critical points.

We settled in for a long night of surveillance. Close to 100 G2 troops lingered around the hotel and the port. G2 was convinced the cocaine would arrive by boat, so they placed most of their eyes on the piers. Someone forgot to bring radios, so runners flitted from group to group, passing messages down the line.

On Saturday morning, the Colombians disappeared. The G2 commander was livid, demanding to know how so many men could allow the traficantes to slip past their surveillance. His men scurried around Puerto Barrios like drunken rats, hunting for the Colombians. Kapasar and I had to laugh. It would be a miracle if this operation worked.

While they searched, the mother vessel Daring cruised into the quiet waters of Puerto Barrios. We suspected the Panamanian registered ship was our smuggler, but we could not be sure. We waited, listening to the scanner, hoping the Colombians would slip and reveal themselves. That night on the scanner, a voice gave an order in English: Turn the lights off, we're coming in. Suddenly, the Daring's lights clicked off, its darkened hull vanishing against the black water. "Probably loading the cocaine now," one of the G2 officers said. The G2 troops were ready to pounce. Most of the officers wanted to move in immediately, but their commander held up his hand. "Let's wait."

On Sunday, I peered through my binoculars and cursed to myself as Garcia de Paz hopped into his Mercedes and drove away, his job apparently done. Every time I got close to nailing the the diputado, he wiggled away. It was like trying to catch a snake with chopsticks.

A G2 officer called to us, his eyes glued to the piers. The Colombians were back. Everything exploded. They swarmed the pier and the hotel, grabbing the Colombians, the Mexican trafficker, and two young women. The girls identified themselves as the Mexican trafficker's daughters. Their father apparently brought them along as cover: Just a middle-class family on vacation in Guatemala. G2 threw the captives in a white van and whisked them to the airport. I turned my attention elsewhere, assuming they would be flown to Guatemala City for trial. G2 also grabbed a Guatemalan air force reservist based in Puerto Barrios who served as the dopers' air traffic controller. We asked his commander to order him to the base. As soon as the reservist realized his interrogators were G2, he turned ashen, then revealed everything. He said he directed the Colombians to a tiny airstrip at a nearby banana plantation, where they landed with 3,000 kilos of cocaine. The G2 men asked where the Colombians went the day they disappeared. They were at the plantation, he said, loading the kilos on the small train used to shuttle bananas to the port. Then, under cover of darkness, they loaded the coke onto small inflatable powerboats and shuttled it to the Daring.

We had enough evidence to search the ship. Randy and I convinced a local judge to sign a search warrant, then commandeered a small boat. The G2 men were behind us, ready to crack heads.

Two dozen feet shuffled over the deck as we inspected the ship, poking our heads into every hatch. The boat was something to behold. Someone had remodeled the former Canadian coast guard cutter drug lord style. Rich wood paneling covered the walls. In the mess, we found freezers crammed with beef and a refrigerator full of beer. We heard voices. Two or three Americans stood near the bow, turning meat on a barbecue and swigging beer. "Narcotics agents," I barked in English, holding up the search warrant. They looked at me, dumbstruck, as the G2 troops took them into custody and rounded up their cohorts.

I could not believe how gently the troops treated the six Americans and one Canadian on board. They were a models of restraint, snapping on handcuffs and sitting their captives down without the aid of a gun butt. I know they were tempted to resort to their tried - and - true techniques when the norte americanos said they knew nothing about any cocaine. We started searching.

Randy, an expert at finding hidden drugs, soon reached his frustration threshold. He could not find the cocaine anywhere. Back on shore, the dopers were deep into negotiations with G2. The Colombians promised to tell them where they hid the cocaine, as long as G2 agreed to turn around and sell it back to them. The G2 officers were not accustomed to negotiating, especially with dopers. One of the officers later told me the Colombians were desperate to make a deal: "I'll have $5 million for you - - just let me make a phone call. " The G2 officers consulted briefly, then agreed.

While Randy and I hunted for the hidden kilos, the G2 troops emerged with the Mexican trafficker in tow. He had obviously received the full treatment. He was stripped to his underwear, hogtied, bruised, and blindfolded. When they untied him, the Mexican rubbed his wrists for a minute, flinching every time anyone moved toward him. He led us into the hold and pointed to the spot where they bolted the cocaine into the ship's thick skin. One of the G2 men unbolted a 3 -foot square sheet of steel. We peered into the dark space with flashlights. Nylon bags packed with cocaine lay piled between the metal skins.

The rest of the G2 force came aboard and gleefully stripped the boat clean, taking everything that wasn't nailed down. Before they could finish, a Guatemalan admiral from the Puerto Barrios naval station commandeered the boat, ordering everything pad locked. This was his boat now.

As the admiral surveyed his new toy, we piled the coke in a on the top deck. It looked like the world's largest collection of leftovers. Every kilo was carefully packaged in a tupperware container marked "oro." Gold. I picked up a container and struggled with the wrapping. The cocaine was compressed it into a brick, then wrapped in two layers of plastic with coffee grounds in between to throw off drug sniffing dogs. A thick skin of duct tape encased the package before it was sealed in the watertight containers.

We counted 2,404 kilos, more than two and a half tons of cocaine. The air force reservist we interrogated assured us the Colombians delivered 3,000 kilos on the nose. Almost 600 kilos were missing. I returned to the Daring to look for the rest. The admiral blocked my path to the hold.

"Everything is out of there," he said with a hard stare.

"I just want to look, " I said.

"No. Everyone's getting off my boat now."

G2 delivered the cocaine to the Guardia de Hacienda in Guatemala City. In the papers, the Guardia de Hacienda received the credit for the Puerto Barrios bust, although they knew nothing about it before the cocaine appeared at their doorstep. G2 hated media attention.

Oscar Diaz took custody of the cocaine and happily burned it, tupperware and all. They checked every other container to make sure nobody tampered with the contraband between Puerto Barrios and Guatemala City. Amazingly, all the cocaine we found was still there.

For DEA, the Puerto Barrios raid was the largest bust ever in Central America. It was the fifth largest seizure in the world involving U. S. federal agents. It was also the first time since I had come to Central America that all the pieces fell together as they were supposed to. The bad guys were arrested; the drugs were seized; the good guys sent it up in smoke. As it turned out, the bust saved Stia's ass. He was suddenly a DEA hero, the brains behind a breakthrough seizure in Central America. The bust helped me as well. Some of the clouds hanging over me from the Contra investigation cleared. I thought I was out of the doghouse.

But in my mind, Puerto Barrios was not a complete success. In the aftermath of the raid, I learned of a dark secret the newspapers never discovered. As I prepared to leave Puerto Barrios that Sunday, a G2 lieutenant known as El Raton debriefed me. I never learned his real name - - G2 preferred aliases. El Raton told me they allowed one of the Colombians to place a phone call to his cartel bosses.

"A few hours later, a Learjet flew in with $5 million in cash from Medellin," he said, his eyes widening with the word 6 6cash. "

G2, he said, promptly took the cash and the plane, raped the Mexican trafficker's daughters, then killed everyone. He described the carnage almost proudly, like a boss describing a job well done by his employees. The dismembered bodies, sealed in weighted 55-gallon drums, were dumped into the ocean. A couple of days later, the Colombians' car would be discovered at the Mexican border, planted to make it appear the dopers fled into Mexico.

I did not want to believe G2 slaughtered the traffickers, but long experience told me El Raton was telling the truth. The TV confirmed it. In the following weeks, I saw heart -wrenching ads on Guatemalan television. The traffickers' families appeared on the screen, pleading for the bodies of their loved ones. Their anguished faces interrupted the deodorant commercials and the daytime dramas for a few weeks, then disappeared.

On October 17, a sullen Garcia de Paz traveled to Costa Rica. He had a lot of explaining to do. The cartel wanted to know what happened to their product and their people. The G2 wiretaps picked up the conversation and called me immediately to pass on the news: Pablo Escobar himself was flying in to meet with Garcia de Paz and other cartel -corrupted government officials. The cocaine king was holding court.

G2's moles in Costa Rica called after the meeting to report their second-hand summary of Escobar's inquest. A furious Escobar held Garcia de Paz responsible for allowing the debacle at Puerto Barrios. Escobar paid a lot of protection money for that load. Someone was going to pay for this outrage.

When he returned to Colombia, Escobar sent a hit squad to assassinate anyone involved in the operation. I presumed that included me. As usual, G2 knew about it soon after the order left Escobar's lips. When the would-be assassins arrived in Guatemala, G2 hunted them one by one, leaving a lone survivor to give the boss all the gory details. It was their custom.

In July, after clicking off the Iran-Contra hearings in the middle of Oliver North's testimony, I picked up bits and pieces from the newspapers. The Congressional committees pulled witness after witness to the table, promising them immunity in exchange for their individual versions of the tangled events. North insisted he raised money for the Contras and guided the resupply operation with Poindexter's approval. Poindexter testified the buck stopped with him: He did not tell President Reagan that profits from the Iranian arms sales were used to help the Contras.

As the hearings wrapped up that summer, I slipped into despair. Poindexter's dramatic testimony in July drove Kerry's narcotics hearings to the back pages. Kerry's subcommittee hearings were overshadowed by Iran-Contra. When The New York Times ducked into the Dirksen Senate Office Building in Washington to cover Morales' testimony, the paper all but wrote off the speedboat smuggler's allegations of a Contra drug smuggling tie: "The charges have not been verified by any other people and have been vigorously denied by several Government agencies. " The third secret slipped out of the political spotlight as quickly as it appeared.

While the nation waited though the summer and fall of 1987 for the committees' final report, I received a call which told me the issue was far from dead.

On October 22, the call came in from DEA headquarters. A woman in our Freedom Of Information department asked me to keep the file on the Contras open. I was puzzled. For months, the DEA brass urged me to close those files and bury them. The woman explained: If the file remained open, Walsh's Iran - Contra investigators could be denied access to my reports under the Freedom of Information Act.

I was tom between complying and telling her to go to hell. After a moment of twitching between the two, I agreed to keep the file open. I wanted to keep my job. And I was not ready to close the book on the Contras yet.

The slaughter at Puerto Barrios should have been an aberration. When I returned to busting everyday traffickers, I learned it was the standard in Guatemala.

In the first weeks of 1988, 1 hopped from informant to informant, gathering enough names and numbers to keep me busy for months. After Puerto Barrios, I wanted to distance myself from G2. I preferred to work with Oscar Diaz and his Guardia de Hacienda, but the the spheres of influence were clearly marked: The Guardia helped with eradication and small raids. For large busts, the embassy wanted me to work with G2, who had the manpower, the money, and the power.

It was a terrible mistake.

I started at the bottom, meeting with small Guatemalan and Colombian cocaine suppliers looking for a Guatemalan buyer. They formed the conduit between the Colombian cocaine factories and the American consumers, using Central America as a sort of narcotics autobahn. If I busted enough of them, I knew they could give me enough evidence to build cases against the cartels. Few lived long enough to give me any information.

Every few weeks, I arranged a meeting with a doper, then called my G2 contacts to give them the time and place. The G2 commanders took down the information, thanked me, then promptly jumped the traffickers on their way to the rendezvous.

The first few times it happened, I found myself waiting at the meeting place like a confused tourist, checking my watch every few minutes as the scheduled meeting time drifted further and further behind the minute hand.

In January, 1988, 1 called G2 to pass along an informant's tip about a Colombian drug plane scheduled to land on a clandestine airstrip outside Guatemala City. The next day, the Colombians were found shot to death near the burned-out remains of their plane. G2 blamed the killings on the guerrillas. I knew better. I described the incident in my next report, shaking my head in disbelief . Six months later, on July 20, 1 gave them another tip, this time about a local judge - lawyer team who offered to sell me cocaine seized by the government. The next day, both were kidnapped and found dead. G2 told me the two got what they deserved. This isn't drug enforcement, I thought. It's a massacre.

The dopers were usually dumped on the streets, their blood - smeared faces gaping sightlessly as people hustled past the stiffening corpses. When I confronted the G2 commanders, they brazenly admitted to the murders. They made no effort to lie or conceal their grisly work. They were the predators here, roaming the streets with no natural enemies. When I insisted they stop ambushing my busts, they simply changed techniques. On the next bust, they staked out the meeting spot as planned, but when the dopers showed up, the G2 stormtroopers wrestled them into the trunk of a car and screeched away. I stood rooted to the spot for ten minutes, dumbfounded. They returned a short time later. The traficantes, they said coldly, had been eliminated.

With every killing, G2 took stacks of cash and bags of cocaine. In a faint nod to the law, they usually turned over a portion of the confiscated dope to beef up the country's drug war numbers. They sold the rest, or saved it to frame future victims.

Noe could sense something was wrong. She prodded me gently for the reason for my deepening gloom. She wanted to know why I was so distant, why we slept together less and less, why I spent my evenings in front of the television, if I came home at all. She wanted to reach out. I recoiled. I tossed her the same answer every time: It's better if you don't know. I did not want her to worry, and if someone snatched her from the streets, anything I told her about my work could put her in greater danger.

I tried to keep my distance from the carnage. Then, in a tiny shack under a bridge, G2 dragged me into their nightmare.

My target was a high -level leftist politician from a small village near the Salvadoran border. He and his Guatemalan associates made arrangements for a group of Colombians to deliver 10 kilos of cocaine in front of a supermarket near Aurora. I almost choked when they gave me the location. I shopped at the Paiz supermarket regularly. The place was also a favorite with embassy staffers. I would have preferred another spot, but I hoped the high-profile location would keep the G2 operatives honest. With enough American eyes around, I felt certain they would follow procedure for once.

The operatives lingered around the front of the supermarket in street clothes, their eyes narrowing as the politico strolled up the sidewalk flanked by four men. The politician pumped my hand and flashed a polished smile as he checked his watch. The Colombians were due any minute with the cocaine. He did not bother making introductions - - not that it mattered. I could see the G2 team collecting behind them, reaching for their pistols. The action caught the attention of several shoppers, who lingered near the door to watch. I recognized a few embassy personnel among the onlookers. The nervous Guatemalans followed my eyes, turning just as a blanket of men jumped them.

I winced as they brought the butts of their guns down on the mens' heads with a crack, right in front of the wide - eyed embassy people. A white panel van appeared a moment later, spilling G2 troops from its back doors.

I helped them load the dopers into the van. As I pushed the last one inside, I heard the doors shut with a metallic clang. Before I could protest, the driver shifted into gear and hit the accelerator.

Shit. The last place on earth I wanted to be was in that van. The commanding officer sensed my discomfort and assured me they were merely taking the Guatemalans in for questioning. The captives sat quietly, knowing a stray word could bring another crushing gun butt. I peered through the windshield every time the van turned. If the G2 officer planned to take these men to jail, they were going the wrong direction.

The driver jerked the wheel, jumping the front tires onto a dirt road. He stopped the van momentarily while two uniformed G2 men scrambled out to stand guard. The road dropped into a ravine, its rocky walls filling the windshield as we descended. I knew this neighborhood. The bridge stretching over the ravine led to a posh neighborhood popular among Guatemalan military officers. This was a G2 nest.

The road curved under the bridge, where the overpass created a cave like gloom. As the van ground to a halt, I could see the faint outline of two small structures in the fading light. Two G2 men silently pushed open the van's back doors as their comrades shoved the prisoners headlong into the dirt, then picked them up roughly and pointed them toward the darkened structures.

Another white van and several jeeps and pickup trucks were parked haphazardly around two wooden shacks. Several men sat in the back of the other van, looking uneasily at the gun barrels pointed at them. The Colombians. The G2 troops ordered them out of the van and lined them up with the Guatemalans. They pulled five from the line: All three Colombians, the Guatemalan politician, and one of his lieutenants. The G2 men filed inside with their captives, followed by the commander and me. We barely fit. As I inspected the inside of the barren shack, a familiar smell filled my nostrils. My eyes adjusted to the dim interior, confirming what my nose did not want to acknowledge. Dark, rusty streaks and spatters covered the rough walls. Blood.

The captives smelled death. A low moan escaped one man's throat, then rose to a grunt as his captors ripped his shirt open, spraying buttons like bird shot. A few minutes later, the five men crouched naked in the center of the hut, their pleading eyes searching for a sympathetic face. I stared at the floor, afraid to look at them. The interrogation began.

The G2 squad took turns shouting questions at the cowering men, demanding the names of others in the politician's left- wing brood, the address of the place where they kept their cocaine, and where they hid their drug money. They punctuated each question with a two-by-four. At first, the dopers tried to take it. They clenched their teeth, their jaw muscles straining to hold back the screams. The board cracked ribs and arms, then the men cracked, blurting out names, phone numbers, addresses. A G2 agent with a notebook jotted everything down as calmly as if he were taking notes in class. A half dozen of his comrades crouched along the walls like spectators at a grisly play. The door opened again. A young soldier carried a metal bucket filled with water in one hand, and in the other, a black length of rubber cut from a car innertube.

The G2 torturers turned their rage on the politician and his companion, beating them mercilessly. They pulled the politician to his knees, a bare flashlight beam turning his face into an anguished mask. The lead interrogator wrapped the black strip around his head and pulled until his features emerged through the rubber. He twisted the rubber tighter, squeezing a muffled groan from the politician, then leaned toward suffocating man's ear and whispered, "You are going to die. " I could see the rubber cave in as the captive desperately tried to draw air. When his body went limp, the interrogator released the mask. The politician flopped to the ground, his chest heaving.

A pair of hands pushed the second man's head into the bucket until the water churned with bubbles. They yanked him up by the hair, splashing my feet. He coughed water from his lungs, then spit out every detail of the cocaine operation he could think of. It didn't matter. The interrogator pulled his head back and repeated the sentence: "You're going to die."

"But why? I'm telling you everything," the man wailed, terror pinching his voice into a childlike squeak.

The agent, a dark-skinned man with vaguely oriental features, said, "Because you're a coward."

The men realized their lives were about to come to a violent end. They pleaded: We have wives, families. The G2 squad continued the torture, asking more questions. Their victims ran out of answers.

From the comer of my eye, I saw a glint of steel.

The interrogator lifted the machete and brought the razor edge down across the politician's shoulder blade, opening his back. It looked like a scene from a slaughterhouse. The politician let out a long, anguished scream. "Mamacita linda, " he wailed, crying for a mother who could not hear. The blood sprayed the other men, driving home the certainty of their fate. Their eyes reflected a deep, profound horror. One of them immediately lost control of his bowels and defecated on the dirt floor. The G2 men crouched along the walls jumped to their feet, enraged. They flattened him with a board, then grabbed his legs, dragging him through his own filth while one of the soldiers fished through his uniform for a pair of pliers. Locking the sobbing man's foot under his armpit, the soldier locked the pliers on the man's toe and ripped his toenails out, exposing pearly flesh which immediately welled blood.

After a half dozen turns with the mask, the politician stopped moaning. Blood oozed from his mouth, his eyes dim from loss of blood and lack of oxygen. His tormenter again pulled the mask tight around his face. Suddenly, his legs thrashed out from under him, his hands struggling against the smothering blackness. The rubber mask heaved twice, then smoothed as his body fell limp. Two plainclothes G2 silently dragged his body outside where others waited with razorsharp machetes and several empty steel drums. I followed them out, took one look at the semi-circle of amateur butchers, then quickly ducked back inside.

The second captive stopped fighting against the hands. His head collapsed into the bucket. The interrogator grabbed a clump of wet hair and pulled. He was dead, drowned in a couple gallons of water. Two more men rose and dragged him outside. When the door opened, the wet sound of steel on flesh drifted in with the warm air. I wondered if the remaining dopers locked up in the vehicles could see what awaited them.

I had seen enough. I pushed my way outside and told the captain I needed to get back to the supermarket for my car. A few of the men with the machetes were smoking and chatting. They were done with the politician, whose components lay scattered in the dirt like a dismantled mannequin. Others were hacking the second man apart by flashlight. The bodies would never be found .

The G2 officer whistled to one of his men and ordered him to drive me back to town. "You know, we only found one kilo when we took the Colombians, " he said as I pulled myself into the seat. "The deal was for 10 kilos," I snapped.

The officer shrugged, then turned to watch his men leisurely toss arms and legs into the steel barrels. He turned to face me again. "Do not tell anyone what you saw here. " It was not a request. It was a cold threat.

"Do you think anyone would ever believe me?" I asked. The motor roared to life.

On the way back to the grocery, the driver smiled. "We really took 10 kilos. We need the other nine to plant on other people. " He laughed at his commander for his little lie. G2 answered to no one.

Ten

Backlash

Guatemala City – 1988

After the Puerto Barrios bust, DEA rewarded us with more manpower in the form of agent Larry Holifield, whose slow Louisiana drawl disguised a quick mind, and agent Delphin Von Briesen Jr., a portly good old boy from Dallas. Larry immediately impressed me with his eagerness to learn the rhythms of Central America, despite his poor Spanish. Von Briesen, who everyone called Tuffy, was another story. He smothered his ignorance with a haughty attitude which set me instantly on edge. DEA, I thought, seemed intent on sending its Latin American offices a steady stream of mismatched agents.

Tuffy quickly alienated the locals, treating anyone who did not speak English as an inferior. He bulldozed his way through each day, an overweight, burr -haired giant in scuffed shoes and mismatched clothes. He barked at members of the Guardia de Hacienda and the National Police. Our informants complained he pretended to understand when he clearly did not follow. They did not trust him to get things right.

I tried to help them both to adjust as best I could. Larry branched out into Belize, a country we had virtually ignored, while Tuffy planted himself in Guatemala.

The arrival of two more bodies took some of the pressure off me. Unfortunately, I did not remember how to enjoy it. The stress weighed on me like layers of wet clothes: First, the Contras; then the G2 murders; then back-to-back investigations by my own agency. I knew from my encounter with Martsh OPR was watching, waiting for one misstep.

Instead of searching for some way to defuse the tension DEA surrounded me with, I buried myself deeper into my work, In addition to several major investigations, I worked countless small cases, playing my well - worn role in Guatemala City's bars and restaurants: Smile big; tell some jokes; gain their trust; seal the deal, then bust them. Move on to the next one. Often I worked until 2 a.m., dragged myself through the front door, then slipped into bed next to a sleeping Noe. She no longer waited up for me.

Noe told me I was killing myself for an ungrateful agency. I stopped listening. I did not want to hear the truth, particularly from my wife. For months, I drifted away from her, feeling the emotions that built our marriage crumble under the weight of a burden I could not voice to her. We did not talk much anymore I began sleeping in the guest bedroom. Somewhere along the way, I stopped thinking of Noe as my wife, instead seeing her as the mother of my children.

After our El Salvador embassy declared the country forbid den ground, I was home more, but not as a father and a husband. After seven years of adrenaline overloads, I saw myself as the protector. I could never relax, not even during my son's second birthday party on September 19, 1987. We invited our friends from the embassy and barbecued while the kids whacked at a pinata. I bought C4 a pint sized bike with training wheels, which he mounted and zoomed off with Ana scrambling behind. She tracked him like a bloodhound, the portable alarm button in her hand. When an alarm sounded anywhere on the street, every guard in the neighborhood scrambled toward the sound, guns drawn. I hated knowing we could never let him play alone. I wondered what Guatemala was doing to him and to Crystal. I began to wonder if I could ever slow down and enjoy their childhood with them.

,,You're losing your family because of your job, " Noe told me. It turned out to be a prophetic statement. I mumbled some pathetic reply. I had a job to do.

By early 1988, my job seemed more at risk than ever. A letter arrived on April 7 from Richard G. Smith, chairman of DEA's Board of Professional Conduct. The board wanted to suspend me for five days for two charges of improper conduct. The first was improper association with a cooperating individual. Aparecio. The letter quoted passages from my statements to Marsh, including my admission that Aparecio and I loaned each other money for the FUCA unit's operational expenses. I was also admonished for staying overnight at Aparecio's house on numerous occasions, also a violation of the agency's "no social contact" rule.

The second charge surprised me: Possession of an unauthorized weapon; specifically, a Colt AR - 15 rifle I bought in New York and brought to Guatemala. No argument there. But the AR15 was not on the list of DEA's authorized shoulder weapons.

The charges amazed me. Somewhere between Washington and the front lines, the rules often became counterproductive. I trusted Aparecio with my life. How could I avoid becoming friends with him? The weapons charge was even more ridiculous. I was a decorated Vietnam veteran. I would gladly prove my skill with an AR - 15 on the firing range.

Someone wanted to send me a message. After back-to -back investigations, I knew the backlash would follow sooner or later.

I typed my response, explaining my side of the story. The loans were for operations, not personal use. I stayed at Aparecio's house during the Contra investigation because I honestly felt safer there than at some hotel.

A DEA bureaucrat wrote back with the agency's ruling.

They dropped the weapons charge, but the improper association charge would stand. The suspension was reduced to three days, beginning August 1. 1 appealed it all the way to Administrator John Lawn's office, but Lawn sustained the suspension with a terse letter: My decision is final. I spent the first three days of August at home, brooding as Noe tried in vain to cheer me up. I was beyond consolation.

Aparecio felt the whip too. The national police, at the request of the embassy, stripped him of his advisor credentials, which cut him off from the FUCA unit he helped build. He remained a DEA informant. The embassy controlled our advisors, but they could not interfere with our informants.

Our FUCA recruits were bewildered when Aparecio said his goodbyes. They could not understand why the U.S. government gave them mentors, then yanked them away. The year before, Dr. Regalado was fired after Corr discovered he was on the U.S. government's blacklist of human rights violators. When Corr realized Regalado was giving shooting lessons to the FUCA unit, he chewed me out and demanded I get rid of Regalado. I had not seen El Doctor in months. By August, 1988, Corr's term ran out and he left too, probably glad to escape the madness. I wondered how long I could last.

Stia tried to help. Two weeks before my suspension, Stia typed out a recommendation for my promotion from a level 12 agent to level 13. He included the highlights of my DEA career, including the Puerto Barrios bust, then brushed off the suspension, writing: "The charge is technical and nebulous and depend ing on the judgement (sic) of the Board could have been decided either way. These charges were brought about by S/A Castillo's having to work all alone under very adverse and dangerous conditions in a country tom apart with war and insurrectionism (sic) ... His dedication to DEA's mission under those conditions should be lauded by DEA Headquarters ... Instead of recognition for these efforts he was disciplined. "

The high-pitched buzz reached the G2 team's ears before the Cessna broke through the clouds. They followed the plane's downward trajectory, gripping their weapons tight in anticipation. On board, the Colombian pilot carried 356 kilos of high grade cocaine. If he hurried, he could drop the load, refuel, and get back to Colombia before dark. He spotted his destination, an out-of -the way airstrip the local crop dusters grudgingly shared with cartel pilots, and swooped low over Guatemala's flat coastal plain.

The G2 team was waiting at the airstrip. I was waiting next to the radio at the military base in Pueblo Nuevo Tiquisate, three miles away. When Larry, Tuffy, and I arrived with a new agent on TDY from Miami, G2 handed us a radio and ordered us to stay at the base until they called. Close to 30 of them piled into trucks and set out to meet the drug plane.

I closed my eyes and thought about the blood-stained shacks. Not again, I thought. It can't happen again.

After the grisly scene under the bridge, I tried quietly shifting my alliance to the Guardia de Hacienda and the national police, but every time we set up a bust, G2 showed up. Their wiretaps obviously were not limited to the dopers' phones. No one could cough in Guatemala without G2 hearing.

The fact that dopers were showing up dead after I gave their names to G2 did not impress my superiors. "The embassy wants us to work strictly with G2, " Stia said after I reported the first killings. He was not about to argue with policy.

I tried taking my concerns to Ambassador Alberto Martinez Piedra, who agreed to a meeting. Piedra, a short, smooth -talking Cuban-American who was on his way out when the killings began, seemed mildly irritated after hearing my story, although I could not tell if he was angry at G2 for executing traffickers or annoyed with me for bringing it up.

"Did you see them killed?"

"No. " I lied. I knew if I admitted witnessing anything like this, I would be kicked out of the country. My presence under the bridge broke every rule in the book, the least of which being the regulations forbidding DEA agents from participating in arrests and interrogations. I felt certain witnessing a foreign military force murdering civilians was probably against DEA rules as well. Washington was watching. I was not about to give them more ammunition.

Piedras complained to the CIA, who complained to G2, with little effect. The killings continued.

Whenever we opened a big case in Guatemala, the ambassador seemed to forget our conversation. Despite my earlier protests, he ordered us to continue working with G2, who the U.S. government had begun referring to as " D2. "

Now here we were, sitting in our Toyota four - wheel - drive at the military base, watching the drug plane drop below the treeline and into the G2 team's jaws.

After a few long minutes, the radio crackled to life. They were ready for us. I had to give them credit for efficiency. The G2 men were cleaning up when we arrived a few minutes later. While part of their force apprehended the pilot, the rest ambushed the Colombians en route to the airstrip.

The Colombians, squatting on the floor of a hangar under a manned guard, looked like the losers of a whiskey brawl. The G2 guards told me to take my three companions to the other side of the hangar. I thought they were going to kill them right there. As We watched, they tossed their prisoners into the trunks of various cars and sped off toward the base, leaving us to unload the nylon bags of cocaine from the Cessna. When we caught up with them at the base, only three prisoners remained. El Raton walked up to us with a smile. The two missing prisoners, he said, had been executed.

By the end of 19 8 8, 1 realized how hopelessly tangled DEA, the CIA, and every other U.S. entity in Central America had become with the criminals. The lines that should have defined our ethical boundaries were stepped over and scuffed until they melted into nothingness. The Piper Co. in Guatemala City served as a perfect case study of how friends and enemies fuse together from sheer convenience.

Endnote coming to support this statement. G2 knew Gregorio Valdez had branched into drugs, as did many of our informants. Valdez, the young, Polo-clad owner of Piper, threw the best parties in town. His company, with its stockpile of planes and pilots, lived off CIA and DEA contracts. To show his appreciation, Valdez frequently filled his office with hookers and dancers, then invited his friends at the CIA, DEA, and the embassy over for booze-drenched parties.

The connections boggled my mind. I needed a flow chart to keep track of all the paths crossing at Piper. Among Valdez's flock of pilots were El Coyote, Reina's smuggler- informant, and several others who popped up in our computer as documented traffickers. Naturally, at least two of them - - Eduardo Ruiz and a pilot called "El Negro" Alvarado - - flew for the Contras before North pulled the plug on the resupply operation. The CIA frequently hired his pilots and hangars at Aurora airport. DEA stored helicopters there and used his planes exclusively until P6rez and Stia purchased their plane, which was also stored at Piper.

When I ran Valdez's name in the computer, I found a case already open on him for financing a drug operation. I wondered why a man with such a solid lock on success would risk his business and reputation by working for the dopers. His father, who built the company and handed it down to his son, was a member of the respected elite. Valdez made good money from his legitimate contracts with the U.S. government.

But after a few days of surveillance, it was obvious Valdez wanted more. He was preparing to run a load of cocaine to Miami for the Colombians. When Larry and I confronted him with our evidence, he confessed immediately and signed a statement outlining his involvement with the cartel. Valdez said he was just in it for the thrill. Naturally, when I told Stia and the CIA we were renting documented drug pilots from a man who just admitted his ties with the cartels, nobody blinked. The CIA and DEA continued giving Valdez their business, and he continued giving us wild parties lasting until the wee hours. The lines were gone.

What the hell are we doing here? The question surfaced more and more as the locals manipulated us to settle scores, the traffickers used us to eliminate their competition, and the politicians coddled us to keep U.S. aid flowing.

In December, 1988, General Adolfo Bland6n, the head of)~l Salvador's military chiefs of staff, dragged us into a political power struggle. As the military's inner circle prepared to choose Someone for a cabinet position, Blandon decided to sic DEA on his Chief rival, General Bustillo.

Blandon invited Stia and me to his home for a quiet luncheon. Elmore was there, with a colonel from the MilGroup. Blandon wasted no time getting to the point: He had evidence an officer at Ilopango was involved in cocaine smuggling. He Wanted DEA to start an undercover investigation. Stia looked at me. I could tell what he was thinking: Get ready to go back into $1 Salvador, Cele.

I knew the officer's name well. Hugo mentioned it several times in his Contra reports. Hugo watched the suitcases pass between the Contra planes and the officer's Ilopango office for ~ while, then asked the pilots what they were carrying. They answered openly: The suitcases held cash and cocaine. Of course, ~hat was no revelation at Ilopango. Aparecio said his buddies in ~he Salvadoran air force knew about the officer's connection with $he Colombians and the Contras.

Stia agreed to put me on the case, much to my chagrin. We should have nailed Bustillo's people two years earlier on drug running charges, but the general's support for the Contras made him untouchable. Obviously, Bustillo's sacred-cow designation disappeared after the Hasenfus plane went down. Blandon certainly saw the opportunity to exploit his rival's lost stature. He anted the investigation kept quiet, but everyone knew how the military's inner circle would react when they inevitably discovered one of Bustillo's men was the subject of a drug investigation. When word of our probe leaked to Bustillo, he flew into a rage, asking how the U.S. government could stab him in the back after what he did for the Contras. Our investigation ended before it could begin. But it was too late for Bustillo. Blandon got the cabinet post.

Omar Pira- Palma pushed open the door of the steakhouse in Guatemala City and found me in a booth along the wall. The young, flashy strawberry baron and businessman seemed nervous without a phalanx of guards around him. Good. When I asked him to meet me the day before, I told him to leave his goons at home. A member of his own family had turned on Pira- Palma, revealing he was using his personal armada of boats and planes to shuttle drugs into the United States for the Cali cartel. By the end of our lunch meeting, I would know whether Pira-Palma wanted to go to jail, or cooperate and help me gather evidence against the cartel.

I put on my best bad cop face and raked Pira- Palma with the evidence we had against him. When I told him his trafficking activities were listed in detail in our computer, Pira-Palma started sobbing. Losing his visa for drug trafficking seemed to alarm him more than the thought of going to jail. He immediately tried to strike a deal: "How about if I give you 1,000 kilos right now?" The cartel delivered the cocaine some time ago, he said, and he knew where it was stored. I was interested. A thousand kilos would put a good kink in the cartel's bottom line that month.

"Let's see what you got," I replied.

The next day, Pira-Palma and I drove to Antigua Guatemala, an ancient city in the shadows of Guatemala's volcanoes. Guiding me to a small house in downtown Antigua, Pira-Palma took me to the front gate and pointed to a gasoline tanker truck parked within the concrete walls. The cocaine, he said, was inside. I could not go in without a search warrant or backup, so I rushed back to Guatemala City to give Stia the details.

Two days later, the quiet neighborhood looked like a war zone. A DEA helicopter circled overhead while two dozen Guardia de Hacienda lurched up to the front gate in pickups. For once, Stia agreed to let us call in the Guardia: Pira-Palma refused to cooperate if G2 was involved. I watched the Guardia bash through the front gate, then emerge a few minutes later with an old woman and a cluster of frightened kids, who were released after they convinced the Guardia they knew nothing about any drugs.

After rounding up such a conspicuous display of firepower, I prayed the cocaine was where Pira- Palma said it would be. It looked like half the city was there, huddled across from the front gate for a peek inside. I heard excited voices from around the tanker. They had found the cocaine. The Guardia pulled 1,000 kilos from the tanker's empty belly, just a fraction of the coke Pira-Palma already smuggled for the cartel.

Pira -Palma agreed to cooperate, and sat down with me to explain how his system worked. It was ridiculously easy, he boasted. Sometimes, he used the cartels' planes to fly in the cocaine. He packed it into boats. He hired drivers to take over the Texas border in loads of towels. He even stuffed it in boxes and shipped it by air freight. Anyone with a taste for money and a little ingenuity could join the game. The powder flowed through America's porous border like sand through a seive.

Back in Washington, the Senate Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics and International Operations was reaching the same conclusion. After two years of witnesses, subpoenas, and stonewalling by government agencies, Sen. Kerry's subcommittee wrapped up its hearings at the end of 1988. The Subcommittee believes that this investigation has demonstrated that the drug cartels pose a continuing threat to national security at home and abroad, and that the United States has too often in the past allowed other foreign policy objectives to interfere with the war on drugs," the senators wrote.

The report contained a virtual roadmap of the connections between drug traffickers and the Contra operation. Unfortunately, many of their star witnesses were convicted felons like Morales, whose credibility came under scrutiny in the media. To this day, I wonder why they failed to call someone from DEA's Central American posts to testify.

Kerry's subcommittee never became more than an Iran Contra sideshow. The country's attention remained fixed on the fates of North, Poindexter, and Robert McFarlane, Poindexter's predecessor, who were all indicted in March, 1988, for their role in Iran-Contra and the subsequent cover-up. Also indicted were Secord and his business partner, Albert Hakim, who each sucked about $1.5 million from the Contra gravy train while serving as the Contras' chief arms brokers.

The subcommittee released the report in the middle of North's highly publicized Washington trial. The media paid little attention. The New York Times buried the story on page 8. Washington Post readers had to dig back to page 20 for a summary of the report, which highlighted the political bickering between Kerry and Sen. Mitch McConnell, the ranking Republican on the subcommittee. A belligerent McConnell boycotted Kerry's press conference, calling parts of the report "one - dimensional or one sided. " While America waited for the jury to decide North's guilt or innocence, the Contra drug scandal quietly died.

Pira-Palma called constantly to update me on the fallout from our 1,000-kilo seizure. To verify their cocaine was gone, the Cali cartel wanted Pira- Palma to send newspaper reports of the raid. Pira-Palma sent them the stories for their scrapbooks, then played dumb when they demanded to know how DEA sniffed out the cocaine in the red tanker. We had a goldmine, someone who could give us the names of the Cali's operatives throughout Central America. The roller coaster was lurching up again, carrying me out of my stress -induced gloom. But before I could gather momentum, a phone call in August, 1989, sent me plunging back into the darkness. The embassy wanted information on Col. Moran.

Moran's name had slipped out of my short-term memory, pushed away by the names and dates and events of the past two years. I had not heard a peep from the colonel since the day G2 yanked him off the Puerto Barrios investigation in 1987. The mere mention of his name made my skin crawl. After his security breach at Puerto Barrios, it was obvious Moran was part of Garcia de Paz's cocaine clique.

Months after Puerto Barrios, an immigration officer at Aurora arrested one of Moran's lieutenants slipping a suitcase full of cocaine on an Aviateca flight. The officer claimed Moran frequently ordered him to stash cocaine on commercial planes, and then Moran arranged for the bags to slip past Customs. When the airport officials called in the national police, Moran tried to pin the blame on two American tourists. But the lieutenant wilted under interrogation, ensuring Moran's airport exploits would be added to his DEA file. But Moran's stature shielded him from criminal prosecution. Nobody was going to testify against him.

Now I learned the State Department had discovered the black marks on Moran's record and denied his request for a visa, snuffing his plans to travel to the States for military training. Moran complained to President Cerezo, who called the embassy, demanding an explanation. When Ambassador James Michel, newly posted to Guatemala, called looking for everything we had on Moran, I typed out a summary of DEA's encounters with the colonel, including his Aviateca smuggling game and the leaks in the early stages of the Puerto Barrios case. The ambassador sent a copy to Cerezo. A few days later, my phone rang.

"I want you to meet me at the El Dorado," Moran said. "Right now. "

I answered almost reflexively: "Okay. I'll be there in fifteen minutes. "

Before I set the phone back in the cradle, I decided I was not going anywhere near the El Dorado. Moran's voice sounded pinched, angry. I knew my name did not appear anywhere on the memo the ambassador sent to Cerezo, but the edge in Moran's voice told me he figured out the source.

After half an hour, the phone rang again. I reluctantly picked it up.

"Where the hell are you?" Moran demanded.

"I've been told not to have any contact with you, " I said, making things up as I went.

The line was silent for a moment, then Moran lowered his voice an octave and continued.

"Why did you give that letter to the president accusing me of those things?" he asked.

"Did you see my name on it?"

"No, but everything in there, you were involved in."

"I did not give that letter to the president," I shot back.

Moran was seething. "You have ruined my military career, " he hissed. "And you will answer to me later. "

I hung up with the threat lingering in the air. I thought back to the lieutenant arrested at the airport with the coke-filled suitcase. Soon after, the immigration official who apprehended the lieutenant was found shot to death. One of the national police agents involved in the investigation was also shot, but survived. They're biting back, I thought. That month, Danillo Barillas, a prominent Christian Democrat, was assassinated by unidentified gunmen when rumors circulated he was about to reveal narcotraffickers had penetrated the party. I could easily be next.

On September 13, 1989, Larry and I walked into Guatemala's presidential palace and handed $10,000 worth of quetzales to Col. Francisco Ortega, the commander of G2.

The cash came from Pira-Palma, who wanted so desperately to distance himself from the cartel that when they gave him $ 10, 000 expense money for the next shipment, he dumped it on my desk and asked me to give it to G2. Pira-Palma wanted protection in case the cartel discovered his betrayal, and he knew a monetary tribute to G2 was the best way to keep the Colombians at bay. Stia had no objections to giving the cash to G2. He considered it a reward for their help with our drug cases.

When I turned the money over to Stia, he asked Tuffy to stash it in the office safe.

"Do you want me to write a report on it?" I asked Stia. It was procedure to report any drug money seized.

"No, I'll take care of it," Stia replied. I returned to my desk, glad to have one less piece of paper to worry about.

Pira-Palma did not trust anyone. He insisted on meeting Stia in front of the embassy to make sure the money reached its destination. "You got the money, right?" Pira-Palma asked. "Yeah, we got the $10,000. It's in the office," Stia said. Pira-Palma looked satisfied.

The money sat in the safe for several months. After repeatedly asking Stia to file a report on the cash, I gave up and wrote it myself. By then, the dollars were gone, replaced by quetzales, the local currency. Stia dipped into the safe before his vacation to Europe, insisting he needed dollars for the trip. G2 would not know the difference.

When Larry and I gave the money to Col. Ortega, he assured us the money would be put to good use. New machetes, colonel? I thought contemptuously. With our errand done, I was glad to wash my hands of the cash. But the incident would come back to haunt me.

In December, three months after his thinly- veiled threat on my life, Moran sat in his office, explaining how he planned to repay me for ruining his career. He did not want to have me killed in Guatemala, where suspicion could fall on him. During one of my trips to El Salvador, Moran told the man sitting across from him, I would be ambushed on the highway. When my body was found, the murder would be blamed on the Salvadoran guerrillas.

The man listening to Moran's plot was a DEA informant from Houston, a Guatemalan whose concealed microphone picked up every word. He arranged the meeting to set up Moran. The informant wanted to arrange a cocaine delivery with the colonel. Instead, Moran launched into his plot to murder me. When the informant took the tape to his contacts at the Houston DEA office, an agent called immediately to tell me about Moran's threat.

When I received copies of the tapes, I listened to Moran's menacing voice slowly spelling out my fate. I was slowly coming unhinged. After watching so many men die, the image of my own death had never seemed so real. I had to get out of Central America. I thought DEA would reassign me immediately, given the seriousness of the threat and the solid evidence backing it up. I waited for action from Washington, who responded with a disquieting silence.

When I took Noe and the kids home to McAllen for the holidays, I made an appointment with Armando Ramirez of DEA's Brownsville office. Noe and I met him for dinner, and for half an hour I sat stiffly next to my wife and sketched the details of my predicament in Guatemala, finishing with Moran's taped assassination plot. I wanted to come back to the Valley, and I needed Ramirez's help. I could almost feel Noe's excitement when Ramirez told me he had a position open in Brownsville, then promised to send his recommendation to headquarters. In the weeks ahead, I clung to that promise like a life preserver. I did not tell Ramirez my sanity and my marriage depended on it.

My parents knew something was wrong as we sat down to Christmas dinner at their house. Noe and I were not talking much. They could feel the tension, and I caught a few nervous glances passing between them. My mother took me aside and asked what was wrong. I pressed my lips together, holding back the words trying to burst through: Noe and I haven't slept together in more than a year. I'm so busy trying to stay alive I can't think straight, and I don't know what to do.

I pushed the jumbled thoughts aside and mumbled, "We're okay, mom."

When we returned to Guatemala, I dipped into my savings to hire two more guards for the house. I told Ana to keep the kids inside. Our "home" became a maximum security prison. I gave Noe a .22 pistol to carry in the car and lectured her on how to protect herself while driving. Everywhere Noe went, she carried a hand -held radio with a direct frequency to the embassy.

Stia walked into the office shortly after my return with another assignment. Newly-elected Salvadoran President Alfredo Cristiani, a member of D'Aubisson's ARENA party, wanted DEA's help. Cristiani suspected military officers were seizing weapons from the guerrillas, then selling them to the cartels. Stia asked when I could start an investigation. I bolted from my chair, feeling the blood rush to my head.

"What the hell are you talking about? Don't you remember what Moran said on that tape? The next time I set foot in El Salvador, he's going to have me whacked," I said, my voice rising in the small room.

Stia said he remembered the tape. Nobody else could work El Salvador, he added firmly.

Now I know how Jimmy Hoffa felt before they grabbed him, I thought grimly as I pushed the car toward the Salvadoran border. I scoured every inch of highway 8 between Guatemala City and San Salvador, pumping the accelerator at the slightest movement. Shrubs became crouching men. Tree branches were sniper rifles. I felt as if someone had painted a bullseye on the back of my head. As I watched my back, I caught my own sunken eyes reflected back in the rearview mirror.

DEA could not spare another agent to back me up, despite the death threat. I drafted a woman from the FUCA unit to pose as my girlfriend during the undercover meetings with the middle man, while Aparecio and another FUCA recruit watched from nearby cars. I chose open -air restaurants so we could spot anyone suspicious approaching from the street. My nerves, stretched to the snapping point, tripped off my internal alarm whenever a bypasser glanced my way. I no longer trusted my instincts. I prayed Aparecio was watching carefully. While we watched for Moran's hit men, Moran was looking for other ways to strike.

On February 12, Stia appeared at my office door, looking solemn.

"Cele, Moran just took off to Costa Rica to meet with OPR. They're going to try to do you again. "

I could not take much more of this. First Moran wants to kill me. Now he was meeting with our Gestapo.

"Goddamn," I muttered. "Again?"

"This time," Stia said, "they're trying to get you for murder. "

OPR called looking for the Puerto Barrios file. While I was in El Salvador, Stia took the file to Miami and met with the investigators, who repeated Moran's story. The colonel, Stia told me, accused me of executing the traffickers captured during the Puerto Barrios raid. Stia repeated to me the scenario Moran concocted: While the captives knelt in a row, Moran said I walked behind them, firing the tiro de gracia into the backs of their heads while declaring vengeance for another agent's murder.

I sat quietly, letting the story soak in. I could picture Moran spinning his tales to an eager OPR audience. A congress of vultures. I tried to laugh at the ridiculousness of it all. Instead, I braced myself for the next onslaught.

At the end of February, 1989, Stia finally typed a cable to Washington about Moran's death threat, a full two months after we received the tapes from the Houston office. I asked him why it took so long. Stia sounded defensive. "We had to verify everything. "

I exploded. "You had the fucking tapes right here!

Stia threw me an I'm -just- following -procedure shrug. I stalked out of the office, wondering if I could trust anyone anymore. When I pulled into the driveway that evening, I called to Noe and told her to start packing. We were getting the hell out of Guatemala.

Eleven

Post-Guatemalan Stress Disorder

Guatemala City - February, 1990

What was left of my marriage disintegrated during our hasty escape from Guatemala. While headquarters worked on how to react to Moran's death threat, I used up my savings and evacuated my family. On February 24, 1 drove Noe, Crystal, and C4 to the airport and put them on a plane to Texas. Noe and I did not talk much. I kissed her and said I would follow as soon as I could tie up a few loose ends.

First, I had to take care of Ana. During Moran's conversation with the DEA informant, he talked of grabbing our maid to squeeze her for information. If I left Ana behind, I was afraid Moran would turn his wrath on her. Ana watched, forlorn, as I packed my bags. I told her to stay put until the movers arrived, then I drove to the embassy to apply for a passport and a tourist visa for her. As soon as the visa was approved, she could stay in McAllen with Noe until we figured out what to do.

Ten days later, I joined Noe and the kids in the apartment she rented in McAllen. I tried spending a night with Noe, hoping the change in surroundings would spark a healing process. It was futile. The next day, I snapped my suitcase closed and trudged to my parents' house, where I slept in my old bed for the next week. Noe called several times to ask if we could talk things over. I let the opportunity slip by. I told her I had too many things on my mind.

I still believed I could straighten everything out. As soon as DEA approved my transfer to Brownsville, I could slow down, defuse, relax, then rebuild my marriage and my family. The agency crushed that faint hope with one phone call. A disembodied voice from headquarters told me the only openings were in New York City or San Francisco. The Brownsville job, the voice said perfunctorily, was closed. I would be assigned to temporary duty in San Diego until they could figure out where to banish me. Noe, not surprisingly, decided to keep the apartment in McAllen and stay behind with the kids. It was over, and it was my fault.

The two suitcases I lugged aboard the plane for San Diego contained the remains of my life. I reported to the DEA office and tried to concentrate on the assignments they happily piled on me. My tension increased with the workload. My kids, the two people in the entire world who truly made me happy, were hundreds of miles away. My marriage was over, and my career, the other pillar of my sanity, was shuddering badly.

Two weeks after I arrived, Stia called to inform me of OPR's latest move.

"Cele, my hands are tied. They're coming after you with both barrels."

"Why?" After being under OPR's microscope for three years, I wondered what they could possibly come up with next.

"Omar made some new allegations. "

Now what? First, Moran accused me of murder, now Pira- Palma was pouring more gas on OPR's bonfire. According to Stia, Pira-Palma told OPR he gave me $25,000, not $10,000, then claimed I skimmed the difference off the top. I took a deep breath, fuming at the lie. You can handle this, I told myself. I was confident I could counter Pira-Palma's accusations. He was an admitted trafficker with a grudge against me. Several friends warned me Pira-Palma wanted to humiliate me after our first meeting. When I made him break down in the restaurant, I stripped him of his machismo in public, a mortal sin to a Latin American man. He planned to return the favor by helping OPR strip me of my job.

DEA wanted more evidence against me. In early April, OP sent two agents to rifle through our house in Guatemala. A friend called one night to warn me about the search. "They found a whole bunch of shit in your house, and they're taking it to OPR, he said.

I quickly dialed the familiar phone number. As the line buzzed, I tried to organize my thoughts. Why would they search my house?

When Maria finally answered the phone, she sounded out of breath and upset.

"He forced me to unlock the closet," she said, breaking into a string of apologies. She was referring to my gun closet, where I stored my rifles, pistols, ammunition, and a handful of grenades I borrowed from FUCA after Moran's death threat. I kept the closet under lock and key so the kids could not stumble onto the weapons.

"Who forced you?" I interrupted.

"Senor Toofie. " She mangled the name, spitting it out like a curse. I mentally moved Tuffy on the enemies list. My friends list was almost empty. I told her to keep the house locked up tight until I returned to pack our belongings.

I hung up and dialed Stia's number, praying he was not involved as well. I needed answers. They had no right to enter my house. Even in Guatemala, you needed a warrant to search a residence. Someone wanted to set me up. When Stia picked up, I heard my voice rise sharply.

"Who gave the order to search my place?"

Stia said the search order came from Anthony Ricevuto, one of OPR's senior inspectors. Another name for the enemies list.

There was more. After seizing my AR- 15 - - the same rifle DEA tried, unsuccessfully, to add to my list of sins in the previous investigation - - someone in DEA had it altered from semiautomatic to fully automatic. Now it was not merely an unapproved rifle. It was an unapproved automatic rifle. This time, they planned to make sure the charge stuck.

I slammed down the phone and collapsed on my small bed, my mind whirling. Stia's back was clearly against the wall. If he did not cooperate, they could turn the spotlight on him in an instant. He obviously planned to play both sides, helping OPR bury me while whispering their game plan in my ear to keep me happy. He knew OPR would summon me soon enough, and I could make his life hell if I told them everything I knew about his questionable airplane investment. "Don't fuck me over, " he said during our conversation. I did not know how to respond. Everything was becoming too complicated.

In mid -April, DEA decided on a new home for me. As soon as the paperwork came through, I was to report to the San Francisco office. I spent a long night wandering San Diego, restlessly weighing my options. I wanted to return home, but that was impossible. "I don't know, but they don't want you to come to Texas," Ramirez told me when I reached him in Brownsville a few days earlier. Word of my impending fall was all over the grapevine. "They're going to do you, man," he said.

"No shit, " I said to no one in particular as I punched the crosswalk button at another strange intersection. I marched blindly, turning comers until the streets swallowed me. I did not want to live in San Francisco. More than anything, I wanted to see my kids. Separation from Crystal and C4 cut deeper than wounds OPR could inflict.

I stepped into an all - night diner to get a cup of coffee. Two voices dueled in my head, one telling me to cut my losses and go home, the other urging me to dig in and fight. I could hear my father: Whatever you do, do it right. After ten years with DEA, I could not fold now. The Contra investigation got me into this morass, and it was also the trump card that could get me out. Playing it would mean the end of my career, or what was left of it. That was fine. I was prepared to surrender my small role in the great " drug war, " but not before I had a chance to clear my name. The decision made,

I tossed two quarters on the table and tried to figure out where the hell I was.

In early May, Stia called again with my regular dose of bad news: Ricevuto was in Guatemala City to request a visa for Moran. The Justice Department wanted Moran to contribute to the government's growing money laundering and bribery case against the Bank of Credit and Commerce International. Moran's anti -corruption squad once investigated BCCI's Guatemala City branch, and Uncle Sam wanted to hear Moran's story.

I can't believe this, I thought, shaking my head as Stia's voice faded into an indistinct murmur. Moran threatens to assassinate me; a few months later, my own agency wants to invite him into United States. Maybe they can give him a pistol and my home address while they're at it.

The ambassador, Stia said, promptly refused the visa request, as flabbergasted as I was.

On May 28, when I returned to Guatemala City to oversee the packing of our household, Stia met me at the house.

"Cele, they got you, man. "

:'What do you mean, they got me?"

'They found Omar's MAC - 10 in the closet.

I bounded up the stairs, with Maria firing exclamations after me. I stood in front of the empty gun closet and cursed to myself. The MAC - 10, my ColtAR - 15, the grenades, everything was gone.

I had taken the MAC- 10 from Pira-Palma shortly after he became an informant. DEA rules prohibited informants from carrying weapons without a permit. Pira-Palma had reluctantly parted with the rifle, which was a gift from the Cali cartel. He said a friend in the military would give him a permit for the rifle. I was skeptical. The rules also said I should have put the gun in the office safe, but the safe was jammed with ammunition from a recent restocking, so rather than keep it in an unsecured locker, I told Stia I would store it in my gun closet at home until Pira-Palma received a permit. Stia had agreed. Now he was telling me DEA seized the gun as evidence.

"You knew about the gun," I said without bothering to conceal my disgust. Stia shrugged.

I called Aparecio while the movers packed our furniture for shipping. Ricevuto had come calling, he said. After the ambassador refused to give Moran a visa, Ricevuto used his remaining time in Guatemala to grill my informants. Aparecio sounded slightly amused at the sight of yet another DEA investigator coming to him for incriminating evidence against me. "I told him you were clean, " Aparecio said with his usual stoicism.

Stia told me OPR wanted a written statement explaining the items seized from my home. I angrily scribbled a handwritten reply and tossed it on his desk. At least now I could see a few of OPR's cards. They obviously wanted to beat me over the head with weapons violations again. I boarded the plane to California more determined to match them charge for charge. When they brought up the weapons, I would counter with this illegal search and seizure. I knew plenty about wars of attrition, and I planned to wear them down to a stalemate.

I arrived in San Francisco July 12. After more than five years in Peru and Central America, walking through San Francis co's tilting streets brought back the sensory overload I felt during my first days in Manhattan. My last assignment for DEA was beginning much like my first: Alone in a strange city, filled with an overpowering sense of foreboding.

I walked into the office with a dark cloud over my head. I could see the discomfort in the eyes of the other agents as I introduced myself. I felt as if someone had branded an "OPR" stigmata into my cheek. I was assigned to Enforcement Group 6, a flock of young agents led by Richard Oakley, whose work I knew well from my days in Manhattan. He became something of a DEA legend in New Jersey, where he busted heroin and cocaine rings with uncanny undercover skills. Oakley introduced himself with a warm smile. With his light build and dark mustache, Oakley could have passed for comedian Richard Pryor. But his eyes broadcast the cool confidence of a man who had proven himself in the trenches.

Oakley did not dwell on my OPR problems. He was accustomed to working with agents under suspicion. The San Francisco office was the catch basin for DEA's outcasts and troublemakers. Several agents in Group 6 were survivors of OPR inquests, who spoke of their experiences in sour tones, like people who all got food poisoning at the same restaurant. Oakley did not let me dwell on the OPR probe. He put me to work immediately, filling my days with undercover cases. He needed a Spanish speaker badly.

The inevitable call came at the end of July. Ricevuto wanted me to fly to Washington for an interview. This would be my opportunity to respond to the charges they were gathering against me. On the last day of July, I packed a bag and drove to the airport, feeling like the proverbial fly invited into the spiders' parlor.

When I arrived at DEA headquarters the next morning with three cups of coffee tingling through my brain, a bored receptionist guided me to the interview room.

Ricevuto chugged through the door and greeted me with a warm smile. "You must be Castillo." Short and dark -skinned, with black kinky hair twirling from the sides of his balding head, Ricevuto projected the air of someone trying to pack Cary Grant's charm into Danny DeVito's body. He led me to the interview room and offered me a chair. The second member of the investigative team, a tall, thin man wearing glasses, pushed a thin hand from his suit sleeve and introduced himself as Donald Petty.

Ricevuto's disposition darkened slightly when the door closed. He recited my administrative rights, then told me I was now required to answer any and all questions. The room seemed to close in around me.

The inquest lasted all day. Playing good cop-bad cop, Ricevuto and Petty tried to push words into my mouth, starting sentences with, "Isn't it true that As expected, they pressed accusations of embezzlement on me, then asked about the weapons found at my residence. They repeated Moran's murder accusations, and jotted copious notes as I reconstructed the Puerto Barrios raid. Obviously, Moran's death threat did not rule him out in their eyes as a credible witness against me.

They came armed with a list of accusations leveled by Tuffy, Pira-Palma, and El Coyote. When I denied skimming $15,000 from the money Pira-Palma gave me, they scoffed, asking why I waited so long to report the transaction. I put a silent curse on Stia for procrastinating. I would curse his name several more times as the morning dragged into the afternoon.

Ricevuto said El Coyote told them he bought a DEA commemorative pistol from me. I remembered the gun. Montoya was a huge gun buff, I explained, and since I had no need for the .45 1 bought in 1980 from a retired agent who needed cash for his daughter's wedding, I sold it to El Coyote. They were digging deep for their mud. I sold Montoya the pistol when we first met, before I knew he was an informant. It was a bad idea, I admitted, but it was a sin committed by U.S. agents and military personnel everywhere. Selling a firearm overseas was against DEA regulations, but the rule was routinely ignored. Guns passed from hand to hand like small change.

El Coyote had inflated the purchase price by $2,000. Reina claimed I knew Montoya was an informant when I sold the gun. Not true, I told Ricevuto. I wanted to take my lumps for my mistakes, but I refused to admit to false charges.

When they brought up the MAC- 10, Ricevuto stunned me again, telling me Stia claimed he never laid eyes on the rifle. I shook my head vigorously and repeated my explanation: When I took the gun from Pira-Palma, Stia gave me the okay to take it to my house for safekeeping because our gun safe was full. I checked my watch for the hundredth time, wondering when they would run out of accusations.

Ricevuto wanted to know why I kept a fully automatic Colt AR15 in my house.

"First of all, I did not alter that rifle," I said. "Second, why would I bother? We had six M- 16s in the office, all fully automatic. " Ricevuto and Petty glanced at each other.

As their questions petered out, I asked Ricevuto why the Brownsville position suddenly closed. Ricevuto said OPR quashed the transfer request because of the "poor judgment" admonishment I received during my first days with DEA. I was floored. They were talking about my investigation of Noe's stepfather in 1980.

That's justification for separating nw from my family? I thought, glaring at Ricevuto. It was the ultimate irony. They were using my relationship with Noe a decade before to separate me from my family now.

Before I could leave, Ricevuto wanted me to visit Yvonne Conner in employee relations for some sort of psychological evaluation. I was tempted to tell him to go to hell, along with the whole damn agency. If I had had a baseball bat handy, I would have broken his knees. I stalked out of the interview room to search out Conner, leaving a trail of muttered curses behind me. I found her office, banged on the door, and found myself scowling at a tall black woman whose smile refused to wilt despite my obvious anger. She motioned to a chair, where I spent the next several hours spewing my troubles like a broken hydrant. I left Conner's office a different man than when I entered. She was the kindest, most patient person I'd met in all my dealings with headquarters. She seemed genuinely interested in my side of the OPR inquest. Before I knew it, I was telling her about Vietnam, Harlem, the Contras, the G2 murders, and all the other searing memories I had bottled up and carried around like rough stones for the past twenty years. Under her calm gaze, I revealed memories I refused to bare to my wife, my family, even myself. The rage I brought into her office flared, ebbed, then died.

"It sounds like post-traumatic stress disorder," she said, nodding to herself and jotting a few more lines in her notebook. ' ' Look, I can handle it, " I replied, pulling my hard veneer back into place. Conner ignored me.

"I'm going to recommend you be taken off the streets. I'll send the paperwork to San Francisco. In the meantime, when you get back there, I want you to visit Verona Fonte. "

A week later, in Berkeley, I sat in another chair across from Dr. Verona Fonte, a DEA -contracted psychologist who examined a lot of agents. Fonte walked me over the same ground Conner had patiently exposed, but she seemed more interested in the clock. A typical Berkeley liberal, she only perked up when I brought up the Contra investigation. She seemed fascinated by the scandal ous possibilities. When I switched to the more mundane stuff of my nightmares, her eyebrows dropped again.

I returned to work, wondering when Conner's recommendation would reach my boss. Before I left Washington, she said she might be able to pull some strings and help me transfer to a desk job in El Paso. I would still be more than 700 miles from home, but that was close enough to give me hope.

I was soon too caught up in my work to think about El Paso. The cases piled up, one running into another, with every group in San Francisco calling my name to help them infiltrate Latino drug networks. I never felt so popular. Out of perhaps 75 agents, nobody spoke Spanish, so it came as no surprise when busts often turned into deadly ad-libbed escapes. It was the Drug War Follies all over again.

During one bust, a trafficker handed me 10 ounces of heroin, then I gave the bust signal: "Excelente. " Nothing happened. I smiled at the man, hefted the package, and repeated the word a little louder, wondering if the microphone taped to my skin was working properly. He wanted to see the money. Shit shit shit where are they? The duffel bag I brought along was purely for show. There was no money, only a loaded pistol I kept in the trunk as insurance. I watched the trafficker's hand drift toward his waist, where a brown pistol grip poked from his belt. I gave the signal again, praying hard as I reached into the bag and cocked the pistol. We were about to play out a quick -draw scene from some Western, and I planned to pull the trigger first. My backup arrived a moment later and arrested the stunned trafficker. I did not waste my breath screaming at them. I slammed the trunk shut and screeched away.

In late September, I prepared for another trip to Washing ton, where Ricevuto waited with written statements from our August session. On September 26, 1 arrived at the airport early enough to call my mother, yearning for a reassuring voice. She picked up the phone on the first ring.

"Thank God it's you," she said. "DEA and the Border Patrol are at Noe's apartment. They're looking for Ana and searching the apartment. "

Shit. As my mother repeated fragmented bits of the story, my fist clenched around the phone. While Noe was gone, she said, a group of men barged into the apartment and began interrogating Ana. My mother immediately had immediately called my sister Diana, at the McAllen Police Department, where she worked; she was on her way to investigate. I looked at my watch. My plane was about to leave.

The flight from San Francisco to Washington pulled me through four time zones and a million emotions. I slumped in my seat, ignoring the conversational overtures of the woman next to me, and dwelled on my helplessness. When the plane landed, I rushed to the hotel to call Diana at the police department, where she was the teen court coordinator. Diana said when she reached Noe's apartment, the kids ran to her, crying. Two men stood in the bedroom, pulling open dresser drawers. Two others questioned the maid. Ana later said they were searching for weapons. When Diana confronted them, demanding their names and their search warrant, an agent from the McAllen DEA office gave her a bogus name and snarled at her: "Listen here, we are here on official business and don't have to take any shit from you. " Diana maintained her poise and took down the name of the immigration official and two men who identified themselves as DEA investigators. One was Tony Ricevuto. The other was Donald Petty. T took Ana into custody as an illegal alien, and Diana scooped up the kids and called her friends at the police department to report the illegal search.

Later, I discovered Ana's visa was confiscated at the border when she tried to cross into Texas. The papers were approved after I left Guatemala, but Stia scribbled "for employment with the Castillo's in Texas" at the bottom of the tourist visa, which set off alarm bells at Customs. When they turned her away, Noe made arrangements to sneak Ana across the river. OPR got wind of it and pounced. They obviously wanted to add smuggling an illegal alien to their list of charges against me.

They did not count on my sister appearing. When DEA discovered Diana worked for the police department, the man who snapped at her back pedaled furiously, calling to offer his "sin cere apologies. "

When Noe found out about the search, she called the McAllen DEA office immediately to find out what happened to Ana. They passed her call to Ricevuto, who asked her to come in and answer a few questions. When I spoke to Noe after her session with Ricevuto, she said the investigator asked a few cursory questions about Ana, then focused on me: Did Cele have a lot of money put away? Was he into anything illegal? Noe was bitter about our broken marriage, but she coolly told Ricevuto as far as she knew, I had broken no laws. I thanked her and hung up, releasing a long sigh. Noe was still on my side.

I flopped on the hard hotel bed, exhausted. I felt like a marathon runner at the end of a race, praying for a second wind that refused to arrive. I tried to clear my mind, then gave up and stood with a grunt. The digital clock on the nightstand glowed a dull red. Midnight. I flipped through a magazine, then walked to the window and stared at traffic crawling through the dark streets below. I trudged to the bathroom and splashed water on my face. The man staring back in the mirror looked gaunt and lost. In a little over a month, my body had withered from 175 pounds to 145. My clothes hung on me like a scarecrow. I could hardly eat or sleep. Nausea hammered my stomach without release. Only my anger gave me focus. Ricevuto had crossed every line by dragging my family into this inquisition.

The receptionist with the bored stare told me Ricevuto was out. An hour later, as I sat listlessly in the interview room, he appeared in the doorway and silently took a seat across from me.

"We heard you were involved with smuggling the maid into the country, " he said jovially, "but don't worry, we checked it out and found out you had nothing to do with it. "

I stared at him coldly, picturing my kids crying on the floor while he dug through their home. For the first time in my adult life, I erupted.

"Ricevuto, if you have something against me, you come after me, but don't hurt my family, " I shouted. "Because if you hurt my family, the gloves are coming off."

Ricevuto retreated, caught off guard by my outburst. He tried to explain why he searched my wife's house, but I was not listening any more.

"It's fucking wrong what you guys are doing, " I growled. "It's wrong. " I barely read the stack of written statements before scrawling my name at the bottom. When I left the room, I knew my career was over.

The end came slowly. Autumn and winter slipped by in a hazy blur, pushing me reluctantly into 1991. George Bush, half way through his term, stubbornly clung to the ideals of the Reagan "drug war. " Interdiction remained the name of the game. It still didn't work. Every bag of heroin or cocaine I took off the streets had about the same impact as removing a cup of sand from a desert. Black tar heroin, crack, pills, blotter acid, you could get it all any time of the day or night in San Francisco.

When an undercover police officer from Eureka called asking for help with a case, I'm not sure what made me say yes. Probably nothing more than loneliness. Every time I slowed down enough to think, my depression returned. I spent my nights falling asleep in front of the TV. Weekends became two - day purgatories. I still called Noe almost every day to share a few idle words before she turned the phone over to the kids. Only their excited voices could reach through my numbness. It broke my heart knowing they did not consider my extended absence unusual. When Noe and I finally decided to divorce in March, it was several months before we could bring ourselves to tell them the separation was not just part of Daddy's job. It was permanent.

I worked my tail off throughout the week, then drove five hours north to Eureka every weekend to help the police there infiltrate a cocaine and heroin ring feeding off the illegal aliens who worked in the lumber mills.

In late April, 199 1, a letter arrived from Washington. Four years after my Contra investigation, the hammer was falling.

Dear Mr. Castillo: This letter is notice of an action which is proposed to be taken in accordance with Chapter 752, Office of Personnel Management Regulations, and the authority vested in nw by DF,4 directives. Based on the charges of Improper Association With an Informant, Receiving Soliciting Gifts, Misappropriation of Government Property, Violations of Regulations Relating to the Export and Sale of Firearms, Failure to Follow Written Instructions, Poor Judgment and Making a False Statement, the reasons for which are set forth below, I propose to suspend you from your position of Criminal Investigator, for 35 days...

The dry bureaucratic prose ran twelve pages and ended with the signature of Calvin G. McFarland, Jr., chairman of the Board of Professional Conduct. I read it three times. Everything from Ricevuto's rambling investigation was there, and more: The money Pira-Palma gave me to give to G2 was considered improper association with an informant and poor judgment; the MAC - 10 I took from him was now an unauthorized gift; the pistol I sold El Coyote brought charges for an unauthorized weapons sale and making a false statement ("that you didn't know Luis Montoya was an informant when you sold him a .45 caliber pistol "); possession of the MAC - 10 and the AR - 15 constituted failing to follow written instructions, since Stia "was not aware that you were in possession of either of these weapons. "

Charge number three came from nowhere: OPR accused me of misappropriating government property, namely, a shortwave radio I gave Pira-Palma for our operation. Larry had seized the radio from a trafficker, then stored it at the office for general use. I gave it to Pira Palma to set up a communications link between himself and the cartel, a direct line I planned to tap for leads. The radio was never given the serial number and inventory card needed to make it government property. According to OPR, I told PiraPalma to charge the Colombians $15,000 for the radio, then give me the money.

I almost laughed. Pira -Palma was already under suspicion bythe cartel foreclosing 1,000kilos of their precious cocaine. They would undoubtedly become even more suspicious if he returned for an advance on his allowance.

They lined up everyone to testify against me. Statements from Stia, Reina, and Larry peppered the letter, but the bulk of the accusations came from Pira-Palma. I knew I could no longer trust anyone. I was alone, but I was going to fight the suspension. I found a lawyer in San Francisco and began writing my appeal.

My life was spinning in a tightening downward spiral, threatening to hurl me into the abyss. I prepared myself for a showdown. In their zeal to take me down, DEA conducted two illegal searches, harassed my friends and family, and cozied up to a man who wanted me killed. The gloves were off.

After five years of almost continuous investigations, the best they could come up with was a 35 -day suspension? In my appeal letter, I told headquarters I felt my aggressiveness in Central America was the reason for OPR's dogged pursuit of me. If DEA wanted to fight dirty, I told my fellow agents, I could fight dirty too. I toyed out loud with the idea of calling a press conference and blowing the whole Contra drug scandal into the limelight.

My lawyer called in September, 1991, and asked me to come to his office: Walsh's people wanted to meet me.

On September 20, 1 walked into his office and shook hands with Mike Foster, an FBI agent on loan to Walsh's prosecution team. Foster spoke with a pronounced eastern accent. He seemed exhausted. For the next six hours, I took him through every step of my investigation of North's Contra operation, the support it received from the CIA and the MilGroup, the visas the CIA obtained for drug pilots, and the money flowing to the Contras from drug sales. Foster flipped through the copies I had made of my reports, scribbling notes on a legal pad.

Foster shook his head incredulously. When Walsh's office asked DEA for documents referring to the Contras, he said, DEA told the prosecutors there were none. "Cele, if we can prove the Contras were involved in narcotics trafficking, it would be a grand slam home run," he said.

They needed to halt their losing streak. Four days earlier, on September 16, North's conviction on three felony counts - obstructing Congress, destroying documents, and accepting illegal gratuities - were overturned on a technicality, stemming from his high -profile testimony before Congress. North, America's newly- christened icon, was just one who slipped through the system virtually unscathed. A month later, a judicial panel overturned Poindexter's three-count felony conviction because of the same technicality.

Secord, facing 12 felony charges, including theft, conspiracy to defraud the government, obstruction of Congress, and perjury, decided to plea bargain and cooperate with Walsh's investigators. On November 8, 1989, he pleaded guilty to one charge of lying to Congress and received a slap on the wrist: Two years of probation. Hakim was charged with five felonies, including offering North illegal gratuities. Two weeks after Secord's sentencing, Hakim pleaded guilty to one count of supplementing North's salary, paid his $5,000 fine, and took two years' probation. One by one, convictions were reversed, punished with mere probation, or erased when President George Bush pardoned six of the remaining conspirators on Christmas Eve, 1992, because their motives were "patriotism. "

I wanted to help bring the government's drug connections to light, hoping some of those responsible for selling out the drug war would go to jail where they belonged. Foster wanted leads. I gave him the names of everyone who knew about the Contras' drug running: Aparecio, Adame, Hugo, Elmore. I also gave him copies of my reports. He closed his notebook and shook my hand again, promising my information would be included in his report.

Foster and I spoke by phone several times after our meeting. He wanted me to arrange for Aparecio and his girlfriend to fly to the U.S. for an interview. He also said he planned to fly to El Salvador to talk to Hugo. The interviews never occurred.

When Walsh released his three -volume, 2,500 -page report almost two years later, the narcotics issue was nowhere to be found. The third secret would remain a vague footnote to the Iran- Contra Affair, the revelation our government could never afford to acknowledge.

I returned to Fonte's office several times for analysis. In her final report, Fonte called me "a warrior who had been grounded without an adequate transition or support" and diagnosed post traumatic stress disorder. She referred me to a Berkeley psychiatrist, Dr. Donald Goldmacher, who agreed: "As a result of chronic exposure to psychologically traumatic events, Mr. Castillo developed post -traumatic stress disorder. He continues to experience significant psychological symptomology as a result of this disorder. And, in my opinion, is totally and permanently disabled from performing his usual duties with the DEA. "

DEA finally took me off the streets in late 1991. 1 was banished to internal exile, shuffled from job to job. They did not bother training me for my new duties. I worked as a training officer for a few weeks, then a dispatcher, then, in the ultimate irony, a DEA recruiter. The agency wanted to bring more Hispanics into the fold, so they sent me to college job fairs across the state to sign up eager young men and women to fight the drug war.

I was done fighting. On December 6, 1991, 1 left San Francisco for McAllen on sick leave, an absence from which I would never return. Six more months would pass before DEA and my attorney struck a deal: If I accepted a disability retirement, they would pay me 40 percent of my current salary and forget about the proposed suspension. I signed in a heartbeat.

During my time as a recruiter, I passed out DEA literature from my booth, recited the agency line, and smiled at the energetic faces streaming past. When a young man or woman asked me what working for DEA was like, I smiled again and did my best to scare the hell out of them. I described the grinding frustration of the drug war, hit them with some of my personal heartaches, then watched, satisfied, as their enthusiasm faded like a forgotten dream.

"I'm telling you what it's really like, " I said as they quietly dropped the literature back on the table. "Man, the worst thing you can do is join DEA. "

ENDNOTES

Chapter I

Taking the Stand: The Testimony of Lieutenant Colonel Oliver L. North, Pocket Books, New York, 1987, pp 8, 12 - 13, 25, 298-299, 558. (North's Congressional testimony).

The Economist, May 21, 1994, pp 27 - 2 8. (U.S. drug war spending).

Rolling Stone, May 5, 1994, p. 43. (price of crack in Little Rock).

"Drugs and Jail Inmates, 1989, " special report bythe U. S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, 1989. (crimes committed for drugs).

Michael J. Sniffen, The Associated Press, June 2, 1994. (drug offenders in prison).

Deposition of Central American Task Force Chief, Report of the Congressional Committees Investigating the Iran-Contra Affair, 100th Congress, Ist Session, Appendix B, Vol. 3, pp 1121, 1230. (CIA knowledge of Contra drug smuggling).

"Drugs, Law Enforcement and Foreign Policy," a report prepared by the Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics and International Operations of the U.S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (Hereafter the Kerry subcommittee report), U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., 1989, pp 145 147. (North diaries).

" Drugs and the Contras, " The New York Times, January 13, 1987, p. A20. (senators fear drug issue could derail IranContra inquiry).

Chapter 4

"Crack's Destructive Sprint Across America," The New York Times Magazine, October 1, 1989, pp 41, 58. (New York crack scene).

Federal Bureau of Investigation crime statistics: New York City drug arrests for suspects over 16, 1980-1985.

"Heroin Ring Smashed - - 20 lbs. of Drug Seized," New York Post, November 4, 1982.

"U.S. Drug Agents Arrest 13 After Major Heroin Inquiry, " The New York Times, " November 5, 1982, p. B5.

"$8M bail set in drug bust; link to mob," Staten Island Advance, November 5, 1982.

"Heroin Mobster's Bound Body Found in Car Trunk," New York Post, February 3, 1984.

Muniz v Meese, Civil Action No. 85 - 2300, U.S. District Court, District of Columbia, July 18, 1985. (Class action suit filed by DEA Hispaiiics).

Chapter 5

Robert O'Brien and Sidney Cohen, M.D., The Encyclope dia of Drug Abuse, Green Springs Inc., 1984, pp 63 - 65.

Edmundo Morales, "The Political Economy of Cocaine Production: An Analysis of the Peruvian Case, " Latin American Perspectives, fall, 1990.

Peter R. Andreas and Kenneth E. Sharpe, " Cocaine Politics in the Andes, " Current History, February 1992.

"Pope Rejects a Role in Central America, " The New York Times, February 7, 1985, p. A3. (Pope's Latin American tour).

"U.S. Drug Agent Kidnapped," The New York Times, February 12, 1985, p. A6. (Camarena kidnapping).

" Body of U - S. D rug Agent Believed Found in Mexico,

The New York Times, March 7, 1985, p. Al. (Camarena murder).

Los Angeles Tinws, July 26, 1985, p. 2. (Judge Manuel Castro shot in Colombia).

"Car Bomb Rocks Capital as Peru Prepares for Transfer of Power," Los Angeles Times, July 28, 1985, p. 14. (Peruvian bombing).

The Washington Post, August 9, 1985, p. A32. (Car bomb explodes in Peru).

The Washington Post, August 11, 1985, p. Al. (North identified for Contra role).

"Peru Scores a Victory In War on Drug Traffic," The Washington Post, August 19, 1985. (Operation Condor).

Chapter 6

George Black, The Good Neighbor, Pantheon Books, New York, 1988, pp. 97-99. (1954 Guatemalan coup); p. 165 (Barry Seal incident).

Ronald Reagan, excerpts from April 15, 1985 speech as they appeared in The New York Times, April 16, 1985, p. A8. (Sandinista speech).

The New York Times, Oct. 16, 1985, p. Al. (Ortega suspends rights).

Ramiro Guerra's reports were placed in DEA file STG - 81 0013. DEA rejected a Freedom of Information Act request for the file, citing privacy laws.

The New York Times, April 13, 1985, p. A4. (death squads).

Guatemalan officials were listed in DEA files under the following NADDIS numbers: Milton Cerezo- Garcia, #214065 1; Claudia Arenas, #2627597; Alfonso Cabrera - Hidalgo, #2390984; Carlos Ramiro Garcia de Paz, #1937048.

Oliver L. North with William Novak, Under Fire: An American Story, HarperPaperbacks, New York, p. 308-309. (quid pro quo with Honduras).

Zabanch is documented in DEA file GH - 85 - 0086. DEA rejected a Freedom of Information Act request for the file, citing privacy laws.

William Clark, "Public Diplomacy (Central America)," July 1, 19 83; The Iran -Contra Scandal: The Declassified His tory, The National Security Archive, The New Press, NewYork, 1993, p. 4, 37. (taxpayer money used for Contra propaganda).

Johnathan Miller, Memorandum for Patrick Buchanan, "White Propaganda Operation, " March 13, 1985; Ibid, pp 6, 37. (Contra public relations work).

The Monitor, McAllen TX, Dec. 18, 1985, p. 1. (Gen. Singlaub's McAllen visit).

The Monitor, Dec. 21, 1985, p. 4A. (AP story on Contra drug connection).

The Contra report was placed in DEA file GF-TG-859999. DEA rejected a Freedom of Information Act request forthe file, citing privacy laws.

Gaitan- Gaitan's activities are detailed in DEA file TG 860001. DEA rejected a Freedom of Information Act request for the file, citing privacy laws.

"Drugs, Law Enforcement and Foreign Policy: The Cartel, Haiti and Central America, " transcript of hearings before the Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics and International Communications of the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee (Hereafter the Kerry subcommittee hearings), U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., 1988, Part 3, pp 280 - 311. (Morales testimony)

The Kerry subcommittee report, pp 41, 147. (North suggests drug money be diverted to Contras; North diary excerpt).

Elaine Shannon, Desperados, Viking Penguin Inc., New York, 1988, pp 147 - 161 (Barry Seal).

Under Fire: An American Story, p. 315 - 317. (North denies Contra drug link).

Chapter 7

Guirola-Beeche is named in DEA files under NADDIS numbers 1585334 and 1744448.

"Salvadoran Archbishop Assassinated By Sniper While Officiating at Mass, " The New York Times, March 25, 1980, p. Al. (Archbishop Romero's murder).

"Salvador is Rocked By 30 Bomb Blasts, " The New York Times, March 26, 1980, p. A7. (Reaction to Romero's murder).

"Salvadoran Rightists: The Deadly Patriots," reprinted from the Albuquerque Journal, 1983, p.29. (D'Aubisson and ARENA).

"Brasher" is documented in DEA file TG-87-0003. The DEA rejected a Freedom of Information Act request for the file, citing privacy laws.

Theodore Draper, A Very Thin Line, Touchstone, 199 1, pp 332 - 337, 345. (1986 Congressional vote on Contra aid).

Oliver North, PROFS (Professional Office System) Note to John Poindexter, "Private Blank Check," July 24, 1986; The Iran - Contra Scandal: The Declassified History, The National Security Archive, The New Press, New York, 1993, p. 184. (North recommends returning operation to the CIA).

Garcia de Paz is documented in DEA file TG-860005:IA4CI. The DEA rejected a Freedom of Information Act request for the file, citing privacy laws.

Chapter 8

Oliver North, Memorandum for John Poindexter, "Press Guidance re: Costa Rican Airstrip," September 30, 1986; The Iran Contra Scandal: The Declassified History, The National Security Archive, The New Press, New York, 1993, pp. 181 183. (Santa Elena airstrip fallout and response).

A Very Thin Line, Touchstone, New York, 1991, pp. 38, 96. (Steele's role in Contra resupply operation).

"C.I.A. Recalls Costa Rica Aide, " The New York Times, January 18, 1987. (Fernandez recalled from Costa Rica).

"American Is Captured After Plane Is Downed in Nicaraguan Territory, " The New York Times, October 8, 1986, pp A 1, A8. (Hasenfus shot down, Shultz's denial).

"Nicaragua Shows Reporters Man It Says Is Flier," The New York Times, October 8, 1986, p A8. (Hasenfus press conference).

Under Fire, pp 353 - 355. (North's shredding).

"U.S. Prisoner in Nicaragua Says C.I.A. Ran Contra Supply Flights, " The New York Times, October 10, 1986, p Al. (Hasenfus says CIA headed Contra operation).

"Bush Praises Man Tied to Contra Aid," The New York Times, October 12, 1986, p Al. (Bush link to Felix Rodriguez).

The Iran - Contra Scandal: The Declassified History, The National Security Archive, The New Press, New York, 1993, pp. 186 187. (Abrams' CNN interview).

"Lack of Help Angers Poor In El Salvador, " The New York Times, October 13, 1986, p Al. (Salvadoran earthquake).

" Close Aide To Bush Linked To Figure Helping Contras,

The New York Times, October 13, 1986, p A I. (Gregg's ties to Rodriguez).

"U.S. Prisoner in Nicaragua Says C.I.A. Ran Contra Supply Flights," The New York Times, October 10, 1986,pAl. (Owen's card found in wallet of Contra pilot).

Kerry subcommittee report, pp 44-45. (Owen's name discovered in DC-4).

"Special Prosecutor Asked," -The New York Times, October 17, 1986, p AIO. (House Democrats request prosecutor).

Chapter 9

"Contra Arms Crew Said to Smuggle Drugs," The New York Times, January 20, 1987, p Al.

"Is There a Contra Drug Connection?" Newsweek, January 26, 1987, p. 26.

"Cache of 2 1/2 tons of cocaine seized on boat in Guatemalan port," Miami Herald (international edition), October 2, 1987. (Puerto Barrios raid).

"QI,360 milliones en cocaina incautaron, " Prensa Libre, Guatemala, September 30, 1987. (Puerto Barrios raid).

The Kerry subcommittee report, pp 39-43.

Author interview with Richard Rivera, January 16, 1993.

Chapter 10

Final Report of the Independent Counsel for Iran/Contra Matters, August 4, 1993, vol. 1, p. 162. (Secord and Hakim's Contra profits).

Tom Barry, Inside Guatemala, The Inter- Hemispheric Education Resource Center, Albuquerque, New Mexico, 1992, p. 20. (Barillas assassination).

Moran's death threat was documented in DEA file #M3 900053 FAI-CL.

The Kerry Subcommittee report, p. IV.

"Foreign Policy Hurt Drug War, Senators Say," The New York Times, April 14, 1989, p. Ag. (Kerry report released).

"Reagan Aides Accused of Hampering Drug War," Washington Post, April 14, 1989, p. A20. (Kerry report).

Chapter 11

Notarized affidavit given by Diana Ramos, September 26, 1990 in Hidalgo County, Texas. (search of Noe's apartment).

Author's interview with Noelia Castillo, June 1, 1994. (interview with Ricevuto).

Powderburns

COCAINE, CONTRAS & THE DRUG WAR

Celerino Castillo III and Dave Harmon

The truth about the remaining dark secret of the Iran-Contra scandal - the United States government's collaboration with drug smugglers.

Congressional committees have established a link between American agencies and known drug traffickers. In POWDERBURNS, for the first time, a DEA agent goes public with detailed information about U.S. links to drug trafficking in Central America.

POWDERBURNS is the story of Celerino Castillo III who spent 12 years in the Drug Enforcement Administration. During that time, he built cases against organized drug rings in Manhattan, raided jungle cocaine labs in the Amazon, conducted aerial eradication operations in Guatemala, and assembled and trained anti-narcotics units in several countries.

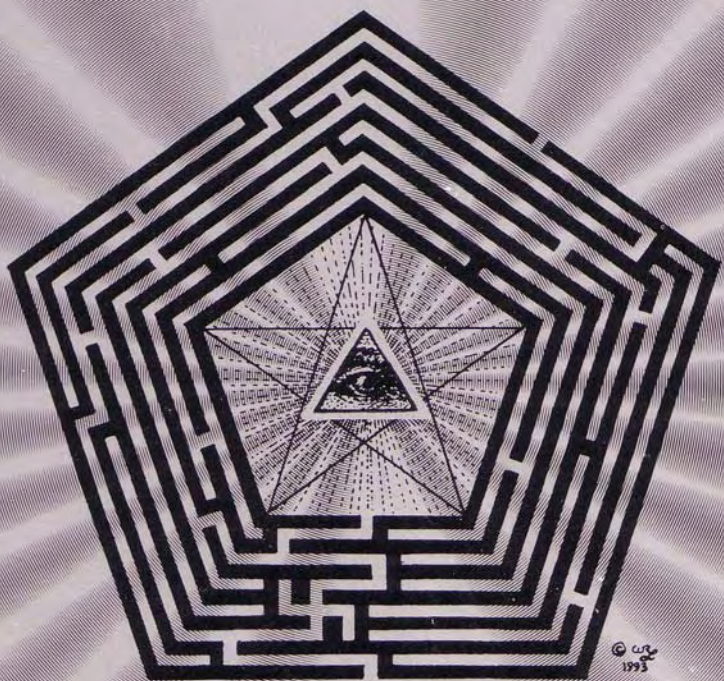
The eerie climax of Agent Castillo's career with the DEA took place in El Salvador. One day, he received a cable from a fellow agent. He was told to investigate possible drug smuggling by Nicaraguan Contras operating from the Ilopango air force base.

Castillo quickly discovered that Contra pilots were, indeed, smuggling narcotics back into the United States - using the same pilots, planes, and hangars that the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Council, under the Direction of Lt. Col. Oliver North, used to maintain their covert supply operation to the Contras.

Sentinel
an imprint of
Mosaic Press, Publishers
Cover Design by Susan Parker

ISBN: 0-88962-578-6

WILLIAM LYNE



PENTAGON ALIENS

(Formerly Space Aliens From the Pentagon)

©William R. Lyne
1993, 1995, 1999

Creatopia Productions™
THIRD EDITION

Abq Journal 10/27/91

The Roswell Incident

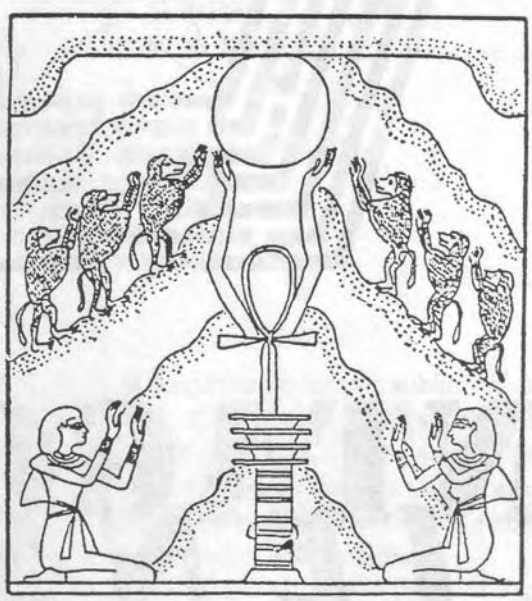
"UFO Crash at Roswell"
By Kevin D. Randle and Donald R. Schmitt
Avon Books, $4.95, 327 pp.

Review by Fritz Thompson

When New Mexico rancher Mac Brazel rode out to check his livestock on the morning of July 3, 1947, what he found instead was wre[illegible]ge oddly strewn across a pasture and a [illegible] that was [illegible]ined to remain dormant [illegible] being [illegible]alled man's [illegible]an alien [illegible] it.

(Part of a newspaper review of a book on the "Roswell Incident")

Drawing by Roswell mortician Glenn Dennis, based on autopsy drawings



Baboons Saluting the Morning Sun

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PREFACE.....v
INTRODUCTION 1
Verisimilitude..... 11
The Achilles's Heel of the Illuminati: "Ether Physics" and Flying Saucer Propulsion 14
I. The Most Rational Alternative 16
II. The O.S.I. Myth Factory 19
III. Gravity and Nikola Tesla's Work 20
IV. Dealing With "Equal and Opposite" Forces.....24
V. A Comparison of Gravitational and Electrical Forces, As Applied to Flying Saucer Propulsion 25
VI. Momentum and Applied Force..... 26
VII. Energy and Time.....27
VIII. Thor's Model T Coil.....30
IX. Work and Energy.....31
X. Forces and Fields.....33
XI. Occult Ether Physics..... 37
A Brief History of Ether Physics 39
Application of the Hall Effect.....40
The Precession Problem 44
SYNOPSIS OF FACTS 48

PART ONE: THE TECHNOLOGY 52

CHAPTER I: Stage I Secret Gravity Secrets 52
Phony Research and Scientific Alzheimers.....53
Inertia and Electromagnetism.....54
Momentum and Inductance 56
Weightlessness, "p2", and the Tubes of Force..... 57
Nikola Tesla's Dynamic Theory of Gravity 61
"p2" 61
The Lorentz Force 64
The Atmosphere as a Cloud Chamber Experiment..... 64
Horizontal Flight 65

Chapter II: Pieces of the Puzzle Come Together 67
The Odyssey Begins 68
My First Daylight Sighting 71
I Meet the K.G.B. and Captain Mantell's Wingmate in the U.S .Air Force..... 78
I Meet the President's Brother-in-Law, and Arnold
Schwartzenegger's Future Father-in-Law, in the Peace Corps..... 83
I Meet the CIA, Its Future Director, and the Future President of the U.S.A., While in the University 87
I Turn Down an Offer from the CIA to be "Once and Future King"..... 88
In 1979 I Meet a Viejo from Pojoaque at the Flea Market, and Buy a WWII
German Flying Saucer Navigation System from an Albuquerque Salvage Dealer..89
Flying Submarines? 95
The Rocket Racket: Wernher von Braun, Willy Ley, Dr. Robert Goddard, and the Kreisel Teller-p2, in New Mexico and Peenemunde 101
I Meet Torquemada and the Medellin Cartel..... 103
I Meet a Member of the Trilateral Commission's International Geodetic Survey Team 109

CHAPTER III: I meet a Government M.I.B. in Santa Fe; Hollywood on the Take 112
"Looking for Motives" 115
Corny Government Special Effects and Hoax Scenarios:
The Roswell Rhesus Monkey Hoax and Other Such Outrageous Shams 116
Phony Expert Consultants and Government Scripts 123
My "Friend", the M.I.B..... 127
Golden Cups, Monkey Business, and a Lot of Bull..... 147
The Roswell Hoax 'Saucer'..... 157
The Roswell Hoax 'Aliens'..... 158

CHAPTER IV: Sightings 159
Vicki Landrum, Et. Al 160
Radiation Dangers..... 165
The U.F.O. Cleaners..... 168
"Stars" 169
The Mind Cleaners 175
"Abductions": Travis Walton vs. Vicki Landrum..... 186
Tesla's "Flivver Machine" 194

CHAPTER V: How to Build a Flying Saucer....195
Author's Disclaimer 195
A. General Considerations....195
1. Size and Shape....196
2. Power System....197
3. High Voltage, D.C. Brush Discharge 199
4. High Voltage, High Frequency A.C. Current 200
5. Vertical Ascent and Descent.... 201
6. Horizontal Travel....201
B. Construction of the Hull....202
1. Power Plant....202
2. Seating and Visibility....202
3. Flight Suit....203
C. Simplified Drawings and Plans....203
1. (Special Supplementary Notations on the WW II German Flying Saucers).204
2. The Two Basic Types of German Saucers: 209
"Flying Turtle" Drawing 210
3. Recent Notes Regarding American UFOs.... 212
4. My Flying Saucer Drawings and Plans 215
Preliminary Technical Background 215
The "Firefly" 217
"Electromagnetic Momentum"....218

PART TWO: THE SOCIAL MANIPULATION....219

CHAPTER VI: Cannibalistic Fascist Litigation 219
A. The Real Issues: The Wave of the Future 224
B. The Socialistic Bureaucracy: A Conspiracy Without Leaders 228
C. Traitor Judiciary....231
Game No. 1: The Ninth Amendment Quiet Game....232
A System in Contempt of Our Rights....233
Game No. 2: The Article One (Sec. 8, cl [8]) and Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments Property Game.... 235
Energy Slavery and Invention Theft 236
Triumvirate of Injustice....239
Game No. 3: The First Amendment End-Run Game
(A.K.A. The Ol'Statute of Liberty Play)....241
Credibility Roulette 241
D. American Dissident Trials, Murders, Tribulations, and Massacres 243
A Bird's Religion 257
The Kennedy Examples 258
The Historical Examples.... 262

CHAPTER VII: From the Easter Bunny to Auschwitz:
The Religion of Einstein and the Nazi New-Agers 268
The "Modern Illuminati" and the Nazis 268
Einstein was a New-Ager 273

CHAPTER VIII: A Taste of Other Energy Secrets 278
Tesla's 'Special' Generator. How Does it Work? 283

CONCLUSION 287

Bibliography 290

Appendix A: Giving to the Public an Unlimited Right to Use of an Invention Heretofore Know as the Dyna-Lyne
Universal Variable Pneumatic or Hydraulic Transmission System 293

Appendix B: The Joseph Papp Patent 297

Appendix C: Fabrication of Tesla's Single Terminal Coils 300

INDEX 302

PREFACE

I began writing this book in early 1992, with such urgency that I often began my day's writing at 4:00 A.M. Chapter I reflects my mood at the time. I believe there are matters addressed for the first time in this book—in 1993—which are important to your freedom and that of your loved ones.

The truth in this case requires exposing a conspiracy. The word "conspiracy" has been made a dirty word by those involved, like dogs under the table, knawing on a few bones and scraps thrown to them by those above, and growling at anyone who threatens their precarious security. Conspiracies exist, they are sometimes real, and real conspiracies can be harmful to those who pretend they don't exist.

This book will disappoint those who expects it to be filled with tales about little 'aliens', or about how I was abducted and used as a sex slave by giant Venusian females (or weird little alien guys who have 'implanted' me, or experimented with my sex organs, etc.). This book is about the "flying saucer"—sometimes called the "UFO"—what it really is, who invented it, and why our government still conceals it after over fifty years of use by it. I also explore the political, social, economic and historical context in which Big Brother has maintained a hoax of gigantic proportions, by lying to and brain washing the public, and oppressing intelligent witnesses, to conceal the saucer secrets from us, and why.

My "space aliens" are actually people, whose philosophy and bizarre masquerade are alien to the American way of life, since they believe in government by anti-democratic hoax, to maintain the secret power of the Trilateral Commission elite, to whom our lives are very cheap.

Some who read this may thoughtfully consider it and agree wholeheartedly, because it is reasonable, knowledgeable, logical and true. Others may be disconcerted and will read no further, avoiding the cold light of reason, preferring to continue believing Big Brother's fantastic lies. It takes courage to admit being duped. Some may be subscribers to The Skeptical Inquirer magazine, misplacing confidence in what Philip J. Klass... supposedly a "fellow skeptic"....says about those 'crazy believers' in "alien flying saucers and ghosts" (all in one breath, mind you). Read further, as there is more here for you. Still others will more vehemently dislike what I say, knowing it is true, because they are among the guilty CIA and NSA, etc. A small minority of the guilty may secretly like what I say, but be unable to break the "national insecurity" bonds which hold them rigidly in place, being forced to continue to lie to their follow humans. Still others are beyond reason or any human sentiment, being motivated blindly by money, power, and a desire to "hold onto what they have". These are the "ruling class". Their fear of the truth is very real, and commitment to continued concealment total. The wealth they were born into is rooted in banking, minerals, chemical cartels which process these, fuel companies, the pharmaceutical industry, banking, automotive or aeronautical manufacturing or transportation...planes, ships, trucks, and trains...anything the general public pays every day for. We are their 'captive' source of money and power.

There is one technology which more certainly than any other, has the capacity to drastically alter the Vested interests which sustain the elite, with its posh lifestyle, and even threatens to destroy it; electro-propulsive "flying saucer" technology.

It is not my desire to see anyone's honestly acquired economic security or prosperity ruined. It is my desire to see the collapse of whole empires, be they built on coercive monopoly, and fascist-state power, which exists at the expense of the freedom and well-being of innocent and productive people, gained and held by secrecy, extortion, force, theft, suppression and concealment of valuable, creative technology, which would also make our planet cleaner, more beautiful, and more accessible to everyone, and allow the peoples of the world to get to know and to appreciate each other more intimately and directly than ever before. No one, be they government, corporate, or individual, has the legitimate right or power to conceal such technology, unless they invented and created it, which they did not.

The existing state of apparently monolithic interests, while presently appearing to be held firmly in place by a chain of powerful government, financial, industrial, technical, military, judicial and law enforcement entities, cannot maintain themselves forever, and it is unrealistic to think that they can.

For those who are threatened by the public advent of this long-suppressed technology, here is the handwriting on the wall: PREPARE FOR THE LIBERATION OF ELECTRO-PROPULSIVE TECHNOLOGY FROM THE HANDS OF THE SECRET GOVERNMENT, BY THE PUBLIC AT LARGE. CONSIDER ALL THE IMPLICATIONS, AND ACT ACCORDINGLY.

The puppets...the "professionals" of pseudo-paranormalism and pseudo-skepticism...don't have so much to lose, and much more to gain. They can probably find more productive jobs selling insurance or used cars. Though they may not like sitting in the COLD LIGHT OF REASON, it will only hurt for a little while. It must be an uncomfortable and weird feeling to "lie for their country", which would not be so bad if that was all they were doing. There is nothing "patriotic" about corralling the minds of your fellow citizens with a fence of lies, so they can be "broke and branded" as the dupes of the BIG LIARS. The suppression of this technology is not in the national security interest.

Some who spread such lies harbor no patriotic delusions, enamoring themselves shamelessly to the covert money masters, performing like puppets, thoughtless and calloused. They will only come painfully alive when they face the music, once they are publically unmasked as professional liars for Big Brother. I can hear the comments now: "...Oh...ya' mean ol' Joe there? Why he use ta' be one of them big-shot You-fologists, 'til it all come out that it wuz just a big lie to cover up gov'ment flyin' saucer stuff. Sad, ain't it?"

It is not difficult to imagine the strange mental processes involved in searching for a new way to present the same Old Tired Big Lies which saw their American premier at Roswell, New Mexico, in 1947, giving birth to the "Twin Lies"....that "aliens have landed" and that "flying saucers don't exist". This BIG LIE SYSTEM was. originally designed by the intelligence personnel of the Gestapo, the Reichsicherheithauptamte VI ("National Security Agency Div. 6"), and the Roswell hoax and the drama which followed has a dualistic nature which is typical of the gnosticism which was the basis for the SS religion[1]. Former SS intelligence agents at Alamogordo designed and initiated the Roswell hoax.

Yes, the two sides were Siamese twins, born of an SS father and CIA mother, representing two opposite sides of the same bogus wooden nickel, counterfeited in America as one of the first shams of the CIA under the fraudulently misnamed "National Security Act" of 1947, which was never submitted to Congress for its approval, because its authors—CFR bankers at Pratt House—knew it contained so many unconstitutional provisions and violations of American liberty and sovereignty, that they feared it would never be approved. (It "went into effect" like most illegitimate usurpations of rights and powers, through executive edict.)

The "Siamese Twins" born at Roswell were the two, diametrically opposite prongs of the Pentagon's concealment apparatus, UFOlogical Paranormalism and Skeptical Official Denial A more organized skeptical initiative was later mounted, as a 'civilian' adjunct to the official deniers, as the counterpart to UFOlogy. Both these fields were planned by the CIA and grew out of the ranks of the CIA's and Air Force Intelligence's plainclothes and covert agent contingencies. This also included such people as businessmen, university professors, astronomers, astrophysicists, meteorologists, other scientists, and aeronautical experts, many of whom were already affiliated with the government's secret projects. Many new press, magazine, book, and screen writers, producers and actors were soon on the payroll, to launch the "alien" scenario through the popular media. There were similar fabrications and concealments in academic areas and textbooks.

Since I originally wrote about the movie-UFOlogy-CIA connections in 1993, there have been many others who have copied me, and to my knowledge, none of them has given me any attribution whatsoever, though to my knowledge, I was the first to do so.

---

[1]Jean-Michel Angebert, The Occult and the Third Reich (the mystical origins of Nazism and the search for the Holy Grail), McGraw -Hill Paperbacks (1975) p. 4.

Of the two counterparts, the UFOlogists seem to have it better than the "skeptics", who appear rather dull by comparison, but spice up their work only by criticizing and debunking their more interesting twin. There are more possibilities among the UFOlogy circles for exciting social, romantic, and sexual encounters, since they are a more interesting bunch of huxters, though an intelligent person soon finds himself longing for another rational being amongst them. To come up with more fascinating subject matter, the skeptics must set their hooks much deeper. Their magazines debunk some false and fraudulent shams—perhaps dangerous to one's mental or physical health, not to mention the pocketbook—only to add false credibility to their irrational denials that flying saucers exist. I can agree with most of the skeptic material, yet their CSICOP flying saucer psychophancy is inconsistent, which reminds me of Ayn Rand's statement: "There are no contradictions in reality; check your premises." The great contradictions in the skeptical arena, are based on false premises planted there by devious, manipulative, lying, CIA-employed pseudo-skeptics, which even many of the innocent true skeptics have failed to identify or to expunge, but they're easy to spot.

To allow these great contradictions to be proliferated in skeptic literature, as reasonable, logical and true, when a lie, poisons the whole arena, like a gangrene of reason, and makes fools of the 'skeptics', and a mockery of the whole movement. Did it ever occur to them that the publications and money behind it came from the CIA? As individuals who pride themselves as having truly ethical intellects, it should be an important part of the skeptic agenda to identify and drive out this "alien implant", which has been using them to carry out the CIA's campaign of lies for too long. It takes an outsider like me to tell them about it. The 21st century should be a "flying saucer economy".

The people who should appreciate this writing the most, are those who are inquisitive, truly skeptical, intelligent, reasonable, individualistic, creative, ethical, imaginative, scientific, and above all, excited and optimistic about the possibilities of opening up a new era in human history, where all mankind will enjoy the greatest invention man has ever conceived and built, the electro-propulsive flying machine generally known as the "UFO", "flying disc", or "flying saucer".

You may either consider this as fiction, fact, or a mixture of fact and fiction. That decision is always up to the individual, for, to paraphrase Aristotle, we are never lied to; we must first lie to ourselves before we can accept a lie as the truth. As for myself, I HAVE NO MYSTICAL BELIEFS, ACCEPT NOTHING ON FAITH, AND ASSERT NOTHING AS THE TRUTH UNLESS I HAVE GOOD REASON TO BELIEVE IT IS TRUE. Though I never ask you to believe me on faith, evidence is sometimes scarce. I back up what I say with documentation where possible, physical evidence, an Aristotelian epistemology, accounts of my experiences and personal knowledge, and striking facts which are too compelling to be dismissed as mere fantasy.

If some Americans have the deluded misconception that the 'Sacharovs' of this world are only in Russia, they should consider that our Sacharovs are so thoroughly buried by deceitful socio-economic oppression...carefully conceived and carried out by the Secret Government...that the world does not even know of their existences, much less that they are "virtually" imprisoned or enslaved.

The present system of nuclear power generator technology was stone-age and intentionally chosen as archaic, inefficient, and obsolete. It was already know by Nikola Tesla—even before Enrico Fermi split the atom without realizing it, and while Einstein was still a second class patent clerk in the Swiss patent office—that all the electricity mankind needs can be easily extracted from the self-replenishing atmosphere, by using a special M.H.D. (Magneto-Hydro-Dynamic) generator discovered by Tesla. It is so simple that a college freshman in physics, with an elementary knowledge of machine tools, could build and test it in his dormitory room.

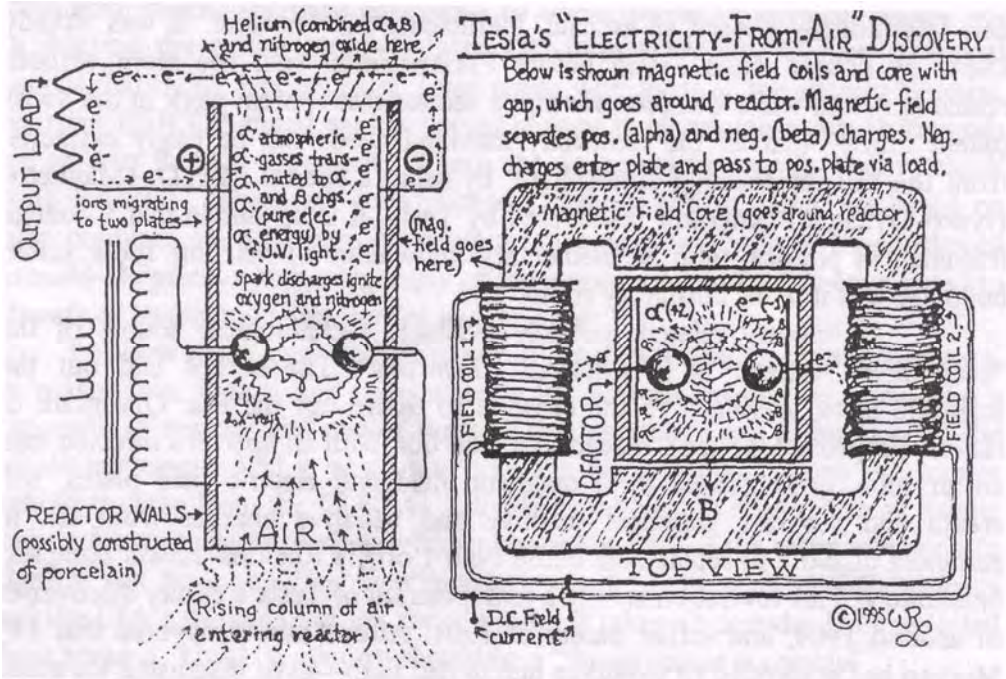
A closely related, publicly available technological source of the "acceptable" variety, is in Physical Chemistry[2]. The author laid out the scientific facts, leaving it to the creative to figure out the use. One gram of radium (approx. 1/31 oz.), placed in a lead box with an aperture directed into an air tube, criss-crossed by a magnetic field and electric field plates, will create and separate abundant positive and negative charges from air, in sufficient quantity to replace the entire Four Corners Regional power complex, indefinitely. This revelation is only a juxtaposition of Tesla's earlier discoveries of around 1904, and earlier patent of 1901. After Tesla discovered that J.P. Morgan had pretended to subsidize him in bad faith—even disguising his greed as philanthropy—in order to gain a controlling interest in all Tesla's patents, Tesla's only recourse was to withdraw his application on the patent. Nonetheless, we still have the unlabeled patent drawing, and with this knowledge, need only fill in the labels. (This patent drawing is shown in Chapter I. Tesla so feared for his life from the ominous power of the Morgan interests that he continued to praise Morgan's business ethic in public statements, saying "..I would stake my life on it...".

According to Tesla, all his inventions were initially conceived in furtherance of his "electric flying machine". The atmospheric generator is sometimes used as a power source on saucers, as confirmed by a renegade

---

[2] PHYSICAL CHEMISTRY, E. A. Moelwyn-Hughes, Pergamon Press, Oxford, 1965.
Page 224: Rutherford and Geiger found the number of alfa-particles ejected per second from 1 g of radium was 3.4×10^{10} ($k=1.26 \times 10^{-11}$ sec^{-1} , later determined by Madam Curie at 1.38×10^{-11}). Each particle carries two units of positive electricity. This will produce 34 zillion alfa - particles per second, at 4.5 Mev. The number of charges per second, yields a huge a amperage which, when stepped down to normal 120 VAC, is staggering.
Page 230: 1 atom of radium expels one alfa-particle producing 1.5 billion ions, at 4.5 Mev.
Page 231: "One alfa-particle has more than sufficient kinetic energy to bring about all the ionizations which stand to its credit", and is "..quantitatively sound".

F.B.I, agent, who wrote a book about what he knew, and was forced to flee to England. The agent lacked a clear understanding of what was fully involved, but I will fill you in more completely in this book. The same method will work with a pure gas such as helium or hydrogen, in an enclosed reactor which recycles the same gas over and over. Tesla's method for extraction of electricity from air is fairly illustrated as follows (with some minor corrections to be done in respect to angles of ejectment of particles and positions of plates):



I have no doubt that, if you really read this book, it will change the way you see many things, especially the 'flying saucer phenomenon', energy, corporate power, the judiciary, and even our local cops. Just remember that, unless we all come forward and speak out, Big Brother (our government and the Trilateral Commission) will continue to spend our money to enslave us.

As for my scientific theory and flying saucer plans, I rely on the words of Leonardo Da Vinci:

"IF YOU GET IT RIGHT ON PAPER, IT WILL WORK."

This book is dedicated to my sons Angus and Matthew, to my friends, and to all the readers who showed their appreciation, encouragement and support, and to the memory of Jewel Gibson, author of Black Gold and Josh Bean and God, who, as my English teacher at Sam Houston State University in 1964, encouraged me to write.

INTRODUCTION

The first crude edition of this book was published in July, 1993, under adverse conditions and pressure which had only recently subsided. At that time, I was attempting to 'get back on my feet' after a very intense six-year period of judicial abuse, which followed on the tail of a total of 17 years of judicial abuse. This particular abuse was instigated by the CIA in 1975, through various employees, dupes, and toadies, some of whom were New Mexico lawyers, judges, law enforcement personnel, and political party officials (Democrats and Republicans), ultimately acting under orders from the CIA, beginning George Bush's advent as CIA director.

In preparing to publish in 1993, 1 took considerable security precautions, although I had a pre-publishing leak through a dishonest "reviewer" (who never wrote the review), in April, 1993, who was recruited by the CIA during his teen years. This gave the CIA advance notice. A copy of my original Introduction reached a CIA ("M.I.B.") around march, 1992, through a mutual "friend" who betrayed me. My first 100 copies were printed clandestinely by copy machine. I silk screened the cover, then had a local printer overprint it with black. I did the collating, binding, and trimming. The second printing, of 1,000 copies, was printed from my negatives and plates by a local printer, then collated, bound, and trimmed by me. The CIA apparently got to the printer, so I had to stay on his back all the time to get the job out much behind schedule, with only 800 poorly printed copies.

My first meager entry as a writer-publisher in 1993, saw immediate changes in UFOlogy, after no more than 50 copies were sold. After all, even before my book had appeared in local Santa Fe bookstores, the Copyright Office had certainly furnished CIA/Langley with a copy, with counterintelligence strategies soon formulated and expedited by the intelligence community. Even the first leak of 1992 (the Introduction), probably resulted in a copy appearing on a CIA desk at Langley.

As a proximate result of my 1993 publishing, the total output of OSI ("Office of Scientific Intelligence", CIA) false propaganda has at least quintupled, in terms of new movies, TV series, books, and magazine articles. There was also some specific misinformation released in video form in Germany, based on (CIA-generated) material, released through the "Hermann Goering Branch of the Knights Templars", an OSI front group, directed specifically at counteracting my book. The CIA knew as early as Dec, 1991, of my intent to produce this book, since I had announced it quite freely among legal 'colleagues' and their spies, who had harassed me for so long.

I had known for at least forty years that CIA/OSI disinformationists control the UFOlogy network, which they themselves created, involving all mass media, especially TV and publishing. As I anticipated, they were among the first people to contact me, their general plan being to give me the 'kiss of death', consisting of quickly arranging to distribute my book—a 'holding action' intended to induce my detrimental reliance and to create a time delay—as they picked my mind, and counter-published "monkey-see, monkey-do, look-alike-type" books, videos, and magazines intended to protract the same old mis-and-disinformation, while attempting to "steal my thunder", by pretending to say something superficially similar in their books—which, unlike my samisdat, would be massively distributed—to counteract it before the general public could be exposed to my long-suppressed message,

Their main strategy however, was to increase the sheer volume of material in the bookstores, to make my single book a proverbial 'needle in the haystack'. Basically, they BURY you in their B.S. At the same time, they loaded my mailbox with a barrage of their propaganda, thinking that they might 'contaminate' my stuff with their phony 'alien' stuff and other incredulous garbage. I knew long before looking at their material—and can with confidence project this to include their future material—that they now have, and will in the future have, nothing new to say, and are only repeating the same Old Tired Big Lies in a slightly more "sensationalized" and cosmetically disguised form, to 'fresh' audiences each year. In addition, they have regenerated a whole new batch of the same old fabrications in the areas I addressed, such as the facts surrounding the end of WW II, in respect to the "secret" amnesty and partnership agreement between the U.S. and Germany, and what I call "The Phony Fall of the Third Reich". They have also created a profusion of names for German flying saucers and flying saucer projects, most of which never existed, were called by other names, or were known by disguised code letters, such as "p2" and "KT-p2" (the projects I unearthed) were known by. I pretended to rely on these first contacts, using them to whatever limited extent possible to distribute and popularize my book, while pursuing several other avenues of approach to the public. Many distributors are CIA fronts, since prompt dissemination of their propaganda throughout the UFOlogy network is indispensable to their jobs in the intelligence disinformation network. Those distributors who are not witting CIA fronts, or complete dupes, have become so economically invaginated with the CIA-created mythology, that they could not afford to immediately free themselves, even if they wanted to. Economic dependency is a powerful motivating factor.

One of the propaganda thrusts spread the erroneous idea that the "Nazis" invented the flying saucer. With apologies to the ghost of general George Patton, let me suggest that this is tantamount to saying that such a thing as the A-bomb or the airplane is a "Democratic" or "Republican" invention! Firstly, a "Nazi" or "Communist", per se, never invented anything, since only individuals do that, and have usually been looted by various statist cretins throughout history. Secondly, the "totalitarian mind" is by its nature one of a collectivist looter and enslaver, not of a creator or producer. And finally, Nikola Tesla's invention of the "electric flying machine" which was later to be called the "flying saucer" or "UFO", is documentable back to the early part of this century, while his conception of it goes back to the 1870's, during his student days at the Technische Hochschule at Graz, Austria. The idea of Nazi flying saucers is as old as the hills, beginning with the 1944 "Foo-Fighter" publicity, yet even this has remained somewhat suppressed because, though incomplete or incorrect as propagated, is a version which is revealing of certain scientific facts (the corona discharges) and close enough to the truth to point a skilled independent investigator in the right direction, and eventually toward the truth, provided he is armored with sufficient scepticism to traverse the precarious minefields (mindfields) of disinformation which have been laid on all sides. I again emphasize that all the ascertainable secret German documents and important developments came into the hands of the OSS/CIA at the end of WW II, not only because of such thoroughly exercised searches, but also by the anti-virtue of the special "deal"—ala Operation Paperclip and Reinhard Gehlen's Amt VI[1]— between Germany and America. There are no documents from the Nazi sources or from our government or any cooperating government, which have not been either destroyed or permanently classified, or first been given the disinformation "treatment" by the CIA, before being "declassified", released or otherwise covertly disseminated through whatever outlets anyone may claim. This same rule applies to the statements of all active, former, or retired military or government personnel who were subject to a security order, for a period of at least 20 years from the date of said order or agreement, and all agreements of a higher order, relating to knowledge of flying saucers, even apply a lifetime statute of limitation. Incidentally, I possess the only known true 'leak' from the original Nazi flying saucer source, via a security lapse of Sandia Base personnel in Albuquerque, New Mexico. The FBI's statement on this matter was that I could not be prosecuted for possession or disclosure because I had "...obtained all my information through innocent means." In addition, I have not been subject to a national security agreement since 1977, 20 years after I signed an agreement while in AF Intelligence in my 18th year. Since I was never given direct access to flying saucer secrets anyway, the information I independently collected and developed on my own was never covered.

The main person attempting to spread the idea of a "German origin" for the flying saucer, is an unabashed 'Naziphile' named Ernst Zundel, who owns Samisdat Publishers Ltd., Toronto, Ontario, Canada. He began his publishings at least as early as 1976, and like me, underwent intense judicial harassment, but was misled to believe the harassment was because he is a German "holocaust revisionist' or 'denier', while the apparent reason is because his flying saucer material is "too close" to the truth. The more Zundel was harassed, the more adamant became his Naziphilia. Meanwhile, some of his best saucer books went out of print, just as his harassers desired. Zundel has remained completely unaware that it was really his saucer material which attracted the animosity of the Canadian national security establishment, pursuant to the secret orders under which he was judicially harassed, similar to how I was judicially harassed in New Mexico, under the ostensible guise of "property dealings", during the same approximate period of time.

Though novel in some respects, Zundel's idea of how German saucers worked was incorrect if not completely lacking, being unfortunately subject to prior Nazi/CIA disinformation via Paperclip, and a vague idea of jets, rockets, or some mysterious, esoteric "anti-gravity" system of Felix Schauberger, involving a "water vortex". The Canadians were most likely worried that Zundel might turn up a German-to-Canadian technology transfer dating to 1945 or soon thereafter. In 19531 made my first close-up daylight sighting.

In 19611 had discovered the 1941 Nazi testing of the neutron bomb on the Libyan desert. In 1963 I discovered the exact scientific basis for saucer propulsion, and in 1966 found out about the "stalemate" of 1945, involving 24 German "Electro-U-boats", towing specially designed, smaller subs , carrying (what I believe may have been V-6) rockets with celestial guidance systems and armed with neutron bomb warheads, fueled by red mercury (a mercury-antimony oxide which originated with alchemists of old). In 1996, a documentation of these small missile-carrying subs, developed under the "Lafferenz Project"[1] was provided to me by Henry Stevens of the German Research Project, Gorman, California. The smaller, rocket-carrying subs could be tilted to the correct firing trajectory when desired. Like later American I.C.B.Ms, such as the Polaris A-l missiles carried by our Lafayette class nuclear powered submarines, the missiles could be fired from underwater. I also learned in 1974 that Wernher von Braun had worked in New Mexico in the late 1930s, something which was common knowledge among local rocket pioneers whose work dated from that period, such as the late Peter van Dresser of Santa Fe and El Rito.

---

[1]Christopher Simpson, BLOWBACK (Weidenfeld & Nicolson, New York, 1988).

I had no source for the complete saucer electrical theories and mathematical formulae, until 1979, a year in which I made great headway. In that year, I acquired knowledge of a 1937 pre-WW II Illuminati "p2" project at Los Alamos, run by von Braun, and acquired the only known extant piece of physical evidence from a WW II 1943-vintage German flying saucer, based on the Tesla discoveries first developed in New Mexico and taken to Germany, before being returned to New Mexico around 1945. This evidence is a celestial guidance slave compass from the "KT-p2" project, in which von Braun included the original New Mexico 1937 "p2" project name, after he had removed it from Los Alamos and transported it to Germany, in 1938, with the apparent good graces of our FBI. The device was on one of the German saucers brought to post-war Sandia Base under Operation Paperclip in 1945, soon followed by a 15,000-person German scientific contingency's exodus to New Mexico[2]. The guidance system was an invention of Nikola Tesla, developed and tested on a 200-mile round trip radio controlled aircraft flight test in conjunction with the Sperry Gyroscope Company, in 1917[3].1 eventually located the source and substance of the scientific data and formulas for the saucer, rediscovered the electromagnetic method for its application, and documented the previously suppressed and intentionally confused historical background concerning the work of Nikola Tesla. In 1997, I authored OCCULT ETHER PHYSICS: Tesla's Hidden Space Propulsion System and the Conspiracy to Conceal It (ISBN 0-9637467-2-3), which I revised in 1998 (ISBN 0-9637467-6-6). It is a documentation of the 19th century scientific research leading up to Tesla's great discovery, which at its earliest, appeared to be in 1891.

Zundel had approached the saucer question with the characteristic tunnel vision of one intent on cleansing away and assuaging German guilt for the crimes of Nazi-era Germany. This is as silly as an old Stalin-worshiper trying to say that Stalin didn't kill off millions of his own people, even including ten million members of his own Communist party. When will people realize that the purpose of Illuminati-created wars is to kill off as many "excess" Germans, Jews, Russians, Americans, British, French, Gypsies, and other peoples as possible? All Hail, Kali Ma! And when are people going to realize that, since the 1770's, the ultimate blame does not properly rest on any

---

[1]Lusar, Rudolf, 1960, German Secret Weapons of the Second World War, Neville Spearman, London; Stevens, Henry, Rumored German Wonder Weapons, Report Number Three, Fantastic German Submarines, German Research Project, Gorman, Ca., 1996.

[2]Discussion between the author and Maj. Helen Nash, Wehrmacht Intelligence, FRD, between 1966-70, Univ. of Tex., Austin.

[3]John J. O'Neill, Prodigal Genius, The Life of Nikola Tesla (David McKay Co., Inc., New York, 1944).

single national group, per se, but with the Illuminati/CFR, rather than with all those who became the cannon fodder/suckers in this massive international conspiracy of "population control", munitions-profiteering and power-consolidation, led by a cabal of central world bankers, especially the banking houses which arose out of the late 18th century German kingdom and the House of Hesse-Kassel. It is no accident that Adolf and Eva Hitler lived out their last days in Kassel. "Oh, really!", you exclaim. Read on.

Despite Zundel's controversial view, he was almost correct about Hitler's planned last-ditch stand against America, using flying saucers and other 'wonder weapons', along with several other 'Wunderwaffen' which were not mentioned as such in Zundel's material, but which I identified for the first time, as the basis not only for one of Hitler's brilliant alternate plans—according to the judgment of the best Russian military analysts who later studied it—but for another even more brilliant plan for which the first plan-evidence of which was conveniently left for the Russians to find in the Berlin Fuehrerbunker—was a mere cover, and which was actually consummated by the coercion of a secret amnesty and partnership agreement between the U.S. and Germany, buttressed by the exodus, under Operation Paperclip, of Nazi saucer R&D, over 400 top scientists, and over 15,000 scientific and technical "slaves", to the U.S. government and the IllumiNazi corporations and banking interests. This plan is so embarrassing that they dare not fully declassify it even today. Though this revelation may startle some of you, its truth is gradually falling, piece by piece into place, from evidence continually surfacing all over the world, especially since the collapse of the Soviet State.

Some people have mistakenly attempted to trace the destination of the Nazi "technology transfer" to Antarctica or South America, and I'm sure the CIA fuels this false scenario which they created. Some of this technology and people involved may initially have gone to South America or elsewhere prior to the finalization of this agreement, until the treacherous combination of the German Amt VI ("Dept. 6") SS RSHA (the Nazi organ upon which the CIA was based), the new CIA created on the Nazi model, and British, Canadian and Australian intelligence, and even Russian intelligence, found and took care of them, where any critical part of the "Big Secret", or any key scientist was" involved. The simple truth is that the flying saucer technology and personnel came to the U.S. of A., lock, stock and barrel, right where Hitler and the rest of his gang agreed to, in order to buy their asses a new lease on life.

My original edition of this book is the most important publication of all time on flying saucers. True to my anticipations, the inevitable CIA look-alike books and other counter-publishings have not plagiarized my original theories, since their objective is not to claim my theories or to advertise them, but rather to "steal my thunder", to overshadow, cloud and suppress my actual findings and distribution of my book, and to obliterate what I have to say, with a voluminous mass of bullshit, spread primarily through the CIA's "UFOlogy network". They have not attempted to discredit, mention, or even to discuss my theories, since this would attract the public's attention, invite meaningful dialogue, and draw in true scientific scrutiny, which I welcome. They prefer to pretend my book does not exist, while using the 'placebo' effect to pacify the public's continual thirst for answers on impertinent questions, while confusing or misinforming them on the American and Nazi saucer developments, through CIA-doctored pseudo-leaks and other blind allies. In addition, they have spewed out a virtual mountain of fresh bullshit, since August, 1993.

Zundel was suppressed until my book was published Then the CIA and Canadian intelligence were apparently forced to rethink their strategy in respect to Zundel's work, 'sanitizing' it of Zundel's involvement and his anti-Semitism, through their own writers, in order to re-propagate his material as a convenient false history of the initial origin of the saucer, as well as the phony, CIA-created science involved, promoting a scheme based on either "esoteric" or "conventional" propulsion systems, but not true Tesla "ether physics". The CIA now uses Zundel's saucer material, since there is nothing harmful in it, because the information available to him had already been carefully screened by them in 1945, for all potentially valuable information, then altered before being declassified and made available to Zundel and other interested parties. All important information which could not be falsified or misinterpreted, remained classified Besides, the Germans themselves were quite capable during the war of creating information "scrambles", and running 'aerodynamic' saucer projects, just to conceal the 'real' one, most likely at Zeppelinheim, south of Frankfurt, or at the Blohm & Voss works in Hamburg, confirmed by a knowledgeable spy friend assigned to the area of Hamburg during the war. Reinhard Gehlen's Amt VI SS RSHA was quite capable of such mis-and-dis-information, in fact invented the CIA's version and implemented it for them. After all, hadn't the O.S.S. hired Reinhard Gehlen's Nazi intelligence network under Operation Paperclip, forming the nucleus of the new CIA?

From the moment that the electro-propulsive saucer's full potential became evident in the early 1930s, forward to the present, rocket projects have been a cover for the "real thing", and ironically, this sham was first actualized in 1937, at Los Alamos, New Mexico, based on stolen Tesla technology, under the tutelage of Wernher von Braun. Hitler had appointed the Prussian Illuminist as "Herr Doktor Professor of Research" and project leader to run his Vergeltungswaffen ("revenge weapon") center at Peenemunde, before his collaboration with the American rocket pioneer, Dr. Robert Goddard, at his laboratory in Mescalero, New Mexico, and rocket test site at Eden Valley, New Mexico.[1] Afterward, von Braun would never allow the high priority ("p2", "KT-p2") 'space travel' project to be too far away from his watchful eye. While collaborating with Goddard at Mescalero, von Braun ran the Illuminati flying saucer project at Los Alamos called "p2", between 1936 and 1938![2] He was given a leave of absence by Hitler for this espionage, and was brought to America by the Smithsonian Institution, the Guggenheim Foundation, and the American Rocket Society, who financed his work and paid for his trip!

A lot of look-alike material presently attempts to mislead the public with the idea that flying saucers were invented by "Germans", were exclusively rocket, jet, or turbine-powered, were based on aerodynamic ("boundary layer") principles rather than electro-propulsion, some vague, (CIA-pseudo-leaked) esoteric 'mercury gyro' "vimana" powerplant, the "water-mystery-power" of Viktor Schauberger's "implosion turbine"—to blow air through what was presumably no more than a glorified, frying air conditioning vent—and that the saucers we see today are based on these. There were several types of German hovering craft which used technology other than electro-propulsion, and even some which combined conventional rocket, jet, or aerodynamic lift with electro-propulsioa Despite all this, what we really call the full-blown "flying saucer", per se, in all its glory, is exclusively electro-propulsive, being originally based on technology discovered and developed by Nikola Tesla, before being stolen away to Nazi Germany by Wernher von Braun, in 1938. Despite the thoroughness of the FBI, O.S.S/CIA and the Gestapo, enough evidence remains to document the fact that Tesla's original sauGer developments were earlier than the first successful liquid-fijeled rocket shots of Goddard, Oberth, or von Braun, and the information I unearthed here in New Mexico, documents the acquisition by 1937, by German interests, of Tesla's discovery, indicating the long-standing fallacy of the rocket projects, which were gleefully paraded before us all those years by von Braun and his American Peenemunde clone, NASA. None of the material from Zundel or from other German sources even mentions the "KT-p2 Projekt" (muchless "p2") or von Braun as its real head, or mentions anything about the technology I alone uncovered While some vague disinformation regards "Nazi experiments with electrical discharges" (said to relate only to "electronic jamming devices"), the allegations of "electrogravitics" are based on vague, esoteric and even 'ancient' pseudo-sources (which in fact are pure mythology), and the information goes no further. Other information from American sources is inconclusive and tainted by the presumption of misinformation as well, due to its prior control by the CIA.

---

[1]The author's discussions with rocket pioneer and scientist, Peter van Dresser, 1973-1979.

[2]The author's discussion with an unnamed employee of the 1937 project in May, 1979.

For example, "How...", you may ask, "...could the CIA (or its affiliates) plant ancient 'Vimana' material in ancient Hindu or Sanskrit manuscripts?" It should not amaze you to know that many of the 'interpreters' of such works were often East Indians with Oxford or Cambridge degrees, who worked with British intelligence and MI-5, and the OSS in the WWII Asian Theater, and that intelligence agencies hire many such scholars and finance their work Their interpretations are often a matter of...interpretation. What is meant in Hindu mythology, as an analogy to the Arabian 'flying carpet', suddenly becomes a "space ship". While I may know for a fact that there was advanced machine technology akin to ours today, in 1450 B.C., the Vimana stuff isnt it. Playing around with mercury (the so-called "mercury gyro") isn't easy, and many of the theories I've heard are just plum dumb. Besides, if you have any concrete idea of aeronautics, and you've ever really looked at the "Vimaana" stuff, you will see for sure that it is obviously dumb.

The true electro-propulsive principle of the Tesla-based American-German saucers cannot be found by ordinary research, because the CIA has already covered all the bases. There is a publisher who would have stolen my thunder on this issue, but was unable to discover another source, so was stuck with the options of either acknowledging and citing my prior publishing, research, and detective work, or of plagiarizing me, so he begrudgingly "...killed me with faint praise". I tend to think his reluctance reflected either CIA pressure, or his fear of the strong possibility that I will subsequently be proved correct.

Another jealous author who agonized over my discoveries, who claims to be a physicist, even made the ridiculous claim that he "discovered" that saucers are powered by gyroscopes. Gyros create only feeble gravitational 'anomalies' ("weight loss" but not "anti-gravity"). He appears to have gotten this idea from a combination of the Vimana' literature and my book, since I was the first writer to introduce the fact that the Kreisel Teller processed, which was the only solid tie between flying saucers and 'gyroscopic' action, other than vague references in recent CIA/OSI pseudo-leaks through German and Austrian sources, to a Flugkreisel ("Flying-Gyro"), in misinformation designed to tie into the pseudo-"discovery". Later CIA-produced 'German' documents contain the word "Kreisel" ("gyrating" or "gyroscopic") in misrepresented contexts. This man had no prior source other than my book. When I met him in the summer of 1994, he immediately asked me about a matter in my book, right off the top of his head, but never mentioned me or my book in his bibliography. I suppose that since I discussed and rejected the gyro idea, he was free to claim it, but the idea wasn't mine in the first place. Since he had obviously never seen a saucer up close, if at all, it was probably my mention of the precessive effect which reinforced "gyroscopic antigravity" in his mind. Aside from my pointing out the saucer's precession, the theory of gyroscopic antigravity is as old as the hills, and no one has ever been able to lift a ship off the ground with it, because the magnetic field of the earth is far too weak. This pseudo-scientific theory has always been encouraged by the CIA, since it is wrong, and serves no better purpose than to buttress and further embed such false explanations into the UFOlogy field, and to damage the scientific credibilities of all those foolish enough to espouse or to believe it.

The alternatives presented are: (a) the "air-blower" ("boundary layer") aerodynamic propulsion systems based on the theories of Ludwig Prandtl and the unverified work of Viktor Schauberger; or (b) an ancient, obscure 'vimana' propulsion system (purportedly a "mercury vortex" drive) misinterpreted from East Indian Sanskrit religious texts such as the Bhagivad Gita; or (c) an unknown propulsion system based on "shared alien technology" which is "too complex for our comprehension"; or (d) centrifugal force gadgets which sling weights around in attempt to increase the centrifugal force in one direction and decrease it in the opposite direction (failing to take into account that the 'increase' in centrifugal force in one direction causes the device to behave as if the center of rotation were in the center of angular momentum, so that the 'gain' on one side is canceled by a loss on the other); and finally, (e) the purely electro-propulsive ether-based system which can be documented in the work of Nikola Tesla as far back as the 1870s.

As you should see, the last alternative is the only feasible one, and I have documented its discovery in Occult Ether Physics. There are several other minor systems originating with various tinkerers which just won't make the grade, some of which involve tortured mathematics and pseudo-science of the ley line, geomancy, and Stonehenge variety, etc., or some mysterious stuff called "Schumann resonance" (which was declassified by the CIA when they disseminated the documents referring to it), and finally the work of the Englishman, Searls, which is only rumored to get off the ground, but obviously lacks a control system. Some experimenters may have inadvertently stumbled across something which causes weight loss, or a feeble thrust, but without understanding the simple and correct ether concepts and physics, are unable to succeed, mostly because they are looking for something too complex, if they have not in fact been supported in their futile research by the CIA. Altogether, the alternatives other than the Tesla proposition, too conspicuously place saucer propulsion in the area of the unknown, the unobtainable, the wacko, or depict it as the obscure and indeterminate work of mystical, pseudo-scientific cranks such as Viktor Schauberger or Bruce Cathie.

When you see a real saucer performing at its high capabilities up close, you know it is not powered by any of these feeble contrivances, but requires the great force and magnitude which can only be scientifically attributed to the gravitational-to-electromagnetic conversion constant, which is 10^{40} x fg. The opportunity for a civilian to see a flying saucer up close is much rarer today than it was in 1953, on the West Texas desert to the south of Alamogordo, New Mexico, where the German prototypes were brought, tested and developed after the war.

Since none of the writers I know of producing recent works, have ever seen a flying saucer as I did in 1953, or possess the scientific perspicacity required to interpret what they saw, I can only conclude that their information is Johnny-come-lately "researcher", second-hand conjecture and speculation, abject CIA-duped falsity, or outright CIA misinformation, since almost anyone of scientific mind, who ever actually saw a flying saucer in the glory of its full potential, would immediately laugh at such phony, CIA pseudo-science, Nazi ass-kissing books, new age charlatanism, illicit money-grubbing plagiarism, and grand-standing sensationalism.

As my acquaintance, former Air Force Colonel, Phil Shaw, of Austin, Texas said in 1967[1], "There haven't been any leaks". Shaw was the former director of two of the most important regional offices of Air Force Intelligence's Operation Blue Book—Reno, Nevada, and Reykjavik, Iceland—before studying jewelry making at the University of Texas. Both before and since then, there were some leaks, and I'm the one who had his bucket set to catch them. I made no bones about it with Shaw, openly accusing him, in the presence of professors and other students, of bending to his CIA orders, in our life drawing classes at the University of Texas Department of Fine Arts. I even embarrassed him a little bit when I showed other students that the lock on his locker in the hall was CIA issue! Shaw made a weakly valiant effort to discredit me, and I thought it no accident that Iceland was a strongly suspected site for wartime German saucer bases, while Reno, Nevada is very definitely 'saucer country'. Shaw knew I was right, but could never admit it.

No gyros, rockets, jets or 'conventionally powered saucers could ever produce the results I saw in 1953, and neither could "mercury gyros", "air suction" or "boundary layer" methods. I knew that a very powerful electrical force, which could be instantly altered and changed in direction, was involved, and this book is the first and only known book to reveal a viable scientific basis for this very real force and the simple method by which it is implemented and controlled. No other researcher in this field has provided any means by which such great force, directional control, or maneuverability could be effected, mainly because they are ALL either CIA employees, whose job it is to hide it, or "second-handers"... "writers" and "researchers"... who can only follow up on CIA pseudo-leaks, snooping around for things which are just not there, or which were conveniently placed there by the "Puzzle Palace", so that these researchers "...found the pieces, and put them all together" (just as the Puzzle Palace planned), thinking they had really 'discovered' something.

I am not only a writer and researcher, but an inventor, analytical and original thinker, experimenter, sceptic, science detective, debunker, and a self-taught theoretical "ether physicist" of the first order. Of course CIA propagandists of the CSICOP ilk like Philip Klass, will only scoff at the inclusion of "debunker" and "ether physicist" in the same breath. Klass and a few others represent the CIA's invasion of the "secular humanist" field, to take it over and use it as another OSI base of operation to attack flying saucer or alternative science researchers, or writers who may threaten to uncover what I call the true, "occult" science of ether physics. This is a brilliant and effective tactic, except for the fact that the "officially accepted" Big Lie physics of today is a prima facie case of flakiness, based on the phony "elastic space and time" concepts taken by Einstein from the Lorentz Transformation, giving birth to Relativity and the "Big-Bang" cosmography, false theories for the public having their roots in the Machiavellian manipulations of Rosicrucianism and the Hermetic Mystery Traditions. In so doing, the CIA has managed to sucker the humanist/sceptic element more firmly into supporting a flaky and false Relativism when, as true sceptics, they should be looking into the concealed alternatives. Why have they accepted on faith the now 'traditional' relativism/big-bang physics, which is interconnected to the mixed premise Kaballah-Bible-Talmud-Koran-whopping, paranormal-pushing "traditionalism" (which in fact has also been created or supported by the Secret Government of which Klass is a representative). Are there really many intelligent people who have accepted on faith, the assertion by Klass and his psychophants, that all of the millions of people who have seen "UFOs", have only misinterpreted "natural phenomena"? How many have been led astray by these leading CIA 'spotlights', Philip Klass and the Smithsonian Institution? Klass's false and in fact mystical assumption that all flying saucer "believers" assume that saucers are of extraterrestrial origin, and simultaneously believe in ESP, ghosts, and other irrational paranormalism, is itself a "paranormal claim" being made by Klass. Those who live in glass ("Klass") houses shouldn't throw rocks. I promise as a true sceptic not to make even one 'paranormal' assertion or claim!

---

[1]Discussion of the author with Col. Phil Shaw (USAF Intelligence., Ret), U.T. Dept. of Art, Austin, Texas, 1967-70.

The fatally tragic flaw of most "alternative" scientists, is that, in attempting to understand "ether physics", they have irrationally tried to reconcile immiscible Relativism—created by the Hermeticists to conceal ether physics—with ether physics, which is based on the "Fixed Universe" theory, which is not nearly so static as the "Big Bang" theory and Relativism True sceptics would be critical of the mystical physics being enforced upon us by the establishment media.

By comparing the gist of my book with what the OSI has conspicuously omitted or artfully confused, it is clear what they seek to hide. They have hauled out all the old time-worn OSI mis-and-disinformation, and erroneous CIA-tampered Nazi stuff, all altered before being made available to anyone. The documents of the Nazis were collected in the days when they shot first and asked questions later. A review of existing theories shows that, until this 1993 book, the truth was concealed. Isn't that rather odd? My over 40 years prior knowledge made me feel very alone, and I have never ceased to be amazed at the garbage the public has swallowed all along the way.

It should be obvious to intelligent readers as to why my simple, rational, scientifically verifiable explanation—conspicuously absent from all prior sources—has been omitted. I had known since 1953 that the propulsion system was electrical, a fact systematically omitted from the milieu of ideas and information available in prior sources. There are only three possibilities for saucer propulsion, which are (1) electricity, (2) electricity, and (3) electricity. That is because ether propulsion can only be electrically created

The thing which makes the 'electro-propulsive' flying saucer—as well as universal gravity—possible, are some odd flukes of nature, involving the natural interplay between fundamental positive and negative electrical charges in elementary matter, the existence of a universal ether (which I call "Omni Matter"), the permeation of space by omnidirectionally interpenetrating Zero Point Radiation ("ZPR"), and the natural electromagnetic field and enormous electrostatic forces emanating from the earth, which affect the ether through which it moves. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and intelligent and knowledgeable witnesses who have seen a saucer in action up close, know it is real, and should see that it works on electrical principals. The things which makes these truths now available to you, are the fundamental intelligent human thought processes which are essential to your survival as a creative and independent, thinking person, rather than to give your mind over to the sway of a raving and hysterical Naziphile or other mystic who is peddling irrationality and endless fantasy for the Pentagon, in hopes that he can obtain money, by supplying phony answers which always requires more scientific knowledge and understanding than anyone possesses, so the truth remains concealed just as the Pentagon planned.

The so-called "UFOlogy field" is full of CIA "organ grinders" with their dancing monkies or ventriloquist dummies, who only repeat what their controllers say. Most of the "big guns" are professional CIA liars. In over 47 years, they have failed to bring forward a significantly new issue, and with the overflowing help of the CIA's abundant publicity machinery, have been singing the same Old Tired Tunes, based on a set of scenarios pre-generated by CIA contract waters in 1947, as one of the first projects of the newly created agency, under the so-called "National Security Act", which was no more than an executive edict which Congress was never even provided the opportunity to approve or disapprove. With all the typical themes already 'set', writers who work for the CIA have a rather hackneyed job of trying to come up with new kinks on the same old themes, always avoiding the one true theme which has been so conspicuously omitted, which to me is much more exciting than all their shabby, shopworn "alien" fantasies.

The CIA-UFOlogists have a very tell-tale fatal flaw, similar to the Illuminati, their bosses. This flaw, which will be the cause of their eventual downfall, is a lack of creativity, which gives them a need to incestuously breed, copy and repeat contrite old lies in order to steal the truth. This fatal flaw is best illustrated by an ancient analogical story about a monkey which was trapped and enslaved by its own self-negating greed, as follows:

A young man was attempting with no success, to capture a monkey in a jungle. Along came a wise old man, who kindly consoled the discouraged young man. and said, "In order to trap a monkey, you must first understand the basic nature of a monkey, and "think like a monkey". I will show you how it is done." Whereupon the old man took a glass jug, filled it half way up with nuts, and tied it firmly to a tree. The young man asked, "How do you expect to trap a monkey with that?" The old man, with a smiling, wry twist of his wrinkled old mouth, said, "Just wait, and you will see." The two men hid in nearby brush, and remained quiet for an hour or so, when finally a monkey descended toward the jug from the dense foliage above. Seeing the nuts in the jug, the monkey extended his skinny hand into the jug, grabbed a large handful of nuts, and attempted to pull them out, except the mouth of the jug was too small to allow the passage of the monkey's hand full of nuts. Nonetheless, the monkey tightly gripped the nuts, refusing to release even a single nut. He stupidly continued to tug at the nuts to no avail. The old man came from his hiding place with a rope, and simply walked up and placed it around the alarmed monkey's neck. The monkey allowed himself to be captured, rather than to release his grip on the nuts in the jug.

To the stupid monkey, stealing nuts was more important than his personal freedom, which he never missed, until he didn 't have it anymore. Then he sadly became a mere toy for the amusement of others, who kept him at the end of a leash when not in his cage, for the rest of his life. The monkey was sold to an old CIA organ grinder, and learned to dance at the end of his leash, to a collection of redundant Old Tired Tunes, monotonously ground out on the old man's whining organ, as the monkey begged for money on the streets ofWashington, D.C.Just across the street from the Pentagon.

VERISIMILITUDE

The "nuts" are hidden truths. The "monkies" are "UFOlogists", on the CIA payroll, and the "Old Tired Tunes" are the same old CIA "alien" and other disinformation scenarios. The problem with the hidden truths, is that they are poisonous to the CIA, and therefore incompatible with the CIA Big Lies, which they will 'contaminate', compromise, and destroy.

All compromise leads to corruption, an attempted mixture of immiscible or incompatible things. Most UFOlogists are indecisive, mediocre, unoriginal, muddled thinkers without spines, the great majority of whom are "second-handers"-literary piranhas who feed in a frenzy off the ideas of others—and mix stolen ideas together until they are as clear as mud. They often make exaggerated claims to be 'first' at something, in their hasty and greedy attempts to steal the thunder of those who realty were the first at some things. They are required to avoid the 'poisonous' ideas (which they seek to obliterate). They usually conceal their thefts, by combining many dissimilar things as a smokescreen—selectively adding a little more here and there—to conceal the fact that their original core of ideas are stolen In their greed and haste, they miss the point entirely, which is the CIA's intent, since "misinformational reverse-engineering" is realty what the CIA wants UFOlogists to do, to create confusion where before there might have been clarity.

The CIA-inspired books are obvious attempts to confuse and use shallow minds, to avoid the rational and clear thinking required to understand the subject at hand Brilliant intuitions are just not the province of hackneyed CIA dupe writers. It must be very frustrating to be one of them, knowing that whatever acclaim they might be 'allowed' to achieve by their bosses, is meaningless and hollow, based on "discoveries" pre-conceived by committees of CIA Ph.D.s.

There is a lot of CIA garbage out there, often purporting to be "great revelations" about such subjects as "Nikola Tesla's work", "anti-gravity", and "free energy". I have never seen so many books, pages, and words so totally devoid of originality, perceptiveness, enlightened consciousness, or any significantly real knowledge about the subjects purportedly covered. Some of these people are literary vacuum cleaners—"brain suckers"—of the ideas of others. They lack the special knowledge to comprehend the material they are purporting to deal with, so their books are little more than bundles of dissimilar ideas packed together without coordinated or integrated editorial comment or design, propagating collected-from-others, self-neutralizing concepts, often claiming that "the author discovered" or "the book reveals" this or that, or 'exposed' something or other, which it never did anything of the sort. Not a single novel revelation or concept is placed in them by the bureaucratic committees which write them in haste. The most this trashy stuff can do for the Illuminati oil, energy, banking and transportation cartels, is to buy a little time. It makes me wonder, for example, how much time can be bought for say, $10 million in false propaganda costs (which we ultimately pay for)?

I don't believe that the public can continue to buy into these hoaxes forever, because there are many intelligent, technologically gifted and discerning people in our society, who have remained in the background, because the CIA garbage has never significantly attracted their interest. These people have held their opinions and conclusions in abeyance, until a more reasonable explanation comes forth, such as that already provided in this book.

One of the my basic concepts is how great ideas have been lost throughout history, by having fallen into the hands of evil and cunning, fraudulent sociopaths, barbarians, destructive religious fanatics, liars, charlatans, and hucksters, or in this case, coercive monopolists. One of the greatest examples of this in ancient history, was the destruction and looting of the great Library of Alexandria, now in Turkey. Had the keepers of the library not collected so much of the ancient world's greatest knowledge in one place, it could not have been destroyed there and lost to history and humanity, in one catastrophic event Given the extent to which documentation shows that ancient conspiracies have been connected to the concealment of illuminating knowledge, just as in our own time, it would not surprise me to learn that the fall of the Library at Alexandria was engineered by an ancient Mystery School cult, with the fall of the city to the Turks being either preceded by the documents being carried away to...the Vatican Library...or spirited away to the Alhambra. Perhaps that is why the medieval Moors in Spain maintained much of the lost knowledge, while the Dark Ages descended on Europe. The similar accumulation of such knowledge in the secret vaults of the national security establishments of the world today, suggests the possibility of a repeat of ancient history, which could set the human race back yet another 1500 years. Though there are some who may relish this idea, a millennium of ignorance or the black plague do not sound so enticing to me.

This book is dedicated to the idea that individuals in free society should take control of their destinies, beginning with the apprehension and use of flying saucer technology right now, in order to set the human race on its natural path, onwards and upwards to a higher level, free of Illuminati exploitation. The Illuminati cannot have it both ways. They cannot steal from us and continue to hoard secret technology to use on us, without our eventual discovery of the sham, and the use of lies to suppress advanced knowledge. Ultimately, they cannot steal my thunder without revealing their dishonesty and motives. At the risk of being a deluded optimist, I still believe that We the People will eventually prevail, that you will know the truth, and that we will all eventually be free. Until that time finally comes, "I told you so".

Graphic by Angus Lyne

THE ACHILLES HEEL OF THE ILLUMINATI:
"Ether Physics" and Flying Saucer Propulsion

Since so many of the Trilateral/IllumiNazi/Coercivists' ill-gotten gains are in the motor fuel and transportation fields (ships, autos, trucks, trains and planes), I believe the truth concerning flying saucer technology, and use of it by the public, is their "Achille's Heel". Why else would they have labored so diligently for over fifty years keeping such technology secret, ostensibly under the guise of "national security", except to perpetuate their coercive socio-economic, technological and political monopoly?

This conspiracy is illicitly, thoroughly, and often brilliantly enforced and propagated by the Office of Scientific Intelligence ("OSI", CIA), coordinated secret political police, the military, the local police, and the judiciary. The OSI takes a more "active" covert role than other government counterparts, in the dissemination of false propaganda, the creation and orchestration of "UFOlogy" and other front groups, and control of 'key' individuals through subterfuge.

The most obvious, stupid flaw in the propaganda, disseminated under cover of such T.V. series as The X-Files and Sightings, is the fact that, if all the paranormal stuff pushed by such programs were really so damned secret, why would prime-time T.V. programs try so hard to convince you it is true, or even tell you about it? Since when does government disclose, or allow the disclosure of, its biggest secrets, on prime-time, big-network T.V., which is all owned and controlled by the Illuminati, and policed by the OSI/CIA? In respect to "military secrets", what you see and think, is what they want you to see and think, they think. Unfortunately, everything on national media is under FCC control and subject to "national security" screening, to insure that "classified" information is not disclosed Each transmitter has a specially trained N.S.A. employee, in a remote room which contains a listening post and a switch to the transmitter. The job is called "transmitter watch". The employee's job is to listen, with orders to turn the transmitter off whenever anything 'prohibited' by N.S.A. guidelines is being attempted to be transmitted. I had a friend years ago who prepared for the job, after a stint in U.S. Army Intelligence communications, in Southeast Asia He really wanted the job so that he could get paid tor sitting around playing his guitar, while supposedly listening to broadcasts and checking for classified leaks or other 'no-nos'.

The OSI objective is to exclude what I call the Most Rational Alternative ("MRA")—the conspicuously missing third alternative which I have interposed between the Two Big Lies ("TBLs"), in the very narrow space in which the truth has been crushed almost to death. They carry this out by promoting the TBLs and excluding the MRA. I am expanding this third alternative, creating a Wedge of Reason, to be driven between the TBLs, to expose how the MRA has been buried, confused, ignored, excluded and obliterated by the TBLs, which are:

1. That flying saucers do not exist; and,
2. That if flying saucers do exist, they are extraterrestrial.

These two (false) options—propagated by two supposedly opposing factions—are unmistakably like an answer to a legal complaint in a lawsuit, in which the defendant first denies all allegations (a demurrer), thereby challenging those who allege the existence of flying saucers, to prove their existence. Having anticipated the plaintiff's (our) traversal of this denial, the defendant

(the OSI) enters the second false option, through "UFOlogy" groups, which is equivalent to the form of pleading known as a "confession and avoidance" (or "traversal"), which conditionally confesses to that part of the allegations alleging the existence of flying saucers, admitting that (if) they are true and exist, then the diversionary defense (the "avoidance"), traverses and moves sideways, completely off track from the original issues, by introducing the false and contemptuously frivolous idea of "aliens spacecraft". If one examines the complete past liturgy on this matter, they will see that it was the government which first introduced the "alien plea" at 1947 Roswell, as a fraudulent "dilatory pleading" intended to expand the issues into irrelevant areas, to create delay, confusion, and wasted effort, and especially to evoke a response from us. This gets us involved in a dialogue over issues which are entirely impertinent, to exhaust our energy, and in summary, to completely avoid the merits of the issues, getting us absolutely nowhere for years insofar as the real truth is concerned, just as they planned. The fact that these two options clearly show the "badges of fraud" typical of a quasi-legalistic deceit, should have long since alerted rational thinkers to their design by a single control group, the CIA, on behalf of the IllumiNazis. The reason the options bear unmistakabte similarity to legal pleadings, is because the CIA likes to hire lawyers, because the CIA thinks—as one official put it-that "...law school teaches a future employee how to think"[1]. The frivolous, impertinent, long drawn out and dilatory pleadings of the last 52 years, shows the indelible marks of "lawyers at work". And if sabotage of rational thought is your desire, by all means hire a lawyer!

The frivolous "prosecution", made on our pseudo-behalf without our consent, is joined by the ridiculous counter-allegations of the (Secret Government) "UFOlogists"—such as those regarding "advanced alien technology" and "abductions"-and the phony debate is protracted ad infinitum. Under the circumstances, these "pleadings", and all their spurious combinations and variants, are knowingly false and fraudulent, since their proponents have access to the truth, and fail to plead to the merits of the issues which they clearly seek to avoid, as a fraud upon us and the 'court of public opinion'. They also fly in the face reality, since they are inherently contradictory. There are no contradictions in reality, only confused facts and false premises. While the rules of civil procedure allow a defendant to make contradictory defenses, a knowingly false defense, entered for purposes of a sham, can be stricken by the court (of public opinion), and the defendant held in contempt.

One popular false (combination and variant of Options 1 and 2) option, posits 'terrestrial' saucers, based on "alien technology" which is so expensive and far beyond our comprehension that we should forget about it, or, since it is being shared with our government—so the story goes—we must wait until the government decides to 'share' it with us, their damned bosses. All these allegations are not only outrageous, but completely false, and people should wake up and realize that they have been hypnotized.

Options 1 and 2 are both repugnant, since any reasonable, knowledgeable person realizes that the distances to earth from the nearest habitable planets (perhaps millions of light years) is so great, that the 'alien' possibility is ruled out for frivolity, but (in the complete absence of the MRA), Option 1 is often accepted. This conclusion is fraudulently induced by the Secret

---

[1]From the text of a speech of M.B.Wood, 9th Reg. Dir. CIA, to my law class, U.T. School of Law, 1966.

Government's heinous mind-control lies. Water skiing on the dark side of the moon? Really! More Big Lies, ad infinitum. Should I laugh or puke?

The way the UFOlogy field is controlled is obvious, and my knowledge of this is buttressed by actual personal experiences. If you are "on the right track", the O.S.I. gang pretends to befriend you You naturally want to promote your material and your career, so you go along with it so long as the effects are positive. They invite you to participate in one of their "expos" as a speaker, to promote and sell your books or other materials, and to give a 'workshop'. If your stuff is still out of sync with their plan, they go to work on your mind. But if you don't abandon your stuff, or adapt it to their 'party line' and help them spread their phony shit, they blacklist you from speaking, and try to obliterate your message. They 'pick you up' and 'drop you', to coerce your adoption of their party line, so you will be asked to speak again. This only works on unethical people who have nothing valuable to say, or who are so weak and stupid that the party line looks feasible.

I: The Most Rational ALTERNATIVE

The third alternative—the "MRA"—is as follows:

3. That all saucers are real, man-made flying machines, invented and flown by human beings for over fifty years, there being no alien contacts whatsoever on earth.

This option comports with what philosophers call "Ockham's Razor" (a test which cuts between bullshit and reason). Furthermore, 1 reiterate that saucers are based on relatively simple, long-known electrical technology, consummated in the late 1930s, when technology was comparatively primitive. This alternative challenges the OSI/CIA to prove—through their agents and dupes—what it falsely asserts. They have failed to do so after over 52 years, and can be presumed to be liars and huxters (since "dupes" is reserved for civilians).

Since the OSI doesn't even want my MRA to exist, it will never be seriously or consistently argued by (their) proponents of the TBLs, who will not plagiarize me, or even risk addressing the issues. They have attempted to conglomerate some of my ideas with some of theirs, or to "steal my thunder", but the truth is not compliant to such a corruption of ideas. My alternative is immiscible with their lies, and even mentioning it would only create more self-contradietory ("repugnant") 'pleadings'. Like quicksand, the more they wallow, the lower they sink.

In my first version of SPACE ALIENS, I called the proponents of Option 1 the "Philip Klass Psychophants". I hereby dub the proponents of Option 2, the "Adamski Psyehophants". The OSI "Alien Abductions Hoax" of Whitley Strieber, Budd Hopkins, and Dr. John Mack of "Haaavad", is not a separate saucer option, but rather a part of Option 2, which is inseparable from its counterpart, Option 1, all of which are mutually repugnant OSI BIG LIES. Proponents of Options 1 and/or 2 are either.

1. Witting Secret Government agents and liars; or,
2. dupes.

Some truly innocent dupes are not stupid, just naive. Considering this, I point out the incredibly devious route the Secret Government takes to "manufacture witnesses". A case in point is a woman I later mention, Vicki Landrum, who may still believe that a NASA employee named John Schussler is her "friend". Schussler has been transferred' to the OSI, and now propagates the abductions-by-aliens scenario. Landrum thought he had been "fired" by NASA for backing her up, but this was part of a "good cop/bad cop" routine, intended to create his 'cover[1] as a 'sympathizer', in his new job with the OSI. Landrum is smart enough to figure it out. At the time Schussler sidled up to her, Landrum was in dire need of help. While pretending to help Vicki Landrum, Schussler was spying on and misleading her for NASA and the OSI, his new boss.

In order to understand all this, many need to do some self-assessment and careful examination of the facts, during the time they became unknowing tools. There are a few people who have just jumped on the 'UFOlogy' bandwagon, saying whatever it takes to sell books or establish themselves as "witnesses" or "abductees". Then there are those who were unwittingly used by the OSI, through the use of such drugs as scopolamine, chloral hydrate, sodium amytal, or even more exotic techniques and drugs, combined with hypnosis. The dupes are usually chosen by personality profile, epistemology (must be Platonist), religiousity (also Platonist), as well as possibly neurological abnormalities such as certain sleep disorders, any or all of which may render them especially vulnerable to the 'manufacturing' process. There is no guilt for having been conned

Dr. John Mack[1] sociopathically concentrates on narcoleptic patients. The "abductions" scenario came into general use around 1975 (just prior to the Travis Walton incident in Arizona), when the CIA realized their Old Big Lie program had become stagnant and needed a new, more bizarre twist. The scam incorporated new special effects, fancier props, better acting, better drugs, and more professional sets. A documentation of some of the inner workings of some of these scams was sent to me[2] in early 1994. In my first edition, I mentioned that a book had been stolen from me before I had an opportunity to read it, having forgotten its title and author, but in a phone call from author Walter Bowart, I was able to determine that it was a first edition of his Operation Mind Control, because it had a red and black cover, and was published in England The female OSI book thief had lived with Dr. Jacques Vallee for two years, and was the same woman who stole two photographs (one showing three rhesus monkies in G-suits, and the other showing a rather corny and poorly fabricated fake "flying saucer", in a hanger) which had been sent out to area newspapers by the Army Air Force Intelligence P.I.O., Walter Haut, in the initial Roswell Hoax. These photos, and my Peiltochterkompass, were sufficient physical evidence—originating with the government itself—to prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that the U. S. government had Nazi flying saucers, and had executed the Roswell Hoax to conceal their terrestrial origin, followed by the Pentagon's "Weather Balloon Hoax", designed to conceal the first (bungled) hoax.

Because of the connection between Vallee and the OSI she-thief, I had realized that the theft was engineered by the Secret Government, and now realize that the thief worked under Vallee, whose main job has always been to straddle the fence, continually vacillating between the questions, "are UFOs real?", "are UFOs illusion?", "are aliens here?", or "are UFOs secret government aircraft?" This is so they can maintain a balance between both sides of the phony debate, which does not even consider the fact that the UFOlogists and people like Vallee work for the CIA. Since my evidence could have tipped the scales completely off the balance, they had to steal it. They refer to such thefts as "retrievals".

---

[1]John E. Mack, Abduction - Human Encounters with Aliens

[2]Letter from Walter Bowart to Wm. Lyne, 1994.

For an intelligent person who has never seen a saucer, there is always the lingering possibility in the back of the rational mind, that they simply don't exist, like ghosts. Once a person has made a broad daylight, close range sighting, there is no longer any doubts as to their existence, and the person should be able to confidently proceed to solve the remaining questions, if not suckered into falling into one or the other side of the phony debate.

By the time I was eight years old (1946), I had already interviewed many reliable witnesses who had observed "flying discs" in the vicinity of Roswell (130 mi. N.W.) and Alamogordo (180 mi. W.N.W.), so I knew they existed, and had probably been brought under Operation Paperclip to Ft Bliss with Wernher von Braun and his 116 top scientists, in September, 1945, when von Braun was appointed Chief of Research, U.S. Army Ordnance[1]. In the spring of 1947, 1 had caddied for my father's first 36 holes at the Roswell Country Club, and caddied another 18 holes there a few weeks later, in a professional tournament in which he was "first runner-up", winning a new Remington electric razor, and a set of Samsonite luggage. While observing the sky while waiting between shots and putts, I saw a few dime-shaped disks glinting in the sun, but wasn't sure they were flying saucers until my 1953 close-up sighting, in which the saucer departed in a trajectory directly toward Ft. Bliss, at c. 9,000 mph.

If there was ever alien contact, I would probably have known it, and if anyone has proof, here I am baby! Just hit me with the evidence (and I don't mean a bunch of government documents, or pseudo-interpretations of ancient Sumerian clay tablets)! I have been waiting a long time, and I'm still waiting, but I don't expect proof this late in the game, especially since I know any "proof would be a fabrication of the OSI "MYTH FACTORY". If this statement seems blunt, I have no apology, and my feelings won't be hurt if you continue to insist on the Ridiculous Big Lies—that there are aliens from outer space, manipulating the human race—since I know these "aliens" are really Pentagon-created delusions, and that those of you who really think you believe the alien stuff have been made jackasses of by the OSI. Feel your ears growing longer? It is impossible to "believe" a lie. Why? Because, in order to "believe" something, one must have some "means by which they know it to be true". Since a lie is untrue, the means is non-existent, and what is purported to be the means, is first a lie to oneself, an agreement with the self to believe a lie.

To the witting agents out there: How does it feel to be a traitor to your people, who conceals technology which would improve the quality of your life and that of your children, and ultimately extend human life on this earth? How does it feel to be the pawn of a warmongering gang of mass murderers?

---

[1]Current Biography. 1952: New York Herald Tribune, p 14 D 4 '46.

II: The O.S.I. Myth Factory

Many have never heard of the OSI, or are confused by the fact that there are at least three OSIs. The first one was the Office of Special Investigations, supposedly set up to investigate Nazi war crimes and criminals after WWII, and was appended to the Tribunal at Nuremberg and the U.S. Department of Justice[1]. This O.S.I, was compromised by helping to protect or conceal many war criminals through its complicity with Operation Paper Clip. The second OSI is the Office of Special Investigations, USAF, which was set up to pretend to investigate "UFO" sightings, having as its real purpose the plugging of leaks about flying saucers connected to the Air Force. The third and most important OSI is the Office of Scientific Intelligence, a branch of the CIA's Science Directorate[2], Clandestine Services, set up to gather 'strategic' scientific information, to disseminate classified 'strategic' mis-and-dis-information, and to run programs designed for such purposes, which includes fomenting domestic "UFOlogy" groups and related hoaxes. Its most important function is plugging any and all leaks regarding flying saucers, by whatever means necessary, on behalf of its IllumiNazi bosses, and to prohibit the development of such resources by private individuals. This particular OSI was and is the most secret of the three, and use of the same "OSI" tag was probably intended to maintain this secrecy by confusion. It has worked pretty well until now. Imagine a group set up to protect Nazi criminals, named the same as one set up to prosecute them. The OSS and Reinhard Gehlen's Amt VI, SS RSHA had a baby, called the CM.

I have always believed that the purpose of all three OSIs involves the Nazis and flying saucers. The first OSI not only investigated war crimes, but also insured that independent post-war investigators looking into the Nazis, did not probe into flying saucer technology, or the secret technological and political deal entered into at the war's end, between the Third Reich, the U.S. government and certain CFR/Trilateral/IllumiNazi-owned corporations, all neatly concealed under Operation Paper Clip[3].

The OSI maintains numerous teams of Ph.Ds. The procedures followed by these teams in the production of appropriate propaganda, are identical to those used in movie production or political campaigns. The scenarios for their scripts are based on the old pre-generated scenarios, as they apply to 'intelligence', gathered from the public, such as what writers like myself are saying, and the public's reactions. After evaluation of current intelligence, false propaganda counter-strategies to be used in the dissemination stage, are designed by OSI clandestine operations personnel. OSI think tanks' brainstorm on plans and proposals, to generate 'new' possibilities on the old themes which are used as 'guidelines', and some of these possibilities are incorporated in proposals. The writer teams then prepare numerous scripts, based on current strategies recommended by evaluators. Final proposals, including scripts, budget breakdowns, potential producers, production schedules, etc., are then reviewed, with approved projects advancing to the production stage. "Script writers" are chosen to 'front' the scripts, and money is provided to producers.

---

[1]Victor Marchetti and John Marks, The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence (Dell, 1980-84).

[2]John Marks, The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate". WW. Norton & Co., New York/London.

[3]1 (supra) compared to related information in Charles Higham's Trading with the Enemy (Dell, 1983).

Over the years, the OSI has created avenues into the Hollywood world and all other potential propaganda media. A review of previous Hollywood, or CBS/NBC/etc, productions, reveals that the OSI tends to use the same producers, 'writers', actors, and staff, to limit the possibility of leaks concerning their covert backing. A review of flying saucer propaganda history will show the method in their madness. Old scenarios are discarded, and new ones adopted. It is often in their interest to collect old propaganda, and to destroy it, so hang on to all the stuff you have, since old names, places, dates, and scenarios have a way of throwing a light on the present, to reveal the truth behind another Big lie. Besides, the future value of your old propaganda pieces as "collectibles" will only increase, as laughable examples in the future, of Big Brother's foiled attempts at mind-control of the public, through mass promotion of "parapsychology", the Platonist epistemology, and false "alien" and mystical science propaganda.

III: Gravity and Tesla's Work

Some of the most basic scientific facts and principles are being concealed and misrepresented, beginning in kindergarten, so we must each re-examine nature, and question all theories, in order to identify and reject scientific lies and omissions, and to rediscover and propagate "true science". About 1937, "science" and space propulsion became really schizophrenic. While Wernher von Braun ostensibly developed rockets, he covertly developed secret Illuminati flying saucers; while Albert Einstein's relativism and Werner Heisenberg's "uncertainty principle" were being publicized, the 'ether physics' of Nikola Tesla and others was being ridiculed, yet was secretly being used for saucer propulsion and wonder weapons so highly classified that they were never even intended to be used in WW II.

H. A. Lorentz had said that, by simply increasing the negative "moving" charges (orbital electrons), attached to the "stationary" nuclear charges (protons and neutrons) of atoms, that the gravitational attractive force acting on the positive charges of the nuclear mass would be completely neutralized. Add to this the constant conversion formula—which says that the electrical attractive force is 10^{39} x 2.2 times stronger than the gravitational attractive force G[1] -—by which Lorentz had suggested a scientific hypothesis for an electrical flying machine, such as that already under development by Tesla and supported by his ether propulsion discoveries.

Tesla at first conducted tests[2] (the high voltage experiments relating to the high frequency reactance between two parallel metal plates), to verify his hypothesis. His tests confirmed that at sufficiently high voltage and frequency, the "space" (containing the ether) between the plates, became what Tesla termed "solid state", verifying the existence of what I call the "Omni Matter" (A.K.A., "the ether") which behaves under sufficiently high voltage/frequency "Tesla currents", as if it is a 'continuous, electrically conductive fluid', possessing mass, inertia and momentum, which can be 'pumped', to suspend or propel the plates in space). Tesla then carried the hypothesis a step further, and concluded that an electric flying machine could be propelled by electric current and the reactance of high frequency, high voltage electromagnetic waves. This electricity would use the inertia of the 'continuous, electrically conductive fluid mass' of the Omni Matter, to be pulled and pushed against, using the Hall effect magneto hydrodynamic ("MHD") principle.

---

[1]R.L. Armstrong and J.D. King, The Electromagnetic Interaction (Prentiss-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffy N.J.

[2]T.C. Martin, The Inventions. Researches and Writings of Nikola Tesla, The Electrical Engineer, N.Y. (1894).

The ether physics of Tesla was quite different from the theories of others, and was based on astute observations and sound experimental science. In 1876, H. A. Rowland had published the results of his experiment in which a gold foil covered ebonite disk was rotated in a magnetic field, showing feat electric charges on the disk were carried around with it as it was rotated.[1] This gave rise to the catchy phrase, "An electrostatic charge carried around is a current". Rowland's student in Baltimore, Edwin H. Hall, based on his teacher's work, had done an experiment in which he had placed a gold leaf strip in which a current was flowing into a magnetic gap, producing an electromotive force at right angles to the magnetic field and the current, proportional to the product of the two.[2] This is called the "Hall Effect", and we know that it was influential on Tesla, because he mentioned it many times, because it is the basis for MHD (Magneto-Hydro-Dynamic) generators and pumping, and was used by Tesla in his electro-propulsion.

In his 1891 lecture, Tesla stated that the "enormous electrostatic forces" emanating from the earth, "rigidifies" the ether within earth's electric field, as it moves through space "like a charged metal ball" (due, as he would later say, to earth's movement through space at over 70,000 mph.). To Tesla, the ether was composed of "independent carriers", "immersed in an insulating fluid"; while this ether behaves as a solid to "heat" and "light", it behaves like a "fluid" to solid bodies, which are allowed to pass through it.[3] Furthermore, according to Tesla's analysis, a D.C. brush current could be used on the forward end of a ship, to create a "rarefaction" of, and "rapid exchange" of the carriers, which would stretch the medium and create an inducement of movement in that direction, while a high frequency alternating current would be used on the opposite, trailing end, to cause a "compression" of the carriers, which would block their passage.

According to the later researches and publishings of J. J. Thomson[4], he had mathematically developed the theory of moving tubes of force. Two years later[5], Thomson declared that "...the aether is a storehouse of mechanical momentum". Tesla, in his prior lecture[6], had mentioned the tubes of force and disclosed some of his discoveries concerning the ether and momentum

Tesla had stated that all his inventions were created in furtherance of his "electric flying machine"[7], which he had partially designed before coming to America, carefully carrying the plans under his arm when he arrived on the ship in 1883. The rest of his things were stolen on his

---

[1]H. A. Rowland, Ann. d. Phys., clviii [1876], p. 487.

[2]Edwin H. Hall, Amer. Jour. Math, ii [1879], p. 287.

[3]T.C. Martin, Supra (Chap. XXV, The Scope of the Tesla Lectures, p. 137).

[4]J. J. Thomson, Phil Mag. xxxi [1891], p. 149.

[5]J. J. Thomson, Recent Researches in Electricity and Magnetism [1893], p, 13.

[6]Nikola Tesla, Lecture Before theAIEE., Columbia College [1891],

[7]Frank Parker Stockbridge, The Tesla Turbine, The World's Work [Mar., 1912, pp. 543-48].

departure for America. Though literally penniless at the time, his step off the boat was to be worth untold $ billions to America, and he knew it

J. J. Thomson had stated in 1893 that if moving tubes of force entering a conductor are dissolved in it, mechanical momentum is given to the conductor, at right angles to the tubes and to the magnetic induction, and is proportional to the vector product of electric and magnetic forces.[1] Tesla's statement in 1891 that the use of high frequency alternating current would compress and block the passage of the tubes was apparently intended to force the tubes being drawn into the conductors of a ship by the D.C. brush at the opposite end, to dissolve in the conductors, and impart momentum to the ship to which the conductors were attached, in the direction of the brush. Tesla said he had developed his Dynamic Theory of Gravity in 1893 and 1894. He never published it, since to do so would have disclosed the secret to his electro-propulsive discoveries, which he did not want the war mongers to get. In 1942 and 1943, the FBI stole, concealed, or retrieved every known complete copy of the original theory. The theory can be pieced together only from bits and pieces, such as collateral references, in still-available sources. I will give the basic tenets of the theory in this book.

In 1915, in an unpublished statement[2], Tesla related his discovery, while in technical school in Graz, Austria, of "...a flying machine quite unlike the present ones...", "...devoid of sustaining planes, ailerons, propellers and other external attachments, which will be capable of immense speeds...", "...sustained and propelled entirely by reaction...", "...which will be controlled mechanically or by wireless energy". Tesla was never involved in rocketry, so these statements clearly referred to a different sort of electric flying machine, propelled by the reactance of high frequency electromagnetic waves and electric current In 1900[3], Tesla described how movement of the control apparati could be effected, "...when they are carried by a vessel floating in the air...", by "...connection of one terminal of the receiving apparatus" to the ground, "...inductively". This pertained to how a flying saucer may be inductively ("virtually") grounded by the neutral or positive terminal of "p2". (NOTE: "p2" will be explained later in this book.)

In 1940[4], Tesla announced his Teleforce, consisting of four already tested inventions, as follows:

"(1) A means of producing rays in the free air without a vacuum;
(2) a method of producing a very great electrical force;
(3) a method of amplifying this electrical force; and
(4) a new method for producing a tremendous electrical propelling force."

---

[1]J. S. Thomson, Recent Researches in Electricity and Magnetism, [1893], p. 13.

[2]John J. O'Neill, Prodigal Genius (supra), p. 172.

[3]Patent No. 649,621, Apparatus for Transmission of Electrical Energy, lines 65-70.

[4]William L. Laurence, New York Times [Sept. 22,1940].

(NOTICE: Number (4) above stated "propelling" force, rather than "repelling" force such as some UFQlogy/CIA misinformants would have you believe, and also note that all four of these inventions were already tested at the time, rather than just the first two, as the CIA would also like for you to believe. In a Dec. 8, 1915 article in the New York Times, Tesla had brought up the same electrical propulsion system—except with a generator on the ground supplying electrical energy to an airborne ship via beam—which he said would travel over a million miles per hour (perhaps its potential velocity in outer space, as this seems exaggerated.)

To show you how insidious the misinformers are, and how easy it is for them to dupe sensation-addicts', there have been several recent instances where the misinfoirnation regarding the four above listed inventions, from the original 1940 New York Times article, has been misstated in a sly and oblique way that few would suspect, right under the noses of the "Tesla experts". The four inventions were already tested at the time, and (4) was indisputably a propelling force. Anyone who ran down the original article to examine it as I did, would know that

Among the several places I have discovered this misrepresentation, was a so-called "patent" on HAARP (High Frequency Active Auroral Research Program). The only purpose for such a fraudulent misrepresentation would be for the explicit purpose of misrepresenting the original Tesla material, to those studying Tesla's work, because it represented one of the few 'unretrieved' leaks of Tesla's discovery of the flying saucer propulsion system. The patent[1] is now held by Arco Power Technologies, Inc., under which they purportedly perform "top secret" tests tor the government, from the North Slope of Alaska The patent is allegedly one of three patents previously locked up under a Navy security order. To begin with, patents are not issued on inventions primary to secret projects. Whatever the real purpose of the HAARP project, you can bet your booties it isn't what they say it is. Secondly, the real purpose of planting the false particulars in a 'patent' which should never have been issued, is so that the misinformation would end up in publications read by 'alternative researchers', to obscure and misrepresent Tesla's discovery of the ether propulsion system used on flying saucers. And who is ARCO? ARCO (Atlantic Richfield Oil Company) was created by Trilateral Commission/Council on Foreign Relations member Robert O. Anderson, of Roswell, New Mexico, the creator of Diamond A Cattle Company, the largest holding company in North America, which owns all known oil shale deposits in North America, and almost all mineral rights in the North Slope of Alaska. Anderson was also, at the time the second edition of this book was published, the President of the Bilderburgers, about which I will have more to say later.

Early on, during the 'fuel crisis' of 1974, Arco moved to garner a monopoly on solar and alternate energy resources, apparently based on a fear that the reactionary alternate energy movement could cut seriously into future fossil fuel profits. The misinformation placed in the 'patent', was repeated[2] just precisely where it shouldn't have been, but just precisely where the Secret Government wanted it Once something like this gets started, where does it stop? Those who should have known better, did nothing to stop it. Where the ball goes, nobody knows. We cannot allow this Trilateralist misrepresentation of Tesla's work to go unchallenged.

---

[1]No. 4,686,605, issued to Barnard J. Eastlund, Spring, TeKas, 1983.

[2]NEXUS MAGAZINE, April-May 1995; EXTRAORDINARY SCIENCE, Jan-Feb-Mar, 1995 (official magazine of International Tesla Society, article by Dr. Nick Begich, New Uses of Tesla Technologies for global Control).

If we search the early inventions of Tesla (the later ones are concealed by the government) it appears that along with the Tesla coil, there were several related inventions such as generators and a marvelous turbine, intended to provide a compact and portable means for the generation of power needed on the flying machine---a "prime mover of sufficient activty"--invented to supply electrical current for the coil, as the fundamental device to increase the moving negative charges. This also explains Tesla's fascination for such a low weight-to-power in his turbine, using the motto, "20 Horsepower Per Pound", on the masthead for the "Tesla Propulsion Company". By "propulsion", Tesla included ether propulsion.

IV: Dealing with "Equal and Opposite" Forces

If the Tesla transmitter produced negative pulses which "preponderated" over the opposite pole of "p2", the question as to whether the "equal and opposite" forces would propel the saucer, depended on several things. Since the electrical attractive force is so much stronger than the G force, it would be conservative to conclude that a small amount of electrical power would be sufficient to propel a relatively large mass through space at an astounding speed, relying on the fact that all mass has excessive positive charge, and that the ether has sufficient positive charges and rigidity to provide something for an electric flying machine to "pull against", as it accelerated in a particular direction. This electrical attractive force is thousands of zillions of times stronger than the gravity force which pulls it toward the ground! Great care would be required in designing the shape of the flying machine's surface, since it might cause the acceleration of objects toward itself, as well as itself toward them. By use of a concave parabolic shape, tor example, the electric force would be focused at the center of its radius, at a particular distance from the inwardly curved surface. On a machine of large mass, this shape could cause a smaller object to be jerked toward it with fantastic force. It could literally jerk a person's head off, were it located at the focal point of the parabola If, on the other hand, one wanted only to "beam up Scotty", a carefully controlled, weaker force could be exerted with a small, parabolic dish of slight curve, pointed downward, in or on the bottom of the machine as it hovered, to pull an object (or person, or young bull), up into the machine.

An appropriately designed flying machine should have a reminded, gradually curved surface, to prevent the leakage of charges into the atmosphere as much as practicable, as well as to insure that the electric force would be dispersed and radiated outward over a broad area, so as to avoid focusing the force, and to diffuse it over a greater volume of space, containing greater mass (of atmospheric gasses, distant bodies, and the polarized, 'solid state', Omni Matter), so the smaller mass of the machine is, attracted forward or upward, with as little disturbance of atmospheric mass as possible. This was the reason for the many Tesla experiments with rounded conductor surfaces, his concern with atmospheric science, and his care to see that the elevated dome-shaped conductor for his Wardenclyffe Tower project was always positively charged (since a shot of negative pulses might have jerked it off its supporting foundation).

There are so many rounded surfaces in Tesla's designs, that it gave me cause to wonder why Margaret Cheney, in her Tesla biography, Tesla: Man Out of Time1, using a passe', post-mortem Freudian psychoanalytic technique, alleged that Tesla had a near psychotic phobia of "rounded surfaces", evidenced by his revulsion and fear of pearls, based on an underlying "fear of the female breast". This hypothesis seemed belabored and misplaced, since Tesla's dislike for pearls appeared to be the result of his well-known phobia of germs, since pearls are essentially the result of a type of 'infection' in oysters. Could this sloppily surmised "phobia of rounded surfaces" be an O.S.I-designed ruse to lead us away from one of the fundarnental ideas of Tesla's flying saucer? Did Tesla realty have an irrational fear of "the female breast" and "all breast-like shapes" ("flying saucers"), as Margaret Cheney said?

Quite to the contrary, many of Tesla's inventions are a glory to the breast, and a display of his apparati looked like a veritable garden of breasts, to be sure. Howard Hughes certainly had nothing on Tesla in this respect. The final design tor his (originally "titty-like") Wardenclyffe Tower electrode, multiplied the titty motif literally hundreds of times, in different sizes! It looked sort of like a giant donut covered with bras. There is an unmistakable similarity between the Wardenclyffe Tower electrode, and early German saucers, presumably reflecting Tesla's original designs, which could just as well have been called "Flying Titties". "UFOlogists might have been called "Boobologists". Is the female breast shape the most perfect flying saucer shape? I have to conclude that I think Tesla loved the female breast, and other such shapes. I won't dwell further on this lovely issue; I should have made my point, so now I'll cut to the chase.

When Tesla died in 1943, few noted that a great scientist and inventor had died It was as if he had scarcely lived, and that his only contributions were A.C. current generators, distribution systems, and motors. Before what I call my 'Tesla Revival", beginning around 1976, there was an obvious attempt to conceal Tesla's place in history, which I believe was because he invented the flying saucer. The national security establishment wanted to dispel private Tesla research or experimentation, since the most fundamental discovery associated with him-the Tesla coil—was also the fundamental discovery used to power the flying saucer. It is still against federal law to operate an unshielded spark gap and Tesla coil, or a Ford Model T coil with a spark-gap. These laws, dating from the early '40s, are still on the books, and though ostensibly enforced by the F.C.C., I think they were really intended to prohibit civilian rediscovery of Tesla's' flying saucer.

Tesla was irritated by Albert Einstein and his theories, and considered himself greater than Einstein. Why? The following comparison may answer this question:

V: A Comparison of Gravitational and Electrical Force,

As Applied to Flying Saucer Propulsion

The electrical attractive force is 1039 x 2,2 times stronger than the gravitational attractive force G. This equation is a constant, for converting from the gravitation to the electrical attractive force.

---

[1]Margaret Cheney, Tesla: Man Out of Time [1981], Prentiss-HalL

Example: 1,000 ft. -lbs. of mechanical energy are required to lift a 1,000 lb. flying saucer to a height of 1 ft. above the ground. This is 1,356 joules (1 ft.lb.=1.356 joules). Divide this by the above constant, to show that only a tiny electrical force will do more work than a 'conventional' mechanical force, such as that produced by rockets or propellers.

This is true for work is done by a constant vertical force F, and motion in a straight vertical line in the direction of the force. The work done on a body is defined as the magnitude of the force, times the distance d through which the body moves. Inversely, the power produced by the constant gravitational force G, acting to move a 1,000 lb. flying saucer from a point 1 ft. above ground, to the ground, would be 1,000 ft.-lbs. (= 1,356 joules, the same equivalent work required to pick the saucer up, against the constant vertical G force, to the 1 ft. height). Since the magnitude of electrical attractive force is the G force times the conversion constant, and the work performed on a body equals the force times distance, then:

W=fd,or Work = (10^{39}x 2.2x 1,356 joules) x 1 ft.,or W= 40,492,781,690,140,845,070,422,535,211,091,549,295.77 miles.

The above calculation would be true if the G force remained constant for that distance above earth, so it would be much greater, since there would be no gravity to overcome once the saucer was outside the earth's gravitational field. The work done by conventional energy, when converted in this manner, should theoretically do 10^{39} x 22 times more work, though in practice, there are inevitable losses, such as corona leakage and electrical resistance reflected as dissipated heat, etc, in the application of power (which, to be conservative, might amount to as much as 30%). In view of the vast increase in work, such losses are insignificant. This phenomenon is one of the fantastic tricks of nature which can be utilized through science, and its discovery by Tesla in the flying saucer, is definitely the greatest invention I know of. No wonder Tesla considered himself greater than Einstein! After all, the saucer is certainly more important than the atom bomb, though Einstein didn't invent the bomb, or anything else, for that matter, to my knowledge, other than Big Lie Illuminist Physics. On a positive note, what Einstein did invent, however, were many very sweet and 'profound' platitudes and anecdotes involving the archetypical "eccentric, genius, absent-minded professor."

VI: Momentum and Applied Force

Simply put, momentum is equal to the overall force required to produce a particular increase or decrease in the velocity of a particular body. The rate of change of momentum is also equal to the applied force. Since an applied electromagnetic force is so much stronger than an 'apllied' gravitational force, the rate of change of momentum is also that much greater.

The force applied from a saucer, toward the ether in space, is emanated outward from a curved, convex surface of certain area, and directed toward a much greater area of space, containing an ether which is rigidified by the enormous, rapidly varying electrostatic forces emitted from the earth, which as Tesla said caused the ether to assert its "inertia-resistance". In addition, there are atoms and molecules of matter such as gasses and water droplets which presents more of a problem than a solution. The total reaction between the saucer and the combined rigidified etheric fluid and carriers (Omni Matter) is apparently more considerable than one would think. This is partly brought about by the saucer's shape, which determines how the force is distributed.

Though the saucer is a compact, more solid mass than the atmospheric gases and ether, the saucer is pulled at a high rate of acceleration. The real work done on the Omni Matter is apparently the result of the propulsive force created by the D.C. brush, as it eats up the tubes of force, which are forced to dissolve in the conductors by the high frequency blocking current at the ship's opposite end. The convex surface directs the force outward along lines which are perpendicular to the curved saucer surface. As the lines of force extend outward, they grow further and further apart, to affect a greater total volume of space and Omni Matter. Considering the density of vacuum space and the magnitude of the force, the interactance by astounding propulsion of a ship by the much stronger electromagnetic force, is the "equal and opposite reaction".

The etheric fluid and carriers in front of the saucer are 'stretched', creating a low pressure (ratified ether) 'cone', as the charges also cause the atmospheric gases to become mutually repellant According to Tesla, "...on the assumption that the independent carriers are of any configuration such that the fluid resistance to motion in one direction is greater than in another, a stress of that nature would cause the carriers to arrange themselves in groups, since they would turn to each other their sides of the greatest electrical density, in which position the fluid resistance to approach would be smaller than to receding."[1] Tesla has described how the elastic force of the stretched ether has made movement in that direction easier. As the saucer accelerates to perhaps 9,000 mph., the shock wave is dampened by the low pressure cone, thus eliminating a potential sonic boom, as the gasses gradually return to plenum as the corona trail dissipates. The saucer's negative ion path and ejectment of mutually repulsive Omni Matter to its aft, causes the low pressure gasses also to be mutually repulsive, preventing them from 'clapping' back together so quickly, such as with the booms and cracks caused by lightning bolts and thunder.

The saucer I witnessed in 1953 went from almost overhead, to infinity, in three seconds. It was between 35 and 50 feet in diameter. A rough calculation would be 9,000 mph., with no sonic boom or other sound, based on my being able to see it at 7.5 miles distance.

VII: Energy and Time

Neither energy nor time exist, since these are only fictions or concepts we have created, to measure, calculate or predict certain functions and reactions in and between space, matter, light, "zero-point radiation", "zero-point ultra fine matter", and cruder "atomic matter" (which may be only a concentrated assemblage of the latter). In 1963, I dubbed the ultra fine zero-point matter, "Omni Matter", saying it is the source of all atomic matter. This comports with Tesla's ether. "Electrical content" and electromagnetic force, in their most finite forms (ultra fine Omni Matter and zero-point radiation in space) are very closely related to light (both visible and invisible). It has been said that this made Einstein and other Illuminists very happy, since it appeared to bring physics and cosmology into consistency with their Kabbalistic, existentialist, Illuminist, Hermetic philosophy and religion. Time is a concept describing the rate at which events in the universe occur. Since one cannot "travel" in a "concept" (which describes a "rate"), it should have been obvious that "time travel" is a physical impossibility, if not an epistemological and metaphysical blunder. The shadows on a cave's walls can deceive those who are content to sit and watch shadows, rather roan to venture beyond the cave, to discover the true nature of reality outside that little womb of false security.

---

[1]T.C. Martin, Inventions, Researches and Writings of Nicola Tesla, 1894, Chapter XXV - Introduction - The Scope, of the Tesla Lectures.

'Objective reality', in the purely physical sense, may consist primarily of electric magnetic force and ultra fine neutral particles, which in turn, compose all atomic mass. Since 'gravity' is the result of electrostatic imbalances to the exuilibrium existing between 'atomic' matter and ether-filled space, rigidified by the effect of rapidly varying electrostatic disturbances, in the space within the proximity of a gravitational body's electric field, a "super-gravity" force can be synthesized by creating an electric field stress which creates an even greater, overpowering disturbance to the equilibrium, which can only be restored by movernent of a body so affected, until its position satisfies the 'equal and opposite reaction' rule. The movement of the saucer satisfies the imbalance created by the gobbling up and dissolution of the unidirectional tubes of force, which imparts momentum to the saucer, along the axis of polarity of the tubes force, in satisfaction of the 'need' created

This line of thinking seems to indicate how Tesla considered so-called "nuclear reactions"...electromagnetic reactions which produce powerful, very high frequency disturbances in the zero point "natural media", which react with atomic matter. These reactions are deemed 'stronger' than normal electromagnetic ones, since their disturbances are of such high force (voltage) levels, and of such high frequencies, as to react strongly (resonantly), with other atomic matter, sometimes to the "critical mass" stage of transmutation, such as that associated with thermonuclear explosions or implosions.

Meanwhile, the "zero-point radiation" ("ZPR") and Omni Matter interact at much higher force levels, yet to be fully measured. The spaces between the nuclear parts of atomic matter are comparatively so large, and the Omni Particles so small, in relation to the average amplitude of the ZPR, that the transference of force takes place right through solid matter, carried by the Onmi Particles, as if atomic mass isn't even there. The use of the term "zero-point" is generally used to describe a system which is in equilibrium According to physicist J. A. Wheeler1, the density of "zero-point energy" in vacuum-space is 1094 gram/cm3. (Note; This is purportedly the density of a cubic centimeter, and if correct, translates into humongous potential energy, right in the space at the tip of your nose.) I view "energy" purely as a potential, rather than something having an actual physical existence, as asserted by Einstein. I think Wheeler did likewise, since his measurement applied to the energy of "zero point radiation", not to the Relativist concept, "zero point energy".

Since I also am an adherent to the wave theory of light (rather than the "corpuscular" theory, or a contradictory combination of the two), I refer to the "omnidirectionally interpenetrating radiation" contained in "equilibrated" space, not as "zero-point energy" ("ZPE"), but rather "zero-point radiation" ("ZPR"). I also believe all space is saturated with ultra fine (normally) neutral matter (which also permeates all atomic matter). I refer to this as "Omni Matter"; This matter is activated by electromagnetic radiation which is not in equilibrium, transmitting its forces through Omni Matter/space until it is absorbed by some 'atomic' matter or body. Likewise, the

---

[1] A. Wheeler, Geometrodynamics, Academic Press [1962].

ZPR is able to interpenetrate almost all mass, because at such high frequencies, its tiny wavelength passes between atoms without resonating with or reacting with them There is an exception. According to Tesla, so-called "radioactive" elements reacting to the ZPR (are "...targets" continuously bombarded by "infinitesimal bullets projected from all parts of the universe", without which "all radioactivity would cease"[1]), which is the actual source of the radiation produced by them. There's something to think about: What is the nature of the structure or status of 'radioactive' elements, which allows them to react energetically with the ZPR?

It is my belief that during a body's movement through the space surrounding our earth, the independent carriers—the Omni Matter—, possessing independent 'tubes of force', are unified, creating continuously extended tubes of electric and magnetic force, which I call "micro-helices", swirling in parallel, tubular pathways through the body. A resistance (called "inertia") is experienced by a body, against the force of movement, with a polarity of movement, as acceleration progresses. There is a buildup of momentum (due to the very same mechanism as inertia). The inertia-resistance/momentum-perpetuation is encountered only with an increase or decrease in velocity, forcing the stubborn micro-helices into a different pitch (angle of turns) and frequency (turns per distance) of swirling electromagnetism, for each different velocity. There is no friction at a constant velocity, at which the ether "gives back" what it "takes".

As proof of this concept, the process can be reversed. By placing some paraffin in a "triax box", with a magnetic field of 10,000 gauss, the atoms of the medium are magnetically aligned, or 'polarized'. A high frequency electromagnetic field at 90 degrees, tuned to the nuclear magnetic resonance ("NMR") frequency of hydrogen...42.6 MHz..., excites the medium. This permits the hydrogen to react with the ZPR, to produce a (radioactive) beam of gamma radiation, which is far above the frequency one should expect from hydrogen. One can produce an output of electromagnetic radiation, magnetism, electric current, or "electromagnetic momentum", depending on the particular arrangement used and output preferred. With a hovering saucer, the electric field is externalized, with a current passing radially from the top center, across the predominantly horizontal area, and down the sides of the ship. A magnetic field automatically appears at 90 degrees to the electric field, and mass propulsion occurs on the third (vertical) axis, as utilized in Hall effect pumps. The downwardly directed beams of radiation seen on flying saucers may be due to the production of temporary radioactive isotopes of extremely short half lives, which emit photons as they return to their ground states.

Since a permanent magnet is composed of a medium (iron, usually) which has been magnetically aligned or polarized, some of the interpenetrating ZPR is arrested and separated into electric and magnetic components, and converted into magnetic flux, which is really a kind of "radioactivity". The ZPR is the driving force behind this flux, which is strongest when aligned with the earth's magnetic field, which in turn has polarized and converted some of the ZPR near or in the earth. The force of the flux will in turn separate moving positive and negative electric charges, more or less as the reciprocal of the mechanism by which the force of the ZPR has been diverted to create the magnetic flux. A permanent magnet can also be thought of as a "magnetic flux superconductor", which like an ultra high frequency antenna, receives the ZPR and produces a magnetic flux.

---

[1]Nikola Tesla, Letter, New York Times [Feb. 6, 1932], p. 16, col. 8.

Use of permanent magnets by Tesla, across a spark gap discharge, was intended to use the Hall Effect to break the discharge, by separating the positive and negative charges, in order to produce a more perfect sine wave. Inadvertently, Tesla discovered that electric spark discharges in air, ignite and combust atmospheric oxygen and nitrogen, producing 12-million-volt waves. The oxygen and nitrogen, both, below atomic number 19, are thereby transmuted into alpha and beta charges (stripped helium nuclei with +2 charge ea., and electrons with -1 charges ea) by the powerful radiation produced, having a voltage potential of 12 Mev. Since this is almost three times the Mev level of gamma radiation emitted by radium, it is certainly sufficient to explain the claims of Tesla, as traditional contemporary physics cannot explain such high voltages or radiation.

In an ancient application of this same principle, there were ceremonies carried out in the underground kivas of American Indian tribes in the southwest. Small, white, hand-held, rounded quartz boulders (around 2 lbs. ea.), were held in pairs, by each of a circle of men, and struck together in the dark, to produce powerful electric spark discharges. Such rocks were called "thunder stones" by the Southwestern Indians. You may notice some similarity to the Norse myth of Thor ("Hare", meaning Osiris), with his hammer. This similarity was not coincidental, since the Indians called the Great White Hare Waban, an incarnation of the eastern dawn that brings light[1] (which comports with the Norse Odin and Saxon Wotam, literally meaning "east dawn "). The spark discharges produce bright light, and when many are simultaneously struck together, it is enough to light up the kiva, just as the Zuni ("Sun-of-Nu") Ahayuda' ("East-Hare (of) Light[ning]") was thought to do. The Zuni war god can only be carved from the trunk of a cottonwood tree which has been struck by lightning, and a lightning bolt is displayed on the carvings. The same thing holds true for the Assyrian ("East-Hare-People" or "Aryan") Ahuramazda ("East-Hare-of-Good-Light"), the carvings of which also display lightning bolts. During these southwestern Indian ceremonies, the unmistakable smell of ozone fills the air, and perhaps the "laughing gas" produced by the sparks, which ignite oxygen and nitrogen and form nitrogen oxide, makes one giddy, euphoric, and intoxicated..

VIII: Thor's Model T Coil

In my 1979 search for scientific salvage, I found a Peiltochterkompass (German, for "Polar-Slave-Compass"), in a pile of salvage from Sandia Base, in Albuquerque, which turned out to be classified salvage sold to a private dealer, who had bought the stuff without knowledge that the government employee had stolen it from a classified salvage heap at Sandia Base, then sold it for his own profit. The device was part of the celestial or inertial guidance system developed by the Germans in 1943, for navigational use on the Kreisel Teller (German tor "Gyrating-Plate"), more popularly known as the "flying saucer". Also in that pile of classified salvage, was an old Ford Model T ignition coil (an invention of Tesla), along with a couple of the kind of ignition coils used in chemistry labs. In retrospect, I have decided that the Peiltochterkompass and other items may have been clues placed there intentionally, and that perhaps someone expected me to interpret their use. I have a hunch as to who that "someone" may have been—perhaps an old friend from long ago—but I won't dare to mention the name here. The ignition coils suggested ignition of the two or more chemical components—such as oxygen and nitrogen—to create a nuclear/electromagnetic reaction from elements commonly existing in the atmosphere. The Model T coil is an interesting gadget, since it contains a Tesla coil, combined with capacitor and a 'Faraday buzzer', which converts D.C, current from the battery into high voltage negative pulses. The Faraday buzzer was a substitute for a spark gap. All feat is needed for operation is a battery. Tesla may have powered his prototype flying saucer with a battery powered Model T coil, and may in fact have originally developed the Model T coil for that specific purpose. Tesla would often invent a particular gadget for his saucer, then 'turn it around' and market it for ready cash when needed, in uses more adaptable to fee relatively archaic technology of the contemporary market place of his day.

---

[1]Iron Thunderhorse, The Mysterious Dawnlanders, ANCIENT AMERICAN [July/Aug,, Sept/Oct, 1997], Issue #19/20

In 1948, when I was ten years old, I belonged to a 'ham' radio club. I built a ham transceiver and had my Morse code up to speed for the qualification test, but was disappointed to learn that, at that time, under federal law, I could not take the test or operate my transceiver until I was 16. Consequently, a more startling fact I discovered, was the federal law prohibiting use of a Model T coil with a spark gap. The law appeared to come into existence contemporaneously to flying saucer technology, and the coil produces a series of negative pulses. The conversion formula indicates that it might be adequate to propel a small, man-carrying saucer, such as the early electrical prototypes in which Tesla ventured out of his New York City hotel window at night, making nocturnal excursions over the city in a machine he called his "flivver" machine, which was described as being about the size of a "gas stove"1. This astonishing scenario must have been what scared the hell out of the oil companies . Most researchers have erroneously associated Tesla's "flivver" machine to the VTOL-type airplane which he patented in 1928.

When we observe a hovering saucer on a windless day or night, a large electrical flame is often apparent, spreading around the saucer, and growing in size the longer fee saucer remains in one spot. This is because the initial high voltage 'leaders'—like electrical spider webs—begin to break away from the saucer's surface, ionizing and igniting oxygen-nitrogen combustion in the atmospheric gasses. Many observers mistakenly believe that the these 'lights' must represent electrical losses from the saucer power system, but this is inaccurate, since the saucers' electric discharges are only the "matches', which ignite the gasses, which in turn burn so brightly. On windy nights, saucers hovering high in the sky flicker like candles in the wind, from the action of the wind periodically blowing the corona flames around on the hull. In a quiet and windless sky, the saucers may hover with a steadier, brighter glow, which is similar in appearance to, but distinguishable from a star, by a skilled observer. All the visible phenomena of saucers are consistent wife this analysis.

IX: Work and Energy

The saucer propulsion system appears to operate "over unity", as a "free energy" device. The "Law of Conservation of Energy" is said to be "violated" by a device which operates "over unity", but this interpretation is false when properly analyzed, especially when considered in the light of devices which utilize fuels or forces already existing in ambient reality, to perform work. In fact, all energy processes are ultimately derived from "ZPR", but the great majority of ordinary processes used in the 'archaic technology' forced on us by the coercive monopolists, waste so much energy that they operate well below unity. The false interpretation of the law of conservation of energy becomes obvious, when going from weak gravitational to stronger electric and electromagnetic, or even nuclear reactions. The question seems to hinge on a definition of "fuel", its origin, and in what form does the fuel for a particular reaction enter into an event. There are several forms of 'fuel' which appear to have been intentionally obscured. Just exactly how does a permanent magnet remain "energized", without any obvious fuel or "input energy"? Formal physics plays with words, accepting certain definitions of "energy", then canceling those definitions selectively in the case of such things as magnets.

---

[1]Microfilm letter, Nikola Tesla to Westinghouse Co., July 7, 1912, Library of Congress.

Energy is defined as "...the ability to do work", and the accepted formula is that "work equals force times distance". We know that a stronger force will do a greater amount of work on a body over a given period of time, than a weaker force will. The "law" is not violated, where one converts a weaker force into a stronger one, and does a great deal more work, even though there are usually losses in conversions, and even though no more 'conventional' energy is added to the process. A powerful rare earth magnet will do more work than a conventional iron one, especially since the electric field required to cancel such a strong field is much greater, and this will be a measure of the output.

Fools will immediately blabber that "...this is impossible, because it violates the law of conservation of energy", and that there is a 'difference' between "force" and "energy". Really? Then why do they fail to delineate just exactly what that alleged 'difference' is, and how the 'force' of a magnet is any different than any other force which does work? They are fundamentally wrong in this case. In 1963, a physics professor told me that a magnet "did no work" when it pulled a steel ball across a table top. The force moved a body (the ball) over a distance. The work performed, measurable in standard units of "energy", conformed to an accepted definition of "energy", the same one used by the physics professor in class. I rejected the tortured route of false reasoning intended to counteract my statement of the above, and the physics professor was exasperated.

A weaker force—the alleged 'gravity' force between the iron in the magnet, and the steel ball—would not have pulled the ball across the table top. The weaker G force was dominated by the stronger magnetic force. Gravity also does work (remember Niagra Falls?). There are large discrepancies in supposed applications of the "laws of physics", yet it is generally agreed that "energy can be neither created nor destroyed, but only changed in its form". This statement is completely consistent to the "free energy hypothesis". We know that ZPR exists in a volume of vacuumized space, also filled with ether, otherwise a vacuum tube would not allow discharges. This applies to the space all around us here on earth, together with around 26 atmospheric gasses. We have the gasses and atomic matter, in addition to naturally existing ZPR and Omni matter, to work with, requiring only that we use appropriate means to simply convert the weaker forces to the stronger ones, rendering them "usable". In reiteration, we only need to polarize the radiant effects and separate and extract heat, other radiation, pressure changes, electric content, or magnetism, to do work. As a "magnetic flux superconductor", a common magnet most likely collects the ZPR in something like a 'reversed' K-capture phenomenon, and converts it to magnetic flux.

The use of permanent magnets to produce electricity in 'over unity' devices, has not yet realty come into its own. The (Hans) Coler "Stromerzeuger"[1] (a "magnetic flux device", developed 1926-45) was a step in the right direction, and might have produced enough electricity to power a saucer, since the conversion constant shows a small current should suffice. It was not taken under development by O.K.M. until Jan. 4, 1943, too late for the Kreiselleller-p2 Projekt, which appeared to use a helium reactor, and the German saucers had been flying since as early as 1936.

Atoms of iron are a 'medium' which have a peculiar capacity to capture and convert ZPR into magnetic flux, which is always a secondary product of current. This means a magnet polarizes and unifies the tubes of force associated with the independent ether carriers. In the manufacture or formation of magnets—either in industry or in nature—the atoms (or molecules) of very hot or molten iron, which are in a state of flux, are aligned by an external magnetic field or electric current, whereupon the atoms are cooled and 'frozen' in aligned state, in a semi-permanent population inversion. Since the magnetic field remains when the external electric or magnetic field is removed, a magnet exists in an unbalanced relationship, 'needing' an electric field or current to accompany it. This imbalance continues because the magnet apprehends the magnetic portion of the ZPR, exposing its electrical portion, disturbing its equilibrium, wherever magnetic flux permeates. By alternating a magnetic field perpendicular to a pole-piece, or alternating an electrical current at right angles to a pole piece, an iron core will oscillate magnetically, producing rising, saturating, falling, and reversing magnetic flux which may then be used to create alternating current in inductance windings. The potential for these processes to operate ova unity is not generally understood or accepted, though there are numerous ways to operate electric and magnetic devices in ways violative of the law of conservation of energy, according to the version misinterpreted by the power cartels and their dupes in the field of science.

It stands to reason that if energy is the "ability to do work", and work equals "force over distance", that energy equals "force over time". These distinctions have been obliterated and concealed by the Illuminati, which has taught us to view energy as something which comes out of a gas tank and is "used up"

X: Forces and Fields

All forces create fields, and vice-versa. Some fields in nature may be unknown in specific detail. For example, we know that certain crystals can alter the frequency of radiation (the "Raman effect"), but some aspects of the process remain unexplained. Electric and magnetic fields, in relation to aligned crystalline molecular structure, are the known fields involved. Since I have not fully developed my opinions regarding crystals and sub-atomic physics, I say no more in this respect, except that crystals generally appear to be transducers of electromagnetic radiation.

Crystals are indeed fascinating and of scientific importance and interest, but have nothing to do with saucer propulsion. Beware of being side-tracked by huxters spewing slyly false OSI propaganda, designed to divert you into pseudo-scientific theories of crystals, so you will neglect your pursuit of saucer propulsion secrets. While it is conceivable that crystals could be used in some peripheral way to produce or control electrical energy to power a saucer, such as a frequency detector, they are not directly involved in producing so-called "anti-gravity propulsion", which is really an electromagnetic magnification and redirection of the so-called "gravity force". I call this "Electropulsion" or "Super Gravity" (also called "electromagnetic momentum" by J. J. Thomson).

---

[1]See Dr. Franklin Kilpatrick's Free Energy Secrets! (regarding a 1946 declassified report of Brit Intel. Objectives Sub-Committee).

Private citizens can do experiments with a minimum of equipment, with exciting prospects. It is often assumed that government/corporate scientists have already explored all possibilities, and that we would know of any important discoveries. But just think about it Patent protection lasts only 17 years. Is some corporation which has existed for over 100 years, going to disclose a discovery which will put itself out of business, liberate people from its power, and render its mineral assets practically worthless, in only 17 years, when they have already projected their future earnings from fossil fuels for at least the next 100 years? How else to guarantee perpetual oligarchic, socio-economic monopoly, acquire and hold ready-made mineral fuels and derived chemicals, while shutting off all avenues of alternative energy, chemicals, and raw materials?

The cartels will riot sit idly by while some "two-bit inventor" produces and markets a device which will demolish their business in 5 years, but will move by hook or crook to nip it in the bud. They will continue to get away with it, as they always have, unless we prevent it and break the cycle of abuse. The only way we can beat them is to make free energy inventions publically available, and pass our technology all around, so that everyone can use it. Otherwise, they will hunt down the information and destroy it, along with its authors. It is indeed ironic, that the inventor's desire to protect his discovery through secrecy, and the patent office's required secrecy, enables a corporate "stainless steal". There is no protection in the law for an inventor of such a device, so it just as well be given to everyone. As stated in Chapter I, the inventor should make a discovery public domain, to nullify any future corporate theft, and to manufacture and sell the invention, rather than go through an exhaustive patent application providing the cartels with advance notice enabling them to steal the discovery through the patent office.

Was it not the failure to reproduce and spread valuable knowledge everywhere, which was the greatest mistake of the ancient library at Alexandria? Where the greatest knowledge of the ancient world was collected and virtually concealed in one place, practically all of it was destroyed there, by religious fanatics. This destruction set human technology back about 1500 years, and paved the way for the Dark Ages, during which the only people allowed to possess, develop, or experiment with advanced scientific knowledge were the alchemists, who were exclusively employed by the ruling elite and bound by secrecy. Those who violated these boundaries were burned at the stake or impaled as witches or sorcerers. Today they are prosecuted into insanity or oblivion by the FCC. Has anything really changed? Let's change it. Spread all your secrets.

Small and non-energy-related inventions can be successfully patented and marketed without Dluminati interference, so long as they represent only a tiny fraction of the marketplace. Anything dealing with energy or transportation however, will be met with severe suppression and theft by the cartels. The typical delusion of the neophyte independent inventor, of receiving a vast fortune from such inventions, will only lead to incredible pain, after he has exhausted all his resources seeking "patent protection". It is time for us to spread all the suppressed technology we know of among the people, and to concentrate on manufacturing durable goods of high quality, just the sort of things the cartels hate. Inventors should devote their time spreading, trading and acquiring advanced, free energy technology, developing and initiating production techniques and creating facilities, as quickly as possible. We should also avoid La La Land-type pseudo-science of the type "encouraged" by the Illuminati.

---

[1]William R. Lyne, OCCULT ETHER PHYSICS: Tesla's Hidden Space Propulsion System and the Conspiracy to Conceal It [1997,1998],

Some will jeer that, if we have such technology, why aren't we using it? I've got news for these naive people. We are using it, and they are using it, but the public doesnt know it. In addition, we are paying for it, while the public service cartels pretend to be generating power with conventional technology, and are being unjustly enriched. A secret free energy system was built into our public electric utility system, by Nikola Tesla. We pay the cartels for electricity picked up 'along the way' to our houses, from the earth-ionospheric source, by the poles, and from the ZPR and Omni matter source, by the electromagnetic fields around the transmission lines. Even more current is generated by the meter on the sides of our houses (a Tesla invention which will function as a meter, a generator, or a meter and generator), depending on the particular equipment and hookups used. This secret is so well guarded that even few high ranking public service employees are aware of it.

If the kilowatt hours used in a region serviced by certain generators were accurately calculated, the total usage would probably far exceed the power produced by the generator stations. We are told by the 'experts' that energy is lost, but Tesla said otherwise. Each power pole is an antenna, having a copper grounding plate underneath it, and adds electric power from the earth-ionospheric source, to the power grid. At your house, the electric meter generates even more power, as it also reads your "consumption". With certain alterations, a Tesla electric meter can generate as much power as you consume and it can measure, perhaps even more. Differently oriented, the electric meter was originally one of Tesla's secret inventions, used as an extrernely over-unity fee energy generator, rather than a meter. I have tested this, and I know it weeks. Tesla's statement as to its potential output was so large that I won't mention it, for fear you would call him a "nut".

These inventions are based on standard free energy or ether theory. Radiation and matter exist in a state of self-restoring equilibrium in which all reactions tend to equal zero, with equilibrium being self-restored when disturbed This tendency to become restored is related to the energy potential existing in fee space, being a property of all matter and radiation. Since free universe is a perpetual motion system, energy, per se, does not exist, and all "work" is done by perpetual universal forces which exist in the environment.

Radiation does not move through space, but is the result of electrical and magnetic disturbances from stored sources emanating into the zero-point system at various points, which activate and polarize the normally neutral Omni Matter, causing transmission in chain reactions, carrying the electromagnetic oscillations from a multitude of points A, to a multitude of points B. The Omni Matter is so fine that it is capable of super-transmitting electromagnetic disturbances, from particle to particle, at all frequencies, simultaneously, in all directions, while self-restoring is own equilibrium. If we conceive of Omni Matter as tiny, identical globes composed of intertwined positive and negative bundles of electromagnetic force in equilibrium, densely packing all space like grains of sand, while ZPR simultaneously vibrates through it in all directions, it is possible to understand how equilibrium is maintained by the omnidirectipnal ZPR, and how equilibrium can be upset. The equilibrium is upset by polarization of this omnidirectional vibratory mode, and 'energy' (the exertion of force through distance) may be extracted from or injected into the Omni Matter and the ZPR, via a proper medium of exchange.

What one may perceive as "light, moving through space", is an electromagnetic fluorescent reactance of matter, as the forces excite it at particular visible frequencies related to the fluorescence-frequencies of the surface atoms of illuminated visible objects.

The trick is to disturb the equilibrium with a minimum of input, then to appropriate the 'restoring' energy, on a continuous basis. Low frequency electromagnetic forces which are transmitted into the system, are transmitted through it very efficiently. Whenever the frequency is increased until it creates disturbances in atomic matter-tending to re-establish its equilibrium—"atomic energy" may be produced. The potential for matter to be "worked upon" by electric, magnetic or nuclear force, is called "energy". Whenever a physical body is forced against another body, electromagnetic reactions, binding, attracting and repelling forces between the atoms and molecules of the bodies are stressed The object with the greater momentum usually forces the other body to move or to come apart. On the microscopic level, force is imparted electromagnetically. "Energy" is always an abstract future contingency, which has no present existence in physical form. It is not a substance, and cannot be equated with a substance, but is a property of atomic, electric, magnetic, or electromagnetic radiation and reactions, which occur under certain conditions.

In order for the equilibrated forces of ZPR and matter to be synthetically apprehended for the performance of useful work, a quantity of specially chosen matter (or 'medium') may be placed in a "triaxial box", and subjected to electric, magnetic, or electromagnetic forces (emphasizing that so-called thermal or nuclear forces are really material reactions to electromagnetic forces).

A confusion between "energy" and "force", in conjunction with a false interpretation of the law of conservation of energy by their scientific dupes, allows the Trilateralists/CFR/Illuminati to conceal free energy and Super Gravity technology secrets from us. We no longer need for them to tell us the 'secrets', because the secrets are out. We must apprehend and use this technology to throw off the parasitic CFR.

Nikola Tesla's discovery of high frequency radiation and its use in the flying saucer, was his greatest contribution to the world. An oscillating electromagnetic wave has a frequency, which is the number of "beats" per second, with which the electromagnetic force is delivered. Within a system, an increase in frequency also increases the voltage or force of each beat, yet this requires no greater power to do so. Visualize a person beating a rug with a certain force, at the rate of one stroke per second. Now visualize that person bearing the rug 10 times per second, at twice the force. Naturally, the results for a given time will be greater, yet with electromagnetic radiation, no greater power is required to deliver 20 megahertz, than 20 kilohertz, yet the force (voltage) of the former, is greater per beat, as well as the number of blows per second. It is this phenomenon which causes the power radiated by an oscillating electromagnetic dipole, to increase at the fourth power of its increase in frequency. This is called the "reactance", and it is exactly what Tesla had in mind when he announced the completion of some tests of his electromagnetic (saucer) propulsion system, in 1940, though he tested it as early as "many years" before 1912, to be specific, in 1894. I call mis system "Super Gravity". It is "public domain", because of its unpatented secret use by the government for over one year.

Tesla distinguished between six kinds of electromagnetic waves, forces, and particles in space, which are:

1. "The Ether", composed of independent carriers immersed in an insulative fluid, permeating all space and matter, and from or to which all matter is ultimately composed or decomposed;

2. "Primary Solar Rays" ("starlight"), electromagnetic waves which travel at C, generated by our sun and other stars—having frequencies far above X-ray, gamma and U.V. rays—which comport with the ZPR;

3. "Cosmic Rays", particles in space, propelled by the Primary Solar Rays (ZPR), and which, depending on the voltage of the propelling ZPR, can greately exceed C;

4. X, Gamma and U.V. electromagnetic waves, which travel at C;

5. Ordinary visible and I.R. electromagnetic waves, which travel at C;

6. Rapidly varying electrostatic force of enormous potentials, emanating from the earth and other gravitational bodies in space.

It should be noted that the ether is not "radiation" or an "energy source", but rather particles ("matter") which carry momentum, magnetism, electricity, or electromagnetic force, and which can be manipulated artificially or by nature to materialize or transmute any form of matter. Tesla did not believe in the interconversion of "matter and force" ("matter and energy"), saying "...without matter there is no force and without force there is no matter."

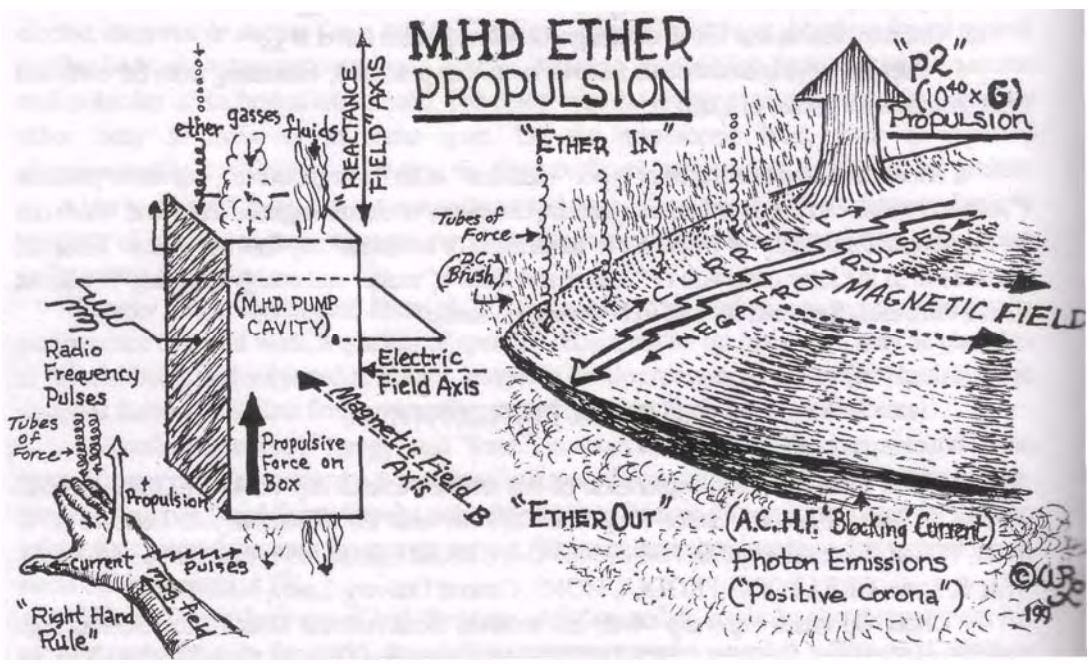
XI: OCCULT ETHER PHYSICS

For a more extensive exploration of this subject, consult my book, OCCULT ETHER PHYSICS: Tesla's Hidden Space Propulsion System, and the Conspiracy to Conceal it, © 1997, Wm. R. Lyne, $8.00, ISBN 0-9637467-2-3, (Second Edition 1998, ISBN 0-9637467-6-6), Wm R Lyne, CREATOPIA PRODUCTIONS, General Delivery, Lamy, N.M. 87540.

Under Operation Paperclip—with full authority from Admiral Doenitz, the German high command, Reinhard Gellen's Amt VI SS RSHA (including General Otto Skorzeny, whose documents bought his freedom and much more) and every German high-level technical and political authority, including Hitler—all flying saucer "documents" of Germany went into CIA (OSS) hands in 1945. All documents relating to flying saucers and some other things, including the real terms of the "surrender", since declassified, are either fake or altered, to confuse and obscure Tesla's discoveries, which I call "occult ether physics", since "occult" means "hidden".

Ether effects may be metaphorically conceived as "interdimensional", since invisible ether is incorrectly thought to be imperceptible, but inertia and momentum are perceptible in 'our' dimension, which they are part of. I use the 'other dimension' reference only because fifty years of brainwashing has obliterated human consciousness of it and many other things in reality. I present it that way to soften the initial effects of facing reality. We perceive the ether effects both physically, feeling inertia and momentum in our bodies as we move, and visually, seeing the effects on objects and life forms as they resist movement, accelerate, fall, tumble, bounce, and come to rest.

Ether physics is the most carefully concealed ultra secret technology of the Illurninati, and is the 'real' physics. The academically accepted stuff, where conflicting with true ether physics, is a cover-up for the 'real' thing. Again, the answer is right under our noses, masquerading as 'insignificant effects' or 'anomalies', such as the Hall effect, as illustrated by a magneto-hydro-dynamic pump. An electric current creates a magnetic field at right angles to itself, with polarity ascertained according to the "right hand rule". Fields each have two components. The electric (+ and -) and magnetic (N and S) fields occupy two axes. The third axis, for lack of better terminology, I call the "reactance field" (the two components of which I call "ether-in", and "ether-out"):



(NOTE: The theory 1 propose as Nikola Tesla's, is different from others known to me or patented by others, such as the "M.H.D. Propulsion Apparatus" of J.F. King, Jr. (Patent No, 3,322,374, of 5/30/67), or patents No. 3,120,363 issued to Hagen, and Nos. 2,949,550, 3,018,393, and 3,022,430 issued to Thomas Townsend Brown. These were all atmospheric "ion thrusters" or "reaction-thrusters" according to Newton's third law of motion, were feeble, and not for outer space. The King patent used AC rather than D.C. fields. These devices relied upon feeble "equal and opposite reaction forces" of the propelled masses of electrons and atmospheric ions, much like an airplane relies on pumped air. An accelerated electron will travel only about 4 cm. in the atmosphere. The ions are limited to those near the surface of me ship. No patented invention powers the "flying saucer". This (my) design pumps the ether, reaches into space and 'climbs' through it like a stationary ladder, and is unpatented because it is classified)

ALIENS38

A BRIEF HISTORY OF ETHER PHYSICS

Research in ether physics was seriously pursued from the early 17th century almost to the middle of this century, by the greatest minds in science and experimental philosophy. The following is a brief accounting of the main contributors and their theories:

Rene Descarte (1596-1650) - a. A dynamic vortex ether;

b. a theory of celestial vortices.

Johann Bernoulle (1667-1748) - Deduced Kepler's laws from Descarte's vortex theories.

Isaac Newton (1642-1727) - a. Mathematical theory of gravity;
b. corpuscular theory of light;

c. free space completely empty.

Michael Faraday (1781-1867) - Electric, elastic solid ether (Tesla's later theory based on this).

G. C. Maxwell (1831 -1897) - Ether vortex theory revived in electromagnetism field.

George Stokes (1819-1903) - Dynamic ether (reconcilable with Descarte's ether vortices).

HA. Lorentz (1853-1928) - Theory of a quiescent stationary ether (C.F. Krafft called it "stagnant" and a close forerunner to the Poincare-Einstein theory of relativity).

Michelson-Morley Experiment (1881) - Proved already weak Lorentz theory wrong, and inconclusively forced a choice between:
a. a dynamic interstellar ether ala Descartes and Stokes; or,
b. empty space without ether ala Newton and Einstein (the prevailing theory).

Nikola Tesla (1856-1943) - 1893-94 Dynamic Theory of Gravity, based on Faraday's "electric elastic solid ether", and J. J. Thomson's "Electromagnetic Momentum":
a. All bodies have electrical content, mass a product of ether swirls;
b. dynamic, elastic ether composed of independent carriers in an insulative fluid, which permeates all space and all bodies;
c. movement of bodies generates microwaves (electrostatic forces) by inductance principles;
d. microwaves rigidify the ether within a body's electric field;
e. movement of bodies through rigidified ether, containing tubes of electric and magnetic force, creates gravitational interactance.

20th Century Ether Vortex Theory - a. Hydro mechanical ether without atomic oscillators (no ordinary frictional viscosity);
b. 'idealized' quasi frictional viscosity;
c. polarity controlled without energy dissipation.

The above outline of theories shows the 'questions' of ether and gravity by no means settled, but it is my theory that a more or less complete and correct ether theory, based primarily on Tesla's theory, is possessed and used by the Secret Government, which developed and propagated Relativism to fill the void of the missing theory, in order to conceal and preserve ether physics for their exclusive use, while preventing the technology from damaging their interests under national security orders which prohibit us from using it. Otherwise, why would Tesla's 100-year-old theory still be classified? This concealment can be documented by a conspicuous lack of clarity and completeness in the use of such principles as the Hall effect to propel act only fluids, but solid masses, since it seems to apply to flying saucer propulsion. While I have found at least one group of patents for propulsion systems based on the Hall effect, the inventions inappropriately use the Hall effect only to pump air and electrons, not the ether, in a circuitous route only a few inches between electrodes. They missed the point entirely, which seemed to be the point of the patents, to discredit the Hall Effect as a viable application to propulsion.

With the Hall effect, the pulsing of electric input, rather than a steady D.C. current, increases the output.[1] This is consistent with the increase in electromagnetic reactance, at the fourth power of the increase in frequency. Tesla was therefore able to use his coil to produce "pseudo-electrostatic", D.C. pulses, which are not high frequency A.C., to produce his brush.

As determined by Nikola Tesla in his tests[2], at sufficiently high frequency and voltage, the ether ("Omni Matter") becomes "solid state", which means that it behaves similar to a solid mass under such circumstances. This obviously tended to confirm Faraday's theory of an "electric, elastic, solid ether" (solid to heat and light, but which allowed solid bodies to pass through). Tesla stressed the space between two electrified plates, in his original experiments, and also explored "unipolarity" of a single electrode or plate, as on a flying saucer surface, as it reacts with space and other matter. Tesla's tests of a saucer by 1915, tended to confirm his theory (along with the subsequent theories of J. J. Thomson and William Thomson), as it applied to electro-propulsioa The surface of a saucer draws in the tubes of force, which are dissolved in the conductor creating a propulsive force which is 10^{40} times stronger that the G-force constant, to provide the motive force. This is no more than a juxtaposition of the Hall effect as used in magneto-hydro-dynamic ("M.H.D.") generators and pumps.

Since the rigidified Omni Matter is ultra fine, it can pass into the attracting surface, carrying the tubes of force into the mass, where they are forced to dissolve by the high frequency 'blocking' current on the other end, leaving the Omni to pass through the body of the saucer and everything in it, and out the other side, with the only perceptible effects being acceleration of mass and the creation of momentum in the saucer and its contents. All physical bodies are 'saturated' with Omni Matter, and their atoms and molecules 'fly through' the Omni Matter like a flock of geese fly through the air. A better conception of what is happening with a flying saucer can be visualized by loosely analogizing it to a squid, which sucks water in one end and squirts it out the other like a jet, propelling the squid through the water, with the exception that the saucer experiences no internal turbulence or pressure. With saucer propulsion, the Omni Matter is stationary in respect to the universe, but dynamic in respect to the earth and matter of which the saucer is composed. The saucer moves through the rigidified, "meta-solid" ether permeating it, by pulling and pushing against it, by use of the Hall effect. By forcing the ether to move through the saucer, the saucer moves through it. This movement is obtained by inducing the tubes of electric and magnetic force to enter the saucer surface, then stripping them away to impart momentum to the conductive parts of the ship, as the Omni pass on through where they acquire new tubes after they exit the ship's posterior.

---

[1]Hall Effect Manual. Beckman Instruments, Inc., Helipot Division, Fullerton, California (1963).

[2]T.C. Martin (supra).

The ether carriers are exchanged through the saucer's electrified surface, behaving like a fluid mass capable of entering into the surface and passing through the saucer as it moves, leaving behind the momentum which is the product of the dissolved tubes of force, in satisfaction of the "equal and opposite' force rule. The internal contents of the saucer are not adversely affected, since it is "internally" accelerated at the same rate, in the same direction, instantly, by the dissolved tubes of force. The electromagnetic force pumps the ether which creates the tubes of force ("micro-helical tubes") through the mass of the saucer. These tubes are the source of inertia, momentum, polarity and precession, and can be turned on, off, or re-oriented instantaneously, to accelerate, decelerate, or change the saucer's direction instantaneously. The reaction between normal solid matter and the ether with its tubes, generates and gives rise to inertia/momentum, and gravitational effects. The effects of such sudden changes on objects and people inside the saucer are canceled with the re-creation of new effects inside the conductors, as the tubes of force are dissolved in them, which insulates the ship's contents from the effects of the tubes.

Normally, the individual ether carriers, possessing individual tubes of force terminating on them, create a resistance ("inertia") to changes in rate of acceleration or direction of a body. As the body is forced through space, the individual tubes of force are united, enter, and are dissolved in the moving body, tending to perpetuate its movement ("momentum") in its direction of travel, at 90 degrees to the tubes of force and the generated current, resisting changes to the state of motion The micro-helices are of approximate atomic diameter, have pitch (angle of momentum) and angular velocity (at C, which means the saucer may only move at a maximum percent of the velocity of light). At a constant velocity, the micro-helices are without friction, according to the principle I call "The Law of Conservation of Perpetual Motion", which means that, with the micro-helices in parallel motion, the mass of the body reacts with the ether and ZPR in such a way as to counteract any internal friction. This is the reason that, at a constant velocity, when the micro-helices resist changes in pitch, momentum, or polarity—analogous to inductance phenomena—there is no inertia (internal 'friction' caused by changes in orientation or pitch of the micro-helices). If the body encounters external force which acts to slow it down, the momentum of the micro-helices tends to conserve the motion, by 'screwing' each of the atoms in the 'micro-helical tubes' forward, along their polarized, parallel axes. The normal acceleration of a body through the ether creates the electromagnetic conditions originating the momentum, and which are synthesized by saucer electro-technology, in which both momentum/inertia is switched, and the saucer turned on a dime by reorienting the electromagnetic polarity and momentum.

Using the method discovered by Tesla, under special circumstances created by "p2", the potential of the ether to react as a continuous, electrically conductive, rigidified elastic fluid, is revealed, in respect to the negatively charged saucer surface and mass. The high frequency, high voltage negative pulses, carried by the saucer surface in one direction, create a magnetic field across the surface at 90 degrees to the current, causing the mass of the saucer to accelerate in a direction normal to the surface (at 90 degrees to the current and magnetic field), according to the Hall effect, as the ether carriers and tubes of force are pumped through the criss-crossing electric and magnetic fields on the saucer surface, where the tubes of force are separated from the ether carriers and dissolved in the conductors, as the stripped ether carriers pass on through the saucer mass, and out the other side (as in an MHD pump), where they acquire new tubes of force. The total electromagnetic force, which is 10^{40} times stronger than the G force,[1] accelerates the ship at fantastic speed. All of the normal inertia/momenturn forces in space are manipulated by the saucer's powerful electromagnetic effects, by being forcibly "eaten up" on one end, with the saucer's movement being the "equal and opposite" effect..

There is a deceptive effect of the so-called gravity force, which makes it appear to 'penetrate' mass under normal conditions. This is demonstrated by holding one body above the ground, with a second body held above it. The G force appears to 'go through' the lower body, to pull the second, upper body down, with the force apparently not being blocked by the lower body. The force appears to be linear, penetrating, and undiminished and unblocked by other mass. These false appearances (what Einstein called "apparent effects"), are in reality a natural deception, resulting from the tendency to falsely assume that gravity is a force exerted at a distance through "empty space" between the bodies, by mysterious, unknown characteristics endemic to the bodies (in the absence of Ether Physics), when in fact, the force is exerted between the bodies and the ether existing in and between all bodies, due to the electrostatic ('microwave') inleractance created in the interpenetrating ether rigidified by these forces. As stated by Tesla[2], "...But place a gaseous (or liquid) column in an intense, rapidly alternating electrostatic field set the particles vibrating with enormous speeds, then the inertia resistance asserts itself. A body might move with more or less freedom through the vibrating mass, but as a whole it would be rigid."

Obviously, if the G force is so infernally weak in comparison to the electromagnetic force, it is scarce wonder that it could not really be such a "penetrating" one, where it would take an X-ray of several million volts to penetrate the two bodies. The force is exerted linearly between a smaller body and the earth, on the ether within each body, because the earth's electric field of influence has rigidified the ether, displaced it, and upset the equilibrium in the vicinity of the two bodies, which requires the smaller body's movement toward the center of the earth, as an equal and opposite reaction to the electrostatic forces. The movement of a smaller body in space above the earth, and within its field of influence, upsets the equilibrium of the ether, and pumps it upward through the smaller body, due to the electrostatic forces generated in the body and the earth by their movement through space. The tubes of force are unified and drawn into the smaller body and dissolved in it, thus accelerating the body downward, which is called "gravity", and erroneously thought to be a mysterious "attraction" between the two bodies.

The masses and movements of certain bodies in relative proximity, cause their electrostatic effects on the ether in their vicinity, to accelerate the bodies toward one another, almost as if they were one body. Gravity and inertia/momentum involve electromagnetic polarization created by special unipolar electromagnetic (electrostatic microwave) radiation, resulting from disturbance of the ether and its ZPR transmissive characteristics. With every change in the axis of polarization of a body at rest or in motion, inertia/momentum must be overcome. Do these forces, once magnified by this technology, represent a danger similar to X-ray? The answer appears to be paradoxical, in that gravity is not really 'penetrating[1] anything, but is only a reaction within and between atomic matter and the ether which does penetrate everything. While the high voltage emissions on the exterior of a saucer obviously represent a type of danger, the internal contents may be quite safe, due to adequate shielding and insulatioa Through common sense, injury should be avoided

---

[1]The Electromagnetic Interaction (supra).

[2]Nikola Tesla, Experiments with Alternate Currents of High Potential and High Frequency (a lecture delivered before the Institution of Electrical Engineers, London, 1892)

The deceptive apparent effects have thwarted our attempts to understand that inertia, centrifugal force, and momentum are all created by the same interaction between atomic mass, ZPR and ether within or near a mass, as the mass moves (since all mass is in motion). On our planet, the electric field of influence dominates that of other smaller bodies in its proximity, including the moon, just as the sun's electric field dominates that of the planets in the solar system as a whole, etc. Being within earth's electric field means that the characteristics of the ether and ZPR have been polarized displaced rigidified to some degree, and otherwise altered and extended for some distance around it, so that on a macroscopic scale, bodies are made to behave as if they were a part of the earth's mass, or earth's mass system. The solar system is similar to a giant atom.

Under special 'synthetic' electromagnetic conditions, the characteristics of the medium (ether and ZPR) as the source of inertia/momentum, are altered increased or canceled as one chooses, instantaneously. The normal requirement that such forces must be mechanically counteracted is circumvented by electromagnetically re-polarizing the forces within a body as it moves through the natural medium, in the direction desired In order for a body to overcome the earth's gravity, an alteration of the same ether/ZPR reactions which are occurring within the mass of the earth, must be reversed within that body. The polarity of the momentum can be synthetically oriented in any desired direction, and increased or decreased as the body's electric field can be magnified (to mimic that of a much larger body), canceled (diminished to that of a non-existent body), or adjusted to whatever level and in whatever direction desired. In so doing, the effects of earth's electrostatic forces are overcome by forces created from within a relatively tiny body, due to the gravitational-to-electromagnetic force conversion constant which allows it to be much stronger.

Though gravity, like X-rays, appears to penetrate mass even more than X-rays, this is a misperception. Gravity causes no known damage to organic life as X-rays do, since the reactions between mass, ether, and ZPR are non-interactive in the frequencies of nuclear or molecular ionization of our organic beings, on our saucer, except on its surface, and create no reactions internally which could result in radioactive organic damage. These reactions are controlled by superficially applied electrostatic force, which affects the interpenetrating ether, without altering internal nuclear structures or organic life.

Microwaves do not ordinarily penetrate metallic surfaces. Ether and ZPR permeate all mass, operating in a different way. X-rays are damaging to cell life, while gravity is not, affecting mass in a non-radioactive way, by conditions created by the natural electromagnetic resonance of all gravitational bodies. The microwaves measured by Tesla, emanating from the earth, are generated by its movement through space, as a result of earth's mass and electrical content, cutting through lines of sun's magnetic field The driving force behind earth's movement through space, is the giant current passing from the sun, through space, through the earth, and back to the sun, which imparts momentum to the earth[1], by drawing tubes of force into the earth through the Aurora Borealis (earth's 'brush'), where they are dissolved. Norwegian Astrophysicist Hannes Alfven recounted how Kristian Birkeland's measurements showed that "...magnetic fields generated by the aurora are so localized on the ground that they can only have been produced by nearly vertical currents—aligned along the magnetic field of the earth.."[2] As Eric Lerner explained, Alfven discovered that plasma clouds moving in the magnetic field of the sun, generate electric currents which flow to the sun, after which giant currents, with trillions of amps, flow out of the sun along solar magnetic field lines, into the earth's aurora, through the earth, back through the cloud, and back to the sun at its equator, and so forth, transferring momentum to the earth.

An oscillating electromagnetic dipole is always changing, and if designed properly, produces an externalized negative pulse radiating from a saucer, which, while affecting ether and ZPR both within and without the saucer, is not destructive to organic life. The key is 'positive' versus 'negative' radiation. Penetrating positive radiation (such as X-ray) reacts with nuclear mass within its frequency range, and transmutes it, while 'negative' radiation tends to react with the outer electronic structure of matter, and does not normally transmute nuclear mass, though the collisions of high energy electrons with nuclear mass can give rise to X-rays, by penetrating outer electron cloud barriers and entering into nuclear space, resulting in the excitation and relaxation of atoms, with the periodic emission of X-radiation.

The Precession Problem

Tesla's original flying saucer was apparently plagued by the problem of precession. It was for this reason that the Germans named it the "Kreisel Teller" ("Gyrating [precessing] Saucer"), which exhibited the behavior of a spinning top, especially when hovering, giving rise among speculators that the saucer's anti-gravity properties were created somehow by gyroscopic action. The mass of a spinning object in a state of uniform (angular) momentum, possesses uniform oscillations in axial and planar polarity. The axial polarity is uniformly precessing (rotating), while the radial polarity is also uniformly oscillating. Is the precessive force exerted parallel to the rotational axis, or perpendicular to it? Clearly, though we are more aware of the oscillation of the spin axis, the force of precession could just as well be exerted through the plane of rotation, as a twisting force directly related to the variations in frequency of toroidal micro-helices formed within a spinning body, due to the progressive difference in velocity between the mass near the center, and that along the outside. It could be due to an undulating wave motion within the ocean of ether saturating all bodies, which varies in frequency and angle according to the motions of individual bodies. It is related to the spinning of the tubes of force, unified and drawn from the ether into spinning bodies, and dissolved in them, and the rate at which they transfer momentum to the spinning bodies, similar to how earth's momentum is transferred from the currents in space.

The hydrogen atom resonates magnetically at 42.6 million times per second. This is its "NMR" (Nuclear Magnetic Resonant) frequency, the frequency at which the axial magnetic poles of the hydrogen atom precess, or oscillate. This oscillation is very fast as compared to the precession of a top, yet the same rules govern both bodies. It would be impossible for a top to precess at 42.6 MHz., because its inertia and mass properties would cause it to disintegrate under ordinary circumstances, but the precession of its individual atoms at that frequency presents no such problem Since a rotating body absorbs the tubes of force, translating them into momentum, perhaps the oscillations of the spin axis is determined by the rate at which momentum is transferred. Generally, the difference between the precessive frequencies of the hydrogen atom and the top, appears to relate to their comparative masses, which have a great difference in the momentum involved. By recreating the electromagnetic effects with an internal generator in a space ship, the ship will behave as if it were a single giant ion, having specific precessive effects peculiar to that body. If the electrapulsive technology puts the atoms of the ship into a sort of "population inversion", it is possible that the precession of the individual atoms is transferred to the entire ship. The speculator looks for a "spinning body" when he observes precession, while the more intelligent thinker realizes that the precession of a large spinning body is more than likely due to a non-apparent electromagnetic effect having its origin in the reaction between the spinning atomic mass of the body, the unseen atomic matter and ZPR within the body, and the ether and tubes of force in the space in which it precesses. The phenomenon may not require a spinning body, but may be due to synthetically recreated electromagnetic reactions of a spinning body, on a non-spinning body. The precessive motion can be related to the cumulative electromagnetic effect of spinning electrons in a magnetic field, transferred as precession to the body.

---

[1]Hannes Alfven, Existence of Electromagnetic Hydrodynamic Waves, NATURE, vol. 150 [Oct. 3, 1942], pp. 405-6.

[2]Eric Lerner, The Big Bang Never Happened, Random House [1991].

The electropulsion used on a flying saucer may cause it to precess as if it were spinning or contained a spinning mass, just as electromagnetic conditions cause any spinning object to precess. The precession I witnessed may have been the result of one of Tesla's large alternators, being turned by a turbine. Since the rate and angle of precession was directly proportional to its rate of acceleration, consistent with a turbine turning the alternator faster to generate progressively more power. Whatever the cause of the precession, it seems endemic to and problematic with the propulsion system. If an internal spinning alternator were responsible for a saucer's precession, it would be difficult to isolate the rest of the ship from the effects of its gyroscopic action, unless it were placed on gimbals. As such, it could be used as the "master" gyrocompass, to be conveniently coupled with the Peiltochterkompass, to provide the navigational necessities of the saucer. If it were bolted rigidly to the airframe, the gyroscopic action would not permit the ship to be maneuvered in the manner observed, because it would resist being turned perpendicular to its rotational axis, and could only be turned around the plane of angular momentum. It would have been impossible for a saucer to turn the 90-degree vertical angles at high speed such as I observed in 1953, even using the so-called "Coanda effect", because the angular momentum of the gyroscope would have to be entirely canceled instantaneously, and reoriented and reactivated with each such turn, and such a possibility could only be effected electromagnetically, not gyroscopically.

In respect to aerodynamics, I was embarrassed for a fellow 'UFO' researcher, who claims to be a physicist, when I discovered in one of his books, that he believes that fast moving air from prop wash is "compressed" air with higher pressure than surrounding air. He apparently was unaware of the fact that aerodynamic lift is created by low pressure (faster moving) air, and was further confused by the fact that fast moving air has greater propulsive force (as an 'equal and opposite' thrust reaction due to an increase in its momentum, transferred to it by an aircraft), which is the main principle of rocket and jet propulsion. In applying this misconception to a little toy styrofoam 'UFO' which uses a model engine and propeller in its center, to suck air across the annular ring-shaped airfoil around it, to create lift as well as downward thrust, he entirely misunderstood the means by which the toy stayed aloft. In mis particular toy, the styrofoam ring to which the engine mounts are attached, is allowed to counter-rotate from the torque of the engine. This causes a certain amount of the air to be drawn along with the ring, due to molecular adhesion and viscosity. So in addition to the Bernoulli effect, the Magnus effect is added, to create further lift, by increasing the height and pressure drop in the burbles above the upper airfoil surface (I'm sorry, but it isn't easy to bullshit me on aerodynamics). The 'physicist' attempted to make the case that UFOs' work on the principle of "gyroscopic action". The problem was, both the engine and ring were rotating on the same plane, so any "anti-gravitational" force purportedly created by the outer mass, was counteracted by the counter-rotating engine. He had merely discarded aerodynamics completely, and by similar reasoning, he should have claimed that helicopters, airplanes, dirigibles, and gyrocopters are all "anti-gravity craft", and in point of fact, did just that In my 1993 version of Space Aliens... (pg. 126), in passages written years before, I also made out a case for gyroscopic forces acting in "semi-defiance to gravity", but that argument is based on the generation of excess negative charges which are sufficient to alter the gravitational reaction, but still insufficient to create "anti-gravity" as compared to mere weight loss. It is also probable that many aircraft gain extra lift by accumulation of excess negative charges. Were the earth's magnetic field many tunes stronger than it is, a gyroscopic device might possibly generate sufficient negative charges to defy gravity completely, but this is not the case, and the 'physicist' was unable to cite a single principle—either of 'accepted' or 'dissident' physics—supporting his baseless theory, though he mentioned the research of others showing anomalous weight loss, most likely caused electrostatically. If he based his claims on their findings, and nothing more however, he wasn't entitled to call it "his discovery". Oh! His discovery of their discoveries and my book.

I knew that this 'physicist' had read my book (since he nastily asked me about something in it), but I have a nebulous suspicion bordering on certainty that he is a witting O.S.I. agent recruited from the KGB when the Soviet super-state fell apart, under orders to misinform the public, to counteract the potential effects of the ideas in my book, although he is possibly just another plagiaristic charlatan who wants to "steal my thunder", by 'taking a few ideas' and misusing them. He is frustrated by my preemption of material collected under Operation Paperclip in 1945, altered by the O.S.I., and recently disseminated in Europe concerning German flying saucers, which is depicted as La La Land misinformation typical of OSI liars, concocted to lure "new-age-prone" people away from the true theory. The dingy theories just don't hold water, and the gut feeling persists that they're the work of OSI misinformation squads. Besides, would the OSI release such information to a German group if it was true? Uhh, here you are, Hermann....the flying saucer secrets you've been asking for. Be sure and tell everyone.

In this book, I publish a valid, complete, "new" theory of gravity, for the first time (Tesla's 1893-94 Dynamic Theory of Gravity being never published that I know of), and the proof of the pudding is in the eating. The fact that this O.S.I. guy—supposedly educated as a "physicist" in the Soviet Bloc—has stuck his neck into a pseudo-intellectual noose, is proof that the CIA is in a panic. He not only failed to convince me that he 'discovered anti-gravity' or is a "dissident scientist" as he claims, but in his apparent ignorance, failed to 'one-up' me as he intended. If he were not C.I.A, he would still be a sucker for the CIA/OSI misinformation, spread through its German collaborators, ostensibly based on misinformation—altered and screened by the O.S.I.—released through the "Hermann Goering Branch of the Knights Templars", in Bavaria The fact that he failed to mention my book, though very familiar with it, indicated that he is possibly a former K.G.B. agent, now a witting O.S.I agent, recruited by the CIA as the Soviet system collapsed. His claim to be a "dissident scientist" is apparently based on my writings to that effect, since I called myself that in my first edition. He parrots a slightly altered contradictory O.S.I. party line', dictated by the status quo of UFOlogy, including an esoteric, mystical propulsion system, and a purported 'anti-gravity propulsion system' based on gyroscopic action, which will never get off the ground. The Illuminati absolutely doesn't want anyone to get lift-off, and despite unfounded rumors, nobody has done so with gyros, or with any other ideas spread by the OSI. 'Founded' rumors hold that experimenters--several with PhDs in electrical engineering--are getting lift-off with models following my designs. The dummy "air conditioner vent" stuff based on the work of Victor Schauberger (as well as the alleged propulsion system for ancient East Indian Vimanas), looks like just so much farting in the wind The "World Energy Grid" and 'harmonics' stuff of "Captain" Bruce Cathie (Ret.) of New Zealand also has nothing to do with saucer propulsion, since flying saucers fly independent to an "earth-grid", on internally generated power, reacting with the ether, tubes of force, and ZPR. Pseudo-"ancient", hocus pocus propulsion systems' are neither feasible nor explained, as usual, and are what one would expect from diploma-mill ancient history O.S.I. PhD.s, or 'retired' military aviators, attempting to impress us with military credentials. So, you wanna waste ten years trying to make it work, huh?

Any serious, intelligent physicists, interested in understanding the true nature of gravity and a unified field', would have to conceive of the interrelated movements of celestial bodies throughout the universe, as evidence of an integrated system of perpetual planetary arid celestial motion, radiation, nuclear physics, and electric and magnetic currents, fields and effects. It is a circuitous, eternal process, in which 'energy' can be neither created nor destroyed, only changed in form These forces continuously transmute in nature, whether or not humans use them to perform "work". Perpetual motion is the rule and not the exception. All energy and matter is conserved in changing forms, exchanging forces, effects, or matter, "using nothing up", and equaling zero. The Illuminati pseudo-scientists have labored so diligently for so long to talk us out of these obvious facts, and to convince us that we need Standard Oil of New York, etc., forever, and don't you forget it!

In the Big Lie Mass Psychological Control System, paranormal propaganda serves the purpose of stretching the public's credulity, so it will accept the Big Alien Lies—used to conceal flying saucer technology—on faith, not reason. In physics, Relativism serves the same integral false purpose, by stretching the credulity of physicists, so they will accept the Elastic Space-Time Continuum and Big Bang cosmography on faith, not reason. The Paranormal beliefs, combined with Relativism, completes the two essential tasks, by opening the way for acceptance of the alien lies, and opening the way for denial of a scientific explanation for flying saucer propulsion. By substituting Relativism for Ether Theory—which purports to solve problems it does not solve—establishment physics has no rational explanation for gravity, momentum, and flying saucer electric space propulsion.

SYNOPSIS OF FACTS

This book is related to the following list of little-known, officially suppressed, or publicly unknown facts:

1. An American citizen (naturalized), Nikola Tesla (an atheist and a capitalist), invented the flying saucer, before 1900, and reduced it to practice by 1915.

2. The American government helped the Nazis steal the invention from Tesla, through a secret 1936-38 project, at Los Alamos, New Mexico (then called the "p2" project), under the direction of the Baron Wernher von Braun, who was simultaneously collaborating in rocket research with Dr. Robert Goddard near Roswell funded by the American Rocket Society (The Smithsonian Institution and the Guggenheim Foundation).

3. The American government later helped Wernher von Braun, under the Nazi project (a forerunner of the Trilateral Commission) and CFR/Illuminati (who still retain control) remove the "KT-p2" Projekt ("KT" is for "Kreisel-Teller" [German, for "Gyrating Plate"], and "p2" is the electronic designation for Tesla's dipolar propulsion system) to Germany, in early 1938.

4. The Nazis, who developed and used the flying saucer during the war (called "Foo-Fighters" by us, "Fireballs", "Flying Saucers" [Fliegende Untertasse], and "Flying Turtles" by them), were unsuccessful in developing appropriate weapons for it until too late. They traded it to the U. S. government and corporations during the stalemate of 1945, in exchange for amnesty for numerous persons (including many war criminals), and for other concessions and guarantees.

5. The U.S. government (N.S.A., O.S.I.), on behalf of the Trilateral Commission/CFR, continues with and enforces a Nazi-originated "Big Lie" program, in which it perpetuates the hoax that flying saucers ("U.F.O.s") are: (a) Extraterrestrial in origin; (b) psychological phenomena ("collective consciousness archetypal images", ala C. G. Jung); © swamp gas; (d) "free-floating plasmas"; (e) piezo-electric effects; (f) ball-lightning; (g) other natural phenomena; (h) unknown life forms; (I) hallucinations; (j) non-existent; (k) hoaxes by attention-seekers; (1) the products of hysteria, insanity, etc., etc.

6. The German navy surrounded the U.S. with 24 U-boats, armed with (V-6?) I.C.B.M.S, having celestial guidance systems, and armed with neutron bomb warheads, trained on key American cities and centers, in a 1945 stalemate; German Admiral Karl Doenitz negotiated a secret truce and amnesty agreement with American authorities, under which he was required to order all 24 U-boats "...scuttled, with all hands on board...", under the agreement, pursuant to which Nazi skippers opened the hatches and the subs and all men on board went to the bottom Under Operation Paperclip, all Nazi scientific research materials, most of their important scientists, and the "KT-p2 Projekt" technology, were transferred to the U.S. and to the CFR corporations, thus attempting to insure that the Illuminati would retain control of the materials. Certain unusual security procedures were initiated to insure this, including the "sacrificing" of some major German scientists to the Soviets, to plant misinformation, and to insure that the hoax was successful.

7. During the war, German scientists bypassed development of the "atom bomb", and built and tested the neutron bomb. German field Marshall Erwin Rommel and the Afrika Korps were originally sent to North Africa to test the neutron bomb, as well as Tesla's "death ray" (which freezes whole armies); this technology was acquired by American corporations, held chiefly by David Rockefeller, and was later sold in part back to the U.S. government and tested in the '60s, and the same technology was again sold to the U.S. government in the "70s and '80s, as "Star Wars" ("SDI" or "Strategic Defense Initiative") technology.

8. Over 15,000 German military, technical, intelligence, and support personnel were brought to America (mostly New Mexico—Manzano Base, Sandia Base, White Sands Missile Range, Alamogordo, Holloman A.F.B., Los Alamos, etc.) with the KT-p2 Project, in Sept., 1945, at which time, under Operation Paper Clip, Wernher von Braun became Director of Research, U.S. Army Ordnance, Ft. Bliss, Texas; he and his 116 top rocket and flying saucer scientists commenced rocket and flying saucer R & D. at White Sands Missile Range, and Alamogordo.

9. Howard Hughes' "Glomar Explorer" was built to retrieve the 24 scuttled German U-Boats, before terrorists or unfriendly governments found and retrieved the subs, missiles, bombs, and related technology. The WW II German "Electro-U-boats" were powered by a type of magnetic-electric generator (invented by an American named Dort, of Virginia), based on a Tesla oscillator, which was superior to nuclear power. Further details about the German 'ship', the Graf Zeppelin, are included in this book; Adolf and Eva (Braun) Hitler were daringly rescued from the Berlin Fuehrerbunker by a flying saucer, flown by test pilot Hanna Reitsch and long distance flight expert Hans Ulrich Rudel. The Hitlers were later protected by the secret amnesty agreement, for the remainder of their lives under protection of the N.A.T.O. alliance, in Kassel, Germany, ironically the home of an international monument to the Holocaust. The Hitlers even visited Hemisfair, the World's fair at San Antonio, Texas, in 1967, on the invitation of L.B.J.

10. Part of the original deceit was under way at Wright-Patterson A.F.B, Ohio, even before the German surrender; Edgar Cayce was already employed as a technical writer, to revise, adapt, and resume the propaganda work pioneered by Hans Hoerbiger, Hitler's personal guru and astrologer, the official "father of parapsychology", and designer of the Nazi "Big Lie" system, in which the public's credibility 'window' is wallowed into a giant hole, allowing the indiscriminate acceptance if faceless authority and whatever the government says; the U.S. government even hired an Ohio naval law professor (and genius) to revise and popularize "Astara" ("Ostara" to Hitler), the Nazi religion based on the Bonpas (Tibetan black magic) religion, imported from Tibet to Germany by general Karl Haushofer, an ordained Bonpas priest, as the basis for the S.S., financed and set up on instructions of the British-American CFR, in 1919; the S.S. Bonpas worshipped "Kali Ma" ("Bloody Mother"). This cult founded the ancient Thugee cult of India, and was the basis for the Society of Assassins; the concepts of this weird religion related to the mass extermination of people, through many means, including assassination, extermination, and war, as the basis for all 20th century totalitarian movements.

11. Most forms of mass communication are primarily controlled or produced by the Illuminati, through the secret agencies of our government, to brainwash the public, in the most monumental hoax in history, to socio-economically control the world, and to perpetuate lies designed to obscure the flying saucer's man-made origin and use (as well as to steal and conceal or monolithically control all other advanced technology); the government hires consultants, contract script writers, and teams of PhD.s, to create and disseminate Big Lie propaganda, in countless pulp magazines and newspapers, and finances and produces books and movies of the Close Encounters of the Third Kind ilk, to perpetuate the "extraterrestrial" myth; the government controls and manipulates the press, hires lecturers, and organizes and funds UFO groups; it stages "abductions", using actors, drugs, and sets; Operation Blue Book was set up at

Wright-Patterson A.F.B., to retrieve leaked information and plug leaks, disseminate misinformation, falsely represent "expert, objective, scientific opinion", and to ferret out 'problem people'; mystical organizations (such as A.R.E.—Association for Research and Enlightenment—part of the Edgar Cayce Foundation, of Virginia Beach, Virginia [conveniently close to CIA headquarters])—are created for the same purposes, and set the stage for the type of mass psychological control of the public required for totalitarian control by mystical cults, such as "Communism", "Naziism", "Synergy", or "Parapsychology" cults.

12. Flying saucers operate on basic, simple, sound (but very carefully obscured) scientific electrical and physical principles, known for over 100 years; Nikola Tesla's discovery has been concealed for over 60 years, and all public sources were thoroughly scoured by the F.B.I, in 1942; the flying saucer uses the electromagnetic interaction, which is 10^{40} times greater than the gravitational interaction, to move huge saucers at fantastic speeds, in apparent defiance to the laws of physics as currently taught, with almost no net energy consumption; they can be powered by unlimited electrical energy extracted from ordinary atmospheric air, based on Tesla's ca. 1900 discoveries; (NOTE: this book tells how to build your own flying saucer.)

13. "E.S.P." and "psychic phenomena" movements (based on Hans Hoerbiger's original Nazi "parapsychology") are orchestrated and promoted by the N.S.A., as part of the continuation of the original Nazi Big Lie program, to dupe and brainwash the public, and to induce unquestioned faith rather than reason; this clandestine manipulation by the government is an unconstitutional abridgement of the U.S. Constitutional First Amendment prohibition against the government's recognition or promotion of an "establishment of religion" (i.e., generally, a mystical belief system based on faith rather than reason).

14. As an underlying cause of the "Holocaust", a proposal was made by the U.S. Government to the Treaty of Versaille Committee, in 1919. In a document known as "Morgenthau's Pastoral Policy", signed by president Woodrow Wilson (drafted by his Illuminati advisor, Hans Morgenthau, Sr.) and presented at Versaille. Under it, the U.S. attempted to make, as one of the provisions of the German surrender, the extermination of all Germans, as an "inherently warlike race", and the "reduction of Germany to a pasture land". The document, examined by me in 1968, was among the papers of former president Lyndon Baines Johnson, now kept in the Sid W. Richardson Research Center, at U.T., Austin, named for my third cousin.

15. The "cattle mutilations" phenomenon is an ongoing program of the CIA's Special Operations Division. 'Biological samples' are removed by specially trained flying saucer crews, from thousands of cattle grazing in remote areas, for analysis, to measure radiation-caused auto-immune-deficiency and reproductive sterilization effects, after the cattle have been subjected to irradiation by "Death Ray" devices under development since the '60s. Since 1979, the saucers have bombarded members of the public, under the MK-NAOMI Program of the CIA, fa- purposes of "population control" (i.e., extermination). Government scientists use special surgical devices, standard blood coagulants, and cryogenic technology, enhanced by microwave equipment, to remove the cattle blood (and ears, lips, tongues, mammary glands, genitalia, anuses, etc.); afterward, the carcasses are returned and air-dropped from flying saucers, back into their original pastures; the mysterious circumstances are then misconstrued by government-spread rumors of "extraterrestrials", attributed to "Satanist cults" or other cults created by the government, or "coyotes and other natural predators", etc. (Of course, MAN is a "natural predator".) (For more on this, see Chapter HI: I Meet a Government MLB. in Santa Fe: Hollywood on the Take, and Chapter IV: Sightings)

16. The Antarctic "Ozone Hole", which U.S. government scientists pretend to be at a loss to explain—yet blaming it on 'aerosol sprays'—is probably the by-product of three nuclear missiles, armed with hydrogen bomb warheads, which were launched from the Antarctic by the U.S. military, on Aug. 27, Aug. 30, and Sept 9, 1957. The warheads were detonated at a 300-mile altitude, to create a reflective spherical layer of ionic particles surrounding the earth, to bounce radar impulses between the layer and the earth. The Strategic Air Command's global "backscatter" radar system, operated from the North American Air Defense (NORAD) command center deep beneath the earth at Cheyenne Mountain, Colorado, thus became operational in 1957, in time to verify that the Russians fired the rocket which launched Sputnik.

17. The N.S.A. protracts a false "national security" veil, to continue concealment of flying saucer technology, creating false fears of 'rampant anarchy, 'chaos', and other exaggerations and ruses, before N.S.A. committees, to justify continued secrecy, and to continue to deny public access to or to declassify the technology. (If society isn't ready for it, how can THEY be?)

18. The true scientific principles of gravity have been misrepresented, confused, and concealed by "Big Brother", even in school books read by our children, just to conceal flying saucer technology, to protect the energy cartels and the mixed-economy socialist political power structure from losing its illegitimate parasitic grip on us.

19. In 1893-94, Nikola Tesla, a patriotic naturalized U.S. citizen, of Serbo-Croatian birth, discovered a new theory of energy and gravity, called the Dynamic Theory of Gravity, which represented a unified field theory. Tesla's energy equation, "C = E/R", and Tesla's application to the Swiss Patent Office, for his flying saucer patent, was made while Albert Einstein was a second class patent clerk there. Einstein's work was an Illuminati conspiracy to obliterate Tesla's discoveries, so the Illuminati could control flying saucers and create our energy slavery.

20. The government's policy of looting and suppressing ideas from independent scientists, inventors, and thinkers, on behalf of the Trilateral Commission, is related to this process, involving (1) stealing ideas from creative individuals; (2) destroying those individuals' credibilities, to conceal the sources and technology; (3) ruining the lives of those individuals (even murdering them if necessary), and denying compensation or credit; (4) exercising the option to suppress the ideas under "national security' laws", or giving the discoveries to their corporate crook partners for exploitation; and (5) abusing and misusing the judicial system to carry out and enforce this illegitimate, criminal process.

21. I am either correct in what I say, or am entitled to a Nobel Prize for new discoveries in gravitational theory and nuclear physics. The former is most certainty true. Since Russia in fact acquired the services of the top Nazi flying saucer scientists, and the top rocket scientists, from the Peenemunde operation, in 1945, there is a strong possibility that the Russians were privy to these secrets.

PART ONE: THE TECHNOLOGY

CHAPTER I: STAGE I SECRET GRAVITY PHYSICS

"Stage I Secret Gravity Physics" includes an attempt to explain gravity as an electrostatic phenomenon.. Though incorrect, this argument is included and compared with the material in the Introduction ("XI: Occult Ether Physics"), and other material, to give it as fair an argument as it deserves. Ether physics is "it", There is not 'another system' which is powered by electrostatics, or Felix Schauberger's alleged boundary layer or other vague, undefined, "new age Austrian" method. Though other flying craft may be 'saucer-shaped', if they are not electrically powered, they are no more "flying saucers", than an oxcart shaped exactly like an automobile is a "car". The "Adamski-type" ships were complete fabrications, photographs of a chicken feeder. Adamski was on the CIA payroll, and his allegations were misinformation. In addition, there are many ways to create hoaxes. For example, it is easy to suspend a model from a balloon, by means of a fine nylon fishing line, with camera out of focus, and produce a convincing photograph. Get real.

Reality is unmistakable in certain cases. I knew from my observations in 1953, that a secret theory of gravity physics is involved in flying saucer technology. Today, over forty-five years later, the underlying cause of gravity is still (supposed to be) a mystery. People continue in the Relativist Rut, blabbering on about Einstein, but Einstein never explained gravity. Truth, like creativity, requires courage. Scientific cowards continue to yield to the Trilateralist sham. Since around 1950, textbook writers have followed secret government orders, helping us 'forget' some (now) little-known facts once taught along with Newton's law of accelerating bodies. Fascist-state revisionists concealed the scientific truth about gravity as a "national security secret". In 1942, the F.B.I, sequestered all known information relating to a scientific understanding of gravity, electrical control of gravity, or 'free energy', as it might pertain to flying saucer technology. Accordingly, the same CFR and Illuminati which controlled Wernher von Braun and the Nazis, in the 1936-38 Los Alamos "p2"project, controlled our F.B.I. as well. For this reason, I have renamed J. Edgar Hoover, "J. Edgar Himmler, the American Fascist in a Red Dress".

To conceal "flying saucer secrets", they rewrote theoretical physics, obliterating the greatest moments in mankind's scientific history. Perhaps when our people are reduced to ignorant, scientifically-deprived yokels, we will have "national security", and only the NSA., the CFR, the Trilateral Commission, the Bilderbergers and the Illuminati (all one and the same) will possess true scientific knowledge. What the Rosicrucians/Illuminati refer to as the "wisdom of the ages", is actually a collection of stolen and concealed scientific—-not "mystical"--secrets! Such knowledge is discovered by individual geniuses, deluded into thinking they are doing mankind a favor, but instead unwittingly doing research for the Trilateral Commission/Illuminati rats, who will steal and hide such "treasures of posterity", and use them to enslave mankind

After all, the rats said, since a 'healthy petroleum industry' is essential to "national defense", protecting Big Oil at the expense of scientific, economic, and social freedom and progress, is in the "national security interest". Since society is "not ready for the flying saucer" - they decided without our consent—such secrecy was "sound public policy"; after all, how could Gulf Oil continue to produce and sell gasoline and diesel at a 'fair' profit, if one could fly a zillion miles on a gallon? With such inventions as the flying saucer at the public's disposal, the economy would be wrecked, they said (at least for the Trilateral Commission). Meanwhile, our government helped the fascists take firmer control of the system, in the interest of "national security".

PHONY RESEARCH AND SCIENTIFIC ALZHEIMERS

Numerous centers throughout the world conduct "gravity research", to 'prove' Newton's laws. The only parts of these old laws which have been brought into question, deal only with the first few inches of a falling body's acceleratioa The remainder of the tests are false, deceptive, and unscientific, intended to dispel widespread suspicion by lay people, to reassure the lazy scientists who accept them, and to heap ridicule upon doubters. Without accurate and honest tests, over at least 1,000' of vertical drop, the results are worthless. Yet what independent scientists have the personal finances or resources to conduct these tests accurately on their own? Most people accept the theories of the "experts", failing to realize they are government-paid, Trilateralists/Illuminati national security" yeggs. "Question everything", the ancient Greeks wisely advised.

I predict that proper tests will eventually disprove Newton's laws in a big way. Such tests would require a vertical, non-metallic, non-electrically-conductive tube, extending up at least 1,000' from the earth's surface, which could be evacuated. A weight carrying a precision movie camera with a digital clock read-out, would photograph calibrations on the sides of the tube, as it was dropped. Its rate of acceleration would be accurately recorded. When the weight reached approximately 120 mp.h., no further acceleration should occur. At the accepted rate of acceleration (32'/sec./sec.), the 120 mp.h. velocity should be reached at approximately 696 feet. However, if I am correct, this could take either more or less distance/time, depending on the reaction.

Nikola Tesla's Dynamic Theory of Gravity provided a scientific basis for explaining Newton's "laws" of gravity, which attempted to explain with some degree of mathematical certainty, the physical measurements, and offered no cause. Even this is questionable.

The erroneous concept of "anti-gravity" cannot explain flying saucer propulsion. Insufficient to merely "overcome" gravity, or "reverse" it, propelling a ship with astounding results and directional controls is much more. The fictitious moon ship of H. G. Welles' Dr. Cavour-was rased on a "blocking" theory, in which 'doors' were painted with "Cavourite", which blocked gravity. This chapter includes my examination of an electrostatic theory of gravity, and attempts to explain flying saucer propulsion in the manner demonstrated by observed flying saucers.

Hydrogen has the highest charge-to-mass ratio of any element. Accordingly, it is the lightest elcment, even though its nuclear proton and orbital electron are identical to those of lead. The masses of the remaining elements are determined according to their respective mass units and densities, and eharge-to-mass ratios, which are correlative to their relative gravitational, electric, and electromagnetic interactions.

I consider electrons as already having "negative gravity" (or "anti-gravity"), even though they have mass, because they will normally tend to gravitate upward from the earth, like a light gas, due to their high charge-to-mass ratio and low mass density. This is more consistent with ether theory than with Relativism. Cosmic radiation and lightning storms bring electrons down to the earth, which is generally an electro-positive mass, upon the surface of which a continuous negative charge is maintained by lightening, though the electrons tend to 'leak' and migrate back upward. Accordingly, the ionosphere is charged at least 176 million volts positive in respect to the earth, creating a vertical electric field, which gradiates from sea level, around 150 volts per meter upward, from negative to positive. This electric field is reversed and multiplied around ten times under storm clouds, rendering the earth's surface relatively positive under the storm clouds, since the higher negative charges of the clouds repel the earth's negative 'like'-charges.

This vertical electric field might be erroneously conceived as the origin of gravity, but there are many gravitational planets which have no ionosphere, while all atomic mass possesses electrostatic charges which are in motion with the masses, representing currents (H. A. Rowland's experiment), a fact used by Tesla in support of his Dynamic Theory of Gravity.

Gravity is apparently a secondary product resulting from an imbalance of other, primary forces. No separate basis has been found, though an electrostatic imbalance is evidenced in atomic matter. The Dutch physicist, Hendrik Antoon Lorentz (1833-1928), in measuring the relative magnitude of the single negative ("moving" or "orbital") electron charge, and the positive ("stationary" or "nuclear") proton charge in the hydrogen atom, actually claimed the two to be slightly unequal, with the proton possessing an excess positive charge, slightly greater than the allegedly 'equal and opposite' negative electron charge. This information has been conveniently disregarded, since, by implication, it contradicts the Relativist Theory, since unequal charges could disqualify the entire theory, and support Tesla's Dynamic Theory of Gravity. Lorentz further postulated that this excess positive charge is responsible for the weak force of gravity, and that, by increasing the negative (moving) charges, the gravity of an atom's stationary nuclear positive mass would be entirely "canceled". Even so, how would this explain electropulsion? It wouldn't Lorentz calculated the electromagnetic forces encountered by a body, within an electric and magnetic field, according to the equations of Sir George Clerk Maxwell. This force, called a "Lorentz Force", is so much more powerful than the force of gravity, that it is difficult to conceive. Nontheless, it is only part of the picture, since it purported to represent only a comparison between static electrical and gravitational attractive forces, rather than the net dynamic "interaction". After all, one has to bear in mind that, in addition to Werner Heisenberg's so-called "Uncertainty Principle", there is the problem of considering the fact that, in all attempts to measure anything on earth, all the measuring instruments, the observer, and all charges are in motion, at over 70,000 mph through space, which means that everything contains "currents".

INERTIA AND ELECTROMAGNETISM

Since, according to Lorentz's hypothesis, gravity is the result of an imbalance in electrostatic charge/content, this imbalance should also explain Newton's laws, except there was no provision for the dynamism of the universe in it. Since Nikola Tesla knew Lorentz, it is also possible they discussed these views. Tesla said that electrostatic force is the most important force for us to study. Although his gravity discoveries were complete over 100 years ago, the Illuminati stole ten away, and smugly keeps them from us today, while hiding, or misrepresenting essential parts of gravity and ether theory and experimental results.

Excess positive charges, or parts thereof in a body, induce negative electrostatic reactance when moving through space permeated by electric and magnetic fields. Since all mass is in motion, and all space is permeated by electric and magnetic fields, this inducement applies to all bodies and all space. The earth induces negative electrostatic reactance as it moves through space. Naturally, this inducement also applies to all bodies within the dynamic electric field of earth, in which enormous, rapidly varying electrostatic forces exist. This inducement continually changes the electromagnetic characteristics of the bodies and the space, according to their relative movements, and redistributes the conglomeration of changes. Accordingly, with a redistribution (or "displacement") movement, away from or toward the equilibrium position, an equal and opposite force tending to counteract it, is produced in tie direction from which the negative electrostatic forces of the earth emanate, which is called "gravity". This is part of Tesla's Dynamic Theory of Gravity, which requires an understanding of the ether and its effects.

Inertia is the resistance within a body to changes in its state of motion. Momentum is the same thing, since all mass is already in motion, but the cause of this resistance to change requires an ether theory which includes the tubes of force. Inertia/Momentum is observed in the dynamic rotor of an electric generator, in which the momentum of the rotor is imparted, via electric current (tubes of force), to the rotor of an electric motor run by that current. In other words, as the rotor is placed into motion, it absorbs electric tubes of force, which travel through the circuits to the motor, which absorbs and dissolves the tubes, imparting momentum to it. Although the laws of inertia are incorrectly said not to apply to the laws of electromagnetism, that is a lie. Where the electromagnetic interaction is 10^{40} times stronger than the gravitational interaction, force gathered in a gravitational interaction—momentum—such as by hydraulically turned dynamos, may be converted into much stronger electropulsive force! (In this respect, I refer you to the Introduction; V: A Comparison of Gravitational and Electrical Force, as Applied to Flying Saucer Propulsion.) This little trick of nature yields so much free energy that the Illuminati have been masturbating over it for over half a century. It allows for much more powerful electromagnetic energy to be concentrated and stored in much weaker inertial form, until converted and magnified into relatively super-strong electropulsive form.

If inertia is the result of a body's resistance to changes in the strong electromagnetic patterns (the pitch, frequency, and momentum of its ether micro-helices) existing as a result of its particular state of rest or motion, within a particular electrostatic ether environment, then the synthetic conditions of an electric generator's rotor field coils are only an unnaturally altered state of the conditions which were already there. I am reminded of the account as to how Tesla discovered the rotating electromagnetic field, in a flash of creative intuition, while on a walk with a friend named Tageti in Buda-Pest, over 100 years ago, and quoting a line from Goethe.

Existing patterns of forces acting on a body become uniform whenever there is no change in its state of motion, and the body encounters no force. Only when the body accelerates, decelerates, or changes directions, or encounters certain external bodies or electric or magnetic forces, do the existing patterns of force resist the change. This is consistent with the theory of the tubes of force. It is obvious that this phenomenon is electromagnetic. Albert Einstein's hypothesis that a mechanism having weights which oscillated over time, as a gravitational analogy to the oscillating electric and magnetic fields in inductance, would generate "gravity waves", as the gravitational equivalence of dectromagnetic waves, was obviously wrong, else someone would have easily proved it Since that hypothesis has never been a secret, it is additionally wrong. Just exactly how Einstein thought such 'waves' were supposed to be responsible for the alleged "attractive force", even if they could be generated that way, remains unclear.

The reason we know that inertia/momentum is an electromagnetic phenomenon, is because it occurs only during the acceleration, deceleration, or directional changes which are essential to inductance principles, and because we can find no other reason. Since no inductance occurs unless electric or magnetic fields change, or unless a body moving within than changes, causing inversely rising, collapsing, and reversing electromagnetic fields, there is no essential difference between electromagnetic and gravitational, inertial/momentum forces, which cannot be explained using electromagnetic theory, integrated with a valid and consistent theory of ether physics. The propulsive force also appears on the correct axis, as predicted by the Hall Effect.

We know that magnetic lines of force exist, and can chart them with paper and iron filings. These lines represent variations in magnetic flux densities, along and across flow lines. Whenever a conductor or body cuts through them, electric current results in the conductor or body. An electric current creates a magnetic field around itself and the conductor or body through which it flows, at right angles to itself, according to the "right hand rule". The variations between the magnetic field lines represent the necessary changes required to generate the current within the conductor cutting through them, and therefore even a "D.C." generator creates its current by an "alternating" (high-frequency) inductance phenomenon.

MOMENTUM AND INDUCTANCE

Since a spinning object cuts through lines of a magnetic field which can permeate it, the earth thereby generates an electric current, which continues to build up at right angles to its magnetic field, until sufficient to cancel the magnetic field. This comports with the Hall Effect, If the current is drained off, the magnetic field is increased, and vice-versa. If a spinning object creates an oscillating current, it therefore constitutes an electromagnetic dipole, which multiplies the electromagnetic energy radiated at the forth power of its frequency. As Tesla said, every physical entity has a natural set of electromagnetic resonant frequency characteristics. It has been suggested that gyroscopes actually respond to electromagnetic transmitter/receiver effects, beyond our solar system. As the basis for the celestial guidance system invented and tested by Tesla in 1917, and developed further by the Germans during WW II, they were not used by us until twenty years later. The electric field of a spinning body, at a particular rpm, within earth's weak magnetic field, should generate increased negative charges sufficient to partially cancel its own gravity, by causing a partial reversal of the displacement of its charges, to lessen their down force, as the ether passes through. Since it rotates about its center, the greatest angular velocity is along its outer circumference. Once its surface charges begin to move, the magnetic field is progressively blocked, as in a Faraday cage. Because earth's magnetic field is so weak, a spinning body will not develop enough upward electromagnetic thrust to become weightless, but delivers its entire gravity on its spinning point, even when turned completely sideways, as with a gyroscope, which behaves in "semi-defiance" to gravity. The stabilizing properties of a gyroscope, which behaves as if held by something in space, proves the existence of the ether and tubes of force.

I observed that precession is common to falling objects, even though they are not spinning, which becomes especially pronounced after they have fallen for around 700 feet. This can beseen in movies of falling bombs. Though an object falling at 120 m,p.h. may be virtually weightless, it still has momentum/inertia, and the force delivered when it strikes the ground is electromagnetic momentum built up over time. A flying saucer's electromagnetic momentum is not bound by the law of acceleration of falling bodies, determined by the time required for a falling object, accelerated by the force of gravity, to absorb a certain quantum of tubes of force, but may be greatly accelerated by the high voltage current, and multiplied. Falling objects are penetrated by ether carriers, which bring along the micro-helical tubes of force, which during acceleration have progressively increasing pitch, before dissolving, transferring momentum to the mass.

All bodies are both gravitationally and electromagnetically affected by the principles of inertia, momentum, polarity, and precession, as explored in the Introduction. Their movement, as flying machines, may be caused according to the Hall Effect the reactions of which are of such magnitude that they can only be surpassed by nuclear fission or fusion reactions. Nikola Tesla built his flying saucers around 1915, using his tuned, resonant air-core coils. 62 years ago, there was a secret German flying saucer project at Los Alamos, using technology stolen from Tesla, called "p2", the existence of which has been carefully concealed.

Baron Wernher von Braun was in charge of that project. He dated several women in the Santa Fe area, in 1936-38, and those women described him as a romantic and gregarious man. He moved rather freely from Germany, to here, then back to there, to run Germany's top secret "rocket" center at Peenemunde, then easily glided once again back to Ft. Bliss, Texas, in 1945, all with the facility of a gazelle leaping a small creek. Von Braun was not an inventor, but more of a "pusher" of projects...a "politician with a rocket". He has been depicted as a "dreamer", who only wanted to "go to the moon"...to travel "...beyond the stars". Now that we know of his control ova the "p2" project, on behalf of the Illuminati, a secret society to which the major political players—Hitler, Einstein, Von Braun, Himmler, Lenin, Trotsky, David Rockefeller, to name only a very few—all belonged, the almost incredible phenomenon of von Braun's international cha-cha is more fully understood. And what of the false story that there was "...nothing at Los Alamos but a boy's camp" before the war? It is simply not possible that those responsible for that story could be so ignorant, and the "Los Alamos Story" is just one more chapter in the Book of the Big Lie, intended to magnify the importance of the huge government expenditures there, by laying claim to many things which were developed first elsewhere, by other people. Even the "p2" project was second-hand, having been stolen from Tesla.

WEIGHTLESSNESS, "p2", AND THE TUBES OF FORCE

It is my belief that an important fact has been ostensibly omitted from what is taught today...that a falling body will cease to accelerate when it reaches a velocity of about 120 m.p.h....at which it naturally maintains or tends to maintain a constant velocity. Has this been secreted away by the Illuminati, because it presupposes other important facts, which naturally occur once the first fact is known? If so, it represents additional proof of the existence of an interceding 'substance'—the ether—and suggests the accumulation of something at a predetermined rate which has reached its maximum under the natural forces present. If the reaction due to the gravitational constant G ceases to accelerate a body at the 120 mph velocity, it could be because of a time-related "equal and opposite reaction" to the force with which it is actuated to move downward, evidenced by the counter-buildup of momentum, sufficient to cancel the acceleration due to the gravitational force G. Does this buildup cancel the G-force, proportionately with time, as the body finally becomes weightless, with its entire gravity cancelled?

Could it be for this reason that one physically, momentarily, senses complete weightlessness, when riding in an airplane which is taking off, at the instant that it passes through the 120 mph velocity? Most people probably think the sensation is when the plane leaves the ground, because so many planes leave the ground at about the same time, but the sensation of physical weightlessness is quite different than just becoming airborne, and can be felt in the inner ear, causing a special sensation in the stomach. It is also possible that the principle of aerodynamic lift is supplemented by the tubes of force as stated in the Introduction.

As atmospheric air resistance slows down a falling body, the gravitational constant again comes into play, so as to accelerate it once again to the constant velocity, and so forth, thus maintaining the constant velocity, at which the equal and opposite positive-mass G-force, and the anti-gravity, electropulsive neutralizing force, are in equilibrium, with the precession angle at its maximum, and precession frequency at its minimum.

Michael Faraday's experiments showed that an excess negative charge will always appear on the surface of an enclosed, hollow vessel. You place a charge inside, and it will always appear on the outside. This mystery is a convenient tool for flying saucer technology, because we don't want those charges jumping around inside our cockpit, all over us, but want them outside, where they can do their work.

All bodies are essentially composed of entities which represent "electrical content" (protons, electrons, neutrons). The presence of these charges in a dynamic mass, allows it to generate or attract its own electrons, to create them from Omni Matter, or to emit them, and to encounter its own gravitational reactions, according to its relative movement, within the magnetic and electric fields of its environment.

This is probably what Nikola Tesla had in mind in his Dynamic Theory of Gravity, The fact that the government has it, and no copies of it are available to the public, should indicate the importance of this over 100-year-old theory, except most scientists have never even heard of the theory. We already know that the same Trilateral/Illuminati symbol was used in the original Nazi-run "p2" Los Alamos project, and in Chapter II, I relate how it appeared on the 1950's I.G.S. resonator implantations. It has been reported in several forms on UFOs.

According to what we know about the difference between the gravitational, electrical, and electromagnetic interactions, if there is a tiny excess positive charge on the proton--so small that its detection has been concealed from ordinary gullible 'physicists'—such a charge could hypothetically be the origin of the weak "gravitational interaction". Suppose the gravitational force is equal to the electrical force created by the hypothetical excess positive charge of the hydrogen proton, in terms of accounting for its "gravity", which is the least for all known elements. For the same reasons, all the elements would be very close to being weightless, An atom of even one of the heavier elements, lead, may require the addition of less than a single election, to gravitationally/electrically cancel all of its mass units, and to give it the same charge-to-mass ratio as hydrogen. In order for us to appreciate the power electrons exert over protons and neutrons, it should be emphasized mat the mass of a proton is around 1,837 times that of an electron, (the neutron having a slightly higher ratio). While it is said that the neutron is electrically neutral, because it is composed of a proton and a 'tightly bound electron', this neutrality only applies to electrical conductivity, and has not been shown to relate to electro-gravitation. The neutron's tightly bound electron already cancels most of its positive charge, but the cumulative total of all the tiny excess positive charges—if the Lorentz hypothesis is correct—of the 82 protons and 125 other neutrons of the lead atom, are still unaccounted for. Under these circumstanoes, the vast differences between electromagnetic and gravitational interactions favors "gravity". Since it would only be necessary to add whatever negative charge required to equal the totality of all those tiny excessive positive charges, in order to completely cancel the gravity of the lead atom, it would be necessary to add less than a single complete electron! Otherwise, the lead atom would already possess another electron. The first thing that an atom "does" when its nuclear mass develops an (electrical) "need" for another electron, is to acquire a new one in its outer orbit.

All atoms, molecules, or compounds, composing the matter on or around our earth, are predominantly electro-positive (although some of them are considered electro-negative in relation to hydrogen, sometimes by as much as perhaps six volts, but this is only in terms of "free electrons", in non-ionized states). The charge-to-mass ratios of all elements are positive in nature, because in all cases, even hydrogen, there is excess positive mass in their nuclei.

The high voltage charges on a saucer's front or top, easily "penetrate" electron cloud barriers, and should exhibit an electrical attractive force toward external positive matter, which according to Lorentz, is 2.2 x 10^{39} times stronger than the gravitational attractive force, but this is not true, and does not work "at a distance". This huge force, which according to the Newtonians, acts over a greater distance, conflicts with the Relativists, who don't believe there is a force at a distance, which is something I agree with, for different reasons. The "electromagnetic interaction", for reasons unexplained, is less than this, or 10^{40} times the gravitational "interactive" force G. If the Relativists don't believe in force at a distance, why do they keep referring to the "attractive" force?

AN ALTERNATIVE TO THE LORENTZ TRANSFORMATION

It has been incorrectly assumed that the Michelson-Morley Experiments disproved the existence of an ether, based on a failure to observe a "shift" (the "red-shift") on the fringes of two light beams placed at 90 degrees, perpendicular to the earth, at equidistant positions from their point of intersectioa Since ether theory asserted the ether as the medium which conducts light through space, and since no shift was observed, these results were misinterpreted to mean that there is no ether. This experiment was based on Lorentz' erroneous concept of a "quiescent, stationery ether", which held that there is an ether 'wind' which is everywhere the same, and that Maxwell's deficient calculation of C was a constant, but which in fact failed to provide two required constants of integration for time (one for each of its two differential equations), which included no definition of Maxwell's coordinate system's position and velocity (as a vector sum).

The false assumptions which arose from this failure by Maxwell resulted in the Lorentz' equation, called the Lorentz Transformation, which had built into it, the elastic space/time frame which attempted to supply Maxwell's lack of definition, and to explain the red shift observed near planets in space. It was this elastic space-time frame in the Lorentz Transformation which was adopted by Einstein in his Relativity theory, initiated to conceal and suppress ether physics.

Since ether theory had already assumed that gravity is a function of the ether, Einstein was incorrect to treat photons the same way as material bodies, to explain the red-shift, with the theory that the photons passing near a planet were "curved by the space-time continuum", producing the spectral shift. According to the Relativists, it was supposedly proved, on May 29,1919, "...that we live in a curved, four-dimensional space-time"'. Albert Einstein said a massive body spinning in space "...would drag space and time around with it...", the origin of so-called "frame-dragging" and "space curvature" which Tesla was so opposed to, along with Einstein's statement, "Gravity is no longer a mysterious force acting at a distance but the result of an object trying to travel in a straight line through space curved by the presence of material bodies".

---

[1]Gary Taubes, Relativists in Orbit, Discover (Mar., 1997).

In researching for more possible explanations for this apparent tragi-comedy of mistakes, I found an article by Swedish physicist, John-Erik Persson[1], who seemed to agree with me. Persson said the Michelson-Morley experiment showed that the ether is space-dependent, not non-existent. Since the observations were made by stationary equipment in relation to earth (moving at over 70,000 mph through space), it was not a valid ground for postulating Relativity. If the ether has a constant velocity V in relation to the observer, the observed velocity of light becomes a vector sum C + V, according to ether theory. If the observer is moving at the same velocity and in the same direction as the ether, no red-shift should be observed. Michelson's empirical results showed that V, near the earth, is equal to the velocity of the nearest part of the earth (in the horizontal plane), in agreement with an ether which was stationary near the earth. This gave rise to Relativity, which made the false assumption that an observer will always find V to be zero, independent of his own velocity, giving rise to elastic space-time concepts, which are against intuition.

What I always point out as Einstein's preoccupation with his "apparent effects", resulting from an observer's failure to take into consideration his own motion, as well as the possibility that the ether has zero velocity only near the earth's surface. This zero velocity was due to what Tesla said was the "rigidification" of the ether caused by the emanation of earth's rapidly varying electrostatic forces, which would decrease in intensity at the square of the distance from earth, as the ether would have a commensurately increased relative motion. This same rigidification of the ether was consistent with Tesla's (Faraday's, Wm. Thomson's) statement that the ether behaved as a "fluid to material bodies, and a solid to heat and light", as still another explanation for the red-shift. That would allow the ether near planets to refract the light passing near it. Persson said that the theory of the ether interprets Maxwell's results as

The velocity of Light = C + V.

With the missing space dependent V(R) (velocity V and position vector R) supplied, the Lorentz Transformation is unnecessary, (and rationality and truth are restored to physics!). V(R) must represent a description of reality, and the reality of material particles is defined everywhere by acceleration A(R), concerning the distribution of matter in a vicinity. We have reason to suspect a relationship between V(R) (the translational field) and A(R), (the gravitational field), showing their common origin (the ether), shown by a photon (a fast wave field) added to gravity (the ether, a slow reference field). Since V(R) (the fast wave field) is the distribution of matter in the vicinity, it has the same value as the nearest part of a big material body it may be near, as a more reasonable interpretation which agrees with the Michelson-Morley experiment, showing that the photon adapts its velocity to local conditions.

This means that the space-dependency of the translational field, V(R), allows the theories of Newton and Maxwell to be united without any non-linear Lorentz Transformations, and that, by the rule of Ockham's Razor, the Translational Field is a more plausible explanation than the Theory of Relativity.

---

[1]John-Erik Persson, About an Alternative to the Lorentz-Transformation (Hagersten, Sweden, 1997).

I had always assumed that, since calculations of C made in conductors and fiber optics, require the "velocity factor" (.97 x C in free space), that such an adaptation of C to the local conditions of the conductors, disproves the Lorentz Transformation and the Theory of Relativity.

NIKOLA TESLA'S DYNAMIC THEORY OF GRAVITY

Tesla's Dynamic Theory of Gravity (c. 1893-94) was based on the idea that all bodies emit microwaves (rapidly varying electrostatic forces) of particular voltage and frequency, as determined by their "electrical content" (mass, composed of protons, electrons, and neutrons), and relative motion. Tesla measured the microwaves of the earth with a special tube he invented (you could see the peaks and nodes of the microwaves created in the gas in the tube), as being only a few centimeters in wavelength. He said the frequency and voltage were related to the velocity and mass (electrical content) of the earth, and that gravitational interaction between bodies, was determined by the vector product of the mutual interaction of their microwaves with the ether, and to electric currents and tubes of force, passing through space and between and within bodies.

Tesla confirmed this, placing two metal plates a certain distance apart, and electrifying them with high voltage, high frequency currents ("Tesla currents", or "microwaves"). At sufficiently high voltage and frequency, the space between them became "solid state". It also worked with one plate only, suspending the zinc plate (1/8" thick x 12" square, weighing about two pounds) in mid-air. This is further documented in 1943 FBI documents released under the F.O.I.A., as being witnessed by Marguerite Merrington, in an 1894 demonstration by Tesla in his Houston Street laboratory.[1]

"p2"

The flying saucer uses "p2", which refers to two potentials, primaries or kinds of currents. The forward end of a saueer--"pl"—uses Tesla's tuned "Single Terminal Coil" (see page 300 for set of plans), tuned to either 1/4 wavelength, or 3/8th wavelength. It is an air-core, step-up transformer, which converts normal A.C. current to high voltage, high frequency current, which has charge-increasing effects similar to an electrostatic generator, but with a much greater reactance, due to its high frequency and tuning, which allows it to shoot out bursts of current of one sign (positive or negative) from one end, while remaining neutral or peak reverse voltage on the other end. Tesla created this coil specifically for the purpose of powering his flying saucer, even before the century began. Tesla noted and was greatly pleased by the "pseudo-electrostatic" effects of his coils. In writing a critique of the enormous Van de Graaff generator built by M.I.T. and tested in 1938, Tesla pointed out the fact mat only a tiny version of one of his coils, dating from the 1890s, would outperform the giant Van de Graaff. This is because a Tesla coil uses alternating, high frequency, high voltage inductance, to throw out electrostatic, D.C. pulses. A much smaller unit will produce the necessary high voltages, through inductance, and a much smaller conductor will carry the high frequency current, while D.C. systems require much larger conductors for the same total wattage. In MHD pumping, it has been proven that a pulsing DC, current is better than a steady D.C. current, so the Tesla coil is ideal for the flying saucer application, producing the traditional purplish brush, a facsimile to the earth's aurora borealis.

---

[1]FBI Documents Regarding Nikola Tesla (252 pages), Part 1, page 49, LIST OF PERSONS ASSOCIATED WITH NIKOLA TESLA.

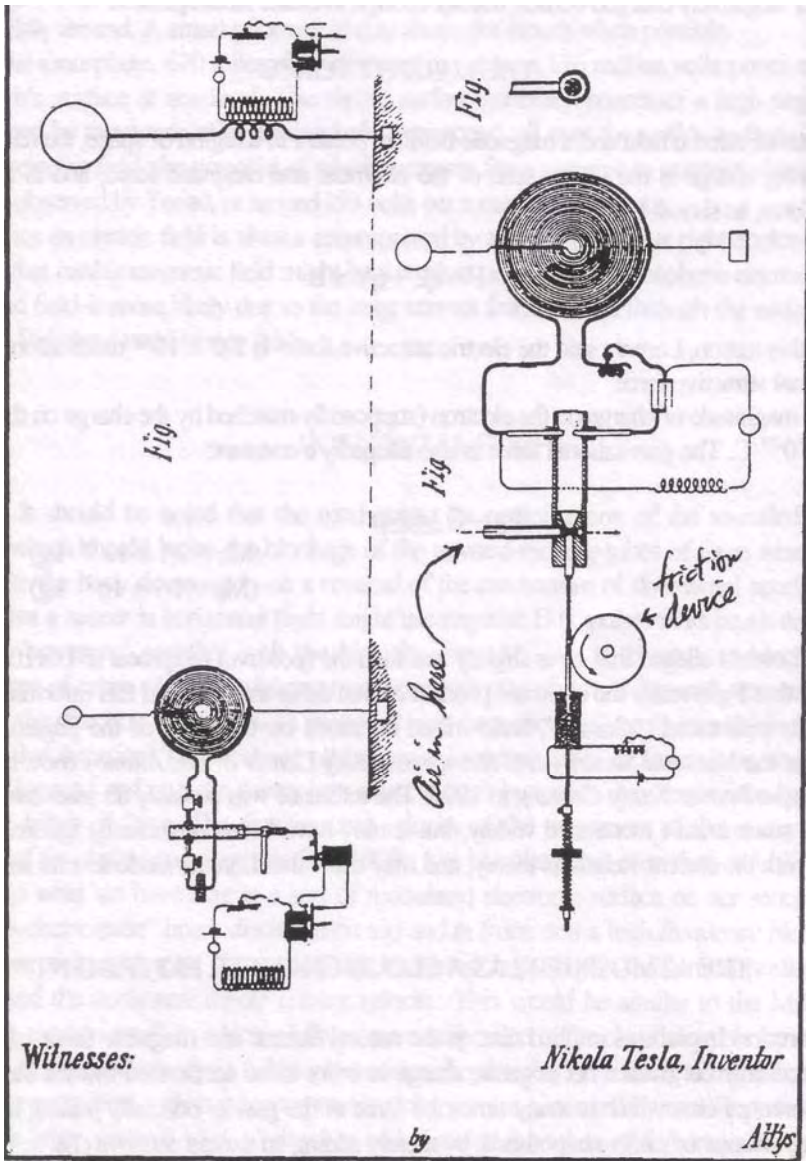
Using "p2", the vastly greater strength of the electromagnetic interaction is applied to control the very weak, gravitational interaction, to pump the ether and tubes of force into the ship and dissolve them, to impart momentum to the conductors attached to the ship, at right angles to the electric and magnetic fields, as explained in the Introduction. A relatively small amount of electromagnetic force, created by an alternator turned by a Tesla turbine, can easily dominate the gravity of a large ship, create electromagnetic momentum, and propel it at great speed.

In theory, an oscillating electric dipole consists of two equal and opposite charges of dipole moment p, where p oscillates sinusoidally with time. A dipole which is tuned to 3/8th or 1/4 wavelength, will continue to throw out energy even when the conditions are reversed, because there is a time-lag between changes in charge and current distributioa The power radiated varies as the fourth power of the frequency, so the higher the frequency, the higher the reactance. The use of the 3/8th tuning, causes the positive and negative potentials to cross and neutralize one another on the neutral end, while emitting the desired peak negative pulses at the other. The 3/8th tuning is convenient where it is desireable to have a neutral connection for the lower end of the coil. Since all gravitational atomic mass has a net positive charge, the negative charges are needed to manipulate gravity. The positive mass possessed by the ether carriers, reacts with the negative pulses, to attract them into the conductor, aeating and bringing along the tubes of force, which are dissolved in the conductor, to impart momentum to the conductor, with a force which is 10^{40} times stronger than the gravitational force:

$Fe/Fg = 10^{40} \times Fg$

The primary L-C circuit is composed of a primary coil (of few turns, using a large conductor), choke coil, spark gap, tuning coil, and capacitors. This combination produces the primary frequency for inductance of the secondary coil, of many turps, using a small conductor. The inverse ratio in number of turns and conductor size converts the electricity from low to high pressure. Tesla found that a primary coil consisting of a wide, thin, strip of metal, laid down flat between layers of insulation, was best, because it had less (undesirable) "self-inductance". This is even better with the bi-filar coil, which eliminates self-inductance altogether.

(NOTE: The following illustration was an unlabeled drawing from a patent application which Tesla withdrew, to prevent J.P. Morgan from acquiring the invention, since Morgan tricked Tesla into giving him a 51% controlling interest in "all his patents", when he funded his Wardenclyffe world energy system project When Tesla was driven into bankruptcy, the patent didn't issue and Morgan didn't own it. Tesla made this discovery at about the time his Colorado Springs experiments ended, as a new way to produce electricity from air, shown as follows:



The consideration of gravity as a separate force may be superfluous, since it appears to be a naturally occurring weak electromagnetic interaction in the first place, caused by displacement of the nuclei of atomic mass downward by the upward passage of ether carriers and dissolving tubes of force, induced by the currents created by the movement of mass through space.

As previously stated, gravitational mass is almost electrically balanced and neutral. If a flying saucer has an artificially created, strong, relatively negative charge, it will strongly attract relatively positive ether carriers. Of course, where this attraction is equal in every direction, the saucer will go nowhere. Since all atomic mass, elements, and compounds have net positive charges which exceed their normal negative charges, there will always be some electrical attractive force between matter and negatively charged bodies, but not enough to create electropulsion.

THE LORENTZ FORCE

If both an electric field and a magnetic field are present in a region of space, the resulting force on a moving charge is the vector sum of the electrical and magnetic force, and is known as a Lorentz Force, as shown by:

$$F = qE + qVxB$$

For this reason, Lorentz said the electric attractive force is 2.2×10^{39} times stronger than the gravitational attractive force.

The magnitude of charge on the electron (supposedly matched by the charge on the proton) is $e = 1.6 \times 10^{-19}$ C. The gravitational force is also allegedly a constant:

$$Fg = G\frac{MeNp}{r^2} \qquad (Me = 9.1 \times 10^{-31}\ kg) \quad (Mp = 1.7 \times 10^{-27}\ kg)$$

(NOTE: Lorentz alleged that e+ is slightly less than the (positive) reciprocal to $1.6xl0^{-19}$ C, which suggested that Fg is really the electrical product of that difference. I found this information only by incidentally referenced ("glossed", handwritten notations on the sides of the pages) in material available at the National Security and Resources Study Center at Ins Alamos (now called The J. Robert Oppenheimer Study Center), in 1979. The reference was possibly an inadvertent "lapse in security", since it isn't mentioned widely, but it may have been conveniently ignored because it conflicts with the current Relativist theory, and may show that Lorentz made several serious errors.

THE ATMOSPHERE AS A CLOUD CHAMBER EXPERIMENT

Lorentz' hypothesis implied that, in the natural electric and magnetic fields of the earth, a saucer need only be given a net negative charge in order to be accelerated toward the ionosphere with a Lorentz Force which is many times the force of the gravity normally pulling it downward. According to Lorentz's naive hypothesis, by merely adding an excess negative charge to a ship, the force of gravity would be neutralized, just that easy! Would this not only free the craft from inertial as well as gravitational force, while also repelling it upward with the like' negative charges on the earth? I once thought that, once conditions necessary for electromagnetic repulsion have come into play, there would be no gravity. Would that it were so easy! Lorentz' silly theory was wrong! We all make mistakes.

Besides, during thunderstorms, the electric field is reversed, due to the high negative charges on the bottoms of thunderclouds, which multiply the potentials around ten times. Had Lorentz' hypothesis been true, a saucer would be slammed to the ground with astounding force, though I have often observed that saucers do experience apparent malfunctions in lightning storms, but not enough to drive them down. There must be some provision for quickly adjusting the potentials and amperage to maintain somewhat stable flight beneath a thunder cloud, as the ships sometimes jump wildly around. A smart pilot would stay above the clouds when possible.

The ionosphere, 620 miles above the earth, is at least 176 million volts positive in respect to the earth's surface at sea level. The earth's surface generally possesses a high negative charge, maintained by thousands of lightening bolts per second, all over the earth's surface. This creates a vertical electric field, the potential of which increases from negative to positive, about 50 volts per foot (as observed by Tesla), or around 150 volts per meter, on a clear day.

Since an electric field is always accompanied by a magnetic field at right angles to it, this also implies that earth's magnetic field might be a product of this earth-ionospheric electric field, but the magnetic field is more likely due to the huge current from the sun through the earth, as noted by Kristian Birkeland and Hannes Alfen.

HORIZONTAL FLIGHT

It should be noted that the mechanism for neutralization of the so-called gravitational force—which should be by the blockage of the upward-moving tubes of force which dissolve to accelerate the body downward—as a reversal of the mechanism of downward acceleration. This means that a saucer in horizontal flight might use negative D.C. pulses in its brush discharge on its top, for 'bouyancy', together with the high freqency A.C. on its bottom, to block the upward movement of tubes of force, while a stronger negative brush on (its forward, attracts the tubes of force in the direction of travel (with increased high frequency A.C. to its rear to block the tubes of force in that direction).The blockage of the upward-moving tubes of force alone, should block the force of 'gravity' and give the saucer bouyancy, though buoyancy may require the brush on top to bring in tubes of force. The direction and velocity of the movement of the saucer is the vector product of the electric and magnetic fields of the two bi-polar pairs, according to J.J Thomson.

So what we have here is a sort of modulated electronic surface on our saucer; a negative "pseudo-electrostatic" brush discharge on top and in front, and a high frequency blocking current on bottom and to the rear. The vertical dipole creates 'buoyancy'—the vertical position above the earth—and the horizontal dipole creates velocity. This would be similar to the Milliken "cloud chamber experiments", in which oil drops were suspended in the cloud chamber by adjustment of external electric and magnetic fields cris-crossing the chamber, in respect to the charges possessed by oil drops, except with our saucer, moving charges are generated by motive power within it, to affect the ether external to it, to draw in and dissolve the tubes of force to accelerate it in any direction, in defiance to the magnetic and electric fields of the "chamber" (earth's atmosphere). Superimposed over this "oil drop" environment, is a double "p2"—one to position the saucer vertically, and the other to move it sideways—by emitting negative charges on one end to neutralize the gravitational and inertial effects on the other, thus actuating the ether and creating a powerful force to effortlessly propel the saucer forward instantaneously, while the internal effects of inertia, momentum and polarity are instantaneously switched and controlled, and the mass of the saucer is liberated from the ordinary rules of gravity, inertia, momentum and polarity, with the saucer's internal (human and mechanical) contents protected from these forces.

Based on Tesla's knowledge that the production of moving negative charges was essential for the Teleforce to act upon his "electric flying machine", he invented the "Tesla coil". The coil manipulates, recreates and magnifies the forces which normally exist, between atoms, and between e+ and e-, to control Fg, and to accelerate a body at astounding speeds.

It is important to understand the effect of the shape of the outer hull on the distribution of the action of the force. Were the hull shaped concave, rather than convex, the force field might become focused on a point some distance from the saucer, and react so as to merely draw whatever ether carriers and tubes of force might be at that focal point, toward the saucer with astounding force. It is for this reason that the outer hull is curved above, so as to "spread" the area over which the force acts to a very large area, drawing the tubes of force in.

As pulses of high voltage, high frequency negative charges move outward to distribute themselves over the saucer surface, some combine with atmospheric gasses and "slough off" as ions, creating a "protective envelope" which shields the saucer from friction and heat, dampens the sonic boom, and creates the "beautiful corona" I observed in 1953...the "lights" often seen. I'm sure this fact makes the "Illuminati" very, very, happy, so let's ruin it for them.

Graphic by Angus Lyne

CHAPTER II: PIECES OF THE PUZZLE COME TOGETHER

Now that I have introduced you to the theory and possibilities, I will now get down to the nitty gritties of flying saucer nuts and bolts, and tell you how I discovered them, step by step, in an Odyssey which lasts even unto the present, as I fill in more and more of the details.

My "odyssey" has involved some remarkable experiences and dangers which, in a way, remind me of a movie I saw a few years ago called Zardoz, starring Sean Connery. The title was derived from parts of the title words spelling "Wizard of Oz", on the cover of the book by L. Frank Baum. The story in Zardoz entailed the education of Connery by a secret elite. Connery played a murderous barbarian, through whom the elite, who had the secret of immortality, wanted to finally destroy themselves, because they had become tired of living. They arranged for tidbits of information to be made available to the barbarian, until he figured out that they were deceiving the violent society in which he lived, through a religious hoax, preaching constant destruction and war, and spewing out weapons from a giant head, for the barbarian worshippers to use against each other, while the elite lived in complete safety, with the secret of immortality as well. As you may see, there are certain parallels between my story and Zardoz, although I am not admitting that the society into which I was born tried to completely raise me as a barbarian, or that the elite which dominates us has any intent of bringing their power to an end The many "revelations" I have experienced, have appeared before me as if intentionally placed there by some clandestine elite. That did not happen to my knowledge, but it is creative and fun to imagine that it did.

Some have suggested that the fact that so many startling 'revelations' have seemed to have 'appeared' to me "alone", is "statistically challenging". The fact is, they appeared to me only because I was aware of them and not asleep. Had I not been aware of them, I would not have known about them I believe that there are astounding events occurring around many people, who, if they were aware of them, and mentioned them to others, as I have done, would also be accused of telling "statistically challenging" stories. I make no claim to having any "mystical powers" which would allow me to experience things others do not. What I do make claim to is the development of my natural skills to notice such things, so that if they occur, I will recognize them.

It is too bad that the analogy of Zardoz does not fully apply to the Trilateral Commission, since they deserve to be destroyed, as punishment for the many wars they fomented, and are still fomenting, to needlessly sacrifice so many lives for an illicit profit, and to reduce the population according to parameters which only they know about, but which we can surmise.

As you will see in this book, this analogy as applied to our society and its Secret Government is more appropriate than the typical Corporate Serf will allow himself to believe. He gets up each morning in the "burbs, and drives to his job at the Feudal Corporation. He takes his Stepford Wife and love-starved children to the Church of the Brain-Dead War Robots on Sunday, and prays to the Lord of Collective Guilt for forgiveness, for the sin of having daydreamed about living a real life. He indiscriminately accepts the premises that he is "his brother's keeper", that the Marxist graduated federal income tax and the welfare system are the best way to enforce his religion on others through the state, as part of 'God's plan under our constitution', and that the Founding Fathers fully intended for our armed forces to police the whole goddamned world no matter what the cost in taxes and loss of American lives. He doesn't know that the government records every single phone call in America and stores it for a period of two weeks...and longer if they have a reason to suspect a person of belonging to a "conspiracy of freedom"...and can store that purloined information forever (but if he did know all that, he would believe the government had the legitimate power to do so under the "general welfare" provision of the Article I, section 8 of the U.S. Constitution). He doesn't believe in flying saucers at all, but if he did, he would think they were "signs in the sky" which the Old Testament said would be seen in the "last days', or the "wheel in the sky" seen by the prophet Ezekiel. The CIA has used all these suggestions.

The flying saucer I saw in 1953 was no prophetic "sign in the sky", but presented a genuine scientific mystery. I saw no sense in attempting to address every theory of gravity propounded by others, since they were obviously wrong. I didn't waste time with UFO reports or "updates" of every type either. Government organizations like Project Blue Book were just set up to plug leaks anyway. You are already familiar with what others have said, and are obviously unsatisfied, because you are now reading my book. So I will at least try to tell you how flying saucers work, and what my theory of gravity is, while others pretend that flying saucers are non-existent or "extraterrestrial" and that gravity is still a "mystery". They look in vain for "waves" and "particles" (such as the "graviton"), and have really found nothing. Their experiments are only part of the Trilateralist science sham, and since they are still looking, they must not know, right? So I will stick my neck out, and give you my best shot. If what they say is really the extent of their knowledge, then the flying saucer would be one of those inventions which worked, but nobody who used it knew why, so if they really don't know, then I should be entitled to the Nobel Prize in physics (which is out of the question), or the Pulitzer Prize for Journalism (which I should get!).

THE ODYSSEY BEGINS

My "flying saucer odyssey" began with an infantile boy's experiences with airplanes. My uncle, Roger Benton, had a Stearman biplane in the late '30s and early '40s, which he used for crop-dusting and any other hell or hair-raising, dangerous, daredevil-type fun activity. When I was around three, Roger flew into my grandfather's ("Papa Benton's") field one day. Like a kid, Papa wanted a ride. Roger was a "chip off the old block", and inherited his love of excitement from his father. So, instead of a bronco, Papa wanted a ride in the plane.

Roger took Papa up and gave him quite a thrill, especially when he looped the plane, and Papa had forgotten to fasten his safety belt. He saved himself only by locking his knees under the instrument panel, and hanging onto the joy stick. When Roger landed, Papa was still grinning, with a pale fringe about his lips and eyes revealing his narrow scrape with disaster. But that was part of the usual for those two.

I fell in love with planes that day, as I waved to Roger, and he disappeared into the clouds. My second 'big' plane impression was when I was around four, in 1942. Our neighbor had gone into flight training, and was stationed at a base which was near enough for him to buzz the neighborhood while on training flights. One morning, after a storm had flash-flooded the street in front of our little stucco house, with around a foot of standing water, I was wading in the street and gathering frogs which seemed to come from nowhere, since we lived on a desert. As I stood in the water-filled street, the flying neighbor came over, diving toward me while rocking his wings. His pull-out was almost too late, as I stood with my hands upraised, touching one of the wheels with my fingertips as the plane passed over me, narrowly missing me with its prop as my mother stood horrified in the front yard. Quite unaware of the danger I had experienced, this to me had a very personal meaning, rather like the two reaching hands in the Sistine Chapel mural by Michelangelo. My fingers reached up as the 'wheel from the sky' reached down, and 'contact' was made.

In 1942, my father joined the Sea Bees. After boot camp at Camp LeJeune, the Navy convinced him to transfer to the regular Navy, because of his wife and three children, since the mortality rate for the See Bees at that time was 97%. He was sent to San Francisco, to set up and run the west coast Navy printing operation at San Francisco Naval Depot. Our whole family soon moved to Oakland, in 1943. For those two years in California, my life was immersed with being a "Navy brat", with weekends in San Francisco, and my frequent walks to the Museum of Oceanic Art, in Oakland.

At six (1944), I found a German spy's short-wave radio, set up in the back of a trash bin behind a grocery store near our apartment building. Navy intelligence allowed me to keep it, along with another my father had found in 1942, under a bed in a hotel room during his first trip to San Francisco. A neighbor and I connected the marvelous radios to his father's antenna, and we "listened to WW II". The German shortwaves were fantastic, and I have never seen another like them My mother threw them away one day because I forgot to remove them from the living room floor after repeated warnings.

My mother and three kids returned to Texas for the last year of the war, staying at my grandparents' place in Dayton, Texas, around forty miles east of Houston. (I later realized that this had been because of the Navy's test of the first American nuclear explosion at Port Chicago, California, on the Sacramento River, prior to the nuclear detonation at Trinity Site on White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico.)

After the war, our family returned to West Texas, where I resumed my interest in experimental aircraft, building many flying models. I took a strong interest in aerodynamics, and made hundreds of well-executed designs, plotted aerodynamic flow patterns, and even did some improvised wind tunnel tests. I belonged to the West Texas Model Airplane Club, organized by three or four WW II aces, including Bill Decker, Don Wooten, and a man named McKinzie (who purportedly was highly decorated), and others. Around 1952, at fourteen, I delivered a paper to the group and its affiliate in Odessa, Texas, on the feasibility of a glider and soaring competition, suggesting Marfa, Texas, as an ideal site. This meeting was attended by several men and boys from Odessa, such as Wally Scott and Mr. Schleymeyer, who later became international competitors, and there is now an annual international glider and soaring competitition meet at Marfa. I wasn't able to be the first to start it, because my father had caught me building a full-sized glider, using our living room floor as a lofting surface, and scrapped my plans right away, because he feared I might break my neck. But that lecture, in my fourteenth year, was the beginning of the international glider competition at Marfa, started by men who had heard my lecture.

Our town, Kermit, was around 325 miles E-S-E of White Sands Proving Grounds and Alamogordo, New Mexico. My first memories of "flying discs" (the first designation) and "flying saucers" (the second designation) which were sighted in the area, was in 1946, even before the 1947 "Mount Shasta" siting. Before I had seen a saucer in daylight, I had heard reports of them from oilfield pumpers who worked the area northward, near Jal, Carlsbad and Roswell, New Mexico, and had gotten other first-hand reports from several people who had seen them. From those reports, I knew that saucers were real, because that was before reports of them had appeared in newspapers, and the people sighting them really had no motive to say they had seen them unless it was true, since there was no sensationalism associated with the phenomenon. Some of these people had served in the Army Air Corps during the war, fighting in the skies of Germans', either as pilots, navigators, flight engineers, crew, gunners, or bombardiers, and often compared them to the "foo-fighters". I had watched the ships maneuvering at night, but had never seen one in broad daylight, at close range, until 1953, although I had seen several discs high in the sky, at great distances, which looked like new dimes glinting in the sun, in the Roswell vicinity.

By 1950, 1 had talked to many people who had seen saucers over the area, and was getting impatient. I slept in our back yard for nine months each year (the warmer months usually), and had observed whole squadrons of them in the night sky. I noticed that they had a peculiar habit of turning in increments of thirty degrees, or multiples thereof. This divided the compass into twelve coordinate directions, and indicated something about their navigational and flight system.

Between 1950 and 1953, 1 hoped for a sighting, and never assumed that they were anything other than secret government aircraft from New Mexico. My mother had heard the rumor that they were connected to the A.E.C. and radiation, and that they were nuclear-powered, using helium fuel. We had many friends all over New Mexico, particularly the Roswell area, Alamogordo, and Deming, because our family business was the only state-of-the-art decorating source in the area between Ft. Worth, El Paso, and Albuquerque, for several years, until 1954 or so.

By 1952, 1 had developed a proficiency at aerodynamics, had designed and tested many experimental model aircraft, and had designed, built and tested my "ground-effects" system for autos, using a model with two engines, one to drive the wheels and the other to drive a prop on the back, which sucked air from under the belly pan. I planned on a career as an aerodynamicist and aeronautical design engineer, along with a career in art. I had, in effect, prepared my mind and senses to make rather specific observations, whenever the time came for me to have the opportunity to see a saucer up close, which I was convinced was in the near future. I had already been carefully building and testing flying model airplanes of every conceivable design, for seven years, since 1946 (when I was eight), and considered aeronautical design, aerodynamics, maneuverability, and performance characteristics as serious matters. I had also flown so many conventional and experimental designs that I could usually analyze a particular configuration and predict its aerodynamic behavior. I knew from my two 1952 propeller-driven flying saucers (powered by an "Allard 19" engine), that vertical stabilizers were essential on "flying pancake"-type designs. No fins had been seen by any of my witnesses on the saucers they had observed. This was already two years after the saucers had been sighted near our house, during which time I had hoped for a sighting. Yet, with all my intense interest in aircraft, I would not ride in a real airplane until I caught a hop' from Keesler, A.F.B., Mississippi to Texas, in a general's C-47, when I was an 18-year-old Air Force trainee.

In the summer of 1950, during the time of the sightings, I had gone to the Buffalo Trail Scout Ranch in the Davis Mountains, for a two-week bivouac with my troop.

During my stay in the mountains, cut off from the outside world, after returning from a trek lasting several days, we discovered that Manchurian tanks had rolled across the 38th Parallel in Korea. On return home, I had learned that, on the first day of the Korean War, a flying saucer had appeared in broad daylight, above the city hall across the street from our house, and had maneuvered for fifteen minutes, and that, on the following day, two saucers had appeared, and maneuvered for thirty minutes. In each case, my mother was the first one to spot them She taught China painting classes as part of our family business. On each of the two days, she went outside to fill her bowl with water and rinse out slip, with water from a faucet on our front porch. Being a farmer's daughter, she had a habit of surveying the sky for weather signs, shielding her eyes from the sun's glare with her hand. When she sighted the first saucer over the City Hall on June 25, 1950, she called her ceramics class out to watch, and hailed the firemen and police across the street along with the mayor, Fred Pearson. The excitement spread, and within a few minutes, much of the town was watching. When it left, it departed in an upward blaze of instant acceleration. Mother said they were like "new silver dollars", and I distinctly remember her comparing them to her sewing machine bobbin, which meant the flat, shiny, "disk" type with peripheral groove.

On the next day, the same sequence occurred, only with two saucers appearing and maneuvering for around thirty minutes, then departing very fast as before. In each case, the description sounded as if the crews had experienced malfunctions, or were lost, which were responsible for the saucers being there in the first place, rather than over White Sands or Alamogordo. I later determined that these first saucers appeared to be of a sleek, silvery, slightly older "disk" type of WW II-vintage German design of the electric type, not similar in any way to the dumpy and "top-like" kind often shown in pulp magazines. It was my opinion at the time, that they were preparing these saucers for observational use in Korea.

I was disgruntled that I had not seen them, because I just happened to be out of town, although I was only a short distance south of White Sands, and only a little over a hundred miles to the west of Kermit at the time, in the Davis Mountains. I "debriefed" everyone I could find, including my friend Ken Burroughs, who was a competent young photographer who had photographed them Air Force Intelligence showed up, paid Ken $250.00 for his photos, prints and negatives, and made him sign a security document. Needless to say, the photos were never published. That was a lot of money for a teenager in 1952, for a few snapshots.

By that time, I had designed over 250 different types of experimental aircraft, rockets, cars, and even boats, and had built and tested numerous models of them. As previously mentioned, I had also built a couple of propeller-driven model flying saucers, and already knew that props, jets, and rockets were not the means of propulsioa In 1955, my father accidentally included my portfolio of designs in a collection of unwanted furniture he carted away and sold to a junk store, when we moved to Waco. It was possible that some of my designs found their way into the rocket and aircraft fields, judging from material I saw when I worked in Air Force Intelligence in 1957, since my book containing them was purchased from the junk dealer, whose store was right on Highway 302, before I could get it back

MY FIRST DAYLIGHT SIGHTING

In late summer, 1953, just before school began, we had our last family ice cream party of the summer, in our back yard Home made ice cream had been a tradition in our family for as long as I can remember. There were my parents, Raymond and Caleista, my older sister, Ramona, and my younger sister, Liz. Liz sat on a towel placed on top of the large, wood-sided, old fashioned, three-gallon ice cream freezer, as I turned the crank, while my father chopped ice and fed salt into the brine. The ice cream was almost ready, and I could barely turn the crank We were joined by the young daughter of our neighbor, Allen Pike, a former fullback at T.C.U. Pike's daughter, Carla, had been wistfully looking through the fence, her mouth watering at die possibility of eating some of my mother's delicious peach ice cream, so we invited her over to join us. We were also joined by our tenants, the Humphries. Mr. Humphries was a leather-faced tool pusher for a local drilling company, and Mrs. Humphries still carried herself with the demeanor of her former wartime occupation as an officer in the "W.A.C.s" (Women's Army Air Corps). She had eyes like a hawk, and had already been an expert shot with pistol and rifle, before she took up and mastered the twin 50 caliber machine gun. She had light brown hair, and a beautiful aquiline profile like that of a Kiowa princess, similar to that of my Aunt Sina. She worked as a substitute teacher in our junior high school, and had also been the former WWII Chief of Aerial Gunnery Instruction, at the U.S. Army Air Corps Aerial Gunnery School, at Sarasota, Florida, at the rank of captain. Whenever our B-17 bomber crews took gun-camera film of any new German aircraft, such as the infamous "foo fighters", she was among the first to know, since it was her duty to immediately develop and integrate into her gunnery training program, whatever new instructions required, to insure that our gunners were prepared to defend our bombers from any new forms of enemy assault. She was therefore not only a qualified expert aircraft spotter and identifier, but was the chief American gunnery instructor as well. I myself had practically memorized Jane's Handbook of the Aircraft of the World, and had discussed aircraft on several occasions with Mrs. Humphries, who had observed with a cool, detached candor, my construction of flying model saucers, and experiments in electromagnetism.

The time of day was near sundown, with the late August sun around 15 degrees above the horizon on the right, to the west of our yard. We sat near our rear fence, as little Carla, around seven, sat nearby.

As I struggled with the increasingly stubborn crank, while Liz tried to hold the freezer down, and the dasher trudged through the ever-thickening ice cream, I happened to glance up at the sky above Liz's head, in the direction of a nearby new water tower to the south of the town's old one. To my amazement, hovering there, at an angle of around 45 degrees above our position, at a distance of around 300 feet and an altitude of about 200 feet, was a flying saucer.

The saucer was precessing at an acute angle of around 45 degrees, at a frequency of around two cycles per second. Sunlight, from the horizon to our right, shimmered across the striated, silvery, bright metal hull, on each precession. A visual comparison to the water tower near and to the rear of the saucer, showed its diameter to be close to 50 feet. Its shape consisted of two evenly curved semispheres joined at the edges. This was unlike the earlier, 1950 versions seen by my mother and sisters. A cloud of "corona"—high voltage electricity emitted by the hull—throbbed orange-pinkishly with each precession, and scintillated into ghostly, silvery blue in the surrounding space, as a gentle westerly breeze wafted the coronal clouds softly about.

The two entirely symmetrical, "wok-like" halves, each having an arc of approximately 120' radius of curvature, formed a ship approximately 10' thick.

The high angle precession created an initial optical illusion, which explained why my mother had mistakenly thought the saucers she saw in 1950 were flipping like coins, end-over-end, while hovering. Mother's sightings were in the early afternoon, with the sun almost directly above her saucers, producing a silhouette effect. This created an inverse illusion, by the large angle precession of the elliptical shapes under those lighting conditions. The low angle of the sun during my sighting, however, and the shimmering sunlight dancing across what appeared to be a spun metal hull, which was highly reflective, as the saucer precessed, produced a clear picture of the movement and shape. Even so, I too was initially baffled until I established the proper movement. The coronal discharge and scintillating, rainbow-colored clouds produced, added a beautiful, ghostly "special effect" to the ship. It was easy to understand why many viewers might get excited by "extraterrestrials", since the event was almost, but not quite, unearthly.

I immediately exclaimed, "Look at that flying saucer up there!" Everyone looked to see it, except Mrs. Humphries, who only allowed her eyes to dart once at it, instead of staring at the saucer. She was more interested in viewing me from my left, as I looked back and forth between the saucer and her, attempting to get her to look at it. I asked her, "What is that?!" She merely cocked a knowing and sophisticated left eyebrow, and shrugged

After perhaps ten seconds of hovering, the saucer began to move slowly at first, due west, toward Ft. Bliss and the southern extreme of White Sands Missile Range. It left a 'buttermilk' trail of silvery, scintillating atmospheric ions, which lingered and sparkled, gradually fading away. As the rate of acceleration and frequency of precession increased, the angle of precession decreased to a mere high-frequency wobble, as it suddenly shot forward to hundreds of miles per hour, at which time it made a 90 degree turn down and a second right angle back to horizontal, then accelerated to infinity, in approximately three seconds, as I counted off "...thousand-and-one, thousand-and-two, thousand-and-three...". I roughly calculated the velocity at near 9,000 m.p.h., based on an approximately 7.5 miles distance required for a 50-foot diameter object to become an infinite point above the horizon, in three seconds. This was a minimum calculation, which I believe was fairly accurate. My eyesight was at least 20/30 at the time. The rapid change to lower altitude seemed designed to diminish the visibility of the ship by the public, when the flight crew suddenly realized that they were over a town.

There was no sonic boom, perhaps because such rapid acceleration gave a boom insufficient time to develop, and other reasons which I was bound to discover.

There were no obvious protuberances or windows that I could see on its surface. It was as if, at high speed, the pilots—who may have had relatively primitive navigational, flight control, and visibiliiy devices—had accidentally strayed over our town, or malfunctioned, requiring some re-orientation to get the saucer back to their base at Ft. Bliss or in New Mexico, which, at that speed, would have taken every bit of 1.93 minutes to reach. I later satisfied myself by concluding that it was a German pilot instructing an American pilot, on how to operate the saucer. Due to poor visibility on the early model, they may not have realized that they were over a town, and when they had, they rapidly departed In that area, at that time, one could fly for miles over the barren Southwestern landscape, without seeing a town or persoa

The most significant 'surprise'—aside from the electrical corona discharge—was the precession and its particularities. Since it was most pronounced when the saucer was hovering, I considered the phenomenon as being closely linked to the power level, in which the ship was on the balance between "gravity" and "no gravity", during which the circling polarity of the accompanying magnetic field created by the electric currents, swept around counter-clockwise, as well as I remember it, thus creating a minimal sweeping gravitational pull. The fact that the ship quietly hovered, dispelled the idea that jet, rocket, or propeller-driven propulsion was involved, and indicated an anti-gravitational propulsion by electrical means. I entertained the idea that the 'gyscopic' action of the ship may have been due to an internal device, such as an engine, which rotated Since the ship processed while hovering, like a gyroscope on gimbals, any considerable rotating machinery could have produced the gyroscopic precession. This was consistent with the idea that a rotating engine and electrical generator caused the precession, since the rate of precession increased, while the angle of precession decreased, as the saucer's acceleration increased. The idea that the propulsion system was "gyroscopic" was negated by the fact that the turn was perpendicular to the (vertical) axis of gyroscopic precession, and was a "power turn".

The answers to all my questions were delivered by my flying saucer, in as glorious a manner as one could rationally hope for, and then some. While I knew at the time that the propulsion system was electrical, it would take me many years to discover exactly how the "electro-physics" applied.

There we were having our last ice cream supper of the summer of 1953, near dusk, on a lovely end-of-the-summer day. And just as the ice cream had thickened to its final state, and I happened to look at the sky above my sister's head, there it was, ghostily gyrating in mid-air, no more than 300 feet away, as the beautiful wisps of electrical corona drifted across the metallic shell and into the air, then faded with a twinkle, like stardust from a magic wand which had just passed across the sky.

I observed the colors of the corona at hovering power, which ranged from a bright white, through every color of the rainbow. Generally, the color was a "pink and blue", with gold highlights and purple undertones. The corona was not too unlike the flame produced by burning zinc, such as when a welding torch was being used to cut galvanized steel pipe. Very beautiful. The corona was emitted from the entire shell at hovering, with a negative corona at the top, as the wind blew gently from the left. Each time the saucer precessed, the wind wafted the corona around on the surface and in the air. The gyrating saucer reminded me of a precessing gyroscope. But the saucer shell itself did not rotate, and the corona did not come out of vents, because there were none.

The air in contact with the surface fluoresced orange-red, in "throbs", which corresponded to each cycle of the saucer's precession, on its bottom as it turned into the wind from the left and in shadow, away from the sunlight from the right. I concluded that the 'throbs' were probably due to the increased visibility of the corona in the shadow, due to the increased light contrast. This created the illusion that the corona came in 'throbs' which corresponded exactly to the precession, which was only the product of the relative light and dark which revealed the corona more in the dark. The corona was still there on the light side of the saucer, only you couldnt see it because the light was too bright.

The precession generally matched that which I had experienced in a friend's new 1954 Buick, at 120 mph. As the car approached 120, it began to precess, as it sped down the highway, rolling around on the coil springs, which scared us a bit. At that speed, the angle of precession was at its maximum, and the precession frequency was at its minimum, of approximately 2 c.p.s. As we passed through 120, and sped up to 135, the precessional angle decreased, and the precessional frequency increased, until it was a mere "shimmy", behaving in much the same manner as the saucer. In fact, we were greatly relieved to be traveling at 135 rather than 120, where the precession was so scary.

At very high speed, the two turns which the saucer had executed were precise, square ones, and it did not 'swing out' at the corners. This boggled the eyes, since one never sees things do that, except on some mechanical devices, which hold moving parts into position with rigid guides. At hundreds of miles per hour, the effect was eerie. The movement indicated that the saucer experienced none of the effects of momentum and inertia, and therefore operated on a principle which controlled these forces, and created 'synthetic', instantaneous momentum by increasing in the new direction of acceleratioa Since the forward edge emitted a 'hairy' (i.e., negative) corona during the rapid acceleration, the electrical polarity was indicated. Since the ship made instant square turns which were perpendicular to its vertical axis, the idea of an internal "gyroscopic" drive system was contraindicated. There was no sound, hence no perceptible aerodynamic or "Coanda" effects.

The saucer accelerated much faster than a jet, rocket or propeller-driven craft could have, and had no visible or audible jets or rockets, orifices, pods, intakes, or shapes. It went from a half mile away to infinity in three seconds, appearing to have achieved a 9,000 m.p.h. velocity almost instantly, although it could have been as high as 25,000 mph.

The metallic shell was similar in color to aluminum, only somewhat duller, with concentric striations on its surface, like a 'spun' "wok" shape. The striations were approximately 1" wide and rather crude, indicating perhaps a technical difficulty in fabrication, such as that experienced in early, large-scale "spin-forming" of the shells on very large vertical lathes, using new, special tungsten alloy discs. A friend, who had worked in a secret government factory, in Amarillo, Texas, in the '50s, described how they fabricated such semi-spheres around 50' in diameter in that same manner. The shells were then shipped to New Mexico. When one of the work crew asked what they were for, he was told they were "shells for flying saucers", and everyone had a good laugh.

As the saucer precessed, sunlight played across the striations on the bottom, like it does on the microgrooves of a silvery compact disc, or of an aluminum pan.

I had made the rough estimate of its diameter by visual comparison to the new city water tower behind it and slightly to the right. The approximate height through the center was visually extrapolated from the diameter, together with the proportionate spherical sections used, and the height-to-diameter proportionality.

What I saw in 1953 was a flying machine. The most irrational assumption would have been that it was "extraterrestrial" in origin. The most rational assumption was that it was made by human beings, and that was my first impression. The puzzle parts I had gathered that day, added to what I already had, eventually grew, until I had enough to fit together to substantiate what I believed on my first impressioa

There were many sightings occurring at that general period of time, especially in that area. That particular saucer was noted by Wink Air Station, about 10 miles away, according to my brother-in-law's relative, who worked there. Wink Air Station was south of the flight path, which was on a bee-line precisely due west toward the northern edge of Ft. Bliss, Texas, where Wernher von Braun was at that time. Had I not been viewing the saucer while it hovered, and its flight to the horizon, almost directly along its trajectory, it might not have been visible.

As I thought about the performance characteristics, 1 concluded that the field of aerodynamics would soon become obsolete. This led me to abandon my plans to become an aerodynamicist, although I still wanted to be an aeronautical engineer. After all, the saucer was powered by electricity, had canceled inertia, momentum and gravity, made no sonic boom, and apparently ignored aerodynamics. I assumed the aircraft was classified at the time, but that it would only be a matter of no more than five to ten years before it would be declassified, just as other aircraft had been. At the time, I assumed that the general public would be using flying saucers by 1960. How wrong this turned out to be! The longer I waited, the more I became determined to know why.

In 1953, at the time of my sighting, I assumed that the saucer was a "secret government project". By 1963, I confirmed instead that it was a "Secret Government" project, and began viewing all government statements as being intended to maintain that secrecy. By that time, I also assumed that the Soviets did not have the saucer, as we knew it, even though Habermohl, purportedly one of the top German flying saucer scientists, had gone to the Russians in 1945, and we ended up with Miethe and Schriever. Neither of these two men appeared to have anything to do with the electrically-powered saucers, and their projects were probably misinformational. I eventually considered the assumption that the Soviets also had the saucer even more improbable, hinging" on the question as to whether or not Habermohl had access to the particular secrets involved, and whether he told the Soviets about them if he did. It is more probable that Habermohl, whose ideas were of the lowest order in the "flying saucer hierarchy", was purposefully 'sacrificed' to the Russians to mislead them, and that the Russians incorrectly assumed that he would have told them everything he knew, while he may have given them only misinformation. The CIA could have put a lot of money in a Swiss bank account for him, while the Soviets continued to treat him like a king. Besides, the kind of saucers under development by Habermohl and Schriever were of the jet and rocket powered "boundary layer" type, not the electric type, and really posed no risk to the "real" "p2" flying saucer, based on Nikola Tesla's original discoveries, acquired by the Nazis and purportedly being developed by Miethe, under von Braun's immediate supervision, from his research and development centers at Peenemunde and in Bavaria.

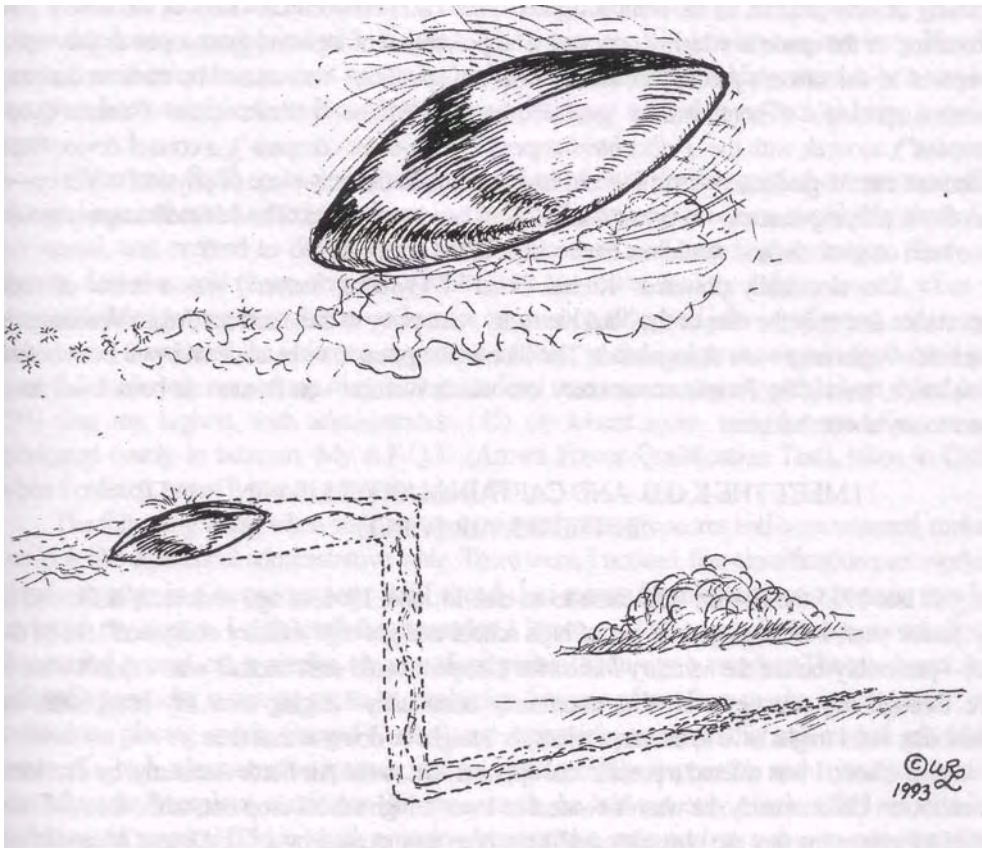
The Nazis were very shrewd, developing several different types of saucers—some aerodynamic, but only one electrical—at different locations using different designers, but they would never have developed the "real" ("KT-p2") electrically powered saucer outside Germany, such as in Czechoslovakia, where Habermohl and Schriever worked. The Czech projects appeared to be purely disinformational. It is probable that the only military organization made privy to all these secrets was the SS, as suggested by evidence purportedly from Wiener Neustadt, in the Austrian Bavarian Alps, and at General Otto Skorzeny's special SS commando headquarters near Munich Skorzeny's groups' specialties included rescues. The saucers were purportedly viewed by the SS mythically, as the Vimanas of the SS Aryan philosopher-rulers, according to the neo-Platonist Nazi religion.

There has been a very carefully executed conspiracy to conceal real photos of what I call "real flying saucers"—those of the purely "electro-propulsive" type—from the public. The O.S.I, has seen to it that many fake photos and configurations have been 'inserted' into the mainstream, to confuse the public not only as to the real shape of these saucers, but to the means of propulsion. I have encountered very sly O.S.I, attempts to propagate the idea—within more 'intelligent' "UFOlogy" circles—that the Felix Schauberger designs (which were non-electro-propulsive, claiming use of an "implosion turbine"-driven 'duct fan', which put them definitely in the "low-tec" category, somewhere in the category of a glorified air conditioner vent)—were the kind developed by the Nazis. From the numerous photos of flying saucers—some real, some fabricated—it is difficult to determine with relative certainty the stages of development which the 'true saucer' has undergone. Many of the photos are obviously hoaxes, and all the types proffered by the "German-genesis" bunch are disinformational, or based on data derived from CIA-generated disinformational sources, so I will try to show you what I saw in 1953, and you can draw your own conclusions. The illustration shown below should give you some idea of what the particular type of saucer I saw looked like:



I knew by the way that the saucer could 'jump around' in space, that it's gravity was being controlled. Otherwise, it would have flown to pieces, and any pilot would have been slammed around so badly that he would have been injured and rendered unconscious by the "G" forces. I knew from the electrical corona, and the 'buttermilk' texture of its corona trail, that the means for controlling gravity high voltage electricity, and included at least some sort of high frequency electricity. I knew also that the saucer disobeyed conventional rules of gravity, inertia, momentum, aerodynamics, aeronautics, and physics.

A rounded surface will hold charges better than those of a small diameter or sharp points or edges, which will 'leak' charges more quickly, and cause corrosion and burns. A corner of 90 degrees or more, will reflect waves being emitted from the top or bottom. This to me explained some of the saucer's physical shape parameters. The emissions seemed to originate on the top surface on hovering—with positive corona on its bottom—and at the front when accelerating.

In attempting to analyze the cause for the precession, I concluded after many years of deliberation, that it was not caused by a 'spinning' mass inside the saucer, such as a gyroscope or motor, or the saucer itself, but was caused by the same unidentified, underlying reason that spinning objects precess, in an electromagnetic interaction between the mass of the saucer and something in the space in which it operated. The precession of tops and gyroscopes as they spin, compared to the saucer's precession, since it was not spinning—was caused by some underlying common principle. There was a guidance system Meisterkreiselkompass ("master-gyro-compass"), to work with the Peiltochterkompass ("polar-slave-compass"), a control device from a German inertial guidance system I would later acquire, as the only piece of physical evidence—a part from a flying saucers—in private hands—my hands—thus far. The Meisterkompass would have been on gimbals, and would not have related to the precession.

The electrically powered "Kreisel Teller" ("Gyrating Saucer") was a secret of such importance that only the elite of the Nazi hierarchy were privy to these secrets. Adam Weishaupt's Illuminati beginnings were at Ingolstadt. The Illuminati appeared to be alive and well even before Weishaupt, among the Prussian aristocracy into which Wernher von Braun was born. I will have more to say about this later.

I MEET THE K.G.B. AND CAPTAIN MANTELL'S WINGMATE IN THE U.S. AIR FORCE

In late 1955 the Korean War came to an end. In June, 1956, at age seventeen, at the end of my junior year, I decided to drop out of high school and get my "military obligation" out of the way—preferably before the Military Industrial Complex could start another war. I didn't want to live through my twenties with that uncertainty continually hanging over my head, with the possibility that I might have to interrupt whatever I might be doing at that time.

Somehow, I was offered a presidential appointment to the Air Force Academy, by President Eisenhower. Unfortunately, he wasn't aware that I was a high school drop-out, while the Air Force failed to inform me that the obstacle could have been surmounted by a G.E.D. test. Meanwhile, I also wanted to be in the Air Force Band, but there were no new assignments. I was offered the position of first bugler for the National Drum and Bugle Corps, in Washington, D.C., but at the time, my disappointment over not being in the Air Force Band was so great, I failed to investigate the bugle corps offer and what a great opportunity it represented, and turned it down. This was while I was in basic training, when I was in the Lackland A.F.B. Drum and Bugle Corps, where I was first bugler. Second bugler was my best friend at the time, Kris Kristofferson, who was quickly appointed as "barracks chief, because he had two years of RO.T.C. at Pomona College. My other good friend was Eddie Heywood, of Boston, Mass. Kris' father was Army brass, and Eddie's older brother, Tom, was a Navy commander. Eddie's lather was an M.I.T. chemistry professor. I had been a Navy brat during WW II, so we all sort of fell in together and got along well. Kris and I had both gone out with the same girl, named Marilyn Wood, of Donna, Texas, who was the National F.F.A. "Sweetheart" around 1956. Those farmers couldn't have picked a better girl, even though she liked musicians.

Kris and 1 reciprocated for base reville and taps. We had a crack marching and performance group, and had some excellent Caribbean drummers, as well as a bagpiping member of the Black Watch of Scotland, on loan to us from the RC.A.F.

Kris was awaiting an application to Annapolis, and had another application in for flight school just in case. After discovering that I wouldn't be able to accept the A.F. Academy appointment, and that no band positions were open, I decided that jet mechanics would be a good job, and would prepare me for my planned career in aeronautical design and engineering. I already knew that I was a mechanical whiz-kid, and didn't anticipate any problems on my tests. Besides, good jet mechanics were in short supply in the Air Force at the time. Eddie wanted to be a tow-reel operator, because of the extra hazardous duty pay, then just wanted to go back to being a civilian again.

When we finally got to our testing phase, I came away feeling good about my tests, even though I was rather exhausted at the time I took them. Later, we were given our files by the testing personnel, and ordered to deliver them to the counseling and classification section. There, an airman first class told us we were not to look at our test scores until the following week, when we were scheduled to meet with the counselors for career counseling and job classification and training purposes. I considered the order too suspicious to obey, so the minute the airman first's head was turned, I disobeyed, opened my file, and recorded my stanine scores on my pith helmet. Mechanics (95) was my highest, with administration (45) my lowest score, with the rest of my scores graduated evenly in between. My A.F.Q.T. (Armed Forces Qualification Test), taken in Dallas when I enlisted, was 97, placed me in the top 1 %.

The following week, when our files were returned to us, my scores had been reversed, making me look like a potential administrative whiz. There were, I noticed, five classification men working closely together in a suspicious way, and I already had reason for my suspicions, because they had reversed my scores. I didn't tell the counselor I knew my test scores had been reversed, and discovered several other similar obvious discrepancies with my comrades. The personnel man refused to consider assigning me to jet mechanics, because of my "low mechanical aptitude", and insisted on placing me in Ground Control and Approach, an air traffic and control job which required a high administrative aptitude, and involved a highly responsible and critical job landing aircraft under hazardous conditions. In other words, he had not only misclassified me, but had placed me in a critical field in which a single administrative error, such as assigning two aircraft the same altitude, etc., could cost millions of dollars and several lives. I already knew that the changes in my scores were made after the records had been turned over to the classification personnel, who therefore were the responsible parties in all likelihood.

On return to our barracks, I made a rapid survey of others to see how they had fared, bearing in mind that our records had been sabotaged. There were several men scheduled for counterinteUigence, some to be sent to Harvard, Yale, Dartmouth, and other schools with good Slavic language programs. I assumed that many of these assignments were misclassifications, based on sabotaged scores that made the airmen involved appear to have a higher aptitude for languages than they actually had. As I later discovered, while my scores were merely reversed, those of some others' were juxtaposed in different order, or graded upward or downward.

Among the airmen being sent to counterintelligence was a young Bulgarian who was a trustworthy friend, who had been recruited just for that purpose by U.S. Intelligence. He was a fine person, whose family had been slaughtered by the Communists. The classifications personnel had probably taken a wide berth with him, but had probably blown his cover. Another guy, who claimed to be from Florida—which I did not believe, and neither did the Bulgarian—was also classified into counterintelligence. He had the same rosy cheeks and Slavic mouth as my boyhood friend, Rudolf, who was a first generation Czech-Americaa I consulted with the Bulgarian, and then with Eddie, and finally with Kris, who was knowledgeable about military affairs and procedures. Kris recommended that I report my findings to the adjutant. By that time, the personnel saboteurs had continued to do their damage, and had even managed to cut a set of travel orders sending me to Air Police School in Compton, California, even though I was assigned to G.C.A. school at Keesler A.F.B., Mississippi, near Biloxi.

I told the adjutant that I had found what I believed to be a 5-man K.G.B. cell operating in the Air Force Career Counseling Center at Lackland, and that they had probably already routed a Czech mole into counterintelligence. The adjutant straightened out my travel orders, and said he would have the matter looked into.

Months later, Naval Commander Thomas W. Heywood—Eddie's older brother—on behalf of O.N.I., came to Keesler to spend four days over Thanksgiving, 1956, with Eddie and I. He said his reason for coming involved the K.G.B. cell, informing me for the first time that the F.B.I., acting on my information, had uncovered them Tom said he had reason to believe that the K.G.B. was responsible for certain problems I was having, and that he would see what he could do to get me out of trouble. He said that Eisenhower had transferred the bunch to the Army where they could be more closely watched. The entire incident was classified "Confidential", and Tom was breaking the rules by even discussing the matter with me. I received the same confirmation from the squadron adjutant and commander, and was also clandestinely visited by Air Force Intelligence and D.I.A. people, who were trying to help me, while the Air Force officially refused to do anything.

About that time, Arthur C. Clarke, head of the British Interplanetary Society, and a big friend to Wernher von Braun, came to Keesler to give a lecture on "Unidentified Aerial Phenomena", which I attended. Clarke concluded that flying saucers did not exist as such, and that all such sightings could be explained as natural phenomena. After his address, I filed through a line to speak to him. I shook his hand and told him, "Dr. Clarke, I enjoyed your speech, but both you and I know that you are a goddamned liar, and that flying saucers are man-made flying machines powered by electricity." Clarke chuckled and shook my hand. Two days later, I was reclassified into intelligence, as a clerk- typist, of all things (there was the uncorrected high score in administration speaking again, which the Air Force refused to correct). Both Eddie and I went to 8th A.F., S.A.C., Headquarters, 26th Strategic Reconnaissance Wing, Lockbourne, A.F.B., Ohio, near Columbus. I was then processed and cleared for Top Secret.

It seemed an odd coincidence that the 8th Air Force intelligence group to which I was attached was the same one which had encountered the first allied air assaults of the German flying saucers, and was also somewhat involved in Operation Paperclip.

While at Lockbourne, in late 1957, 1 met a lieutenant colonel named A. W. Clements who was on T.D.Y. there, who had been one of the lieutenants who were Captain Mantell's wingmates, at the time of the Jan. 7, 1948 incident near Mayville, Kentucky, involving a flight out of Godman A.F.B. Flight Commander Thomas Mantell, Jr., led his P-51s in pursuit of a flying saucer. His plane was completely destroyed and Mantell with it. The later account by J. Allen Hynek, in his "Operation Blue Book" report, was almost completely different from the one given to me by Lt. Col. Clements. The situation gave me cause to wonder that, should others have followed up on Hynek's footsteps on all the other reports he supposedly considered, that almost just so many other errors might not emerge, showing a consistent pattern of lies.

The way I came to meet Clements, a tall man with dark wavy hair, was because of a discussion—actually more of an argument—which I was having with a couple of intelligence officers, one a major and the other a captaia I was making my argument on flying saucers, and they were calling me crazy, saying flying saucers were either 'aerial phenomena' or non-existent. The colonel came down the stairs, introduced himself, and said he was on T.D.Y. at Lockbourne for a couple of weeks, (from either Kentucky or Wright-Patterson, I don't recall for certain). He said he couldn't help but overhear our argument, and said he was taking my side. He told us he had been Captain Mantell's wingmate in the 1948 disaster, and gave a blow-by-blow account of the incident, which significantly differed with the account written by Hynek when they spotted the saucer, and immediately commenced pursuit under standing orders, they contacted the control tower at Godman. Mantell led the way, and was close to the saucer. The control tower patched them through to the Pentagon, which ordered them to immediately cease pursuit. Clements said that he was unable to make radio contact with Mantell, because of the strong electric field near the saucer, so Mantell continued the pursuit, within the colonel's view. Mantell's plane flew into tiny pieces and Mantell with it. There was no evidence or sighting of any weapons use. The two officers who were arguing with me had to eat crow, for there was a superior officer having direct personal knowledge of flying saucers, in a famous incident, to corroborate my argument. 1 thanked Clements for his honesty. The two other officers didn't call him crazy.

My theory is that Mantell's plane, at 500 mph., entered the saucer's electric field, which gravitationally neutralized the front of the plane. As soon as his plane lost its charge, the front and rear of the plane shredded together and apart in every direction, due to the sudden effects of momentum and inertia. The Pentagon's order to cease and desist was heard by Clements, but not by Mantell, and must have been intended to avoid such an incident, based on prior knowledge by Pentagon personnel as to what could happen. Otherwise, there is no case in which the Pentagon has ever ordered the U.S.A.F. to cease pursuit of any "unidentified" aircraft, while flying over the continental U.S.A. The parts of Hynek's report which were false, due to critical omissions and misrepresentations—since Clements told his story to me the same as he told Hynek—were related to the facts that they clearly pursued a flying saucer, that Clements was in view of Mantell's plane at the time of the explosion, that radio contact had been obviously broken with Mantell due to the electric field of the saucer, and that the Pentagon had caEed off the pursuit immediately on notification, prior to the incident. This incident has been rehashed over and over, and Clements was very clear on the fact that it was a flying saucer, and not a "weather balloon" as the government later tried to fabricate.

On the night of Nov. 2,1957, while I was on leave from the Air Force, visiting at my parent's home in Odessa, Texas, my father was returning from a marketing trip, en route to Odessa. Just after passing through LeveEand, Texas after dark, his 1957 ford staEed and aE Eghts went out, and he had to coast to a stop in the dark, on the highway shoulder. He rolled down his window and felt a rush of air, while over his car, a flying saucer hovering only a few feet above. He sat there for around fifteen minutes before the saucer finaEy departed In essence, he had been "arrested" during that time. Afterwards, he was able to restart his engine, but his lights were gone, so he returned cautiously in the dark to a Levelland motel, where he spent the remainder of the night. The following morning, at first light, he drove on to Odessa, where he ate a quick breakfast and went immediately to SeweE Ford to have his lights repaired, saying nothing about the flying saucer. After he left, I turned on the T.V. for the morning news, which included the well-known report about the Levelland saucers, including an interview with the sheriff of Hockley County. I immediately went to Sewell Ford to talk to my father.

The Sewell Ford repair shop had just opened, and the mechanic was just beginning to check out the lights, as my father stood close by. I asked Dad about the flying saucer, and he asked how I knew about it. He was unaware that there were news reports concerning other sightings and incidents around Levelland the previous night. He said he had said nothing about it because he didn't want to be called "crazy". The saucer was "egg-shaped", about 200 feet long, and glowed in the dark. The mechanic said he'd never seen a car with every single light bulb blown out, without there being a blown fuse or any other evidence of a short or other electrical malfunction. I suggested that the tungsten filaments were damaged because the strong electric field around the saucer had caused the filaments to burn out or break, as the weakest links in the circuits, already weakened by their white-hot temperatures, when the saucer hovered over the car. The magnetic field in the car, induced by the strong electric field of the saucer, would cause the electrons in the light filament and circuitry to spin like crazy.

I left the Air Force in 1958, because the classification errors made by the K.G.B. in 1956 had led to an impasse, in which I eventually could not be upgraded in the field in which I was working—in Special Services P.C.U. (Physical Conditioning and Judo Unit)—until I had first been upgraded in my primary A.F.S.C., which was as an illustrator in Intelligence. The Air Force had refused to correct my test scores so that I could be classified into a field consistent with my real aptitudes. Meanwhile, Intelligence decided they wanted me back, after I had trained in the P.C.U. Using their 'secret' influence, Intelligence got the classification officer who was to officially assign the P.C.U. classification number to me after training in that field, so I could be upgraded, assign me a primary A.F.S.C. as an illustrator in Intelligence, with a secondary A.F.S.C. in the P.C.U., so that I could not be upgraded at all, until I had gone back to Intelligence for six months so I could first be upgraded there. This created a "catch 22", however, because I had already been in the A.F. for two years and had not been upgraded, so I demanded a discharge under an obscure 8th A.F. Letter, a copy of which was in my possession. The ironic fact was that, not only was I already trained as an illustrator, but there was no one on the base to train me anyway. I had attended night classes at the Columbus College of Art and Design for a year.

And now for the incident on the three Russian bombers: When I worked in Intelligence as a clerk-typist, I had 'spontaneously' devised a new briefing system during a "Red Alert", called during a snowstorm. I was the only one in my group to show up, and had to brief and debrief the S.A.C. crews before and after takeoff. That alert concerned three Russian bombers which crossed the Arctic Circle and eventually landed in Minnesota under fighter escort, picked up over Canadian air space. That was the "Bison, the Bear, and the Muskrat" incident I referred to earlier, being the three latest Russian bombers, flown by three defecting Russian pilots and landed in Minnesota. As far as we knew, it was an attack. The briefing system I devised involved color-coding, in which the map pouches I provided to the pilots identified their primary, secondary, and alternate targets by color code. That system was adopted by S.A.C., as it was very handy under pressure, and the pilots liked it, even though it was a breach of security for me to devise and distribute the system without authority. What else was I to do, since the responsible intelligence men were still at home hiding under their beds? Only survival officer, Lt. Don Cook and I, did the whole routine with only a skeleton crew. I had picked up what I knew by working in the same room Congress had rejected the plans for the three Russian bombers, so the American designer had sold his plans to the Russians. We had no defense from those planes at that time, since they flew above our missiles.

The last time I ever personally heard from Kris Kristofferson, was a letter I received from him at Keesler in late 1956, in which he said he had been accepted to flight school. I later learned that he had became a Rhodes scholar at Oxford, after finishing at Annapolis, after his other application eventually came through. When he appeared as a musician in the '60s, I hardly recognized him, except for his voice and eyes. In 1956, he was rather stocky, wore a burr haircut, and even had those little rolls of fat on the back of his neck I was greatly disappointed in 1996 to learn of his connections to Col. Michael Aquino and the CIA's MK ULTRA program, in which he was a Vatican-based Project Monarch slave-runner.[1] Working with the Jesuits, eh Kris?

Eddie's older brother, Tom, eventually became the Chief of Naval Operations. It didn't surprise me, because he was always well aware of what was going on, while others were still in the dark, and had the guts to "violate" bad orders like a good American should Ironically, the Air Force Records Center in St. Louis, Mo., was burned out, because they could never correct the damage done to the records by the K.G.B. To this day, there are still numerous claims and lawsuits resulting ultimately from the sabotage, and most people don't even know it ever occurred. If I had not stumbled across the KGB. cell, there is no telling how long they might have lasted, right under the noses of our ignorant government bureaucrats, and the fact remains that they might never have been caught. The distinct feeling I got was that I was being punished for turning up this incident, not only by the K.G.B., but by my own government as well, and that the only help I got was from people who were disobeying orders.

I never received an official word of thanks from the Air Force, and got only an unofficial thanks from Tom Heywood, and he was with the Navy!

I MEET THE PRESIDENT'S BROTHER-IN-LAW, AND ARNOLD SCHWARTZENEGGER'S FUTURE FATHER-IN-LAW, IN THE PEACE CORPS

In 1962, 1 applied for the Peace Corps, on a bet with J. Evetts Haley, the western historian. Our bet was that I would apply for duty in Southeast Asia, and be accepted for South America, based on "bureaucratic probability". My application was accepted for Ecuador, with training in Puerto Rico. I never tried to collect on the bet, since it was more in the nature of a joke.

While in training at Arecibo, and at the Universidad Inter Americano at Barranquitas, Puerto Rico, I had some rather noteworthy experiences. Beginning at Arecibo, I was under close scrutiny for some reason unknown to me at the time. This immediately followed a fiery speech by Fidel Castro of Cuba, in which he accused the Peace Corps of being a front for the CIA. I was followed around by certain administrative people, and even treated rather hostilely. Finally, R. Sargent Shriver, brother-in-law to President John F. Kennedy, came for a visit, and hung out with me over several days. Everyone knew who he was, even though he used a phony name. One volunteer even sculpted a limestone portrait of him. He was checking me out for some unknown reason, and seemed disconcerted that we agreed on so many things. My friend, Dr. A. Henry Sara-Nee, of Midland, Texas, had been a graduating classmate of his at Yale Law School, class of '47.

It was near this time that an old Puerto Rican man, who smuggled back and fourth to Cuba in his row boat, most urgently approached me at a rural cantina, to give me information. The story that he related to me indicated that he had observed the Russians building what I knew from his description were nuclear missile silos, equipped with I.C.B.M.S. This was the first information picked up in the "Cuban Missile Crisis", and I passed the information along, after which it was verified by intelligence people. The missiles were actually there, contrary to later false reports (supplied by the CIA) that only fake 'mock-up' missiles were in Cuba. They were apparently setting Kennedy up, and I knew it, the American public be damned.

---

[1]Cathy O'Brien with Mark Phillips, Trance Formation of America, Reality Marketing, Inc., Las Vegas, NV (1995)

It was also near this time mat I was harassed by Peace Corps bureaucrats, because a friend and I had Puerto Rican girl friends. The friend was a Black guy named Bill, who had won the Medal of Honor in the Korean War, as a tank commander. The Peace Corps officials particularly wanted me to stop seeing my girlfriend, a school teacher named Maria, because her brother was the secretary to the Bishop of Ponce, who had called Munoz Marin a communist Maria had participated in freedom rides in the southern U.S., and I thought it odd that Peace Corps officials should be guilty of such bigotry and weirdness. Didn't these guys ever see West Side Story? They were acting like "Officer Krupke".

I was finally 'selected out' of the Peace Corps, without any reason being given. It would not be until four years later that I would learn why.

In protest to the Peace Corps having 'separating me out', a group Barranquitas citizens showed up with placards, in my support. They were Puerto Ricans I'd become acquainted with, including my girlfriend, her chaperone, and several others. I thanked them for their sympathy, and said my goodbyes to them, after which we were taken to the San Juan airport, thence flown back to the U.S. Though the group had little money, they later very sweetly took up a donation and sent a small gift of money and a nice card, after I reached home.

As I was preparing to depart the training facility at the Universadad Inter Americano at Barranquitas, I was offered some damaging information on Peace Corps operations, from several people whom I had already identified as CIA agents. The information ranged from the fact that our "dance teacher" was paid $120.00 per day, to the fact that many of the male officials abused their positions by demanding 'bed time' with some of the female recruits. What I also thought was very odd, was the fact that nearly all the Peace Corps officials and other trainees had almost nothing to do with the Puertoriquenos, and were discouraged from doing so. At the forefront of this attitude, were some people from the Union Theological Seminary. When I reached home, I was surprised to have some media people very anxious to 'expose' the Peace Corps operations. I attributed this to CIA orchestration as well.

Thanks to Walter Bowart, I read in 1994 that, according to The Report from Iron Mountain (purportedly an accidentally leaked paper of the Secret Government) that war is considered a desirable component of modern society to reduce population, and to control "..dangerous social dissidence and destructive anti-social tendencies". The military is considered a pool for "misfits...a state-supported haven for the unemployable". They conceived of the Peace Corps as a model for an alternative replacement for the non-military functions of war, to sociologically control "misfits" ...as a "modern sophisticated form of slavery", motivated by a) "intensified environmental pollution", b) "new religious or other mythologies", c) "socially oriented blood games", or d) "combination forms".

In respect to my having been "selected out" of the Peace Corps (which in view of the above report, was a positive sign), the following copies of letters and documents are included for your reflection:

PEACE CORPS

Washington 25, D. C.

August 17,1962

Mr. William R. Lyne
529 E. 43rd Street,
Odessa, Texas

Dear Mr. Lyne:

I am enclosing a letter to you which explains the policy objectives and procedures of Peace Corps selection. Perhaps after reading this, you can more fully understand the reasons for your being "selected out."

I see no reason to discuss specific reasons for your separation at this time, for evidently you had been told quite specifically by Dr. Boulger why you were separated when he interviewed you in Barranquitas. In your telephone conversation of July 12, you yourself told Mr. Krusekopf the reasons which Dr. Boulger had discussed with you.

Sincerely,

E. Lowell Kelly

E. Lowell Kelly
Chief,
Division of Selection

Please note the evasive language of E. Lowell Kelly's second paragraph ("...I see no reason to discuss specific reasons for your separation..") in response to my letter attempting to find out why I was removed. Kelly mentioned "Dr. Boulger", whom he asserted had 'evidently' told me "quite specifically" why. To the contrary, Boulger never told me why, even though very nervous, and actually broke down in tears when I asked him for a reason. The only thing I could get out of him was a vague reference to "...something to do with my military record". Since everything about my ""military record" had been fully disclosed at the time of my recruitment, the Peace Corps had been fully informed, and there was scarcely any basis for that.

I knew that Fidel Castro had delivered fiery damnations of the Peace Corps in his radio broadcasts, which we had listened to, alleging that it was a "front for the CIA", but never imagined that I was being set up as a scapegoat. I also knew that two of my fellow recruits— John Bolin and Patricia Cohn—had fraternized with two of Castro's spies, when they had approached the training facility and entered it, just prior to those broadcasts. I also knew that Bolin and Cohn were CIA agents, along with John Barrett and a man named Salazar. It wasn't until four years later that I would realize what Bolin and Cohn had told Castro's agents, that I was a CIA agent.

In retrospect, I knew one of the men associated with the Peace Corp was a Cuban associated with the CIA forces which had attempted to overthrow Castro. He had brutally raped a friend of mine, a girl from Kentucky. Everyone knew about it, yet no one said anything about it or attempted to rectify it. She had black eyes and bruises all over her face, was dejected and ashamed, yet nothing was done to the fascist CIA Cuban pig. In distinction to this, the following letter is from a woman who, along with her friend "Libby", were kicked out of the Peace Corps for being "lesbians":

From: Inge Duvander
1681 Mulberry Drive
Hanford, Calif

To: William R. Lyne
529 E. 43rd. St.
Odessa, Texas

Dear Bill

Libby and I hoped we would have seen another big explosion in TEXAS but I'm sure you have had some problems to overcome as have the rest of us.

Libby and I went to Washington and hoped we could convince Dr. Kelly there to either give us further consideration or give us some good valid reason for rejection. A nicety that Dr. Bolanger overlooked. I had my wits fairly well about me when I spoke to but in spite of being aware of his suggested crimes I took defense to two of them and by his reasoning thereby became guilty, As Dr. Kelly quoted. Peace Corps first--the volunteer xxx second. So anyway no satisfaction from that quarter. Recieved a letter from them today in repley to one Libby and I wrote. Same evasive garbage,but he had the audacity to say Dr. Bolanger spent 45 min. discussing the situation with me. On the contrary I spent 40 min. begging for information and demanding some justice and inquireing about recourse. Laake I believe didabout the same.

Well, we wrote a letter and sent copies to Pres. Kennedy, Mr. Shriver, Mr. Haddad, Dr. Kelly, and Dr. Bolanger. Other copies will be sent to my senators and congressmen. Also, I have written an apology to your Senator ~~Tow~~ Tower since I was the first to sign the protest letter to Senator Tower over the Fletcher issue.

All these little letters may not get anywhere BUT get enough of z them and it dirties the house. Maybe we can prevent this stupid activity from continueing and leaving more people in its wake.

1. I fell we should have been screened before we went to the training. I know they would have rejected three of us and who knows?...they may have spotted me as an undesireable in advance.

2. I think they should behave along the lines of high integrity, for this is what they preach.

3. If the Peace Corps considered the effects of social stigma on a reject, they would have to alter the selection methods.

4. Finally, few of us, when we finally decided to join, concerned ourselves with finances; not all of us could make arrangements for rehife. Also, many debts xxxxxxxxxx were incurred prior to going to Puerto Rico as well as x debts that would have ceased upon entering,(car payments, insurance, house, etc.)

(etc.)

Again, I couldn't understand why the Peace Corps was kicking out Inge and Libby, since it should have been obvious to any idiot who had interviewed or investigated them in the first place, that they were lesbians. With some women, you just know, and Inge was one of those women.

I MEET THE CIA, ITS FUTURE DIRECTOR, AND THE FUTURE PRESIDENT OF THE U.S.A., WHILE IN THE UNIVERSITY

I picked up bits and pieces of the flying saucer puzzle during my college years, particularly when I took a freshman course in physics, at Sam Houston State University, in Huntsville, Texas, in 1963-64. At that time, I began to see the relationship between gravity and charge-to-mass ratio in individual atoms.

Later, while I attended a year of law school at U.T.-Austin, in 1965-66, M.B. Wood, the CIA Southwestern Regional Director, gave a recruitment speech to our law class[1], and said he'd be glad to answer any questions he could, if we would contact his secretary to set up an appointment, which I did. I was surprised to learn that the "sweetheart" of our law class, 'Sandy' (Kay) Bailey, was also M.B. Wood's secretary. (I was not surprised 26 years later, when in 1992 Kay Bailey-Hutchinson became a U.S. senator from Texas.) The meeting was held in a room of the Business and Economics Building, on the U.T. campus. At my meeting with Wood, I asked him point blank if he knew why I was kicked out of the Peace Corps. He reached across the desk for a dossier on me, opened it, and showed me an "executive edict" signed by John F. Kennedy, staring that "...no person who has worked for the CIA may be in the Peace Corps." I asked Wood how that applied to me, and he said "Because President Kennedy thought you worked for us.". I then asked Wood if the CIA had permitted Kennedy to believe that, even though it was not true, and he said "Yes". Then he proudly showed me another executive edict dated around two weeks later, stating that "...no person who has worked for the Peace Corps may be employed by the CIA." Then Wood said, "However, we'd be glad to consider your application five years from your date of departure from the Peace Corps." As I was leaving, Wood said "Stay dry!" (old intelligence jargon, meaning "stay sensitive!").

The facts were as follows: There I was having a beer at a rural Puerto Rican cantina, listening to accordion music blaring from a Wurlitzer juke box, and just happened to pick up America's first intelligence on the Cuban Missile Crisis. Though I was not a CIA agent, this seemed of considerable importance to me, and I didn't think I should remain silent about it. After all, my family didn't even have a bomb shelter. Besides, I was in Peace Corps training, and the missile silos sounded fairly unpeaceful, so I passed the information along for the benefit of the American People and the world, not the CIA. Castro's radio broadcasts reminded me of Hitler's.

This incident proved to me what I had suspected all along, which was that the CIA was not playing it straight with the president, who was their commander-in-chief. If the president could not depend on the veracity of the CIA, as his supposed means of intelligence gathering upon which to base his decisions, then the American people could not rely on those decisions as reflecting the rational options available to the president, as betrayed by the CIA. It stands to John F. Kennedy's credit that he lacked confidence in the CIA, so much that, even after they had scapegoated me, to avoid discovery of the fact that they remained well represented in the Peace Corps in violation of the President's order, that Kennedy sent his own trusted brother-in-law, Shriver, to see if they were lying to him, which they certainty were. If they had just told me why they were kicking me out, I could have fingered Bolin, Cohn, Barrett, and Salazar—who were not separated out—in a few minutes. They had told Castro's spies that I was a CIA agent, and then gave me the damaging material on the Peace Corps as I was departing, obviously for use in my later interviews with the media, which they had also arranged. It seemed odd to me that the president of the United States did not know who his own CIA agents were, yet I, a civilian, whom he was falsely led to believe was with the CIA, did know who they were.

---

[1]8, supra.

If the CIA answered to a 'higher authority', then this was truly bigger than a "betrayal" of or by Kennedy, in his dealings with the Military Industrial Complex. There was John F. Kennedy—a Cambridge-educated Illuminatus (A.K.A. "Fabian Socialist")—betraying the Council on Foreign Relations' goal of British-American world imperialism, as envisioned by Cecil Rhodes, the British billionaire who, as an Illuminist, had endowed Oxford's Rhodes Scholarships program, and was a 'world-control' adherent to the ancient teachings of Hermes Trismegistus ("Thrice Greatest"), as elucidated by his favorite Oxford professor, John Ruskin. These teachings say that only an illuminated elite—which maintains a dualistic ("Hermaphroditic") difference between what is said and what is done—should rule the world

In 1968, while a graduate student in art at U.T., I attended a lecture on gravity in the physics department. I was disappointed to find that the physicists were still ignorant of the scientific basis for gravity. I was also amazed to find a grant application on the bulletin board, from the U.S. Department of Energy, for prospective PhD. candidates in physics. All the candidates had to do to pick up a $10,000 grant, was to base their theses on the given government premise that "U.F.O.s are free-floating plasmas." This was apparently the manner by which the Trilateral Commission bought phony "documentation" to support their BIGGEST LIE, to be later used by UFOlogists. It also constituted a prima facie case of scholastic dishonesty.

I TURN DOWN AN OFFER FROM THE CIA TO BE "ONCE AND FUTURE KING"

I left the university and my first wife and I divorced in 1970, then I moved to New Mexico. By 1967, 1 had already done sketches of flying saucer control systems, having twelve directional grids, corresponding to twelve 30-degree incremental divisions of the compass, such as I had surmised from my 1950s observations of flying saucers navigating in the night sky above our back yard in West Texas. This observation would later be corroborated, at least for the early vintage saucers.

In 1973, at the Santa Fe Ski Basin, I ran across some friends whom I had known in my U.T. days, who had belonged to O.S.O. ("Organization of Students of Objectivism"), a philosophy club I belonged to which studied the literature and philosophy of Ayn Rand The friends introduced me to a woman who accompanied them. I dated the woman on occasion over two years. In 1975, she attended the School of Law at the University of Houston, and lived with her grandmother, in Pasadena, Texas. While visiting her, after my return from a trip to Europe—on which I had embarked on the Kraljevica, a vessel of the Jugolinea—I was rather astounded when she and another vivacious young woman suddenly announced that they were CIA agents, and said, "...we are authorized to offer you M.B. Wood's job, with the provision that you return to your wife." You could have knocked me over with a feather! Wood was the CIA executive with whom I had met in Austin, concerning the Peace Corps. I turned the offer down. It was odd to discover that a lady you had been seeing for ova two years, was all the while checking you out for the CIA. It was also ironic that I was offered the job of the same CIA employee with whom I had met concerning J.F.K. and the Peace Corps. To make it stranger, the offer came from George Bush, the new head of the CIA, whom I had met and talked to while visiting my first cousin, Patsy, who was his private secretary for five years, at his Tidewater Oil Company office in the Nelly Esperson Building, in Houston.

It took me a while to sort out all of the pieces of that little incident. The CIA "agentrix" was the first cousin of my first wife's first cousin's wife. That cousin's wife was the sister to a (now retired) Texas Ranger, who presently lives in Santa Fe. That Ranger had taken a shot at my second wife along highway 285, in October, 1983, to scare the hell out of her. George Bush had just taken over the CIA. The girlfriend had commercial dealings with Bush, as one of the owners of a major oil company. And why did the CIA try to bribe and coerce me back to my first wife? George Bush and my first wife's father were butt-bumping buddies, in Bush's 1950s Odessa, Texas days. Beginning with George Bush's command at the CIA, my problems began in Lamy, stirred up by the CIA, in order to "motivate me" to accept their offer. The problem continued for over seventeen years.

I later determined that the 'friends' from the O.S.O. were CIA trainees, who had been sent to our club to spy on us, and to "learn how to think". The CIA had secretly used us as a surrogate think-tank. The "Oil Queen" of the CIA had given me a copy of T. H. White's Once and Future King as a gift a few months before, and I never knew what was intended, until I recalled the part about where King Arthur just went about his business, despite the embarrassing gossip about court caused by the carryings on of Lance and Guinevere. Well, I considered myself a notch above ol' Art, and the CIA.

In reminiscing about the Oil Queen, I am forever amazed at the confirmations I got from her, concerning the inventions of Nikola Tesla and his flying saucer. Heir to a large oil fortune with very high connections, she was in the know about energy matters of concern to oil interests; Tesla's invention of the flying saucer, free energy discoveries, and Tom Ogle's 100 miles-per-gallon carburetor, which I will tell you more about in this book.

IN 1979 I MEET A VIEJO FROM POJOAQUE AT THE FLEA MARKET, AND BUY AWW II GERMAN FLYING SAUCER NAVIGATIONAL SYSTEM FROM AN ALBUQUERQUE SALVAGE DEALER

In 1975 I began researching alternative methods of energy generation, based on the premise that inexhaustible energy can be obtained from the environment, because "...energy cannot be created nor destroyed, but only changed in form...". Since I conceive of the universe as a never-ending perpetual motion (energy) process—as the rule and not the exception—my goal was to discover ways to trick nature into producing "free energy". This involved gathering, focusing, and channeling some part of the infinite perpetual motion of the universe, through whatever work I wanted to do with it. I finally evolved what I call my "Triax System".

In 1976 or thereabouts, I had resumed my childhood research in nuclear sciences, electricity, and magnetism, which I had begun in 1947, when I was nine years old. By 1978,1 had accumulated a lot of material and knowledge on the work of Nikola Tesla. As a child, my neighbor's father, Elmer Schlosser, a self-taught electronics repair man, told me about Tesla, his boyhood inspiration, while growing up in the Cimmarron Territory. He told me the saucer was Tesla's invention. He gave me a lot of materials to use in my experiments with electricity and magnetism. I took the soft iron bars from the windows of the barracks from the German P.O.W. camp in Roswell, from which we'd built our new house in 1947, and used the bars in my experiments with magnetism and electricity. Some of the things I discovered seemed to defy the accepted laws of electromagnetism.

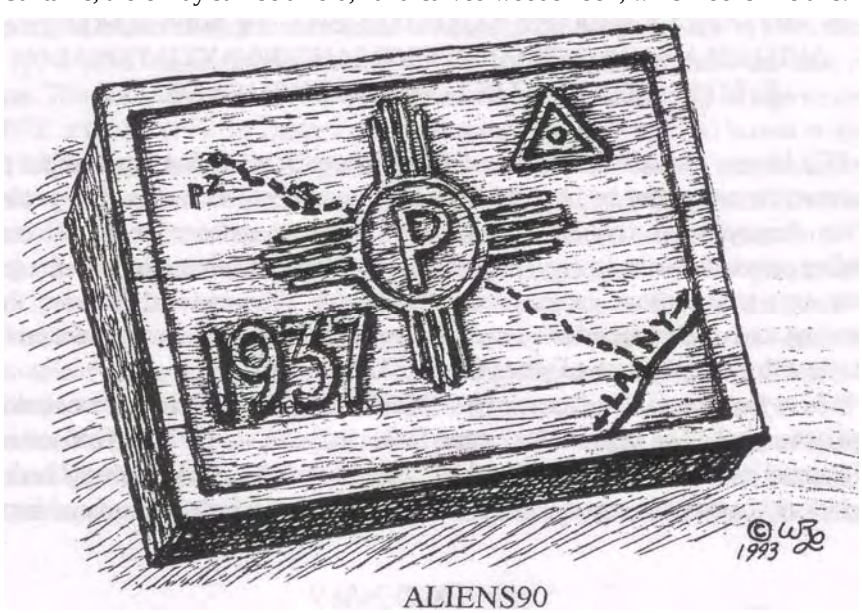
I had always presumed that Tesla had indeed invented the flying saucer, because of the way the government and Trilateralists had practically drummed his greatness from history.

By 1979,1 had several operational Tesla coils, and was hunting materials in the salvage heaps of Los Alamos, Albuquerque, and Santa Fe, to use in a multitude of experiments. It was during this time that many of my new inventions and re-discoveries came about.

While browsing through a Santa Fe flea market in 1979,1 met a viejo from Pojoaque, who was trying to sell an old wooden box which he had made in 1937, to carry tools behind the cab of his Model A Ford pickup. On the lid of the box, he had carved, in New Mexico "folk" style, a map showing Los Alamos, Pojoaque (with a "zia" sign around it), and the unpaved road leading to the interstate, showing "LA." (Los Angeles) one way, and "N.Y." (New York City) the other. The date ("1937") was shown, as well as the name of the project ("p2") in which he was employed at Los Alamos. The symbol for the project (a triangle with a dot in its center) was also shown. It was a scientific project headed by Wernher Von Braun. The old man said that after the project was "shut down and moved away", at the end of 1937, that he was never rehired when the "new project" (the Manhattan Project) was begun in 1942.

I knew at the time that the triangle with a dot in its center was the "all-seeing-eye" of Bel, Ra, or "God", that it was a Masonic symbol, and that it appeared on the dollar bill. I was inclined to buy the box at the time, not only as a curiosity, but also because of some haunting reason of which I was not then fully cognizant, but I didn't buy it because I was so short on cash at the time. I also thought "1937" was a little early for anything scientific at Los Alamos. The Manhattan Project originated in late 1941/early 1942. Our government was an "ally" with Germany, until the 1939 invasion of Poland (Surprised?). It would not be until a week later that I would realize my mistake in failing to buy the box, and did not remember the old man's name. Somewhere in Pojoaque or Santa Fe, there may still be an old, hand-carved wooden box, which looks like this:



ALIENS90

The following week, I regretted having failed to buy the box, when I realized what the carving meant. This was revealed when I went to a surplus dealer's yard in Albuquerque, shortly after a fresh pile of unusual things had been sold to him by an employee of Sandia Base. On top of the pile was a navigational device of the type I knew early saucers would have used. The entire pile was not the usual stuff I was able to buy, so I asked Mark King, the owner's son, who was also a friend of mine, what he would have to have for the device. He answered, "Oh...about seven-fifty". My heart sank. Seven hundred and fifty dollars was way out of my budget. I asked, "Seven hundred and fifty dollars?" Mark answered, "No...cents, for the whole pile". I wasted no time picking the stuff up and paying Mark, with a big thanks, a handshake, a smile, and $7.50.

When I returned home, I began to examine the device, made in 1943 by Lizt, in Germany, more closely. The label on the device was as follows:

Peiltochterkompass
KT-p2
GeratNr. 127-178 A-l
Anforderz. FI 23374
WerkNr. 10143
Hersteller: gvy

There was the "p2" again. "KT-p2" was the codename for "Kreisel Teller" (German, for "Gyrating Saucer") and "p2" was, according to Tesla's drawings, either two plates, potentials, or primaries.

The 1943 device had a 6-volt motor to drive a geared ring marked in 30-degree partitions, around an inner electromagnetically coupled disk. A selection knob in the center of the face was used to manually turn a pointer to the desired flight-heading. There were fourteen contact points on the bottom, two of which supplied D.C. current to the motor. The motor would rotate the outer geared compass ring until it showed the correct flight heading, based on information relayed from "master" gyrocompass, oriented to earth's north pole, at which point the motor was automatically switched off The term "Tochter" (German, for "daughter"), literally meant "slave" in this respect, so the term "Peiltochterkompass" meant "Polar-Slave-Compass". The device was one-half of an inertial or "celestial" navigation system. This manually operated device presupposed the "master" (gyro) compass....and electromagnetic propulsion, in 1943.

I had observed a flying saucer up close in 1953, and my father had been 'held' for at least a quarter of an hour, by another large "mother ship"—"egg-shaped" and about 200 feet long—as he left Levelland, Texas, on the night of November 2, 1957, which hovered only a few feet above his car, killing his engine and burning out his lights. Both the 1953 and 1957 ships emitted electrical coronal discharges rendering an ordinary compass useless. That and the fantastic speeds necessitated an inertial navigation system The 1953 ship was obviously disoriented, its pilots surprised to find that they were hovering over our town, so their relatively primitive Peiltochterkompass was used to 'dial in' the proper heading, to speed back to their base along the New Mexico-Texas border, between Ft. Bliss and White Sands Missile Range, where Wernher von Braun had brought the post-war German KT-p2 Projekt.

The Peiltochterkompass had partitions of 30 degrees, identical to the 30-degree incremental turns of flying saucers I'd seen in the night sky, from 1949 to 1953. It was designed to be mounted horizontally, with 360-degree peripheral headings, indicating a round ship, which moved in 12 directions. Photographs of the Peiltochterkompass appear below:

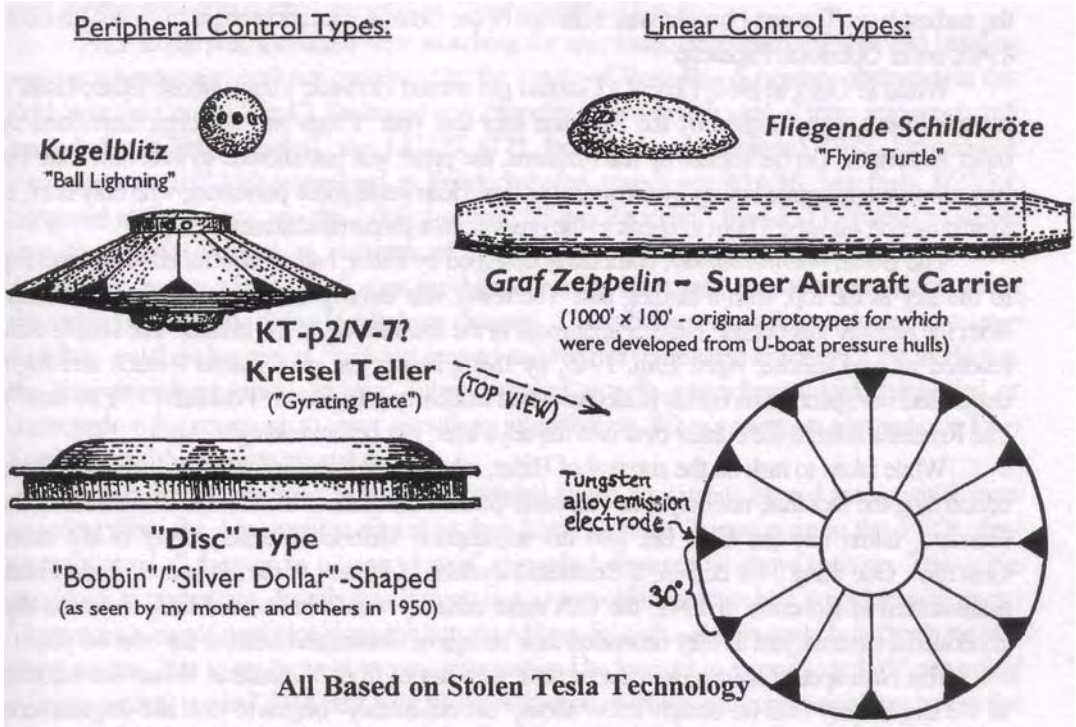
FIG. 1: Top View - fluorescent dial and face calibrations, with 12 30-degree peripheral increments. With master gyrocompass calibrated to true north prior to takeoff directional selections made with dial read on Peiltochterkompass.

FIG. 2: Horizontal rear view - label and receptacle at bottom for control cable attachment with 14 contact points, including power for 6-volt motor and 6 bi-directional polarities, interconnected to the "Meisterkreiselkompass". Appropriate high-voltage switches automatically activated via opposite pairs of twelve contacts.

FIG. 3: Perspective View.

FIG. 4: Photo of two antiquated wooden high-voltage Tesla tuning coil forms (coils missing), from Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory ("LAS.L") salvage, ca 1978. Twelve 30-degree increments on notched form primitively secured by old window latch Among stuff cleared out of "old bam" in oldest area of lab. Examination of patina, materials, screws, nuts, bolts, and other hardware, indicated a ca 1900 construction date, apparently reworked in '30s, to retrofit automotive thrust bearings. Handwriting on them comports with Nikola Tesla's. Probably part of electrical apparati from Tesla's Colorado Springs experiments, taken south to Los Alamos for use in von Braun's 1936-38 Illuminati'p2" project Lab personnel were probably unaware of their origin or use by the time they were released for sale in 1978.



I knew that General Patton, on his 1945 saucer-hunt, had been ordered to destroy 200 of the celestial navigation systems which he had found in a salt cave, deep beneath the Peenemunde complex. Tesla had developed and flight-tested such a navigational system in conjunction with the Sperry Gyroscope Company in 1917. The device I saw on the salvage pile met all the criteria for the device I knew had to exist, and it was made in Germany, by Lizt, on October 1,1943.

Since I discussed the device with several people, word soon reached Sandia Base Security that I had it. In their investigation, they went to Mark, who told them he had purchased it from a guy who usually brought stuff released to salvage by Sandia Base. They could not confiscate the device from me, because I had a bill of sale, and Mark had one too. Mark told me later that the security people had told him that the employee from Sandia had stolen the pile of classified salvage and sold it to him. The employee was placed under surveillance, caught doing it again, and sent to jail. Confiscating my Peiltochterkompass would have violated a security regulation prohibiting the confirmation that something is classified. The security personnel also violated that rule in their discussions with Mark. My Peiltochterkompass was a part of a WW II-vintage German electro-propulsive flying saucer, just as I said it was. Otherwise, it would not have been classified, because its design was obsolete. Otherwise, one wonders just how far behind America was.

ALIENS93

At first, I could only document what it was not No such device was to be found in a catalogue of known WWII German nautical, aeronautical, electronic, or automotive navigational devices or related equipment. In addition, it was to be mounted horizontally. The "master" gyro retained its orientation, with reference to the earth's north pole, and relayed this information to the "slave" compass, as the central navigational device used to control electro-propulsive saucers of the earliest type. The one I bought was from one of the German saucers brought to New Mexico in 1945, under Operation Paperclip.

While in Ohio, in 1960,1 knew a German girl named Gertrude Thum, whose father, Hitler's personal valet, was released by the Russians later that year. Thum was not even mentioned by other historians. On his release by the Russians, the press was not allowed to interview him. He was immediately spirited away by German and American intelligence personnel, who only later, in their presence, allowed Thum to speak to the press from a prepared statement.

The Berlin Fuehrerbunker, completely designed by Hitler, had an unfinished tower opening to the sky at the top, with a landing pad. The tower was directly accessible by private staircase from the hallway just outside Hitler's apartment in the lowest level of the bunker. The couple were rescued around sunrise, April 29th, 1945, by flying saucer test pilot Hanna Reitsch and flight expert and navigator Hans Ulrich Rudel, who had made many flights to "Feuerland" ("Fire-land"). The Russians entered the bunker over two full days later, just before midnight, April 2,1945.

While taken to task on the survival of Hitler, other documented information has reached me, concerning the fact that, not only was Reinhard Gehlen, the head of the RSHA VI division of the Gestapo, taken into the CIA, but also his accomplice, Heinrich Mueller, Chief of the entire Gestapo[1]. One thing's for certain; if Reinhard Heydrich, Architect of the Holocaust, hadn't been assassinated in Bohemia in 1942, the CIA most certainly would have hired him, and naturally, concealed it from us, just as they concealed their hirings of Gehlen and Mueller for over 40 years.

This Nazi specter haunts us in the present, with stories from Yugoslavia. When one recounts all the Big History Lies we already know about, "official history" begins to look like staged events scripted beforehand, with the complete cooperation of the leaders of all sides, to produce a certain, predictable 'ending'. Of what use is a United Nations, if it is completely impotent to stop the ethnic and religious squabbling and slaughter in Yugoslavia, with NATO finally becoming the bared fangs of the NWO 'mask'. All NATO can do is destroy a lot of real estate and create mass hysteria which is productive of nothing except more suffering, death, and the destruction of the economy of the poorest European countries, while enriching war industry manufacturers. As stated in a biographical sketch of Nikola Tesla[2] (in pertinent part):

"For a long time the Slav people—who, after the battle of Kosovopjolje, in which the Turks defeated the Servians, retired to the confines of the present Montenegro, Dalmatia, Herzegovina and Bosnia, and "Borderland" of Austria—knew what it was to deal, as our Western pioneers did, with foes ceaselessly fretting against their frontier; and the races of these countries, through their strenous struggle against the armies of the Crescent, have developed notable qualities of bravery and sagacity, while maintaining a patriotism and independence unsurpassed in any other nation."

---

[1]Gregory Douglas, Gestapo Chief (three vols), R. James Bender, P.O. Box 23456, San Jose, Ca 95153.

[2]Nikola Tesla, Experiments with Alternate Currents of High Potential and High Frequency (1904)

FLYING SUBMARINES?

(NOTE: Some of the following material—that related to "flying submarines"— is presented not as a "proven" fact, but as a possibility, given the many suggestive facts and mysteriously missing facts surrounding the disappearance of the German "super aircraft carrier", the Graf Zeppelin, as well as other well-documented sightings of "cigar-shaped UFOs.")

Prior to the war, the Nazis were searching for new ideas, experimenting with and building various weapons and craft not prohibited by the Treaty of Versaille. A primary contractor in this field, was the Count ("Graf) Ferdinand von Zeppelin. There were a total of three important craft named the "Graf Zeppelin", the LZ-127 (775 feet long, commissioned 1928, hangered at Frankfort), the LZ-130 (completed at Friedrichshafen, test flown 9/14/38, last flight 8/22/39, hangered at Frankfort), and the 1,000 foot long "Super Zeppelin", the LZ-131 (work on which was purportedly stopped at outbreak of war [1939-40]). The LZ-127 and LZ-130 were dismantled, and on May 6,1940, their two hangers at Frankfort were ceremoniously blown up on the second anniversary of the Hindenburg disaster[1]. The rather senseless destruction of two large dirigibles and their hangers at Frankfort seemed to have been calculated to convince the world that the Nazi dirigible program—and the "Super Zeppelin" as well—were discontinued, dismantled, or destroyed—a big ceremony to cover something important up. What's more, an acquaintance from Frankfort said the hangers are still there.

Recently, a greengrocer acquaintance related to me how, while he and his daughter were traveling from the Albuquerque airport to their home in Santa Fe one night in the 1980s, they were followed all the way by a 'cigar-shaped' ship which flew not far above their car. They got a good look at the bottom, described as looking like a rusty old iron ship's hull, complete with rivets. There were a line of portholes along the bottom—like a dirigible—and he could hear the drone of a diesel engine. This to me brought to mind information I had sought to assemble in 1957, regarding a "super aircraft carrier", 1,000 feet long, the construction of which was commenced just before the war and 'abandoned', which was named the Graf Zeppelin. While in Air Force intelligence, I had first heard of the 'super ship' in a book I was reading about Patton, and was curious about its fate, so I asked my associate, a sergeant who had been a spy in the area of Hamburg at the end of the war. He told me the Graf Zeppelin had a stainless steel hull which was 11 inches thick, and when I asked him what had happened to it, he said it was "sank in the North Sea" or was 'dismantled'. He then became evasive to my further inquiries (Uh-oh! Still classified!). The existence of a "Super Zeppelin" as a supposed "dirigible", is documented in Toland's book, and as an "aircraft carrier", is documented in a naval history of WWII by Keegan Both versions were 1,000 feet long, were both 'discontinued' "at the beginning of the war", were both named "Graf Zeppelin", and were both "super". A great coincidence in names for supposedly "different" type ships.

The late model U-boat pressure hulls were "cigar-shaped", perfectly round tubes, to which were added the usual outer ballast tanks, conning towers, etc. to complete the subs. With portholes added to their bottoms, the "naked tubes" would have been perfect, ready-made hulls for ships for a "Mars Mission", such as von Braun had already planned. With a U-boat pressure hull as a prototype, complete with diesel engines, batteries, and an 'hennetically sealed' living environment, and applying the gravitational-to-electromagnetic force conversion, von Braun built his first prototypes—some of which burned helium in outer space, the earlier prototypes of which belched black diesel smoke when near earth—based on "p-2". The 'rusty old iron ship's hull' seen by my greengrocer friend, was apparently one of the early prototypes, converted from a submarine hull, and later brought to New Mexico with the rest of the German projects, and now hangered at Sandia Base, Manzano Base, White Sands, or some other clandestine site.

---

[1]John Toland, Ships in the Sky, Henry Holt & Co., N.Y.

The stainless-steel-hulled 'super' Graf Zeppelin LZ-131 "aircraft carrier"—carrying flying saucers—could have been a "flagship" from which Hitler and Doenitz could have directed the stalemate scenario at the war's end. Use of an ("11-inch-thick") stainless steel hull could have had two purposes, 1) to eliminate the need for the inner ribs and ballast tanks (the heavy weight of the hull and all internal equipment, including several flying saucers, being sufficient to submerge it in the ocean), and 2) to provide sufficient radiation shielding outside the Van Allen Radiation Belt. The stainless steel could also have avoided the resistance, hysteresis losses and inductance heating of a steel hull subjected to high frequency, high voltage currents, supplied by large Tesla coils powered by an hermetic helium generator and battery system.

Was the LZ-131 powered by helium reactors, just as my mother had heard from our New Mexico friends in 1949? Trading With the Enemy[1] documents how Germany would have obtained helium. We are told that helium is an "inert gas", but available scientific information shows that by a simple electric spark discharge, helium will produce 760 kcal./g.-atom[2]. This is the approximate caloric equivalent to 760 loaves of bread, produced from a gram-atom of helium subjected to van de Graaff discharge. Available documents show a globular liquid helium tank (which misinformants call a "Thule Tachyonator"), reaction chamber, and an interconnected van de Graaff generator, in a German flying saucer. A van de Graaff would have been an excellent, simple way to supply the required high voltage discharges needed for helium generation of power to run the two large Tesla coils shown in the documents, probably mislabelled by the O.S.I.

With the generation of power from helium by electric spark discharge, the use of "trigatron" spark gaps takes on a whole new meaning. The spark gaps—fed by helium (falsely described as an 'inert gas' used to 'insulate' the spark gaps)—might have been the fuel for generation of high voltage electricity. I traced the use of trigatrons to 1930s Germany[3].

Was the Graf Zeppelin originally outfitted to function alternately as a battleship, submarine, and Super Zeppelin/cigar-shaped mother ship/aircraft carrier/interplanetary space ship? According to Rudolf Lusar[4], she was scuttled outside Stettin, salvaged by the Russians, and sank on the way to Leningrad. The "official" story was that Hitler purportedly scrapped the huge Graf Zeppelin super carrier before it was completed, to embark on some "very ambitious" U-boat constructions and development. The same or remarkably similar ship to the Graf Zeppelin was

---

[1]Charles Higham, Trading With the Enemy, Dell Publishing Co., New York (1983).

[2]Van Nostrand Reinhold Co., Van Nostrand's Encyclopedia of Science, 5th Ed. (1976).

[3]Bethge, O; Kleen, Werner; Translations from Annalen derPhysik, 1931.

[4]Rudolf Lusar, German Secret Weapons of the Second World War, Neville Spearman, London 1969.

sighted off the Straits of Madagascar on June 30,1947[1]. Another documented sighting of the same ship (or its identical twin) was sighted in 1962, at Hampton, Virginia[2]

Was the Russian salvage story a cover for the truth?. What about a (likely) story that a huge convoy of U-boats with 30,000 mile range, left Norway in 1945?

In 1945, as the Russians closed in on the Berlin Bunker, flying saucer test pilot Hanna Reitsch and Colonel Hans Ulrich Rudel, who had made many flights to "Feuerland" (Tierra del Fuego, on the southern tip of South America), piloted the flying saucer carrying Eva and Adolf Hitler to the safety of the Graf Zeppelin, from which to direct the battle during the stalemate. There, from the secret Nazi supership, Hitler made his final demands on the Allies as a field commander, and exacted his nuclear blackmail on America[3]. After the stalemate, the Hitlers returned to Germany under secret allied protectioa Today, German flying saucer bases, such as the huge underground base built in Greenland, are probably maintained under joint Trilateral/ex-Nazi control.

The Deutsche Antarktische Expedition (1938-39) laid out Germany's claim to part of Antarctica, which claim has been undisturbed since the war. In the last coded messages from Martin Bormann, references to "Tierra del Fuego" (A.K.A., "Feuerland") were made, as the reins of power were transferred to Reichschancellor Admiral Doenitz, and his twenty-four German U-Boats surrounded the United States, armed with I.C.B.M.s (A-9s), carrying neutron bomb warheads, and with celestial guidance systems. From this position of strength, Doenitz negotiated with the Allies, during a stalemate. The Russians were overrunning Germany, but Germany had its nuclear missiles trained on the heart of America. If Germany fired the missiles, the Russians would take all of Germany, and all would be lost for the Germans, who could have bombed America, yet would have had no home to return to. Under the circumstances, only America could save only half of Germany, and so a deal was cut. Certain conditions were stipulated, and Doenitz was required to "scuttle all U-boats with all hands on board", as a part of the amnesty agreement. Certain people were guaranteed amnesty, including Eva and Adolf Hitler, who were secretly provided with a cozy and secure home in Kassel Germany, for the rest of their lives, under the protection of the N.A.T.O. allies[4].

The story that Admiral Karl Doenitz assumed power after "Hitler's suicide" was untrue, since even available documents show that full power was transferred to Doenitz as soon as the "opera" at the Fuehrerbunker began, designed to buy time while Doenitz put Hitler's ultimate plan for the stalemate into place. If the commonly accepted story were true, Doenitz would have assumed power on April 30, 1945, with the "unconditional surrender" (signed by generals Jodl and Friedeburg at Ike's headquarters) on May 7,1945. Doenitz was not taken into custody until May 23, 1945. His headquarters was at Eutin in Holstein, within 50 miles of Hamburg. In April, they had "120 vessels [of the new "electro-U-boat" type] ready for combat", with only one of them "going into combat". That was double talk. No combat was necessary, because of the stalemate.

---

[1]Frank Edwards, Flying Saucers: Serious Business, Bantam, New York (1966), p. 12.

[2]Paul R. Hill, Unconventional Flying Objects, Hampton Road Publishing Co. (1995).

[3]Discussion of the author with an unnamed Ph.D. candidate with access to L.B. J. 's papers at U.T., Austin, Tex., 1966.

[4]6 supr. a.

Meanwhile, certain Nazi commanders opened lines of communication with the Allies, ostensibly to pursue amnesty negotiations, made to appear to be without Hitler's consent, to get around Eisenhower's prior ultimatum which had already forclosed such negotiations. Not once during this grand "opera" was Hitler ever in jeopardy of capture, and as you may know, the opera ain't over 'til the fat lady—in this case, Hitler—sings. As soon as power was transferred to Doenitz and a 'new hierarchy' installed, Albert Speer was heard to exclaim, "We now have an operatic government"[1], a statement which confirmed its purpose during the coming stalemate.

Hitler's Alpine Redoubt had significance only to the extent that last-minute technical work was being performed there, relative to the special saucer operations of General Otto Skorzeny, and nuclear weapons used in the missiles. The failure to expedite several secret emergency plans for defense of various areas of the Reich, all followed the direction of the still higher plan, being executed under the cover of the other 'last ditch' plans of which the Allies were advised. The Germans intentionally collapsed the western front on cue, to suck the Allies into Germany, so the firestorm bombings would stop, and so we could not nuke them.

In 1967, the Hitlers were invited by president Lyndon Johnson, to be his guests, during Hemisfair, the world's fair in San Antonio, Texas. The main tower of the Hemisfair, was designed by an architect who had been a high-ranking member of the S.S. As I sold paintings with a friend of mine in the La Villita area, in the seating opposite the Arneson River Theatre, along the San Antonio River, Adolf and Eva Hitler came by us, as I spotted them the moment they came into view. I had just been talking to a German "engineer"—whom I realized was a security agent, the moment I spotted the Hitlers—and Hitler took an interest in a particular painting of the Moritz Von Schwindt variety. When he saw that I recognized him, he and Eva were quickly whisked away by their security agents. My friend Bob, also a former Air Force Intelligence personnel, who sat next to me, agreed that what we saw was what we saw. This event was followed up by other security agents, who came by and talked to us, to debrief us. We played it cool. What else could we do? If we had said anything about it, who would have believed us? I have been taken to task for this sighting, but I'm sorry. There were just too many indicators to verify it. In addition, since the fall of the Soviet State, Russian military historians have admitted that they failed to find the bodies of Adolf and Eva Hitler.

The celestial guidance system used on the nuclear-armed rockets—predecessors to our Polaris missiles—and similar to the "rocket-torpedoes" written about by Ley, were of the same type found by General Patton in a salt cave at Peenemunde[2]. Patton hit the ceiling because his superiors ordered him to destroy two hundred of the systems, which he said he could get back through Allied lines with. Our military didn't obtain such systems until twenty years later, Patton was sent to Peenemunde, on the Baltic, to pick up the files, and to make sure the flying saucer and rocket projects were cleaned out before the Russians got there, and that everything valuable was destroyed Patton was probably assassinated, as several biographers suggested, by Army Intelligence. This was probably because of something to do with the flying saucers and Operation Paperclip. Though posthumously accused of wanting to be too soft on the Germans after the armistice, it would have been more in keeping with his temperament to complain about CIA collaboration with Nazi hard liners under Operation Paperclip, and that Patton may have wanted to blow the cover on it, so they killed him. I interviewed Patton's valet, George, who was married to my first wife's aunt's maid, in Crockett, Texas:

---

[1]William R. Shirer, The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, Fawcett Publications, Inc., Greenwich, Conn.

[2]This documentation has been censored from Patton's war history sources I found in 1957.

All information concerning Patton's trip to Peenemunde has since been expunged from all current war histories that I have examined, yet it was available to me in 1957.

As for the neutron bomb, when prisoners from Rommel's Afrika Korps were brought to Roswell, New Mexico, they carried some rather strange post cards, apparently printed by Rommel's field lithographers, showing New York City being destroyed by a mushroom cloud. The camp commandant, Dave Dunn, who later became an engineer with Union Oil Company of California in their Midland, Texas Office, and who prepared the U.S.G.S. for President John F. Kennedy in 1962, thought these were humorous, and showed me one he had saved as a souvenir. The fact was, however, that Rommel's main mission in the Libyan desert, was testing the neutron bomb. The post cards carried by his troops were a 'morale builder', which superimposed the photolithograph of the mushroom cloud of the bomb they had actually tested and photographed, over a photolithograph of New York City, in a composite. The claims by the Manhattan Project members, that they built the first ATOM bomb—from German plans—was true. After all, Einstein had brought the stolen plans to us with the firm belief that we would use the A-bomb on Germany. Since the Allies had already succeeded in obtaining the German plans for the A-bomb, Werner Heisenberg merely sidestepped the A-bomb, and built the N-bomb. The question to me was not "if', but "how" (did the Germans make their neutron bomb)?

Dr. Sam Cohen, inventor of the American neutron bomb, traces the production and sale of a mysterious substance called "red mercury" to Russia[1]. Red mercury is a mercury antimony oxide, specially prepared by irradiation and pressured into a gel to increase its density to create the necessary preconditions for a neutron explosion. A small quantity of it can then be used as a nuclear trigger/igniter, to detonate a small amount of heavy hydrogen, producing the deadly neutrons for a 'clean bomb'. In February, 1992, Russian president Boris Yeltsin signed Directive No. 75-RPS, authorizing Promekologia, a Russian company headed by Yeltsin's ecological advisor, to "manufacture, purchase, store, transport, deliver, and sell for rubles and foreign currency" 'red mercury', in amounts up to ten tons per year. The order was rescinded a year later because of criticism within Russia of export of such a "valuable raw material". In a spring, 1994 documentary on Britain's Channel Four ("British PBS"), a Russian nuclear chemist confirmed he had worked with red mercury since 1965, that it is currently produced in a factory in the central Russian town of Ekaterinburg, and that fusion weapons have been made in Russia from it. Cohen believes red mercury represents one of the greatest threats for potential terrorists to produce "baseball bombs" from it. He may be right.

On April 4, 1944, Nazi submarine U-859 was sunk near Penang (location of one of three Nazi far eastern U-boat bases), by the British submarine Trenachant. The Nazi sub was carrying

---

[1]Dr. Sam Cohen, America Online: DJIBO (3/1/95).

33 tons of mercury to Japan[1]. Perhaps the Japanese were to process the mercury, or use it in their own neutron bombs. As for how the Soviets could have ended up with the red mercury technology, a persistent rumor[2] has it that a U-boat rendezvoused with a Soviet surface vessel shortly after the surrender in the South Atlantic, at Mar del Plata, Argentina, and bartered Nazi neutron bomb technology for the release of German P.O.W.s in Russia.

If the Germans indeed tested a neutron bomb in North Africa, I would bet that it was produced with red mercury, since the Russians employed German metallurgists and nuclear chemists in their nuclear program, and it was they who produced Germany's WWII supply of plutonium, purer than any ever produced, so pure that it must be diluted before use, even today.

Ironically, in 1946, my father bought the buildings comprising the Roswell P.O.W. camp, and moved them to Kermit, because he couldn't get building materials anywhere else. The prisoners had done a beautiful job of converting one of their barracks into an Alpine "great hall", and used egg-tempera to paint about 100 windows to look like stained glass, with Alpine scenes, and coats of arms. They even built a sauna. Vandals eventually smashed the windows where they were being stored. Did the prisoners carry out and witness a neutron bomb test in North Africa?

What happened at Los Alamos and Mescalero, New Mexico in the late 1930s, involved Wernher von Braun, project leader at Hitler's Vergeltungswaffen development and production center at Peenemunde—which included the flying saucer project commenced in New Mexico.

Tesla had created a remarkable turbine, what we now know as the alternator, and the T.M.T., all for use on his flying saucer. He tried in vain to interest the government in his turbine and several other potentially great defense inventions, but the government showed little confidence in Tesla's abilities, and considered them too far flung to work or to be of value. In Jan., 1914, just prior to the entry of America into WW I, after the government showed no interest in the turbine, Tesla acquired a $5,000.00 loan from J. P. Morgan, Jr., so he could finish and ship a turbine to the German Ministry of Marine, High Admiral Alfred von Tirpitz.[3] Since he had already unsuccessfully offered the turbine to the U. S. government, he felt it no question of loyalty. It is my belief that around 20 years later, after unsuccessfully offering his flying saucer invention to the U. S. government, he agreed to collaborate with the Germans in the p2 project at Los Alamos.

The person who was most instrumental in inducing Tesla to work with the Germans in the "p2" Los Alamos project, aside from Uncle Sam, was a close personal friend of Tesla's, George Sylvester Viereck, who was also a close personal friend of Adolf Hitler, and was convicted in 1942 for failure to register with the U. S. Department of State as a Nazi agent.[4] Viereck took advantage of Tesla's loneliness, shoddy treatment and lack of respect from the U. S. Government, and Tesla's need to see his project through before the end of bis life. He spent considerable time and patience in cultivating Tesla's trust, thus allowing the Nazis to end up with his technology, with the complicity of the government, through the American foundations who were involved

---

[1]Haarmann, D. H., Geheime Wunderwaffen, Hugen Gesellschaft Fur Politisch-Philosophische Studien E.V., Hoerstel, Germany (1985); Henry Stevens, Report Number Three, German Research Project, Gorman, Ca. (1996).

[2]Zeiten Schrift, 1994, p. 64. Henry Stevens, Report Number Three, p. 25, German Research Project (1996).

[3]Margaret Cheney, Tesla: Man Out of Time; Letter, Nikola Tesla to J. P. Morgan, Jan., 1914, Library of Congress.

[4]John Roy Carlson, Under Cover, The Blakiston Company, Philadelphia[1943]; Current Biography, 1943.

Also working in rocketry in 1930s New Mexico, was the late Peter Van Dresser, who was the originator of "Van Dresser's Constant", a mathematical constant which von Braun and others used to calculate the trajectory of rockets fired into England and Antwerp. Van Dresser was bitter and disgruntled about the fact that Dr. Robert Goddard not only got all the credit for pioneer rocket research, but also had "collaborated with the Nazis", via his pre-war work with von Braun, while he, Van Dresser, had done more important research, had no truck with the Nazis, and had gotten very little, if any, of the credit. According to Van Dresser, his rockets worked, and Goddard's fizzled, at least in the early thirties. Van Dresser used solid fuel, and Goddard liquid fuel. Van Dresser did his research independently, on his own resources, being unsupported by either the U.S. or Nazi government. And, Van Dresser was a Jewish-American.

If anyone ever saw the movie "Gadget", and remembers the guy who strapped a rocket on his back and fired it off while he was on ice skates, that was Peter. One must admit that, although the rocket knocked him on his ass and caught his pants on fire, it damn well worked! And at least he had the guts to try it out himself, right in front of a movie camera. Little did he know that he would become a part of a movie showing the wildest creations of funny inventors. Peter was very embarrassed to admit that the "rocketeer" in the film was him, because it was one of those great, yet very embarrassingly funny moments in the progress of science. I saw the movie with Peter and his wife, Florence, whom he nudged in the ribs when she exclaimed, "Oh Peter!...that's one of your's!".

So von Braun, Goddard, and the F.B.I. all saw to it that Hitler got "p2" safely to Germany. And then they traded it back to us if we'd give safe conduct to some of the criminal arch-socialists who led the German people down the primrose path to the grisly holocaust and the ghastly tribunal at Nuremberg, which left such an ugly blemish on the "German national memory". Let's take a closer look at this situation.

THE ROCKET RACKET:
Wernher von Braun, Willy Ley, Dr. Robert Goddard,
And The Kreisel Teller-p2, In New Mexico and Peenemunde

The facts in this section bring forth some very interesting questions which were missed by Charles Higham, in his Trading with the Enemy. Beginning around March 26, 1926, when Dr. Robert Goddard (1882-1945), professor of physics at Clarke University in Massachusetts, launched the first liquid-fueled rocket, at Auburn. In Germany, Willy Ley had read Hermann Oberth's book on space travel that year, then wrote his own first book, Trip into Space. He communicated with Oberth, then formed the Verein fur Raumschiffahrt ("Union for Space Travel"). In 1927, Ley introduced Wernher von Braun to the Union, and was von Braun's first tutor in rocket research.

In 1927, the Graf Zeppelin LZ-127 was commissioned. It was a 775 foot long dirigible.

From 1928 to 1933, Ley was vice president of the Union. Goddard had fired the first instrumented rocket in America, in 1930. That year, von Braun assisted Oberth in early liquid fuel rocket research. In fall, 1930, von Braun joined the Union, which established a launching field in an abandoned proving ground at Ploetensee, outside Berlin (cost= $.25/year). Experiments were conducted with 13-lb. thrust rockets.

In 1931, Ley provided the basic ideas for a liquid fueled rocket which was fired to an altitude of one mile. In 1932, von Braun acquired his B.S. degree, having studied at the Technical Institute in Berlin, and in Zurich, Switzerland. He completed 85 rocket tests that year, with rockets which reached an altitude of a mile in free flight.

In fall, 1932, the entire rocket program was transferred to Wehrmacht ordnance, with the 20-year-old von Braun appointed to head an experiment station at Kummersdorf. In 1933, nose-mounted gyrostabilizers were tested Hitler came to power that year, and the Gestapo seized all papers of the Union and the research center. In June, 1934, von Braun was granted his Ph.D. in physics by the University of Berlin. That year, a center-mounted gyrostabilizer was tested, making a 2,000 meter (c. 6,000 ft.) flight.

In 1935, near Mescalero, New Mexico (Eden Valley), Goddard's flights exceeded 700 mph., and altitudes of 7,500 feet, with financial support from the Smithsonian Institution and the Daniel and Florence Guggenheim Foundation. This attracted the attention of Ley and von Braun.

On February 21,1935, on invitation from Goddard and the American Rocket Society (the Smithsonian), Ley arrived in New York City, thence traveled to New Mexico to work with Goddard. In 1936, Hitler took greater interest, and poured 20 million marks into his Peenemunde center, commissioning von Braun and his group to "produce a field weapon capable of carrying a large warhead over a range much beyond that of artillery".

Through Goddard, Ley arranged an invitation for von Braun from the American Rocket Society, for his visit to New Mexico, where in 1936-37, he collaborated with Goddard at Mescalero and the Eden Valley firing range, while running a secret Illuminati "p2" flying saucer project at Los Alamos. During that same time, he was still Hitler's project director at Peenemunde, in absentia. Ley must have worked on the p2 project also, because of his great knowledge of electrical science, but took out American citizenship papers in 1937, the year von Braun was appointed Obersturmbannfuehrer in the S.S. In 1938, von Braun returned to Peenemunde with "p2", and an increased knowledge of higher performance liquid fueled rockets acquired from Goddard, courtesy of the Smithsonian and the Guggenheims, and began developing the V-2 (Vergeltungswaffen No. 2 ["revenge weapon No. 2"), with a range of about 11 miles. The Nazis lost a great scientist when Ley decided to remain in America.

On May 6, 1940, two large dirigible hangers at Frankfort were ceremoniously destroyed. They had housed the Graf Zeppelins LZ-127 and LZ-128. The "Super-Zeppelin" LZ-131 (1,000 feet long) was supposedly also abandoned A "ship"—supposedly a "super aircraft carrier", also named the Graf Zeppelin, also 1000 feet long—was also supposedly abandoned in 1940, and Hitler's interest in rockets dwindled (since the German flying saucer project, "KT-p2" was then under way?). The rocket program apparently had to be resumed, to buy more time for the KT-p2 program. Meanwhile in America, Ley became a member of the scientific department for PM newspaper in May, 1941, and on X-mas, 1941, married Russian-bom ballerina Olga Feldman. Ley had escaped Naziism in America

In 1941-42, the V-2 became 20 times larger, with a c. 190 mile range, and almost a ton payload. Before the war's end, von Braun's rockets were capable of 20-ton payloads and a 3,000 mile range (capable of hitting New York and other American cities). Von Braun fired over 3,600 V-2s into England and Antwerp. Nice guy.

Beginning in 1944 (to 1948), Ley was appointed director of engineering at Burke Aircraft Corporation, Atlanta, Ga., later made part of Washington Institute of Technology, College Park, Maryland, just outside Washington, D.C., adjacent to the Goddard Space Flight Center. I surmise that, with his knowledge of "p2" and microwaves, Ley formed the matrix of America's earliest government-related flying saucer project, within this corporation, followed by its relocation to the environs of Washington, D.C., which indicated a very high security priority.

In March, 1945, with Russian troops within 100 miles of Peenemunde, von Braun and about 400 top colleagues left for the Bavarian redoubt—code-named the Serail—occupying a resort hotel. They were found by Operation Paperclip, and von Braun immediately signed a contract with the U.S. Army. In Sept., 1945, von Braun and 116 of his rocket colleagues were flown to Ft. Bliss, where von Braun was appointed as Technical Director, U.S. Army Ordnance Guided Missile Center. By May, 1946, V-2 testing was resumed at White Sands Proving Grounds.

In the obituary of German missile expert Dr. Ernst A. Steinhoff, in Alamorgordo (c. 1991), it was stated that during the war he was in charge of flight dynamics, guidance, control and telemetry of the German V-2s, and participated in the first launch of a missile from a submarine under the Lafferenz Project (in preparation for the missiles carried by the advanced "Electro-U-boats" in the stalemate of 1945). In 1947, Willy Ley wrote about "submarine rockets" used by the Germans during the war. Along with Germany's Dr. Heinz Fisher, Ley was one of the world's greatest experts on radar. Microwaves ("rapidly varying electrostatic forces) are directly related to gravity and flying saucer propulsion, according to Tesla's Dynamic Theory of Gravity.

In Aug., 1949, von Braun was made an honorary member of the British Interplanetary Society, through his friend, Arthur C. Clarke. During the war, he was awarded the Knights Cross and title of Research Professor ("Herr Doktor Professor") at Peenemunde by Hitler, was made an honorary member of the Gesellschaft fur Weltraumforschung, Stuttgart, and of the Nordwestdeutsche Gesellschaft fur Weltraumforschung, Friedrichstadt.

In 1950, the U.S. Army Guided Missile Center was moved from Ft. Bliss to Redstone Arsenal, Huntsville, Alabama, where von Braun was transferred as technical director. In September of 1951, von Braun's paper on an 869-day Mars mission was read to the Second International Congress of Astronautics, London (the "Super Zeppelin" probably already made the trip in much faster time, beginning in 1945). On Oct. 12,1951, an 'unmanned' two-stage rocket (probably a reworked German two-staged A-9) reached a 250 mile altitude from White Sands.

Showing his Illuminist sympathies, von Braun once said "...As long as national sovereignty exists, our only hope is to raise everybody's standard of ethics." His rocket programs were nothing more than a cover for the IllumiNazi flying saucer technology and ether physics.

I MEET TORQUEMADA AND THE MEDELLIN CARTEL

As mentioned in Chapter I, the government of New Mexico is fascist, especially the judiciary. In Nazi Germany, the judiciary was among the last institutions to succumb to fascism. In New Mexico, it leads the way, in terms of "economic fascism". This is true perhaps because, in striking first to protect what it deems to be the "public interest", it is the lackey of the military-industrial complex, the power of which is felt through the many secret agencies connected to it in New Mexico. The judiciary functions as a guardian of the golden pipeline which channels the payola (taxpayers' money) into the state, and as such, are puppets dancing on the strings of the CIA.

The state used judicial tactics to harass me, which delayed this expose, beginning in early 1975, just after I turned down the position of 9th Regional Director for the CIA. Ever since then, behind-the-scenes agitation of, and manipulation by abusive, incessant litigation prevailed Toward the end of this overt judicial harrassment, as I was gathering evidence in the County Clerk's Office, I spotted a young man observing me from nearby, and looked him in the eye. Realizing that I knew he was a fed, he then said, "You know, of all the people we've done this to, you're the only one who hasn't broken.." That was at the end of 1991, just prior to Bush's departure from office. Harassment immediately slackened, perhaps in apprehension of a backfire. I am leaving a lot of NAMES out of this book. Many CIA field agents are naively unaware of the fact that the rats they serve are unworthy, and that their work will ultimately serve the Trilateral Commission and betray their own people. It's time to wake up and smell the coffee, or perhaps, the cocaine, smuggled by the new "Untouchables", the CIA.

The history of cocaine, in the political sense, is tied to fascism. It was the drug of choice of Hermann Goering and many other fascists. In reference to what I call "contemporary New Mexico fascism", one looks for several things. Cocaine is only one means for controlling high-placed users, such as judges, lawyers, and public officials. For example, one Santa Fe judge is an ex-pornographer who is strung out on cocaine. This gives the CIA and cartels two means of extorting what they want, in addition to protection of their supplying of the drug. The 'customer' needs the drug, and he doesn't want to be exposed as a child pornographer, so he is in a double bind. This is also why the CIA prefers corruption at the top. They copied their methods from the mob. "We'll just keep this video tape on file, and no one will see it so long as you do like we say. In addition, we'll pay you every time you render a decision like we want" (or vote a particular way, if a senator or congressman).

To raise money for CIA black operations in Central America, the Medellin Cocaine Cartel was organized by Klaus Barbie—the Nazi war criminal closely connected to Dr. Mengele, the "Angel of Death". Both Barbie and Mengele were brought to America under Operation Paperclip, but were provided new identities and shipped off to South America by the U.S. Army C.I.C., because they were too hot to handle here. Others, even though "hot", often shown by history books to be dead, got new "Amerikan" names, and were employed in America. Many of the kingpins of the cartel are the offspring of S.S. officers who married South American women, especially Colombian women. Jack Anderson, the columnist, uncovered some of these things a few years ago. Because of the Spanish history, as well as the inherent politically corrupt fascist government, New Mexico, like the "Little Havana" of Florida, is especially suited as the "cocaine capitol" Banana Republic of the central U.S. The government and law enforcement here "belong" to the cartel. Political influence can also be bought more cheaply here because the politicians of New Mexico are seedier, cheaper, smaller-time crooks. No matter what turn the politics takes, there seems to be no difference, as there has been no significant change in CIA drug smuggling in the area. A governor is without power to stop it, and would be risking his life to try.

There is a considerable amount of real estate and bank money-laundering in New Mexico, on behalf of the fascist drug marketeers, with a compliant judiciary to protect them Even the I.R.S. cooperates with the cartel, "so long as its participants declare the income and pay the taxes due". Their attitude is that of the Federal Reserve Bank. They only want their piece of the action. They had rather collect the taxes, than to roll the dice on prosecution for evasion. The judiciary merely views the money-laundering and related big-time drug payola, in much the same way that it does the secret government payola, all as part of an economic boon to New Mexico, and therefore within its duty to protect as a matter of "public policy".

Northern New Mexico has become one of the primary deal-making and distribution points for CIA-connected cocaine traffic in central North America. This makes New Mexico's small-time judiciary feel more big-time, and they are flattered by it. As part of the world-wide cocaine scenario, the involvement of New Mexicans themselves, is rather menial by comparison, in the capacities of quasi-lackies, sort of like "spear bearers" in an opera. It is my belief that the cartels and CIA even use flying saucers to make many of the drug shipments and deliveries, because flying saucers were among the first of the "stealth" aircraft used by the secret government. There are connections between the real estate developments here, former S.S. officers such as Colonel Otto Skorzeny (who died in 1975 in Barcelona, Spain), the Trilateralists, the Krupps (who gave us Hitler), and even Fidel Castro, of Cuba.

For example, one of my former tenants and her former Colombian doctor husband (the offspring of a Nazi S.S. officer and a Colombian woman), were involved in receiving shipments of cocaine in Encino, New Mexico, where Cuban Air Force planes, piloted by uniformed officers, delivered cargo plane loads of Colombian cocaine and marijuana. They were never caught or stopped, and obviously had the secret blessings of state and federal officials. The tenant was later shown in the papers, hugging Fidel Castro, who had muscled into the (CIA) drug traffic, by threatening to shoot down dope-carrying planes, unless the cartel cut him in for a 'piece of the action'. This was arranged through fugitive financier, Robert Vesco, a Nixon and Bush pal. Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega was extradited and jailed by the U.S. in Georgia, because of his little stunt—forming an alliance with Castro, who cut the two in for a bigger piece of the action by threatening to shoot down the Colombian planes.

This CIA-connected dope crowd worked with a former neighbor, a former member of the Weather Underground and the Communist Party (according to information my former attorney said the F.B.I gave him), who handled at least fifteen tons of Colombian marijuana per year, picked up in approximately 100-kilo shipments near my house, in the limos driven by members of the Chicago mob. Though arrested once, she beat the rap under the "adult prosecution diversion program" which she was legally ineligible for, while all her criminal records were erased, after she put up a total of $25,000.00 in bribes. This was mere pennies to the dealer, since, at a very conservative $50.00 per oz., there was easily $24 million per year in marijuana alone being exchanged, within 100 feet of my back door, and probably over $100 million by the time it became more 'clandestine', due to the publicity of the bust, which was barely noticed in the papers. Add to this the probable take in cocaine, the total was probably twice that.

I suppose all those money-making activities by my Weather Underground neighbor were "...for ze revolution...". Sadly, the only 'revolution' being financed, was one in which the New World Order of John D. Rockefeller, Adolf Hitler, and George Bush et. al, was protracted through black operations of the CIA in Central America and elsewhere, funded by Klaus Barbie's South American cocaine cartel, spawned by the CIA's "Operation Paperclip", which is how Bush and the CIA motivated my neighbors, made me suffer, and suppressed energy and flying saucer secrets.

The judicial harassment which began in 1975, became particularly obvious (to me) in 1980, when the D.A.'s office persisted in prosecuting me on a fraudulent and abusive fish and game charge, based on tampered evidence, similar to a prior, 1975 incident created by the Communist/dope-dealing plea-bargainer, who maliciously had me arrested on trumped-up assault charges, because her Chicago Mafia customers were complaining about my neighborhood presence. They didn't like me driving my vehicles past their windows in the wee hours of the morning, while they were trying to get a good night's sleep, prior to their pre-dawn departures back to Chicago, in the Mob's Cadillac limos loaded to the springs with dope. This was the obvious response of state and federal officers toward an innocent neighborhood bystander, who had, by his increased awareness and knowledge, threatened the Golden Pipeline of funds for CIA black operations in Central America.

A dead "endangered specie" bird was planted in the refrigerator in one of my apartments, wrapped in aluminum foil, as tenants vacated, and I was charged with "possession". This malicious prosecution coincided with the $50,000.00 grant from the feds to the Santa Fe D.A's office, to investigate cattle mutilations, to be conducted by ex-F.B.I. agent Kenneth Rommel. Meanwhile, my key defense witness, former tenant Bill Englert, was killed when the single-engine aircraft he was piloting plowed into the ground in Alaska, during his last flight to Ankorage, the day before his planned return to Santa Fe to testify. After obtaining his pilot license, Bill worked as a fish-spotter for Alaskan fishing fleets near Ankorage. I speculated that his plane had been sabotaged prior to his last takeoff, just to prevent his testimony, since there were those present with him in Alaska, who worked with my New Mexico neighbor in the smuggling operations. In fact, they formed a direct extension of the Colombia-to-Alaska drug conduit. Fish and Game fuzz John Miles, who conducted the search and seizure illegally and without a warrant, and issued the abusive subpoena illegally, and physically assaulted me on my own property, is now head of the agency.

The malicious prosecution was coordinated with the government's investigation of itself in the cattle mutilations, smuggling dope to fund its black operations, and murder of anyone who got in the way, in the Big Lie program, designed to conceal these dark deeds along with flying saucer propulsion secrets, along with activities connected to a secret program involved with the cattle mutilations. The mutilations program collects and analyzes 'specific biological tissue' from mammals—cattle—which are similar enough to humans to yield reliable results in tests of "stealth" particle beam weapons under development, intended for use on humans. This monitoring of the effects of ionizing radiation on cattle, is 'pseudo-justified' to NSA oversight committees, on 'environmental grounds', since the techniques for studying the effects of radiation—whether produced by the high-voltage electrical discharges emitted by saucers, or defense-related weapons under "national security purposes"—are essentially the same.

The weapons appear to be for "population control", judging from the degree of secrecy surrounding the removal of tissue from the cattle. (See Chap. TV ["Sightings"] for more on this subject). The use of other people's animals without their permission helps to conceal the research, since the presence of such large animals at government facilities would be obvious. Since the weapons are designed for use on humans in their natural environment, without their knowledge, use of them on cattle, as the most available mammals around, produces more realistic results. A 'spinof' benefit of the perennial "tests", is to justify the continued veil of secrecy, since, so long as there is "on-going" research involving the saucers, the secrecy conceals them and everything connected to them. Though the government continues to use the national security veil to deny public access to saucer technology, the ultimate purpose is the private, economic security of IllumiNazi corporations. One fascist hand washes the other, as we are controlled and experimented on like lab animals, and the sham continues.

Back in 1966, during my second semester of law school at U.T., I had discussed saucer propulsion with another law student during a coffee break between classes, within earshot of a student whom I knew to be employed by the CIA. Immediately afterward, in a class of the eminent constitutional law professor, Charles Allen Wright, the CIA/student screamed out, "...What should the penalty be for a law student who disclosed 'national security secrets' in the hallways?", gesturing toward me. Wright screamed, "He didn't disclose national security secrets!"

Around two days later, as I drove south down Red River Street at its intersection with 6th Street, out of the corner of my eye to my left, I spotted a discolored '55 Ford being driven by two Air Force men, parked at the curb near the light. As I entered the intersection, they floor-boarded the Ford, and accelerated directly toward my left door. In a quick reflex, I applied brakes and swerved to my right, just in time to deflect their blow. Both my Chevy station wagon and the Ford were totaled. The Ford had no license plate, and the two men, whose uniforms bore no insignia or other markings, were ticketed for running a red light and causing the collision, and nothing else, although circumstances indicate that they should have been arrested on the spot.

The following day, I discovered that the two airmen were "shipped out' from Bergstrom Air Base, and the Base Commandant's office refused to give me their names or their "newly assigned base". There was no doubt in my mind that they were Air Force "hitters" from the O.S.I. This incident was easy to connect to Air Force spooks, since the men lacked identities, ranks, and addresses, their car was equally anonymous, and the base Advocates office concealed their identies and whereabouts. I could detail a half dozen more such incidents, all of which had similar Kafkaesque qualities which could only be created by a secret police state. This CIA harrassment occurred after they told President Kennedy that I worked for them, and prior to to their actual attempts to recruit me. Some of it was meddling in my life by George Bush, prior to his CIA directorship.

Most of the harrassment and malicious prosecution in New Mexico was ostensibly property related. Every property transaction I was involved in since 1970, was intentionally engineered at the outset by the CIA, or screwed up by them They initially suckered me into coming to Santa Fe in the first place. In 1970, they offered me a seven-acre tract at the junction of Cerrillos Road and Rodeo Road, for a mere $4300.00, which is now worth millions, and presently includes a business owned by my CIA girlfriend. In 1973, they transferred a beautiful ten-acre parcel on Barrancas Drive to me, filed the deed, and even had it assessed to me. That property is worth at least a million. The transaction was signed by an ex-CIA employee (now a lawyer/banker), a former New Mexico Governor connected to the CIA, and another well-known (also ex-CIA) lawyer. It took me at least four trips to the county assessor's and clerk's offices to convince them the property was not mine. These attempts to give me property by the CIA, were related to attempts to "recruit" me, by indebting me to them, in anticipation of future employment which they intended to provide me, whether I liked it or not.

D.A.s, police, and judges are easily controlled by the N.S.A., and can be made to do anything under the guise of "national security". Even more extreme, I knew that at least two D.A.S, (one in Texas) were employees of the CIA, because one was involved in attempting to recruit me directly, and the other I won't say how I know. One judge inadvertently disclosed to me that the N.S.A. was influencing the case before him, in which I was involved, in his ruminations from the bench, mumbling that I was supposed to be "...some sort of 'rocket scientist' or something...", which the government wished to control. That was because the particular orders given to him came from security people connected ostensibly to rocketry, but were actually concerned about flying saucers. That judge was a close personal friend to a man I refer to as the "Friend", about whom I will say more later. We don't control these people. They operate on their own, inside our government, representing the Trilateralists, not us.

For around ten years, I was grilled by northern New Mexico's "Torquemada", (a Santa Fe judge). There, sitting in judgment of me, was a psychologically tormented, insecure "momma's boy" from Espanola—an 'ex-pornographer' who was addicted to cocaine—who for the sake of his co-addict/sadist legal colleagues, took every opportunity to pretend to impeach my credibility, or make underhanded swipes at my character, which were really none of his business.

When I first moved to New Mexico, I was a sculptor and a painter. I had already undergone a horrible incident at the University of Texas, instigated by Jesuit-controlled agents of Dr. John ("Long John") Silber, which eventually resulted in his being fired by Frank Erwin, President of the Board of Regents, for FRAUD AND CONSPIRACY, and the revocation of the PhD. of LB.J.'s Undersecretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Dr. Billy McCrocklin, for plagiarizing his doctoral thesis from a 1920s top secret document on the Garde d'Haiti called "The Hart Report". These were not retributions by me, but the result of anger by others over the things being done to me, which tripped certain levers leading to the undoing of an evil perpetrator, taking a few others with him.

Some of you may have heard of Dr. John ("Long John") Silber, the Dr. Strangelove-type president of Jesuit-run Boston College, who ran for governor of Massachusetts and lost in 1993. He is a rigid, dyed-in-the wool classicist/fascist, with a potential to create great mischief. He left the University of Texas after I uncovered his conspiracy, because he sent a cabal of his "hatchet-women" after me. He dragged some of them on up to Boston with him, because they were being run out of Texas too. The incident was similar to one involving John Henry Faulk, with the exception that there probably never will be any attempt to redress what happened to me. What brought the harrassment temporarily to an end, was the blowing of the cover of several CIA operations on the University of Texas campus, which resulted from some of those angered and set into motion over what was happening to me. Sometimes you never realize who your friends are until the chips are down.

I once mentioned to a CIA man whom I respected, that it appeared that the agency could be harrassing someone at the same time another group from the agency was trying to do them a favor, or gain their cooperation. He explained it to me like this: Every organization has its right wing and its left wing, each of which does not seem to know what the other is doing.

Though I graduated with what my friend Henry said was the highest grade-point average of any fine arts graduate student in the history of the University of Texas, that incident had dragged me through the mud as it was designed to do, and had taken a lot out of me already.

The seventeen years of New Mexico judicial harassment just about stamped out all of the art in me. An artist cannot work under conditions of "judicial war psychosis". There are two horrible aspects involved here, which are: (1) The government's policy of secretly violating freedom of speech and press; and (2) clandestinely carrying out this policy through obedient government yeggs and dupes, each motivated at his or her own level (and who often don't even know who is calling the shots). The victim has no way of proving the illegal motives or even the existence of the conspiracy, because of the phony "national security" veil.

I turned away a large fortune rather than become beholden to the CIA. After all the abusive litigation, I concluded that so-called "justice" and "freedom" in America are terms used on the naive and ignorant, to give them the false impression that they are the fortunate recipients of "rights", which in reality exist only for so long as their individual interests don't conflict with those of the Trilateral Commission. I now realize what a wealthy young man was trying to tell me in 1968, when he said "...property is just a trap". I thought he was some kind of Communist or something, who didn't believe in property rights. I didn't own any real estate then, but thought I'd like to have some. I now realize that what he meant was that a person who owns property can be controlled by threats against the ownership of that property by the state, or indirectly through others encouraged by the state. He helped organized the Washington Monument demonstrations in the late '60s, to bring the Viet Nam War to an end. Though a multi-millionaire, he refused to own property. The F.B.I. probably didn't even know who he was.

The last six years of horrible controversy which diminished in 1992, involved motivating some of my thug neighbors to sue me, as others continued to abuse me while the litigation progressed in court. As I struggled in vain to hold my family together amidst the stress of litigation and social ostracism created by the criminals behind it and in the courts, they moved in for the kill and destroyed my family. Causing my loved ones to suffer is a "blood crime", if you get my meaning, and it won't go unpunished. I'm part Kiowa, Cree, Cherokee and Natchez—as well as Highland Scottish— so I know how to play the "waiting game". I'm incredibly patient.

I MEET A MEMBER OF THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION'S INTERNATIONAL GEODETIC SURVEY TEAM

This region is quite a crossroad of America, including many Trilateral Commission connections. A friend of mine was one of the surveyors for the International Geodetic Survey, in the 1950s, during the Korean War. The survey was international, which meant that the supposedly civilian American scientific crews, with American military escorts, were allowed into China, the Soviet Union, etc., even during the war. My friend was a surveyor in the American military, as was the entire survey crew he worked with. The scientific crew was civilian. However, according to my friend, they switched clothing, so that the military survey crew looked like civilians, and vice-versa. The civilian-dressed (military) survey crew, would determine the location of each of the points, to be marked by the I.G.S. brasscaps, and were instructed to remove themselves from the area, after which the (military-dressed) civilian crew would then come to place the brass-caps.

One day, after locating a point, my friend left the area, then discovered that he had forgotten some of his equipment, and went back to get it. At that time, he came upon the other crew, while they were supposedly in the process of setting the I.G.S. brass-cap. This came as a surprise to them, because they were actually placing a device underneath where the I.G.S. brass-cap was to be placed. This "sub point" was marked with the insignia of the Trilateral Commission, which was a triangle with a dot in the center, just as I had seen on the old Pojoaque viejo's work box from the "p2" 1937 Los Alamos project. The civilians (dressed as military) were very angry at him for having disobeyed instructions, especially in view of the fact that he had seen the concealed device being set into cement, beneath the surface, above which the I.G.S. brass-cap was to be placed.

The secret point, marked by the Trilateral pyramid with a dot in the center (the Masonic/Egyptian "all-seeing eye of Bel, God, or Ra" as shown on the dollar bill), identified the "Illuminati" as the controlling, so-called "civilian" parties of the I.G.S.

Each of the secret geodetic points on our globe, placed at the vertices of geodetic triangles dividing our planet's surface, apparently contains a crystal resonator set to respond to a distinct frequency, for navigating flying saucers (even unmanned ones), and even rockets, either manually, electronically, or by computer. Flying saucers can travel at least 9,000 m.p.h. At that speed-given other limitations on visibility—the resonators provide a means for computer navigation of saucers at high speeds, without visibility, and allow for accurately determining global locations. As a means for Secret Government world navigation, the I.G.S. markers have been in place for forty years. Without the means for using them in 1950, they would have been useless. This survey, actually done for the Trilateralist world government, under the "cover" of the I.G.S.—right under the noses of the United Nations teams, military authorities, international committees, survey teams, and host countries—showed the awesome power of these world-wide conspirators, whose actions violated the sovereignty of nations, through the United Nations.

This "geodetic navigation system" was a perfect solution for the flying saucer and for the Illuminati and Trilateral Commission, since it automatically involved triangular global areas generated by the "great circles" of the "master builder", according to the Genesis passages relied upon in the "secret work" of the "Old Prussian" Masonic Lodges based on the Johanite Gospel, the membership of which excluded Jews, and were forbidden to belong to "humanitarian" Masonry. The teachings of this Johanite German Freemasonry included a dogmatic Christianity, and is rooted in the same, weird teachings of the former Jesuit priest and founder of the "modern" Illuminati in Bavaria, Adam Weishaupt. Out of this sprung the Thule Society and the Ahnenerbe Society, which figured strongly in the S.S., among whose founders was General Karl Haushoffer, the originator of the modern "science" utilized by "our" CIA, called "Geopolitics". The following three archival emblems show the transition from the Thule Society, the Deutsche Antarktische Stiftung (the German Arctic Expedition, with swastika and oak leaves showing Thule Society sponsorship), the "globally conscious" I.G.S. Survey, ala Haushofer's "geopolitics", to the UN:

The several special multidisciplinary, integrated disciplines developed by the SS inner circle, as part of a plan of fiiture world government, included Geopolitics—combined politics and geography—including the ethnic studies and 'racial science' of the Ahnenerbe, linguistics, and culture—and Parapsychology—combined religion and psychology—for use in the MASS PSYCHOLOGY BIG LIE system. Parapsychology would assist the 'geopoliticians' in maintaining mind control of particular populations, creating psychological conditioning conducive to unquestioned obedience to faceless authority. This system was ordered by John D. Rockefeller in 1923, when his people trained the SS and chose Hitler as the future leader ofthe Third Reich, as R & D for the fiiture mass-psychological control technology, now applied in America since 1945.

In 1957, as a member of the Air Force—like all American armed forces managed according to the Sturm Abteilung ("Storm Division") Nazi troop management manual written by the 'synergist', Ernst Roehm, homosexual 'father' of Hitler's SA—I was assigned to Operations Intelligence, working in an 'SS library' as a monitor. I often heard the term "geopolitics", and logged various documents and books into and out of that library. I was literally surrounded and controlled by the trappings of the Nazis which had impressed our leaders so much that they officially 'adopted' them. The library was the creation of the Nazi intelligence network, the photos in the documents and books dating from that period and bearing overwritten German file indexes. There was practically no way for the U.S. government to have obtained such a 'library', other than from the files compiled during the Nazi invasion of Russia

At the time of the German 'surrender', American authorities were deeply impressed with these materials, so thoroughly accumulated, catalogued, and organized by Reinhard Gehlen's SS group, which included the monsters Heinrich Mueller and Reinhard Heydrich, that the CIA actually hired them in the U.S. under assumed names[1]. These files were used by the SS in the death camps and in sifting though the various Slavic "slave peoples" of the Soviet Union, to ferret out and murder Soviet Jewry, Gypsies, and others deemed "inferior". The documents acquired an ostensible 'new' purpose as barter and trade to an America which allowed itself to be drawn into a Cold War based on the dubious urgings of the Organization Gehlen's "experts", the new CIA's Soviet 'analysts' and 'specialists'—former SS intelligence officers—who convinced us that the Soviets were planning to attack us at any moment. We in SAC Intelligence could load the library into "mobility boxes" on a moment's notice, to take with us to a remote staging area nearer to the Soviet borders, in the event of the outbreak of war. But only after an invasion of the Soviet Union by us as conquerors, would the library assume its actual function because, other than the ostensible purely academic use as an 'invaluable reference library', it still retained its true identity...as a reference to be used in the systematic subjugation of foreign peoples by Nazi conquerors.

Almost a month before the fall of the Berlin Fuehrerbunker, Gehlen was already deeply bartering with selling American intelligence on the value of his organization, primarily on the basis of its contacts in and expertise on the Soviet Union. In retrospect, it appears that the long-range plan of the SS officers of Gehlen's organization was to get Hitler's revenge against "Judaized America", by offering themselves to us as "intelligence experts" at a hefty profit, allowing them to survive intact as a secret sect within the secret core of our 'intelligence community', while embroiling us in a tortuous Cold War which lasted for almost fifty years.

---

[1]Gregory Douglas, Gestapo Chief (three vols.), R. James Bender, P.O. Box 23456, San Jose, Ca 95153.

CHAPTER III: I MEET A GOVERNMENT M.I.B. IN SANTA FE; HOLLYWOOD ON THE TAKE

The magnitude by which electricity overcomes the force of gravity, is rivaled only by the magnitude by which the Big Lies of our government and the Trilateralists have overcome our rationality. These IllumiNazi Big Lies about "aliens" are disseminated through all the mass media. Someday there should be justice by public trial and punishment of the traitors who have perverted the instruments of democracy, and are entitled to none of our protections, which they seek to destroy. They who have made war on our Bill of Rights and Constitution should have to defend themselves without their protections.

Without our consent, the Secret Government is consciously waging psychological warfare against us, in violation of our right to government only by our consent. They use movies, T.V., books, magazines, advertising, children's stories, and all forms of propaganda, from the cradle to the grave, to criminally undermine and subvert the epistemological underpinnings of rational existence. We have not 'consented' to a fraud of which we are unaware. Our government, on behalf of the TC/CFR, has created the whole "alien" scenario, to brainwash us. So what is their purpose? To conceal flying saucer technology from us, and to stretch our credulities so we will believe the Big Lies. Control is the name of the game, and they have it. Flying saucer technology would break that control, so we don't have it. Are we a nation of wimps who will do nothing about it?

According to one nutty writer[1], the purpose is either to fabricate a phony alien threat, so as to unite the world under a one-world fascist/socialist TC/CFR/Bilderberger/Illuminati dictatorship, or to render the world's people into subservience to actual aliens with whom they have cut a deal, and he thinks it is all the fault of the Masons.

Unfortunately, neither of these conclusions is correct, though the first one contains a germ of truth, in the fabrication of a phony alien threat, but in view of the two purposes I stated above, this wacky theory is perceived as just as misinformational as the crap emitted by the CIA's or O.N.I.'s covert agents in UFOlogy. The phony 'alien' threat was derived from a public speech by Ronald Reagan regarding the effects of an hypothetical alien threat, which in a paranoid's mind, is the kind of hype to be used to appeal to a bewildered constituency, so they can be unwittingly used to spread the dumb idea that the alien propaganda is intended to scare us into the arms of the NWO, or is a leak from the inside regarding a deal the government has with the aliens.

Such wacky propaganda is induced by a shell game: "Will those who have lost track of the real issue please raise their hands." The real issue is saucer technology. The controllers get their control over us with our money. The TC/CFR bunch have exclusive control over the saucer, since it is the most perfect instrument for 'world surveillance', and because its availability to the public would eventually destroy the economic power they now wield over us, through their control over energy, transportation and communications resources which we pay them for every day, so we "can't have it".

The plan will work only if they can maintain this exclusivity, which can only be maintained through continued ultra-secrecy and the help of dupes, and anyone else stupid enough to believe the CIA UFOlogists, in spreading the misinformation of alien origins of saucer technology. Since saucer construction is rather easy to duplicate, once the simple principles are known, even the scantiest secrets related to it are protected. That is the reason there has been no open saucer usage in any of our wars since 1945, even though this would have guaranteed clean and complete victories and prevented further loss of American lives. These facts show the ultimate treason through which these people have abused us, the 'paying' and purported 'owning' parties, while the CRF/TC enjoy exclusive use of 'our' saucers as 'their' special tools.

---

[1]Milton William Cooper, Behold a Pale Horse, Light Technology Publishing.

The second idea, that our government may have cut a deal with "aliens", was just plumb dumb. It was so dumb, that William Cooper, one of those who adopted this story, changed his tune the moment he bought a copy of my first edition, with the idea that he could abandon his old stuff and take credit for my claim of "exclusively human origin", so long as he never cited my book or told anyone that I had 'converted' him to the idea, but people noticed anyway, drat it! But Cooper still doesn't get it.

The manipulators of the TC/CFR have the mentalities of sociopathic ants. Their whole method was copied, then cynically perverted from an original idea of Nikola Tesla, before the ultimate destruction of the League of Nations, eventually brought about by Cecil Rhodes' British Round Table Group, and its American branch, which fused in 1919 into the new international British-American organization, known in America as the CFR ("Council on Foreign Relations"), and in Britain as the I.I.A. ("Institute for International Affairs"). Tesla had naively offered his flying saucer invention to the Geneva Convention and League of Nations, as an ultimate 'police vehicle' with which to patrol the world to maintain peace. His dislike of the new British-American organization was reflected by his disillusionment when the League of Nations was emasculated by the new group.

Meanwhile, the CFR/IIA was stealing his greatest invention, for its own exclusive use in the inobsequious world dictatorship we now have, using covert manipulation by war. Rather than maintaining peace, the war profiteers create the divide-and-conquer conditions leading to wars, profiting by them, then use the resultant wars, surrenders and 'peace negotiations' as pretexts to constantly restructure the world, profiting by them. The man who stabbed Tesla in the back, then twisted the hilt, was none other than J.P. Morgan, a member of the CFR, who was already a dictator of American energy and communications. Morgan suckered Tesla in, in a most treacherous and sadistic manner, seeking to completely crush him emotionally, driving him into a psychological turmoil and destitution from which he was never intended to return.

The TC/CFR/IIA like things just the way they have them, don't want to rock the boat, and fear most of all, significant change, since fluxing of conditions could induce unpredictable widespread free communications, which could awaken the people to the scam. That is the reason they sought to shut down the computer Internet in 1995. When they control the purse strings of the world, and soak up all the revenues of the people of America just to pay the interest on our 'national debt', why would they want an obvious 'world dictatorship', which would kill the goose that laid the golden egg? So long as we slaves keep our noses to the grindstones, they have it made. The only thing which would induce them to take drastic action, would be if the public suddenly becomes aware of the Big Picture. They won't create tumultuous conditions which they can't control, and anything 'spontaneous' must be brought under control to the ends they desire. That is the reason the TC/CFR media have taken unfair advantage of the Oklahoma bombing of

Apr. 19, 1995, by misdirecting the public outrage over the bombing, from those responsible, to the grass roots sovereignty movement, militia movement, constitutionalists, and in general, all those who are critical of the government, know about the Banksters, have documentation to prove it, and are awakening the rest of the people to the total abnegation of American sovereignty by these worldists.

Though the Bilderberg group's public emergence can be traced to 1952, its name supposedly derived from the place of their supposed "first meeting" at the Bilderberg Hotel in Holland in 1954. This group has a much older, but perhaps not so clear, origin. "Bilderberger" is a German word meaning "picture merchant", denoting the internationalists who have for centuries used paintings and art as a store of wealth, as a hedge against inflation, and as a compact means of transportation of their wealth from one country to the other. That is the reason so many unscrupulous and ruthless people, such as Armand Hammer, have had so much of their wealth tied up in valuable paintings and other art. And that is where the famous Dutch Hotel got its name, since these people came so often to Holland to conceal the loot which they as dictators or just plain high-placed thieves, had accumulated in the countries which they had so often throughout history, stripped of wealth.

For centuries, Holland was the place to discretely buy and sell valuable pieces of art, and to convert them into and out of the various currencies of the world at current values, avoiding inflation, taxes and prying eyes. The Dutch, like the Swiss and their banking interests, have always been accommodating, and named a hotel after their infamous guests, many years before the formal meeting in 1954. I first heard about the Bilderbergers in 1960, from a person who had known about them since before the depression. I once knew an old Dutchman who as a boy at the turn of the century, acted as an inconspicuous, secret courier, riding his bicycle, carrying various currencies for the Bilderbergers from country to country in the lowlands, usually at night, until he received a serious, life-long injury when he was run over by a coach one rainy dark night.

The TC/CFR/Secret Government, has consistently used the mass media to convince us that flying saucers are from outer space, rather than being man-made, and to my knowledge, this is the first book or any other media production, which makes the unequivocal, categorical assertion that they are exclusively man-made, and that NO EVIDENCE EXISTS ON EARTH OF ANYTHING EVER BEING "MADE" EXCEPT BY HUMAN BEINGS.

If anyone believes that the use of mass media for such purposes is just "harmless entertainment", they should have watched the two-part miniseries, Intruders, aired by C.B.S. on May 17 and 19, 1992. The scenario left no doubt that the intent was to beg the question that flying saucers are "extraterrestrial spacecraft", to intimidate and threaten us, and to falsely convince us of the following ominous things:

OSTENSIBLE MESSAGE: (a) That aliens are "with us";
(b) that our government "knows it";
(c) that the government's policy of secrecy is "for our own good" and "justified";
(d) that the government will hurt
you if you don't comply;
(e) that anyone who actively resists, will commit "professional suicide", or worse.

ULTERIOR MESSAGE That man does not possess this (simple) technology.

If anyone has any doubts as to the CIA's harrassment of independent flying saucer investigators, the following facsimile clipping regards oppression of them by the CIA;

UFO congress hears claims against CIA

ACAPULCO, Mexico (UPI) - William Spaulding, director of Ground Saucer Watch Inc., claims the CIA has been interfering with unidentified flying object watchers.

He told the International Congress on UFO Phenomena in Acapulco Thursday the CIA has recommended that groups of UFO researchers be watched during sightings and "considered as subversive."

He charged the agency's domestic operations have "harassed and intimidated researchers and tried to hold up the dissemination of UFO information."

Spaulding's view is challenged by former CIA agent Bradley Ayers, now a registered private detective in Minnesota and UFO researcher.

"The agency has been made the whipping boy for all the ills of the world", he said.

"LOOKING FOR MOTIVES"

We can use the CIA's own analytical techniques against it. The gist of the government's primary motivations can be reduced to protecting the corporate-state interests, by concealing the Secret Government's flying saucer surveillance of us, and the elite's energy, technological, and transportation cartel. The rest of the garbage is merely a "means to an end". Through false propaganda rumors about "extraterrestrials", they have duped support for their policy, based on the false premise that the "end" (prevention of widespread panic over the fictitious "alien presence") justifies the "means" (government mass-media brainwashing and intimidation of men, women, and children), while on the 'public' level, a phony alien threat is "implied" by the media, and used to psychologically intimidate reticence to the TC/CFR Illuminati leadership. Once we recognize the FACTS that THERE ARE NO ALIENS ON EARTH, and that THE GOVERNMENT AND THE TRILATERALISTS HAVE CREATED THE ALIEN MYTHOLOGY to conceal FLYING SAUCER SECRETS intended for EXCLUSIVE USE AGAINST US WITHOUT OUR KNOWLEDGE, it naturally follows that public access to flying saucer technology, conceived by an American citizen over NINETY

YEARS AGO, will remove the PRIMARY motivational basis for the world corporate-state conspiracy, and destroy their BIG LIE PROPAGANDA SYSTEM.

In examining these hoaxes, one cannot fail to see a connection to the ancient Sumerians, Egyptians, and their worship of Osiris, as well as other ancient esoteric suggestions, which is because the Nazi intelligence planners in the CIA are fond of such esoterica. In my chapters III and VI, I give you some of the mythological foundations for this religion, which is over 6,000 years old. The Egyptians, who did not originate this belief system, which came from Asia, used a whole system of myths to control everything, just as the Illuminati does today. This has been a role model for totalitarian designers throughout history. The Egyptians' 'enemies'—the Sea Peoples, Assyrians, Babylonians, Amorites, Sumerians, Akkadians, Chaldeans, Greeks, etc.—shared this same ancient nature religion, and could be 'spiritually' manipulated by Egypt, which practiced the religion in its most highly classicized form, the Mecca of sun worship, just as Rome became the home of the Roman Catholic Church. This is the "secret of the ages": Mysticism! Those who can be suckered in by it, are putty in the mystics' hands, the hands of those who only use mysticism as a means of control. And those who resist, can be killed by those who follow, all in the name of "God", "Ra", "Mohammed", "Stalin", "The Fatherland", etc. Marx stated that "religion is the opiate of the people", but he failed to point out that he also was a religious mystic, who asked his followers to believe in the "mystical power" of THE COLLECTIVE, on faith rather than reason. I would further define "mystics", as those who seek to gain values from others, or to deny others the use of their own minds as individuals, on the basis of "special powers" which can't be proven and must be accepted on "faith", so as to control them. This always involves some form of mysticism, as any con-artist could tell you. And the bottom line is, THERE ARE NO MYSTICAL SECRETS!

Socialism, Communism, Fascism and Naziism are inventions of the IUuminati, theo-statist "masks", which make the citizens pay for their own bureaucratic enslavement and "social and economic benefits", while the elite remain in secret control of the world, increasing and using their illicitly gained profit and power for themselves, without bearing any responsibility for the wrongs they inflict, since the guilt for this is thereby scapegoated to the citizens and their puppetized 'leaders'. Karl Marx and the IUuminati which backed him, took the Judeo-Christian "you-are-your-brother's-keeper" conscience, and perverted it into a "statist conscience", under a "state religion" with moral and physical damnation of non-believers ("heretics"), while the people shared the poverty, false guilt and weakness thus created.

CORNY GOVERNMENT SPECIAL EFFECTS AND HOAX SCENARIOS:
The Roswell Rhesus Monkey Hoax and Other Such Outrageous Shams

In the late '40s, when Hollywood's emerging "space age" special effects were funky and humorous by today's standards, the special effects of the personnel of Holloman A.F.B. at Alamogordo, White Sands Missile Range, and Walker Air Force Base at Roswell, were even funkier. They executed the stupid 1947 hoax which is sometimes called the "MJ-12" incident or "The Roswell Incident", but which I call "The Roswell Rhesus Monkey Hoax". Until 1952, Wernher von Braun was working at Ft. Bliss (as Director of Research, U.S. Army Ordnance Guided Missile Command), from which post he continued to conduct V-2 (A-9, V-6, V-7) tests at nearby White Sands Proving Grounds, while other tests were being conducted on the rocket sled at Alamogordo, using rhesus monkies in G-suits, to determine the limits of human G-force endurance and other problems of high performance flight in conventional high performance aircraft (necessary to sustain conventional aeronautics on a high level in order to stave off demands for the saucer technology in national security groups). In 1952, the researchers switched to chimpanzees in A-9 tests. The chimps were much easier to control and less dangerous and problematic for personnel to handle.

In the original 1947 hoax, a small, comic-strip-type flying saucer—around twelve feet in. diameter, constructed of stock sheet aluminum, rivets, screws, bar stock and molding, with a plastic "bubble-canopy" for the 'pilot', and an old automotive antenna with a ball on its tip projecting from the top of the bubble—was placed in a spot about four miles from Walker A.F.B., on the ranch of a cooperating co-conspirator. Four rhesus monkies, which had been shaved, dyed green, and outfitted with corny little "space suits", complete with little 'space' helmets, were strewn near the fake saucer. News leaks were arranged by the intelligence "E. & D" (Evaluation and Dissemination) Officer, as the 'crashed alien flying saucer' and the four 'space aliens' were 'found' by the military authorities. Just like in a third-grade play, only this scenario was worse. Just imagine "Peter Pan" being performed by a bunch of G.I.s.

The Alamogordo intelligence personnel even purchased the green pigment—dry tempera pigment—from our family business, and I even showed them how to apply it by rubbing it on dry, just like on "limed oak" furniture I showed people how to finish. Our business was the best art supply, decorating and paint contracting business in the region, and Alamogordo had none. My father and I even decorated the new house of Robert O. Anderson, in Hondo (near Roswell) about 1951.

By our present standards, the mock flying saucer was a grossly amateurish attempt to foist a corny hoax upon the public. 'Leaks' to the news media, including a few ridiculous photos of the saucer (which would have been prohibited if the events were true), and the dead monkies in the corny 'space suits' (the monkey-sized G-suits used in the acceleration experiments), were publicized in newspapers, and eventually found then-way to magazines, despite the immediate attempts by the startled and angered Pentagon officials to retrieve all the evidence. The whole confused scenario and withdrawn publishings, created even more weirdness. One of the P.I.O.s (Public Information Officers) of Army Air Corps Intelligence, Walther Haut, sent out the initial press releases to area newspapers, announcing the recovery of an "alien flying saucer", including 8" x 10" black and white glossies, showing the 'captured' saucer and 'aliens'. Haut, who now runs a "Flying Saucer Museum" in Roswell, New Mexico, has made no references to those photos in any of his recent statements. That is because he was then, and still is, an employee of the intelligence community. Fortunately for the Pentagon, the photos were sent only to regional, small-town letterpress newspapers, few of which possessed the means to reproduce the photos in 1947, without first having half-tone photo-engravings produced in larger cities. This gave the Pentagon more time to get most of them back before publication, or to stop the papers before they were distributed. In preparing for the hoax, regional military intelligence personnel had created a 'crash site' with a bull dozer, on the rancher's property, by making a huge gash in the ground. Whoever was handling the dozer that day was a bit heavy-handed. The 'saucer' however, was obviously a stupid hoax, as there was no way that the flimsy little craft, without a dent or hole in it, could have plowed such a gaping hole in the hard and rocky, sun-baked desert ground. The photos of the 12-foot diameter fake saucer had become known to many people, yet today, I seem to be the only person who recalls them. Since the initial photos—already prepared before the crash—were issued immediately after the purported 'crash', personnel had insufficient time to fabricate the fake saucer afterward, so the initial photos from the Army Air Corps, of the original fake saucer, without a speck of dust or a dent on it, represented physical evidence of the hoax perpetrated by them. Further proof that the photos were taken before the hoax was executed was the fact that the junky little saucer was photographed in a hanger (at Walker or Holloman), while the "aliens" (i.e., rhesus monkies, completely dressed in their G-suits), were photographed in an Air Force laboratory, not at the hospital, most probably at Holloman A.F.B. at Alamogordo. That was prior to their removal to the hoax site, thence to the infirmary at Roswell. After the hoax, the G-suits were removed for 'medical' purposes, except for a couple of the monkies, which were raising a horrible stench, because they had relieved their bowels in the G-suits, upon death days before, and the hot desert sun had accelerated the fermentation of the monkey excreta and corpses, after their removal from the morgue at Holloman.

Years later, a photo of a supposedly operational, 60-foot diameter, jet-powered saucer designed by Schriever in WWII Germany, was leaked, but that scenario was withdrawn, since it verified a German saucer program, although a disinformational branch intended to hide the true electrically-powered project at Peenemunde. The initial evidence which reached certain members of the public, had already revealed the initial hoax to intelligent but somewhat confused witnesses. The latter leaked photo showing the Nazi saucer designed by Schriever, made in Czechoslovakia during the war, part of the saucer stuff rounded up by General Patton and transported to New Mexico along with the rest of the German saucer projects, around September, 1945, under Operation Paperclip. Since it wasn't one of the highly classified "electro-saucers", the photo did little harm, and had a 'professionally constructed' appearance, intended to overcome the poor craftsmanship and design of the fake saucer. It was a 'withdrawn hoax', however, since it tended to acknowledge a crash which conflicted with the later "weather balloon hoax" concocted by the Pentagon to conceal the first bungled hoax.

Because of all the gross stupidities and miscalculations on the part of the initial huxters, the initial scenario was obliterated by subsequent weather balloon stuff which was only slightly less stupid, but the initial 1947 hoax, 38 years before the third, 1985 "MJ-12" hoax, still contained 'salvageable parts' as far as the Pentagon huxters were concerned. The Pentagon team had taken great pains to carefully obliterate and omit the dumb photos of the original saucer and monkies, which clearly smells of a Pentagon "cover-up" of its hoax, while, the public, most of whom never saw the photos, failed to realize that what was being "covered up" was not an "alien crash", but an unauthorized 'wildcat' hoax, not cleared through the Pentagon, created by ex-Nazi military 'intelligence' personnel, which was bungled by lack of special effects expertise.

The 'salvageable' parts of the first hoax, which provided the precedent of a mystified 'alien saucer' incident, together with the 'government cover-up', were reborn as a third, MJ-12 hoax, complete with a set of fake, newly created and planted 'presidential orders', obtained through the "freedom of information act" This new scenario was written by a team of Ph.D.s, submitted to a secret committee, and approved by them. Even so, that scenario has been called a hoax by the government itself, since it also conflicted with the second, "weather balloon hoax", which has now become the "official" position, because government officials are absolutely forbidden to acknowledge the existence of flying saucers, be they fake 'alien' ones, or real, 'man-made' ones. In order for the government to drop back to the second hoax, it was necessary for them to admit that the third, MJ-12 hoax, was a hoax. It took them some time to realize that the second hoax was better, because it allowed them to simply deny questions about 'aliens' which did not in reality exist. Also, it was necessary to insure, through their control of UFOlogy groups, that only the 'right' (i.e., "wrong") questions were asked in the petition now known as "The Roswell Statement".

It would seem that, with the 38-year lapse between the first and second hoax, they could have done a better job, but alas, the government bunglers screwed up again. The error involved slander and fraud against deceased presidents Truman and Eisenhower, by forging their names on false documents which alleged an incident which never occurred. Such fraud and slander should not have been treated so lightly by law enforcement authorities in respect to the arrogant Pentagon officials, who clearly overstepped their authority, by falsifying actions taken by former (deceased) commanders-in-chief, ex post facto.

At the time of my 1993 first edition I was unaware that the original photos had become completely 'unavailable'. Though I was unable to find my copies of them to include in this book, I assumed they were known to the usual saucer investigator, and proceeded to point out facts which I thought would be obvious to anyone examining them. Then I was astounded in late 1993, to discover that no 'civilians' involved in UFOlogy knew of or said a thing about the old photos. I knew that I hadn't seen the two photos, given to me in 1970 by a newsman, or my magazine showing the photos, since 1974. These stupid photos infuriated Pentagon officials, by revealing the identities of the "aliens" as shaved rhesus monkies, in a hoax which was an amateurish attempt to convince the public that the German flying saucers seen by so many people in the area, were "extraterrestrial". The Pentagon would never have approved the hoax beforehand, and the original hoax, as perpetrated, would never have held up, because it was too amateurishly funny!

What the photos showed, as purported "space aliens", were shaved rhesus monkies, wearing monkey-sized, machine-sewn, G-suits with the pressure lines and lacings, equipped with oxygen tubes, helmets, and other equipment, identical to those of the X-15 rocket plane test pilots, for whose benefits the monkey tests were conducted, to accumulate data from rocket sled tests at Alamogordo, on the outer parameters of G-forces which humans could withstand. The helmets concealed the small sizes of the upper craniums of the monkeys, later exaggerated in the "official standard alien" model.

In view of the original hoax, the MJ-12 documents were apparently intended to retroactively convince us that "space aliens" from millions of light years away, possessing 'superior intelligence', had come to Roswell. It was contemplated that the public could still be convinced of this, provided the scenario was presented without the photos, which by the poor judgment of the 1947 military intelligence personnel were considered "convincing". The third-rate 'saucer kitsch'—the rhesus monkies in G-suits, and the junky little saucer of such poor craftsmanship that a California hot-rodder would have been ashamed—had to be concealed. The recently fabricated 'presidential orders' of "MJ-12" were intended to resuscitate the original "aliens"—minus the dumb photos—despite the obvious fact that beings of sufficiently high intelligence would never have contacted jerks at Roswell or Alamogordo, or even Area 51, unless there was a reasonably expectable opportunity to contact the most powerful political leader in the world, and even an idiot wouldn't make that mistake! The sites didn't even vaguely resemble Washington, D.C. or New York City. Government-employed writers have attempted to fabricate several "secret meetings" between various presidents of the U.S., as a basis for hoax scenarios, when an examination of the presidential calendars and newspapers on the alleged dates, shows that the presidents in question were involved in other activities which precluded the authenticity of the documents. There is now the original "rhesus monkey" hoax, the "weather balloon" cover-up hoax, and the "MJ-12" hoax, all now being played upon by the O.S.I. "UFOlogy" and government "denier" symphony, which can buy time indefinitely, so long as the phony debate is protracted.

I taught art at White Sands Missile Range School, in 1970-71, and I can assure you that there was no reason to believe that space aliens of superior intelligence would have passed up New York City and all the other metropolitan cities of the world, and instead, have landed near Alamogordo or Roswell. I have also worked in the movie industry, and can assure you that these efforts were grossly incompetent! Poor props, poor sets, poor makeup, poor acting, poor script, and poor production. Worse than Radar Men From the Moon. I also believe the hoax was cooked up by ex-Nazi Holloman intelligence personnel, rather than Walker or White Sands personnel, because the monkies were used there, the saucers were used there, and because Walker, as the "fall guy" base for the hoax, would create a distraction from the real perpetrators. Walker was a basic flight training base, with a few old bombers from an old atomic bomb wing (which at one time possibly included the Enola Gay, if my recollection is correct), mothballed there after the war, until the base was closed down sometime in the late '50s or early '60s. Holloman, an advanced flight-test base which also defended the whole top secret area with a fighter-interceptor group, performed highly classified tests in conjunction with White Sands Missile Range, and in respect to Wernher von Braun's intended manned (rocket) moon missions, which were probably shams to cover an earlier mission in the electro-propulsive Graf Zeppelin. Data produced at Alamogordo was used in the design of future rocket planes, jet fighters and bombers, flying saucers, and eventually, stealth planes (very expensive shams to cover saucer stuff).

Another reason the MJ-12 hoax related back to the old rhesus monkey hoax, was to utilize the weird 1947 image of the shaved monkies, which had become the 'official standard alien model' approved by the secret committees, to be useful in back-dating the more recent plans of extended fraud. The monkies, with their large, glassy, slanted eyes, small chins and mouths, and skinny bodies, are close enough to "E.T." to make a stab at it, at least in the retarded minds of the government plagiarists, and if need be, could be faked by small human actors, even child actors, midgets, or small, skinny women actors, in space suits, wearing latex masks with sunglass-lens eyes. The dark lenses conceal the human eyes, and create an eerie effect. The more recent wave of "alien" movies from Hollywood—many having nothing to do with this hoax—seem to have given the huxters a new life, by providing a body of more recent movies from which to plagiarize and sponge new 'spin-off hoaxes. There are also now many more competent special effects, prop-building, and makeup technicians available within the intelligence community.

Government agents posing as concerned citizen "UFOlogists"—also mimicked by unwitting dupes falsely induced by them—recently have naively revived this old incident, alleging that a "government cover-up" in 1947, concealed "evidence of aliens from space", and secret collaboration between them and our 'brilliant' military authorities and government. If that were true, they certainly didn't do a very good job of it! Even if genuine, the MJ-12 presidential documents could not have been obtained through the freedom of information act. Government agents ("UFOlogists") have agonizingly gone through the whole "Freedom Of Information Act" act, to obtain these "secret documents", for use in their propaganda war against us; warmed over hash, four times over. That's supposed to make this sham more believable?

The fake MJ-12 documents were intentionally ambiguous, since the embarrassingly stupid photos may still pop up. They have protected their flanks by ambivalent statements, intended to plant more seeds of doubt, to stretch the credulity and 'open the minds' of the gullible, to wallow holes in their credibilities large enough to cram the most recently approved official versions of the BIG LIES into. I lived just to the south of Roswell in 1947, and picked up the truth by "social osmosis". Three of the dead rhesus monkies had been stored in a morgue at Holloman, after being killed in acceleration experiments on the rocket sled. The fourth monkey was almost dead, and so was included with the three other dead ones used in the hoax.

To make my 'social osmosis' more complete, the story that the "aliens" were shaved and dyed rhesus monkies in G-suits, originally came to me through family connections, since my brother-in-law's aunt was the "nurse who later became a nun". As a nurse, she was present during the alleged "autopsy" (actually a dissection). Being a U.S. Army nurse who was a New Mexico survivor of the Bataan Death March, she easily recognized the rhesus monkies, since she had been forced by the Japanese to cook and eat rhesus monkies for food in the Bataan Peninsula. Leona, her sister, told me about it in 1958, but I'd already heard the story through my sister, Ramona, in 1953. I detail more on this under "Golden Cups, Monkey Business, and a Lot of Bull".

In 1995, just before my second edition went to press, I inserted information about seeing an old, 1947 Kodak color print made by the Roswell Army dissectors' photo assistant, during the dissection. That photo was acquired by a man named Bart Wilson, who had told me that he was negotiating with Time-Life Publications and the Sightings TV show people, for sale of the photo. Bart's family member had been in U.S. Army intelligence in Roswell in 1947, which is how he got the photo. I obtained this additional information after Bart's sale, too late to include in my second edition.

Bart's photo showed the splayed facial musculature of a rhesus monkey, pinned out in typical fashion on a board to be photographed for 'documentation' purposes. I immediately recognized it as the musculature of a monkey because the muscles were cut from around the two ears, which produced two strange almond shapes above the cut-outs for the eyes, when stretched out on the board. Bart wouldn't let me make a copy of the photo, as his potential purchasers had insisted on his not doing that.

A few days after Bart showed me the photo for the first time, in the Villa Linda mall in Santa Fe, where Bart's computer imaging and photo processing business was at that time, I mentioned to Bart that the photo verified what I said about the rhesus monkies, and he said he had a firm commitment from the Sightings people. A couple of days later, I just happened to be at Toys-R-Us, located a few hundred yards across the parking lot from Bart's business. As I waited for my son to look at some toys, looking out a window facing Bart's business location, a tan colored government Hummer pulled up in the parking space directly in front of my view. A man got out and walked directly across the parking lot to Bart's business. I went from the building and looked at the

Hummer. The front had a "CIA" plate, and on the passenger side there was a notice: "Property of Central Intelligence Agency: For Official Business Only."

I checked with Bart later, and he said he had concluded his sale of the photo print to the "Sightings" people on the day I saw the guy in the Hummer walk into Bart's business. I told him the guy arrived in a CIA Hummer, and we both had a laugh. I told him there was no chance that the photo will ever be seen by the public now, which is further proof not only that the "Sightings" show is produced by the CIA, but that they are concealing the "monkey business". It is what a friend calls another one of my "statistically challenging" experiences, that I just happened to be at Toys-R-Us, where the CIA man had parked his Hummer, hundreds of yards from Bart's business, in order to avoid the detection by people like me, of his purchase of the photo from Bart.

The following facsimile news clipping related to the government's covert revival of the Roswell "alien" effort.

Documents link Truman with UFO in New Mexico

Gannet News Service

WASHINGTON - Journalists from as far away as Europe and Japan converged on American University here Friday to look at controversial documents purportedly linking the late President Truman to a recovery operation involving a crashed extraterrestrial spacecraft in New Mexico.

The controversy centers on the authenticity of the so-called Majestic-12 document, allegedly prepared for President-elect Eisenhower on Nov. 18, 1952.

The document was never released publicly and, according to what was presented as a White House memo at the time, only President Truman, two of his Cabinet members and the director of the CIA knew its contents.

The continuing UFO controversy is enjoying perhaps its broadest forum ever this weekend during the "International Symposium on Unidentified Aerial Phenomena: A World View." The symposium lasts through Sunday.

The document reports that on July 7, 1947, "a secret operation was begun to assure recovery" of a supposed space-craft that had crashed about a week earlier near Roswell Army Base in New Mexico.

"We've spent two and a half years with that document. We are not prepared to state that it's genuine, but there is no evidence so far to suggest otherwise," said Bill Moore, author of a book on the case titled The Roswell Incident.

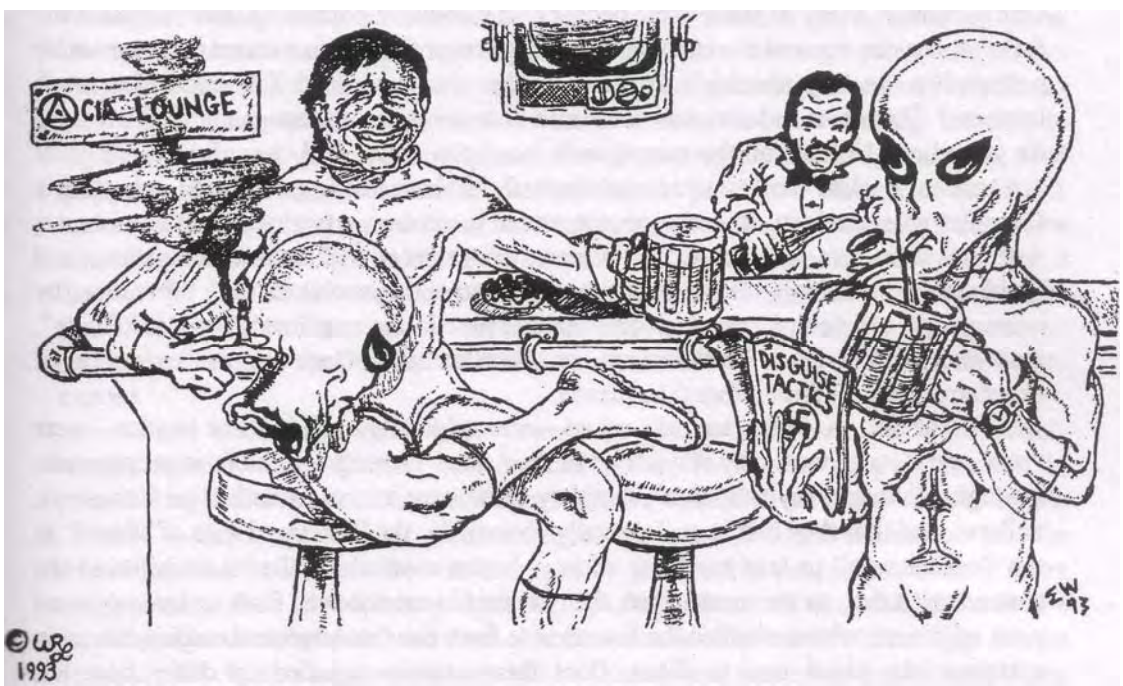
According to the Majestic-12 document, the decomposing corpses of "four small human-like beings" were discovered some two miles away from the New Mexico crash site, indicating they had perhaps ejected before impact.

The M-12 briefing said: "It was the tentative conclusion of this group...that although these creatures are human-like in appearance, the biological and evolutionary processes responsible for their development has apparently been quite different from those observed for homo sapiens."

Under the F.O.I.A., a flock of CIA UFOlogy sheep go "Baa-aa, baa-aa, baa-aa!", asking, in O.S.I.-prepared questionnaires, for "concealed evidence" of a crash which never occurred, involving "aliens" which were monkies, and "secret contact" between

"extraterrestrials" and our government which never occurred. The "official" government response was easy, merely to deny every (CIA-loaded) leading question asked.

Predictably, the "UFOlogists" asked the wrong questions, so the government was 100% correct in denying 1) knowledge of an 'alien UFO crash' at Roswell in 1947 (since there was no crash, and since, if there had been, it would have been a government flying saucer), and 2) that 'alien bodies' (either three or four) were recovered (since a crash never occurred, and since the bodies 'recovered' were of rhesus monkies in G-suits). If the group had asked "Was there a government-conducted hoax at Roswell in 1947, in which the bodies of rhesus monkies (or other primates) were dressed in G-suits (or other costumes designed to look like 'space suits'), to make them appear to be those of 'alien astronauts'?" And, "Did the Pentagon officials retrieve evidence of this first hoax, and cover it up with a second hoax, in which fragments of a weather balloon were substituted?" The old adage, "If you ask a stupid question, you get a stupid answer" applies.



PHONY EXPERT CONSULTANTS AND GOVERNMENT SCRIPTS

The same Arthur C. Clarke who was invited to Keesler by the Air Force in 1956 (whom I called a liar to his face), has been a consultant on many movies involved in this massive hoax, such as 2001: A Space Odyssey, etc. Although such movies as Close Encounters of the Third Kind and E.T. are heartwarming, poetically wishful, and life-affirming, the underlying message such movies deliver—whether by intent or because their makers were duped—is to beg the question that "UFOs" are "extraterrestrial", despite the fact that there is absolutely no known evidence or personal knowledge, verified by any human being, of there being anything made by intelligent being from beyond our earth. Yet the same Arthur Clarke who in 1956 said saucers "didn't exist", was later involved in these efforts to convince us that they not only existed, but were the exclusive property of "aliens" from outer space. The half-truth and the truth-and-a-half, again.

Every single intelligently formed, fabricated or compounded substance we know of is human-made. The tasks of our government's secret agencies, involved in such movies, are made progressively easier over the years, by the victims (us) already having been duped and brainwashed by the constant, false propaganda drilled into them from the mass media, controlled by BIG BROTHER, for over 50 years. The general public, once known to trust "government experts", has become more skeptical, with their blind trust rapidly waning, realizing that their trust was falsely procured.

A movie like E.T., which may have been intended purely as entertainment, still functionally brainwashes kids before they are mature enough to question our government's actions, motives, or integrity. Realistically-intelligent people, who may never have seen a single flying saucer, usually categorically disbelieve their existence. Oddly enough, many of those same people also disbelieve politicians, and recognize the fact that our government is manipulated by large corporations, in a secret corporate-state partnership. So why shouldn't they realize that the movie and T.V. industries aren't immune? The movie industry has been used extensively as a propaganda medium since its inception. Not all of the propaganda has been false, bad, harmful or evil. But government-backed movies which subliminally brainwash the public into accepting a Platonist epistemology, to make people easier to control, trivializes man's existence, destroys individual autonomy, self-esteem, confidence, and self-determination, and builds false dependency on the government. It also abridges church-state separation, by promoting a religion of "psychic phenomena", pseudo-science, mysticism, "UFOlogy", ignorance, "new age" charlatanism, and blanket acceptance of the existence of extraterrestrials on faith rather than reason.

The fact is, Hitler and his crowd—who originally created these hoaxes—were "new-agers", who were only way ahead of their time. They spread the false propaganda, through a "whispering campaign", that they alone were in contact with alien Venusians, in Peru[2], and that they had been "specially chosen" by the "advanced race of aliens", as the "master race" to lead earthling society. In the meanwhile, the Nazis believed the contradiction that, as the master race, their "orders" were received from an underground race of giants, who controlled the human race from their underground empire, the main entrance into which was in Tibet. Does this scenario significantly differ from the Trilateral Commission/Illuminati/New World Order/UFOlogy versions? And in a certain way, doesn't it bear a remarkable similarity to stories in the Bible, the Torah, and the Talmud, in which the Christian or Jewish people were supposedly chosen by God or Yahweh, while the various alleged racial and 'spiritual' inferiorities of their enemies were enumerated? And, since the particular proportions and design of the swastika used by Hitler and the Nazis, was the "17-square anagram" swastika of the Jewish Kaballah, it appears that Hitler also drew from that source as a basis for his own new religion, at no fault of today's Jews of the world, most of whom we should hope no longer consider non-Jews to be inferior as stated in the Torah and the Talmud.

---

[2]Louis Pauwels & Jacques Bergier, The Morning of the Magicians, Stein and Day/Scarborough House, N.Y. (1977).

The people who make these Secret Government propaganda movies, are usually unaware of their backers' hidden agendas, and are 'motivated at their own levels', by a desire for success and profit. There have been only a few movies, to my knowledge, which have touched upon the truth, and they have been more or less banished to oblivion or presented as ridiculous farces. One was The Formula, starring Marlon Brando, David Huddleston, and George C. Scott. Another starred Hoyt Axton (I don't recall the title, and there is no information available at video stores either. Perhaps it was a made-for-T.V. movie.). It showed cattle mutilations being conducted by government operatives using helicopters and other strange aircraft. Another movie, Rage, starring George C. Scott, also had strong implications, especially in respect to military Masons involved in covering up a government nerve gas "accident".

The Formula involved the technological secret of making gasoline from coal. The technology is known today as "acetylene chemistry", and is available in many chemistry texts. The secret originated in the 1930s with an American, the former director of the Colorado Bureau of Mines, who sought a patent on what was then called the "Parry Retort", a refinery and process which cracked a gasoline-like fraction out of acetylene. (Acetylene, or calcium carbide, was originally produced by burning coal in the presence of crushed limestone.) I have seen a copy of the original patent application. The refinery was similar to gasoline refineries, with numerous 'retorts' or 'cracking towers', to separate out or synthesize various hydrocarbon fractions from the acetylene, using what are today standard catalysts such as platinum black, palladium black, etc. The F.B.I, took over the plant, and barred Parry from entry, use, or sale. The technology then came into the exclusive possession of the Nazis—via the Rockefeller interests—who used it during WW II. The Formula scenario picked it up from there, mentioning its transfer (back) to Gulf Oil Company (a Rockefeller company), along with the flying saucer, during the "amnesty deal" with the Germans at the end of the war, which I am the first to expose.

Parry's daughter, whom I have known for over twenty years, was unfortunately manipulated by the "Friend" who trained "The Two"—the couple involved in perpetrating extraterrestrial hoaxes through the O.S.I.R.I.S. front group created by the "Friend"—and Jacques Vallee, into stealing my photos of the fake alien saucer and the rhesus monkies in G-suits. She was also used by CIA-backed people fraudulently suing me, enabling their fraudulent judgments by theft of my trial exhibits, with the unmistakable complicity of the New Mexico courts. The mental instability of the daughter, who has been incarcerated in sanitariums several times, was exploited by these huxters. She was so eager for gallery contacts for her art work, that she was willing to do almost anything for the "Friend" (a CIA pseudo-art dealer, with bad taste). She caused me to miss a trial in a case filed against me by a member of the CFR/IIA, also having connections to the Chicago "Organization".

I love good movies. Movies which faced the realities of flying saucers as man-made machines, would be more exciting than those we've seen. Imagine sitting in the cockpit of one of those babies, clipping along at 2.5 miles per second, with 360-degree view-screens, fed by image inverters! You stop over the enemy camp (the Trilateralists or Bilderbergers), and zoom in on their most guarded secrets with one of your super magnifying image intensifiers, from an altitude so high that you are entirely invisible from the ground, in broad daylight, and do not appear on radar either. Incidentally, "stealth" technology was first developed for Nazi U-boats and flying saucers. Most probably, the "striations" I identified on the hull of the saucer I saw in 1953, were for this purpose, since that was the way the technology worked at the time.

A good example of one of the newer, slicker propaganda movies, was Hanger 18 (1980, Taft International Pictures, Inc.; Worldvision Enterprises, Inc.) It was produced by Charles Sellier, Jr., and the cast included Gary Collins, Robt. Vaughn, Joseph Campanella, Darrin McGavin, and James Hampton. These are some of the same actors often appearing in Secret Government pseudo-documentaries or pseudo-expose-type pictures. An opening statement was "...brave eyewitnesses have stepped forward and now the story can finally be told". This hypocritical statement should more appropriately have said "...cowardly liars have stepped forward, and now the Big Lie can finally be told".

There was ample government involvement (use of the air base at Big Spring, Texas, cooperation of NASA, etc.). The plot involved a fictitious satellite explosion, caused by a collision with a "UFO", which was hovering near an orbiting NASA space shuttle dock. One of the several astronaut-witnesses was killed by the explosion (heroes all), also killing the saucer's alien pilot, after which the saucer made an automatic controlled landing in Bannon Co., Arizona (why always the desert?).

Two of the astronauts sought to expose a "government cover-up" conspiracy, and were hunted down by government agents, who killed one of them. In spite of the phony sympathy created for 'those who sought to expose the government's concealment of alien contact', the film took every opportunity to plug NASA and the space program, while creating apprehension by implied death threats against potential witnesses who attempt to tell the real truth. A typical line (Vaughn): "So what you're saying, General, is that we have a flying saucer in our possession?", (as if to say that "we" did not!).

Hanger 18 was supposedly a secret NASA hanger "...within fifty miles of Midland, Texas..." (presumably Big Spring). The plot included the theory that ancient markings on earth, such as those on the Plains of Nasca in Peru, or Totonac writings—based on phony-baloney linguistic comparisons—were the same as those found inside the fictitious UFO. The "Hanger 18" incident was just another government-concocted hoax like the MJ-12 and Roswell hoaxes, only with better technical and conceptual work.

By 1994, my first edition kicked up enough dust to spur a Viacom Pictures, made-for-TV movie, Roswell, starring Kyle McLachlan, Charlie Sheen, Dwight Yoakam, etc., produced by Ilene Kahn, etc., (based on the Kevin Randle and Don Schmitt book, UFO Crash at Roswell). They even had a spooky 'bad guy' exclaim to Kyle McLachlan, "It was just a bunch of rhesus monkies!" (a direct quote from my book, and a front page Albuquerque Journal North newspaper article on me and my book, of Jan. 6, 1994). I find it odd that attribution was not present in the Randles/Schmitt book, which showed the real motive for doing the movie, based on a book which could be bent to government purposes, if it was not initially commissioned by the government, similar to how the "Friend" had tried to commission me to write a book attributing the petroglyphs to extraterrestrials. By 1994, Schmitt and Randle weakly attempted to address the rhesus theory raised by me, without saying who raised it, in their later book, The Truth About the UFO Crash at Roswell, the title alone of which showed their OSI affiliation, since they have always known there was no "UFO crash at Roswell", but a "fake crash".

Rancher Mac Brazel was depicted as a reluctant 'patriot' during an intimidating 3-day interrogation, while admitting that he took a $3000 payoff to stand behind the government's second, weather balloon hoax, after he had already helped in the first rhesus monkey hoax. He changed his story, saying the weather balloon debris was there for two weeks before he reported it. This created the suspicion that he was paid off to conceal a real alien crash, and to account for the time between the first hoax and the second hoax. Besides, they would have had to pay him again for a second hoax.

Approximately one week after the Journal North article, as I returned home from Santa Fe at dusk to Lamy, I saw a very large flying saucer (appearing to be at least 100 feet in diameter), hovering within a quarter mile across Apache Canyon (A.K.A., "Galisteo River") to my east, which was putting out a large amount of coronal flame. Though I am not in a habit of photographing every saucer I see, I ran for my camera, because it was a good sighting that my camera could have captured, but before I could get set up, it was gone. It traveled across the Eldorado Subdivision to my north, and moved on a bee-line across the southern periphery of Santa Fe, into the northeasterly end of the Jemez mountains, toward the "technical areas" in the southwest side of the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratories, where the saucers fly quite often. I discussed it with some friends in Eldorado, and they said they saw it and reported it to the Santa Fe County Sheriffs Department, and were told that three other witnesses had already reported it. Friends in Canoncito also confirmed their sighting of the saucer. It was as if the government had placed an obvious and large saucer in the area, just to see if my book or the article had produced any effect on the local population. The saucer sightings have been so prevalent and outrageously obvious in the past, over the Canoncito area, that I would have found them disturbing if I had lived over there, and they have at times been irritating in my own area around eight miles to the east, but I am further from the tip of the southern Sangre de Christos, where the government has chosen to place them so often at night. Presence of lower altitude saucers in this area have noticeably diminished since the book and this news article, even though the public has been brainwashed to 'not see them' anyway.

MY "FRIEND", THE M.I.B.

"M.I.B." is an acronym for "Men In Black", the Secret Government spooks who often show up to harass witnesses. My reference to a so-called "Friend", is to a man who is and was one of them. He also created some of the hoax scenarios for the CIA/OSI, involving pseudo-linguistics, pseudo-archaeology (ala Zechariah Sitchin), as well as the O.S.I.R.I.S. group used to 'smokescreen' the cattle mutilation/stealth weapons test program. This archaeology/linguistics brand of government lie has always angered me, because of the tendency to blur and confuse the work of those who are engaged in responsible linguistic inquiry and archaeology, yet which may be vulnerable because they are divergent and out of the mainstream. The flaky and irresponsible fabrication of 'extraterrestrial' interpretations, tends to put a blight on new breakthrough work being done, as if it were also false. For example, around 1977,1 had begun to make headway with petroglyph research indicating connections between American Indians and specific, ancient Middle Eastern, Indo-European, Semitic, Asian, Norse, and Celtic writings, languages, cultures and peoples, about which I was contemplating a book.

I was astounded when the "Friend" (whom I had known for several years), paid me a visit in 1977, and announced his intent to institute a program attributing the petroglyphs to "ancient space aliens". He was the M.I.B. who had lived in Santa Fe with and trained the couple of government-paid U.F.O. shamsters known as "The Two" in 1972 (Marshall Herff Applewhite and Bonnie Lu Nettles). He later exploited the mentally disturbed daughter of the inventor of The Formula. I realized at that time, that his fraudulent work was being sponsored by the intelligence community, for whom he had worked for years, and continued to do 'contract work' for.

I noticed that, in my presence, he wore a Shriner ring. This was to gain my trust—or better still, to shut me up—on the erroneous assumption that, since CIA files showed I came from a "Masonic family", I would feel compelled to "keep the secrets". This, in spite of the fact that he was a graduate of a Catholic school (U. of Denver). One of the primary tenets of the Masonic Oath is never to betray a trust. To me, it wasn't my trust he sought, but rather my complicity in a secret betrayal of the trust of the American people. Even if I had been a Mason, which I am not, gaining my trust through such a fraud would have nullified the oath. He erroneously thought that he was 'motivating me at my own level.'

It angers me that the intelligence spooks exploit entire fields of knowledge and professions, sacrificing them to government 'expediency', by generating knowingly false programs designed to conceal technology from the public and to brainwash them in BIG LIE mass-psychology programs ala Hitler. These programs are to subliminally control people by propagating fantastic, ignorant and twisted lies which elevate insane and irrational elements of society, at the expense of knowledge, reason, and truth. It astounded me that the '"Friend" could hypocritically look me straight in the eye, while my life was all the while being cruelly torn apart by their covert harassment. It occurred to me that a committee had worked this all out on paper somewhere, and that individual rights and human life didn't matter to them, so long as they fabricated the 'right' interpretations of things which helped them to control society.

While in graduate school in art at U.T., I was appalled to learn that the fields of art and art history were cynically considered 'expendable' to the CIA people, who referred to artists as "...just a bunch of paranoids...". They had permeated both the faculty and the student body of the university art department. To them, the "cover" of artists and art historians were ideally suited for deceitful, intelligence-gathering foreign travel, photographing strategic defense areas, picking up and delivering data, acting as couriers, etc., and little else. It was my judgment that the people who do that are no better than the closet homosexuals who marry in order to present a false image of themselves to society as being heterosexuals. There were no less than six CIA professionals on the art faculty at U.T. in 1969, and several CIA and military intelligence operatives posing as art students. I wondered how many operatives they had in other departments of the university. Those who posed as students seemed to be spies on the students and the faculty. Since the Viet Nam war was in full swing, 'draft counselors' seemed to be among their prime targets, but I suppose that any excuse could have served as a pretext to continually meddle with and control what would otherwise have been a natural, and more just flow of the affairs in a supposedly "educational" institution.

In the fall of 1977, the Friend made the trip to my home for the specific purpose of dissuading me from publishing this book, and had the gall to lay out the phony hypothesis for HIS book, which he expected me to write. At that time, he had apparently become disturbed not only by my plans for a flying saucer book, but because I had also begun to branch off into petroglyph research, which threatened to interfere with his official Big Lie plan to interpret the petroglyphs as the "writings of extraterrestrials".

He had apparently dreamed up the alien petroglyph hoax, and enticed me with a lucrative CIA contract, to draw me away from my saucer book, thinking that, once I had collaborated in the false "alien archaeology" lies, I would be "hooked", to be compelled by my published change in position, to fit in with the "alien saucers" lies. This opportunity to prostitute my intellect for cash, included the guarantee that the publishing contacts were already set up and ready to go, in Sedona, Arizona.

I hit the ceiling, saying that I had personal knowledge that flying saucers are man-made, that the government's program of spreading the gospel of E.S.P., Edgar Cayce, and extraterrestrial origin of flying saucers, was a Big Lie originating with the Nazis, and that I would never cooperate in the spreading of such trash. I told him of my broad-daylight sighting, that my parents were present among more than seven witnesses, and that they had often seen whole squadrons of saucers in the Dakotas. This information on my parent's sightings turned out to be a serious mistake, as I underestimated the extremes to which the CIA would go to suppress witnesses. Besides, why argue with someone who already knew the truth, and only wanted me to join into the lies to conceal it for fun and profit?

He then attempted to intimidate me, and even threatened me, recounting some of the bad things which had happened to some of those who had refused to cooperate, or had "gone too far" (presumably by doing such things as revealing the secret manipulations I am telling you about in this book).

A couple of weeks later, I was visited by my father, who was on his way from the Scottsdale, Arizona, merchandise mart, to Thornton, Colorado, where he and my mother then lived. They ran a lucrative market-building business in womens' sportswear, providing representation for six Dallas manufacturers and a couple of west coast labels, in around seven or eight states. My father was a member of the Board of Directors of the Dallas manufacturers' association, my parents maintained showrooms in Dallas and Denver, and they had built the markets in Nevada, North and South Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, and parts of Texas. For ten years, they traveled over 100,000 miles per year, in the "flying saucer states". It was the only visit I can remember in which my father came alone, without my mother.

After visiting with my father for a half hour or so, he brought up flying saucers, and to my surprise, urged me to stop telling what I knew about them. Since this was only a few days after the Friend had threatened me, I assumed that my father's visit was somehow connected, another attempt by the CIA to "shut me up". To my dismay, my father then denied ever having seen flying saucers, despite the many times that he and my mother had told me about seeing whole squadrons of them over such areas as North and South Dakota, and the mountainous country near Cheyenne Mountain, Colorado, deep beneath which is the underground N.O.R.A.D. Command Center.

This behavior was very unusual, and I wondered how the Friend had manipulated my father's conduct, speculating that he may have exploited the "Masonic connection", since I had seen a Shriner's ring on his finger. My father is a 32nd degree Mason, and my mother is a highly-esteemed member of the Order of the Eastern Star (the female Masons). For what it's worth, I had been a charter member and officer of the Winkler County chapter of the Order of De Molay (junior Masons) when I was a boy, but never considered becoming a Mason because I am an Atheist, since I knew that initiates were required to swear a belief in "Almighty God". As I said earlier, the Shriner's ring was evidently one of his CIA cons, an attempt to represent what he thought would 'motivate me (and my parents) at my own level.' The 'con' had apparently worked on my parents, who are Masons, but not me.

As for suggestions of a connection between Fascism and Masonry, it seemed improbable, at least among the American Masons and a few northern European Masons I have personally known, though there was some rather compelling evidence unearthed in Italy, in the "P-2 Lodge Controversy", about which I will have more to say later.

My uncle Roger Benton had been a 33rd degree Mason, in the original First Grand Lodge of Texas, at Nacogdoches, founded by Stephen F. Austin and Sam Houston, and was a Shriner (the military Masons), and I knew that he would have nothing to do with an evil plan to subvert the constitutional authority of America, or to subjugate any race. Roger had driven an L.S.T. in almost every major invasion in the South Pacific, and had been the world's first radar gunner on the Navy's "Black Widow", in its record-breaking mission over Tokyo, and had proven that he was prepared to make the supreme sacrifice to stop Fascism, fighting bravely for the freedom of the Phillipinos and others. If the Illuminati Fascists worked within the American Masonic Orders, he apparently knew nothing of it, since he was anti-Fascist, and simply not the kind of man to tolerate such an attitude within himself or among his associates.

I wondered how my father had been persuaded or scared into lying, since he is highly opinionated and stubborn, painfully truthful, and unlikely to change his mind because of what someone else wanted. It was indeed uncharacteristic behavior on his part, which was inexplicable except by the application of extraordinary pressure, subterfuge, or threats. In dismay, I accused him of cowardice in the face of government intimidation—the kind of feudal extortion that good Masons are supposed to resist—for whatever reason unknown to me at the time. Because of that incident, my father and I didn't speak for over five years. I finally forgave him, since he is an elder person. How could I expect him to stand up to these creeps? Who knew what kind of threats or powers were invoked by the "Friend", to coerce my father?

The next evening, in the late fall of 1977, in a local coffee shop, I was invited by a well-known Santa Fe art dealer I knew, to join he and his friends. I brought up the subject of flying saucers, having in mind the "Friend", whom we both knew. The dealer had just returned from the Scottsdale market. When I mentioned my father's recent visit there, he said that he had met him, and said that they had seen him talking privately to the "Friend" in Scottsdale, only two days earlier, thus confirming contact between the "Friend" and my father. The secrecy made the following facts apparent: My "Friend" never mentioned knowing my father, and vice-versa. My father (and mother as well) had been intimidated and coerced by the "Friend", to stop corroborating my sightings, and to cooperate with his attempts to shut me up. My father had been forbidden to tell me about the extortion, proven by their behavior and the secret contact.

Having independently discovered the fact that the "Friend"—named James ("Jim") Parsons, who really isn't my friend—had threatened my father, I discussed it with a girlfriend, who inadvertently relayed it to Jim, whom she also knew. I had failed to warn her not to discuss the matter with the Jim, which I didn't expect to happen anyway, but it did. Within two weeks, the Dallas manufacturers, without warning or authority, 'fired' my parents, who had built their markets for ten years. Since my girlfriend had inadvertently told Jim that I knew of his threats, he incorrectly assumed that my father had disobeyed him and told me about them, so he arranged for them to be fired, in attempt to 'get to me'.

With a ring of poetic justice, the manufacturers lost millions of dollars, due to the loyalty of some of my parents' purchasers in their territory. As I learned from one of their associates, an older man who also marketed ready-to-wear, Mafia Don, Joseph ("Papa Joe") Bonanno—who, believe it or not, ran a womens' sportswear shop in Tucson—smelled the federal rat, and organized a boycott. The other shops in my parents' territory, boycotted the manufacturers, as a protest against this injustice, and their market generally broke down. Poetic justice sometimes comes in strange ways, from unexpected quarters. I have always wondered if the government ever fully compensated Louis and his Dallas associates for their losses, or whether they ever knew why they occurred. If not, the M.I.B.s made suckers out of them too. I have often wondered how much it was worth to the government.

I published the following material in my 1993 and 1995 first and second editions, years before the Heaven's Gate cult's suicide at Rancho Santa Fe, California, in March, 1997. Years earlier, I had learned from another girl friend—whose name shall remain anonymous—that Jim had intensively trained "The Two" in late 1972 and early 1973, for three months, in a house the threesome shared in Santa Fe. The 1997 mass suicides highlighted Jim's mysterious CIA training of Marshall Herff Applewhite and Bonnie Lu Trusdale Nettles—"The Two"—who had immediately founded "HIM" ("Human Individual Metamorphosis"), and several other cult CIA front groups, following Jim's training. I had known since early 1973 that the cult was connected to the CIA, the primary purpose being the concealment of government saucer and cattle mutilations activities. Jim's subsequent cover-up of his associations with the cult leaders in articles published in area newspapers, showed his desire to conceal the CIA's involvement.
"Never run 'til you know you're being chased," they say.....

Beginning in the '70s, investigative reporters wrote exposes on The Two, documenting their pattern of infiltrating communities—pretending to be previously unassociated transients—then becoming 'associated', after which the members would become 'followers', to be 'convinced' that they were descendants of an 'extraterrestrial race', and that it was "time for a flying saucer to come from outer space to pick them up" at a designated time and place, and take them back to their 'home planet'. After spreading word of this around the community—for maximum propaganda impact—the group would meet on the appointed evening, drive to a certain hill or other landmark, park their cars, then mysteriously 'disappear', leaving their cars behind.

The media coverage was orchestrated concerning the strange 'disappearances', along with the usual paranormal and UFO magazines. The abandoned cars, which were indispensable for the sham, were hauled away to local public pounds. The remaining members of the community, and the media's interviews of them, were relied upon to spread word of the mysterious 'departures'.

This worked pretty good, until some smart investigative reporters trailed the members, took down their license plate numbers and auto makes, etc., at several hoax sites, and did some comparisons. It turned out that the same "Two", and the same "followers", driving the same autos, were repeating the same scenario all over the western U.S. The incidents showed the compliance of local police and authorities, by first impounding, then releasing the cars, to the 'disappeared' owners, to be used again, with no reports by public officials correcting this in the public media or police reports.

Jim had studied law at the University of Denver School of Law, prior to entering the Air Force, serving in Air Force Intelligence (the O.S.I.), from which he had retired at the rank of colonel, after which he had taken up "civilian" employment with the O.S.I., apparently continuing to do 'contract work', recruiting and training huxters, and designing hoax scenarios, to convince dupes that flying saucers are from "outer space". The following facsimile clipping completed the connection (emphasis mine):

Calf death, UFO group tied

LAKE VILLA, ILL. (UPI) - Two calves found mutilated at a farm in this rural area northwest of Chicago may have been killed and butchered by would-be voyagers to another planet, according to police.

At meetings in Waldport, Ore., and elsewhere in the Pacific Northwest, a woman know as "Her" and a "holloweyed" man known only as "Him" reportedly enlisted followers for a UFO trip.

Friends and relatives of missing persons reported to have joined the band have expressed concern about their whereabouts and well-being.

A band of 50 to 70 persons who may have been followers of the mysterious couple camped at Chain O'Lakes State Park about 10 miles from here early this month, using the park as a staging point for their planned UFO journey to another world. The campers' cars bore license plates from Oregon, Washington, Colorado, Texas, Arizona and one Canadian province.

License plate numbers on three of the cars were reported to have matched those of cars that disappeared with 23 persons from Oregon after a meeting with the couple at Waldport.

A woman appeared to be in charge of the group, some sources reported.

The calves were slaughtered about the same time the group was at the park.

The first slaughtered calf was discovered Oct. 1. Only the calf's head and internal organs remained and police said the head was so neatly severed that no blood could be found anywhere around the remains.

"It seems like someone was looking for something to eat," Lake Villa Police Sgt. Raymond H. Engel said.

The carcass of the second calf, found Oct. 5 about 1,000 yards from where the first was slaughtered, was virtually intact. Only the calf's left ear was missing. It had been cut off, Engel said, and could not be found.

Some believers in UFO's have said aliens cut off animal organs in order to take them back to their own planet and study them.

Engel said there was no evidence as to who killed the calves or why.

The campers believed members of the UFO cult began arriving at Chain O'Lakes State Park Oct. 1 or 2, with others arriving Oct. 4, according to State Forest Ranger Mick Egan. All appeared to be financially pressed---even to borrowing a nickel from a gateman to help pay a camping fee. They repaid the nickel.

Egan said members of the group "were clean and neat and very well behaved."

He said the group held a quiet meeting on Oct. 6 and left Oct. 7 after newspapers in the area published reports about the mysterious UFO group.

Although the group apparently left the area and there has been no trace of them in the Midwest, authorities told the 1,000 residents of Lake Villa to report "any strange goings-on."

Another girl friend, who had known both Jim and The Two, had said in early 1973 that the couple had been "...recruited and paid by Jim for some kind of training", during the three months in which they had shared a house in Santa Fe in late 1972. All our friends thought that it was mysterious, since the training was so secretive. At first we thought it might be some sort of kinky sex cult, but everything was clarified later when the couple was identified in 1973 news articles as the leaders of HIM, and later, in 1987, as the leaders of the O.S.I.R.I.S. ("Outer Space International Research and Investigations Society") hoax.

Having known about Jim's training of the couple in 1972, prior to their hoaxes, the purpose of the hoax was clear to me, especially in view of the various inducements, coercions and subterfuges specifically regarded UFOs and "aliens", which were applied to me and my parents in 1977, by Jim, the O.S.I./ M.I.B. who had instigated it, to shut me up about flying saucers or to coerce me into writing propaganda for the CIA. After all, it would have been clear to even an idiot that Jim was doing all in his power in 1977 to force me and others to propagate lies about "aliens".

When I encountered Jim at the "50th Anniversary of the Roswell Incident", in July, 1997, he was extremely nervous about my presence, afraid I'd blow his cover.

When the news hit the papers in late March, 1997, about the "mass suicide" of the "Heaven's Gate Cult", I figured that the CIA had decided it was time to 'close out' the 24-year-old operation, which hadn't been very productive of significant, new propaganda for years. This was especially so where I had already identified it for the public as a CIA front in my 1993 book. With its members aging, their activities slowing down, they were beginning to look more like a geriatric care group, so what else was to be done with them, since they had been 'programmed' for years and were dependent on the group. The CIA, couldn't have these 'loose cannons' rolling around on the deck, so they were heartlessly 'put to sleep' like tired old dogs who were no longer of any use to their CIA mind-control masters.

With the mass deaths, Jim was nervous. Just as articles he had written for the Santa Fe Reporter in 1975 had lied about his earlier connection to the HIM cult and The Two, the articles he wrote in 1997—four years after my first edition—just after the horrible news of the cult's 'suicides', was intended to conceal the guilty knowledge of a nervous CIA propagandist, concerning the many deaths which he had contributed to as the creator or the cult. In an article by Jim in the Albuquerque Journal, of Sunday, April 6, 1997, entitled "Man Tells of Friend Joining Heaven's Gate" - "Santa Fean Saw Cult Lure Friend", Jim said "One day in 1975, I encountered a group called Human Individual Metamorphosis, and showed Gordon a flier for a public lecture the next Saturday." Thus Jim had "showed Gordon" a flier and begun to 'recruit' Gordon Welch, his roomate, in 1975, into the cult Jim had created, and which was eventually the end of Gordon. Of course he didn't tell Gordon or the newspapers that he had created the cult. It was clear from Gordon's letters to Jim that he was a complete dupe, unaware of the fact that Jim and the CIA were behind the cult, and that, to them, he was just a piece of animated meat they had chosen because of his innocent gullibility, who had been programmed to act out stupid fantasies to conceal flying saucer technology, as well as to provide more propaganda mileage for the CIA, to feed the demented minds of whatever suckers were out there.

In one of Gordon's letters to Jim, he stated, "I hope I am in the final stage of this thing. I still believe it is true but it is very hard and demanding as we learn to go to a world where you live a large part of your time on spaceships and communicate by projecting thoughts. Have to work on getting all thoughts pure and good and honest and direct. That's a tall order."

At one point in the article, Jim described how he had gone with Gordon to Albuquerque to attend a HIM meeting, and a 'reading'. Jim gives us his thoughts: "Driving back to Santa Fe, I pondered this reading and decided to reverse my skeptical attitude about flying saucers and HIM." At the head of the article, it was stated, "Authorities say one of the victims from last month's mass suicide in Rancho Santa Fe, Calif, was identified as a Gordon Welch."

I have to laugh about Jim deciding to "..reverse" his "skeptical attitude" about flying saucers and the cult activities HE created. Since I met him in 1972 he had always had this inflexible attitude, especially in the presence of impressionable new-age types.

The O.S.I.R.I.S. front group activities are shown through the eyes of another dupe, by the following Albuquerque Journal facsimile clipping (emphasis mine):

Believer in UFOs Says He Met Space Being

BERNALILLO - Ray Keller believes in extraterrestrials because he met one.

In the summer of 1987 Keller and members of the Utah chapter of Outer Space International Research and Investigations Society were on a pilgrimage to Mount Shasta.

He said they chose the site because of the many reported sightings of unidentified flying objects in the area. One legend says the mountain is hollow, a super-garage for spaceships or a temple for space visitors.

While he and the others were hiking beyond the tree line, a woman appeared as they rounded a boulder near the peak.

"She was a lady with red hair about 5 foot, 6 inches and she was wearing a white jumpsuit for want of a better word," Keller said.

"It's bare up there. There were no trees that she could have been hiding behind," he said.

He said the other pilgrims identified themselves as part of a UFO group and the woman said, "I know why you're here."

Although he didn't want to elaborate on what the woman said, she talked to them for about two hours and let them take her picture.

As the group was leaving and turned to wave good-bye, the woman disappeared, he said.

Keller, 34, who works for the Head Start program in Bernalillo, said he sighted his first UFO at 13 while he and other Boy Scouts were on a camping trip in Ohio.

Keller said he believes that his experience is not unique. On Sunday at 2 p.m. at Bernalillo Town Hall he will talk about reported sightings in New Mexico.

Ray Keller, quoted on the previous page, a member of O.S.I.R.I.S.—another CIA front created by Jim—worked in early childhood development, and was involved in the Boy Scouts, a perfect sucker. The CIA/OSI front group he belonged to was named for a deity of the ancient Egyptian religion, "Osiris...the Beautiful Hare"[3]. Though the name for the god "Osiris" was derived from a folk mythical hare (the Easter Bunny), as shown by references noted in 1886 by Budge in Egyptian Book of the Dead, they remained unnoticed until my 1993 first edition. I had already derived this fact from independent research in etymology, in which Osiris, as a hare ("Heru-"), was associated with Isis, a duck or goose ("Khuti"), who gave birth to Horus ("Heru-Khuti"), from the earliest times in western Siberia, in the mythology of the Uralo-Altaic-speaking peoples.

The naming of the UFO 'research' group—run by a CIA/OSI counterintelligence team—after Osiris, shows the earmarks of the former SS RSHA Gestapo spooks who formed the core of the CIA's Office of Scientific Intelligence, Science Directorate, Covert Operations (flying saucer cover-up teams). Movies from '20s and '30s Germany show parades of 'pre-Nazi', Thule Society-sponsored 'new-agers', in ancient Sumerian and Egyptian costumes, holding ceremonious pagents, propagating the mythology of Ostara, the Nazi religion created by a Cistenian monk, Adolf Joseph Lanz, founder of the Order of the New Temple in 1900. That same year, at Lambach Abbey in Upper Austria, Lanz initiated the boy, Hitler, into this religion. He then left the order, and under the alias Georg Lanz von Liebenfels, began publishing the Hyperborean and anti-Semitic periodical, Ostara, in 1905.[4] The Ostara religion, as the basis for the Thule gesellschaft, was one and the same as the new religion which I mentioned as being 'revised' for American dissemination, using von Liebenfel's manuscripts, by Charles Hundley[5], as Astara, to be led by the Cheneys. This group is now known as The Ashtar Command, and is also the basis for the script for the TV series, Stargate. It is also the basis for the writings of Zechariah Sitchin, regarding the alleged extraterrestrial origin of the Sumerians, the same kind of stuff which Jim tried to hire me to write in 1977.

The Egyptian esoterica ("O.S.I.R.I.S.", etc.) was used by the CIA to imply involvement of an occult group, or a group of 'extraterrestrials' who practice or originated that religion. This fits in with other parts of the 'puzzle', by saying that the ancient Egyptians were extraterrestrials. The O.S.I, group known as O.S.I.R.I.S., specializes in appearing at the sites of cattle mutilations, to suggest that the mutilations are occult-related, and to falsely absolve the Secret Government, according to the "Puzzle Palace" tradecraft. We are expected to investigate and to 'discover' that occult groups, practicing the Egyptian religion, are holding "golden cup" ceremonies.

The Nazi influence in our society exists in many forms, often unrecognizable even by people who should know better, often due to the concealment of the actual nature of the Nazi phenomenon, perhaps through the influence of people like Reinhard Heydrich and Heinrich Mueller of the CIA. In the following news item, there was less room for doubt. New Mexico State Policeman Leonard Frietze, shows his admiration for the "Guru" (which in German, is "Fuehrer", referring to Hitler):

---

[3]E. W. Budge, Egyptian Book of the Dead, Introduction, p. cxxii (Un-nefer defined as "The Beautiful Hare"; p. 254,-Un-nefer interpreted as "Beautiful Hare" [citing Proc. Soc. Bib]. Arch. 1886].

[4]Jean-Michel Angebert, The Occult and the ThirdReich [Chap. 11, Catharism and Hitlerism].

[5]Discussions between the author and Charles Hundley (the CIA/ONI co-designer of Project Bluebook), Columbus, Ohio, 1958-59.

Photo clipping from Albuq. Journal Capitol Bureau, article by John Yeager

The Order of the New Temple which Joseph Lanz set up in 1900 was inspired by the Templars, with Lanz as the Grand Master, as a successor to Jacques de Molay.[6] The original painting of Hitler as a Knight, in Templar regalia, clearly referred to the Nazi neo-Templar tradition. The New Mexico State Police "Knight" on horseback—copied from the Hitler painting—searches for the "Holy Grail" (the "Golden Cup"), which is the Nazi double symbol of "pure blood" and "knowledge". This neo-Templar theme, a fundamental tenet of Nazi SS novices, in their training under Heinrich Himmler at Wewelsburg Castle, seems to have surfaced again in America.

A White Sands Missile Range Army Security document, placed in the mailboxes of teachers at the White Sands Missile Range School, where I taught in 1970-71—to 'warn' us about the awesome evils of "atheism" and the "peace sign"—was evidence of the kind of "knowledge" to which the Nazi/Christian/Templar "golden cup"/"Holy Grail" myth refers. Disturbing as it may seem, the connection between Fascism, God, the De Molays (junior Masons), and the national security establishment, was obviated by the 1971 document, which contained quite a number of errors and inaccuracies. The document demonized Atheists, even though Atheism is a religious preference protected by the US. constitution and Bill of Rights, which means the security people don't respect our American freedoms, and appear to have something else in mind. Note following words, "De Molay", "Christianity", and "Atheism", in the text of the White Sands Security Bulletin, Security Office, Intelligence Division, dated 19 Apr., 1971, which quotes directly from the New Mexico DeMolay News, as follows (emphasis mine):

---

[6]Jean-Michel Angebert (Supra) Chapter 11.

"With the permission of the DeMolay Association of New Mexico, the following article was excerpted from their January-February DeMolay News, Vol. 6—No. 1.

This illustration most of you will recognize as the 'Peace Symbol.' It is a popular emblem with protestors, draft card burners and flower children. Furthermore, it has become a popular fad with unsuspecting youth to embroider it on their clothes and paint it on their cars.

Peace symbol? Hardly. Nor is it a product of today's youth. The symbol is an ancient one, but it has never been associated with peace. It is actually one of the Satanic symbols known as the broken cross or the 'crucified cross.' In short, it is one of the marks of the Anti-Christ, the sign of Satan. During the Middle Ages, it was known as the 'Witch's Foot.'

Look closely and you will readily see why it was adopted as the subtle sign of those opposed to Christianity------ it is a broken cross turned up-side down.

One of the nation's most sophisticated magazines, the NEW YORKER, said in a recent article that the so-called "Peace Symbol" was adopted by various 'youth organizations' on direct orders from the Communist Party. It is part of their long range propaganda campaign to attract youth into subversive Communist-directed programs. They seek to encourage young people to express contempt for adults, for authority, and for the ideals of patriotic Americans.

Be sure of one thing, the Communists are gleeful when they see this mark of atheism worn by Americans, whether knowingly or unsuspectingly.

PEACE SYMBOL???
FOR THE COMMANDER (signature)
VINCENT B. COTE
LTC, MPC
Chief, Security Office
DISTRIBUTION: (1/70)
D except D-50 (1,000); F;
AMSEL - bl (12)
AMSTE -SE- (2)"

The document had a quaint naivete to it, as well as some basic theological ignorance. If the peace sign was a mark of "Satan", how could it be "Atheistic"? Wasn't Satan supposed to be a 'fallen angel'? An Atheist doesn't believe in such mythology, so there could hardly be a connection between the peace sign and Atheism, even if it were a Satanic symbol. Satan is supposed to be an enemy of his father, God. How could he disbelieve his father existed? An Atheist can't be an "enemy" of God, because to an Atheist, God doesn't exist, and you can't be an enemy of something which doesn't exist. Immediately following this oxymoronic "Army Intelligence" blunder, an article appeared in Navy Times, which gave a more "knowledgeable" history of the iconography of the "peace sign" than the one written by Army intelligence Fascists at White Sands, who wanted to equate the peace sign with "Satan's little plan". Navy scholars related the peace symbol to the semaphore alphabet, as a combination of the two diagonals ("N"), and a vertical line ("D"). It was first used by a London group called Direct Action Committee Against Nuclear War during the 1958 Easter March at Aldermastoh. A facsimile of the NavyTimes clipping follows:

Peace symbol originated from semaphore alphabet

THE NAVY TIMES, in its April issue, claims the world famous peace symbol is an old Navy signal.

Despite the number of fables which have spring up concerning the controversial symbol, the Navy says the symbol's origin is really the common semaphore alphabet used by the world's navies.

The signal for "N" and for "D", when used together, stand for Nuclear Disarmament. They are superimposed on a circle to make up the peace symbol.

It was first used by a London group called Direct Action Committee Against Nuclear War during the 1958 Easter march at Aldermastoh. The lore that has since grown around the symbol includes the claim that the circle can represent an unborn child, a human in despair, or a broken cross.

Judging from the Nazis' involvement with Masonic teachings regarding Solomon's temple, the Tower of Babel before that, and to their eclectic infatuation with related esoteric material—as indicated by the triangular Illuminati symbol for the "p2" project run by von Braun in 1937 New Mexico—it is only natural that there was a Nazi-Masonic connection, and a Masonic-White Sands Missile Range Security connection, along with Masonic connections to many other covert government operations as well. The von Stauffenberg conspiracy to assassinate Hitler, for example, was an attempted coup d'etat by aristocratic Prussian Masons, to install Field Marshall Erwin Rommel as the new Fuehrer. Hitler may have been the dictator of Germany at the time, but he was not Germany itself, and the Masonic plot was intended to get rid of Hitler, and create a new government which could join with America and England to stop the Soviets. Just as the White Sands Security Bulletin disclosed information relating to Masonic influence in the group which ran the Army security operation at White Sands, the Masonic scandal in Italy involved an attempted neo-Fascist coup d'etat, by members of a clandestine "P-2" Lodge, a lodge with a coded name which meant "Propaganda-Due" ("Propaganda-Two"), which referred to the dualistic nature of a covert, Masonic government which uses "dual propaganda" to control the public, similar to the "Siamese Twin Big Lie System" I have detailed, and the Hermetic principle.

The following facsimile clipping relates to the Masonic scandal in Italy involving the attempted neo-fascist coup d'etat:

Italian official quits in scandal over Masonic Lodge

ROME (AP) - Justice Minister Adolfo Sarti resigned today after his name was linked to a Masonic lodge that prosecutors are investigating as a possible "criminal association."

The widening lodge scandal has led to the arrest of a former colonel in the Italian secret service and threatened Premier Arnaldo Forlani's 7-month-old coalition government.

Italian newspapers and magazines have alleged that the so-called "P2" lodge was involved in a variety of illegal activities ranging from bribery and tax evasion in the oil industry to a far-reaching plot to set up an authoritarian regime in Italy.

The names of top politicians, businessmen, publishers, diplomats and military officers were on a list of 953 lodge members Forlani released to the press two days ago under pressure from Parliament. Two cabinet members were on the list: Minister of Foreign Commerce Enrico Manca, a Socialist, and Labor Minister Franco Foschi, a Christian Democrat.

Sarti, who has helped direct Italy's battle against terrorism, was not named, but documents found in the home of the lodge's grand master reportedly say he was a candidate for membership.

Sarti, in a letter to Forlani, denied he had attempted to join the lodge, but said he was forced to leave the government because his name had been tainted in a "slanderous campaign." His resignation was announced after a 15-minute meeting with Forlani, a fellow Christian Democrat.

The Italian constitution prohibits secret associations, and if the P2 lodge were in fact secret, membership in it would be outlawed.

On Friday, Milan prosecutor Pierluigi Dell'Osso issued an arrest warrant for Grand Master Liceo Gelli on charges of political espionage and the procuring of information on state security. Gelli is listed as a fugitive outside Italy.

Antonio Viezzer, a former section chief of the Italian secret service, was arrested Friday on political espionage charges.

A parliamentary committee investigating the case has said it suspects the lodge helped stage the phony kidnaping of Italian financier Michele Sindona in 1979.

(NOTE: A synopsis of the above clipping is that the Italian "P2" Masonic Lodge involved over 953 well known Masonic businessmen, publishers, both the Christian Democrat and Socialist parties, the Italian Secret Service, and the Labor Ministry, in an oil industry scheme to set up an official corporate-state fascist regime like that of Mussolini.)

Admission into Masonry requires a belief in "Almighty God", which comes as a surprise when considered in light of esoteric mythological information, related to the origins and meanings of the myths of "The Holy Grail", "Lucifer", and "Jesus". The word "grail" ("Graal") comes from the language of the ancient Albigensians (Al + bur + gen + si + ans = "El-Barrow-Born-Sun-People"), in which "Gorr-" + "-aal" means

"Holy Stone of El" ("El" being Saturn ["Sa-" + "-turn" = "Sun-Hare", meaning Osiris] or Lucifer ["Luci-" + "-fer" = "Light-Hare"], or Satan ["Sa-" + "-tan" = "Sun-Dawn"]).

As the myth goes, when Lucifer—also known as the "Morning Star"—fell from heaven, a sacred green emerald (the "sacred stone of El") fell from his crown. This was the "Holy Grail". From it was supposedly carved a cup known as "The Holy Grail", which was searched for by the Nazis[7] in the vicinity of the ancient Pyrenees stronghold of the Albigensians, whom they regarded as their "ancient Aryan spiritual forebears". The Albigensians were burned at the stake (the "Pyre", hence "Pyrenees"), 700 years earlier, by the Catholic church. The Nazi Ahnenerbe defined its mission as being to avenge the ancient wrongs done to the Hyperborean ("O-phir-bore-an", or "East-Port-Barrow-People") Cathars ("Ca-" + "-thars" = "Quay-Hares").

The Christian religion was designed by Josephus[8] (A.K.A., General Arius Calpurnius Piso), on behalf of the ruling Roman elite—who were Hermeticists—to replace the old Arrian (Aryan) religion, in which Osiris was the main god. Jesus was created literally as a replacement for Lucifer, to become the "Messiah" for the 'new' religion for the "Age of Pisces". Since the (five-pointed) morning star (Venus) which was the symbol for Osiris (Lucifer), was also to be the symbol for Jesus, Josephus made Jesus to be called, "the bright and morning star"[9]. That means the Christians worship Lucifer, disguised as Jesus. That Lucifer really is a deceiver!

It became apparent to me that only the government could have financed and run such an operation, and that only they had the motive to do so. Only the corporate-state O.S.I. conspirators had almost unlimited funds and financial motivation to invest in such an endeavor. It was indeed astounding that an O.S.I. agent whom I had known for years, had confirmed his connection to the Secret Government, and attempting to recruit and employ me in the fabrication of tacky CIA "alien" trash, to hoodwink the American people, by concealing the advanced technology on behalf of the IllumiNazis. Maybe the cult was financed by the dope smuggling, minus a fat salary for Jim.

Our government creates and promotes hoaxes, backs fake propaganda movies and T.V. specials, and harasses anyone who threatens to expose them, more to conceal energy secrets, rather than to protect aeronautical or weapons technology. This is especially directed at anyone engaged in research or inventing within the field of "free energy" or "perpetual motion". If anyone categorically doubts the feasibility of perpetual motion devices, I would like to introduce you to my real friend, the Universe, which, like an atom with its perpetually orbiting electrons (as a rule and not an exception), is a perpetual motion machine. Nobody created it, nobody can destroy it or make it disappear, nobody can stop it from working, and nobody can show any 'external' source of energy which runs it. It has no "gas tank", no beginning or end, and will never die. It is too big to have been "created", and if it were finite, what would it look like on the outside? The S.E.C. cannot prosecute the Universe "out of business". Scientists who are incapable of conceiving of the infmiteness of the Universe, and can only conceive it with a "beginning and an end"—like Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm—are inferior and limited thinkers who shouldn't even be in the field of science.

---

[7]Jean -Michel Angebert, The Occult and the Third Reich, McGraw-Hill Book Company.

[8]Abelard Reuchlin, The True Authorship of the New Testament, Abelard Reuchlin Foundation, Kent, WA98064.

[9]New Testament, Revelations 22:16.

"UFO" groups—actually O.S.I, counterintelligence teams—falsely create the illusion that occult groups are responsible for cattle mutilations—by coordinating their activities with the inadvertent reports of saucer sightings and the discovery of mutilated cattle by the public. Meanwhile, the government also disseminates other false propaganda through "official sources" like the Santa Fe District Attorney's office, such as through the federally-funded $50,000.00 grant for a phony "investigation" conducted by former F.B.I. agent, Ken Rommel, in which the government investigated itself. The purpose of this "investigation" was to feed propaganda to the pseudo-skeptical "Official Government", Philip Klass/CSICOP side of the phony debate, to protract the misinformation through continued confusion and false conflict.

We the People—supposedly the damned 'bosses'—are "not yet ready for the technology" (the ostensible excuse for the over 50 years continued secrecy, proffered at NSA/military/O.S.I./Air Force oversight intelligence committee levels). But what about the bankers and corporate IllumiNazis who in reality determine national—and international—security policy? Isn't it they who are "not yet ready for the technology"? Is this the ultimate Wag the Dog scenario, or what?

There is traditionally a quasi-Nazi orientation of state police in America, which is often interlocked with the CIA. In Texas, as a Neighborhood Commissioner for the Boy Scouts in 1962, I attended a scouting executive conference hosted by the Air Force at Big Spring. For some unexplained reason, everyone started speaking German. Most of the Buffalo Trail executives were of German or Nordic extraction.

The keynote address for the conference was to be delivered by the head of the Texas Department of Public Safety, Col. Homer Garrison. Also in attendance was (then Capt., later Col.) Wilson Speir. As I waited in the "air room", before Garrison's address, Col. Speir approached me and unexpectedly said, "Adolf Hitler was the finest Christian gentleman the western world has ever seen, except he made only one mistake, by failing to kill all the Jews." After the conference, I was placed on the mailing list of several anti-Semitic, Nazi-oriented publications, such as Conde McGinley's Common Sense, of Union, N.J. I never paid a dime, and the paper continued to reach me no matter where I moved, until 1966. Many policemen like Speir apparently admire Hitler because they consider him to have been "a good cop", who "cleaned up the streets of Germany". Police work sometimes naturally attracts authoritarian types who think that an authoritarian state will diminish crime and improve life. And imagine: A state in which the cops would be "top dogs"! These are not good cops. They are "bad cops".

Another thing this experience confirmed, was the Nazi orientation of the Boy Scouts, similar to the transformation in Germany of the Pfadtfindern ("Pathfinders", the German equivalent of the Boy Scouts), into the Jugendbunds ("Youth Bunds"), from which the S.S. Hitlerjugends had grown. In Austin Texas, in 1968, a Boy Scouts of America T.V. ad was narrated by one of Wernher von Braun's N.A.S.A. astronauts, John Glenn, now a U.S. Senator from Ohio (and the oldest astronaut to go into space). The ad showed Scouts on patrol, carrying patrol flags, running up a hill and tumbling down the other side, as a vaguely familiar German military march played in the background. I recollected having heard the march only a short time before, in a televised documentary of William Shirer's Rise and Fall of the Third Reich. In the documentary, a Hungarian composer and favorite of Hitler—affectionately referred to as "Putzy"—related how he had composed a march entitled Youth Marches Forward, on request of the Fuehrer, for a propaganda film for his Hitlerjugends. John Glenn gave his recruitment spiel to American youth, and the ad with the march was a verbatim copy of the Nazi ad. After I pointed this out to a few people at the university, the ad was promptly jerked from the media without public comment.

The same Col. Wilson Speir (previous page) who was a Scouting official, and eventually became head of the D.P.S. in Texas, after the death of Col. Homer Garrison (ca. 1966), was given a special "heroism" award by President L.B.J., in 1967. Despite the numerous inquiries of Senator 'Babe' Schwartz of Galveston, no one could figure out what Speir had supposedly done to earn it. Schwartz probably knew of Speir's Nazi proclivities, and was just 'turning up the heat'. One of the first things Speir did when he took over the D.P.S., was to create the state police's very own "mini-CIA". The first thing to come to my mind, was Himmler's S.S.. How deeply in law enforcement has this influence penetrated?

In 1986, a young Atheist scout was kicked out because of his refusal to believe in a "god", or to pledge loyalty to "God", as stated in the "God and Country" phrase in the Boy Scout Oath. Asserting his right to religious belief or non-belief, he brought suit to enjoin the scouts to reinstate his membership, alleging not only the un-American, illegal and unconstitutional discrimination against him because of his beliefs, but also the abridgement of his 2nd Amendment rights to protection against state recognition of an establishment of religion. He lost the suit and the U.S. Supreme Court upheld what they referred to as the "right" of the Boy Scouts of America to discriminate against Atheists. A taxpayer-provided federal highway marker on 1-25 to the south of Santa Fe, directs the public to a local Boy Scout meeting hall, as official sponsorship of the Scouts, who discriminate against Atheists, just as they might do against Jews. Ergo, the state officially discriminates against Atheists.

It is disturbing to think that these Christian fascists equate only their religious beliefs with "good", while the beliefs of "Atheists" are automatically associated with "evil". Perhaps someone should have told them that "Satan", to an Atheist, is purely a mythological creation which belongs to the Christians and Jews. The Communists only pretended to be Atheists, but in reality, substituted a different pantheon of gods (their leadership), under a different set of mystical beliefs, replacing the myth of "god" with the myth of "collective consciousness", the same as the Tibetan Bonpas.

Atheism is inconsistent to totalitarianism, since Atheists are by definition individualists who reject both Christian, Communist, or any other mystical collectivism. Without blind acceptance of what a totalitarian government or religion tells you, based on faith rather than reason—such as the idea of a "collective consciousness"—as the basis for a "more just", "more scientific", or "superior" form of government or society, a collectivist system breaks down. There is nothing in the world's major religions to prevent them from practicing communism or fascism, which are based on the same kind of altruism. In fact, wherever these religions have become the "state" religions, the results have been communistic or fascistic. Many people like Stalin, merely exchanged their priestly garbs for communist or fascist uniforms, without even breaking stride. Fidel Castro was converted to Marxist-Leninism by two Jesuit priests, while in the Sierra Maestas of Cuba, preparing for his final march on Havana.

I have found nothing in the lives or works of such famous Atheist as Giuseppe Verde, Mark Twain, Thomas Edison, Nikola Tesla, Nathan Hale, George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and many others whom you might never suspect, to urge anything other than a free system, including the right to believe as one chooses, upon others.

Many of our most famous Atheists have been forced by circumstances to pay "lip service" to Christianity, Judaism, or other religions, including Communism, in public statements, coerced by corporate fascists who consider the mind-control mechanisms of "collective belief indispensable to the security of their coercive "systems".

It is easy to be confused when the government spreads false propaganda among a public willing to believe it. A 1953 panel was set up to "investigate" flying saucers, headed by Dr. H.P. Robertson—an O.S.I, consultant, chosen to head the Robertson Panel—which eventually issued what was called The Robertson Report (on "UFOs"), intended to embellish the cover-up which has been protracted until today.

The N.S.A. (parent agency to the O.S.I.) is known in the "trade" as "The Puzzle Palace"[10]. A 'puzzle' is something that comes in bits and pieces, but "puzzle palace" implies a place where puzzles are created, like a "pizza palace" creates pizzas. Through "false puzzles"—the pieces of which fit together to form false pictures—the public is misinformed in such a way that they believe they have pieced a puzzle together, and "...figured something out", when in reality they were suckered in by the O.S.I. These "puzzles" might lead a rational person to conclude that the scenarios are too corny to believe, but the religious history of the world shows that 'mass' society is hooked on corny scenarios, especially "religious" or "spiritual" ones. O.S.I, think tanks—guided by the S.S. mystics of Reinhard Gehlen's RSHA—have designed these phony 'alien' scenarios, using the principles of secret, mystical movements, societies and religions of the world. This technique was influenced by the fact that, in the creation of librettos for grand opera, composers and librettists know that successful librettos must be "schmaltzy" (Yiddish for "chicken-fatty", but meaning "corny" and overdone). This conclusion influenced the modern Big Lie Technique, as stated by Adolf Hitler:

> "In the size of the lie there is always contained a certain factor of credibility, since the great masses of people...will more easily fall victim to a great lie than to a small one, since they themselves...lie sometimes in little things... Thus such an idea of an untruth will not at all enter their heads...therefore, just for this reason, some part of the most impudent lie will remain and stick ".

Sometimes determining the truth is just a matter of common sense, being a good judge of character, and at other times, objectivity in listening to the ridiculousness of what is being said. You sometimes know the truth because it is reasonable, is being told by a calm, sane, reasonable and honest person, unconnected to the government, who is not given to flights of fantasy, corroborated by other reliable sources. People who say they "met space beings" (p. 133), are either government liars, attention seekers, insane, or pathetic victims of slick government cons.

Why do these liars have such illegal power over us? We shall know the truth—which is a pack of CIA lies. The 1979-80 "investigation" by ex-FBI agent Ken Rommel, reported in the New Mexican, is immediately refuted by a letter from Thomas Martin of Santa Fe, as shown in the following facsimile news clippings from the New Mexican (ca. 1980):

---

[10]James Bamford, The Puzzle Palace [1982],

Investigation says mutilations caused by scavengers

Details of a year-long investigation into New Mexico's mysterious cattle mutilations, summarized in April, were released Monday and point to animal scavengers as the cause of the mutilations.

Former FBI agent Ken Rommel, who conducted the probe, concluded that most of the 117 cattle deaths he investigated were caused by natural causes and damage to the carcasses was caused by natural predators.

The report supports conclusions outlined by Rommel in April and adds details.

The 297-page report, prepared for District Attorney Eloy Martinez with a $50,000 federal grant, includes reports from veterinarians and others and photographs of damaged cattle.

"...I found nothing in the official reports to indicate that the animal was mutilated by any agents other than predators and scavengers," Rommel wrote. "Available evidence strongly suggests that those animals died from natural causes or common injuries and were subsequently ravished by scavengers."

Rommel claims that in 117 mutilations he investigated since 1975 there is not one case which could be described as a "classic mutilation."

Rommel's report claims that data obtained from qualified investigators and experienced veterinarians in other states confirms what he discovered in New Mexico.

"In fact, I have found no credible source who differs from this finding, nor has one piece of hard evidence been presented or uncovered that would cause me to alter this conclusion," Rommel's report states.

Though Rommel's first recommendation is not to spend more taxpayer's money to fund law enforcement investigations of this phenomenon, he said further studies by anthropologists, psychologists, sociologists, and other behavioral scientists could be "useful and revealing."

Rommel urged law enforcement officers to investigate future mutilations sufficiently to determine if the facts point to unlawful killing, butchering or stealing, and to collect evidence and testimony to support a successful prosecution.

Rommel stated in his report that he hopes his conclusions would end "rumors, theories and fears that some highly organized criminal activity or extraterrestrial conspiracy is responsible for these mutilations."

The belief that mutilations are being done as experiments by highly skilled individuals using precision instruments is unsupported by facts, Rommel said.

He termed the facts cited to support this belief as "at best questionable" and "involving incredible flights of fancy" in some cases.

Reports of organs being removed "with surgical precision," lack of evidence at the scene and the carcasses being devoid of blood were among reported findings Rommel said were erroneous or misleading. Rommel said he found many "errors of commission and omission" in official reports.

Disputes 'mutilations' report

I can't speak for the other 116 cases, but I happened upon one of Rommel's investigations. This case involved a 1,000 pound bull, "caught napping in a tree by predators." The "predators" in this case rode in a helicopter and obviously had scientific training in toxicology. They took the same tissues I dissected while doing graduate study in toxicology, but then I was limited by finances to use rodents, not the cattle of northern New Mexico ranchers. Tissues taken included brain, gastrointestinal, gonadal and six inch core of the liver region. Clamp marks were present on the lips, to facilitate the removal of the tongue. I admired the surgical techniques, neat and without blood. The focus on Rommel's investigation of this case was to investigate the possibility of purchasing the negatives of the pictures taken by local residents of the slain animal.

You should refrain from calling these cases "mutilations" and describe them as they are, lab animal sacrifices.

My questions are: Who is responsible? What environmental polutant is being investigated? Is it of danger to us?

The real scavengers, the coyotes, didn't touch the carcass, but then they know not to mess with the CIA, LASL, USAF, etc.

Thomas Martin
Santa Fe

Some policemen are responsible to the people, rather than to totalitarian-like bureaucracies which direct them. One gutsy New Mexico State Police member, Gabe Valdez, of Dulce, New Mexico, who is both intelligent and truly courageous, took on the phony FBI/CIA "mutilations investigation" of ex-FBI agent, Ken Rommel, head-on. The following is my facsimile clipping, with photo of Valdez:

Trooper blames mutilations on massive conspiracy

By JANE SEAGRAVE
The Associated Press

DULCE - Five years ago, Gabe Valdez didn't believe in aliens from outer space. That was before the steely eyed state policeman witnessed his first cattle mutilation.

Now, Valdez says he just can't rule out the existence of extraterrestrial beings.

More likely, he says, a top-secret medical research project is responsible for the mysterious deaths of more than 90 head of livestock in New Mexico since 1975.

And despite skepticism from his peers, gentle chiding from his friends and an official report discounting his theories, Valdez refuses to be dissuaded.

"It doesn't bother me. I think they're ignorant," he says of his detractors. "It just makes me work harder to prove these people wrong."

More than a year after a former FBI agent concluded in a 297-page report that the "mutilated" cows were victims of natural predators, Valdez has vowed to get to the bottom of what he believes may be a massive conspiracy engineered by the federal government.

"There are some things I can't talk about now because they're under investigation," Valdez said in a recent interview at his home in this small community on the Jicarilla Apache reservation. "But one of these days it will break."

The 38-year-old career officer is not the kind of man one would easily scoff at.

Small but squarely built, he was named "officer of the year" by the state police in 1977, largely for his part in the armed capture of a first-degree murder suspect.

The only state police officer on the reservation, Valdez is often called on to break up fights in bars or intervene in domestic quarrels.

Valdez, raised the son of a Los Alamos janitor in the tiny northern New Mexico village of Cebolla, realized his lifelong dream when he joined the New Mexico State Police in 1969. The father of three young boys, he speaks with the earnest conviction of a man who is used to being listened to.

He rarely drinks, lifts weights in his spare time and ---until recently--- "never even though about" the supernatural.

"He's realistic, I can vouch for that," said his wife, Margie.

Valdez became involved in the cattle mutilation issue in June 1976 when a neighboring rancher reported a dead cow with what appeared to be strange incisions in its soft tissues.

On investigation, Valdez said he found a tripod-like imprint near the animal's carcass, resembling tracks that might be left by a helicopter landing.

Later, the officer received reports that an unusual orange light had been spotted by area residents around the time the cow died.

Although Valdez said he did not see the light on his first investigation, he subsequently has seen it "a lot of times."

"It goes slowly and then it goes quickly. It looks like an evening star, but it's orange," he said. "I bet at least 85 percent of the people in Dulce have seen it."

Ken Rommel, a former FBI agent, was commissioned in 1979 to investigate the alleged mutilations. He concluded in a June 1980 report that the livestock deaths were due to natural causes and that the "mutilations" were the result of scavengers.

To believe that the cows were deliberately mutilated, eh said, "would require a wild imagination coupled with an agility to totally disregard the facts."

Rommel also questioned Valdez' credibility, quoting an unnamed associate of the police officer as saying Valdez sometimes "sees things that are not there."

For his part, Valdez said Rommel failed to investigate true mutilations.

The report "looks very convincing because it came from an FBI agent," Valdez said. "But everything he put in the report was speculation."

"I really don't know of an animal that can handle a knife or break a leg or put a clamp on a leg. You actually have to be a big fool to say that it's predators."

Since 1976, Valdez' name has been linked to the issue of cattle mutilations and he frequently is the first person called to the scene to investigate dead livestock.

Anticipating that his findings will be viewed with skepticism, he now "always try to take along credible people to the scent of these mutilations."

The mutilations follow a general pattern, he said. In most cases, the animal's rectum, sexual organs and tongue have been carefully cut out.

The incidents usually follow reports of the strange orange light and of helicopter noises. Valdez is convinced that aircraft are involved.

But concrete evidence has been elusive. Valdez said ranchers have tried repeatedly to no avail to catch a mutilator in the act.

"You can sit there for months and nothing will happen and you might leave for the night and they will hit you," he said.

Valdez is becoming increasingly convinced that the incidents are carefully staged to appear supernatural, but he won't say for sure.

"I'm not going to commit myself and say it's not a human force, but there is at least some human involvement," he said.

The explanation he favors is that the federal government is using cows in a top-secret, defense-related medical research project. Orange lights and other devices are used to confuse observers into doubting what they see.

If Valdez has facts to back up his theory, he isn't making them public.

But to the state police officer, the explanation isn't the product of a wild imagination.

"Who else is going to spend the money to hire an aircraft to kill a cow?" he asks. "Who has the damn money just to kill a cow and take its tongue. It's got to be the government. It's got to be something big."

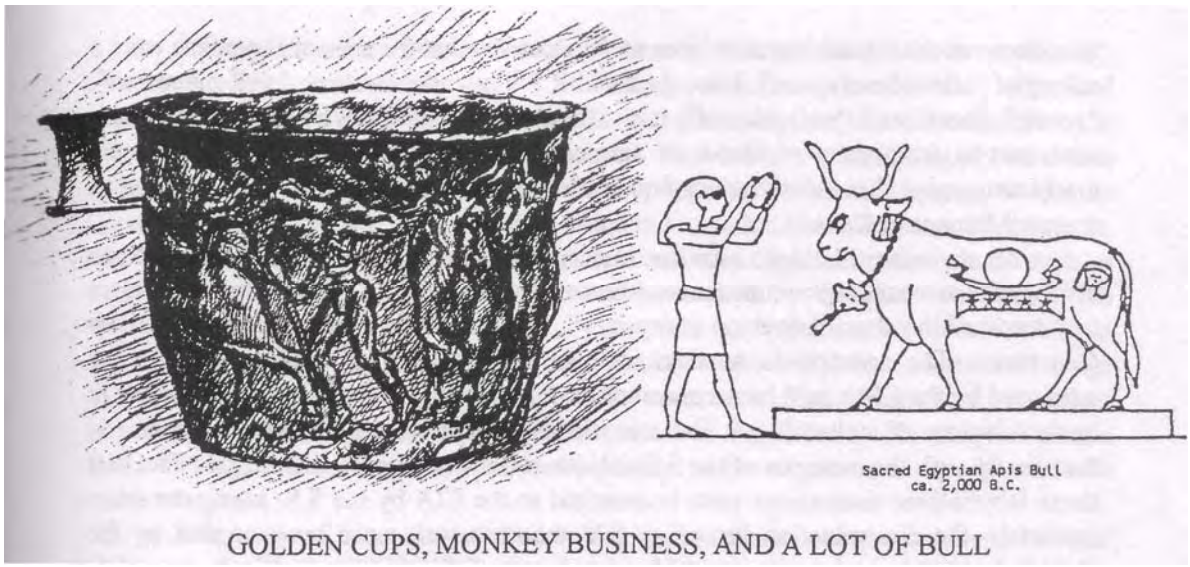
SKEPTICAL PATROLMAN - New Mexico State Policeman Gabe Valdez believes cattle mutilations are part of a top secret government medical research project.

Gabe Valdez said Ken Rommel didn't investigate "true mutilations", and engaged in "speculation". Rommel questioned Valdez' credibility, yet failed to name a source for a comment allegedly made about Valdez by a fellow state policeman, an apparent lie by Rommel to patch up his own damaged credibility. Valdez' statement---"You actually have to be a big fool to say that it's predators"---pretty much says it all. Valdez gets my gold star for rationally saying the 'mutilations' are actually a "top secret, defense-related medical research project." Flying saucer-borne particle beam weapons irradiate the cattle, and mobile teams rustle the cattle and remove tissue and blood to examine for reproductive and immune system damage, as the CIA's "O.S.I.R.I.S." front creates a sham Nazi "golden cup" effect.

The issues are whether the cattle are (1) being intentionally "mutilated" by weirdos (highly unlikely); or, (2) being killed and eaten by predators with scalpels for teeth (Valdez' "big fools" believe this); or, (3) being subjected to particle beam experimentation, exsanguination, and surgical extraction of tissue to analyze for ionizing radiation damage (the "MRA" under the circumstances). As I have already said, an Albuquerque scientist named Calvin Horn, among others, years ago found that a standard blood coagulent and a microwave chamber were used to thoroughly exsanguinate the carcasses (even removing traces of copper from the livers). A cauterizing scalpel (invented in 1938, for those idiots who are easily mystified by technology as old as I am) removes tissue in non-bleeding cuts, cauterizing as it goes. The blood and tissue are then processed and run through a counter to determine the number of cells affected and how. Since it's secret, you know it's illegal and bad for us.

There is also the compelling evidence of strange aircraft which are silent (not helicopters), glow orange, and, as described by Gave Valdez, "...look like an evening star." Some of these ships, incidentally, have been photographed up close, "in the act."

After the cattle have been removed to a laboratory—at a secret government facility, or in the saucers themselves—and are fully processed, the carcasses are dropped from the air, so as to avoid tracks around them for investigators to find, though tracks may appear at pick-up locations. Some have been found lodged high in the branches of trees. As Tom Martin implied a couple of pages back, it's stupid to call these partial dissections, tissue samplings and experiments "mutilations", any more than one would refer to an apendectomy as a "mutilation", unless the surgeon is extremely incompetent, or insists on proving he's no "button-holer".



GOLDEN CUPS, MONKEY BUSINESS, AND A LOT OF BULL

The golden Vapio Cups depict ancient Minoan "cowboys" of 3,500 years ago, rounding up bulls for the "pagan" ceremonies commencing important gatherings, in which such cups were used to drink the blood of young bulls. This "Golden Cup Ceremony" spread from Asia (Western Siberia), into the Mediterranean, and throughout the Celto-Nordic tribes, as traditions of the westward-migrating bands of mixed Norse, Mongols, and Moors. It appeared in the ancient Nibelungenlied ("Song of the Nibelungs", the pan-Germanic epic), became known as the "Holy Grail" myth, and was eventually taken up by both the Christians—who erroneously associated it with their religion—and by the Nazis, via their Ahnenerbe/Thule Societies, within the "Old Prussian" Masonic Illuminati, which revived the ceremony in neo-pagan Luciferian/Osirian Nazi S.S. ceremonial toasts to "knowledge" and "pure Aryan blood". This and the Egyptian Apis Bull myth are more fully connected in Chapter VII.

Then came the O.S.I, with its cattle mutilations cover-up, and covertly operated "O.S.I.R.I.S." pseudo-occult front group, to which they psychopolitically imputed responsibility—not to exclude the possibility that the ceremonies are actually those of Nazis perpetuating a secret S.S. infrastructure within the CIA—and daring us to catch them. Was not von Braun an Obersturmbannfuehrer in the S.S.? Were any Blacks or Jews reported in these groups? "O.S.I.R.I.S." gatherings are coordinated with saucer sightings and related secret medical experiments ("mutilations"), to throw outside investigators off. The F.B.I.'s position is 'natural causes' for the experiments, and 'blackouts' on the saucers, while the Air Force's suspicious behavior lends false credibility to the cover-up conspiracy theory.

Seeking to rectify a blundering lack of visual arts finesse which was apparent in the original 1947 Roswell Hoax, the CIA now employs more skillful technicians, artists, and panels of Ph.D.s. In 1985, they warmed up the old Roswell leftovers as the "MJ-12" hoax, to retroactively fabricate a coverup in 1947. (There was a 1947 cover-up, but that was to conceal the fatal flaws in the hastily bungled initial hoax.) A lingering phoniness is obviated by the contorted, over-scholarly extremes to which they have gone, to create the effect that occult groups—with names like "O.S.I.R.I.S."—are responsible for the cattle mutilations. Oh, what tangled webs they weave, when first they practice to deceive!

Some of the related literature goes so far as to say that the ancient Egyptians were a colony of "aliens from space". Since the O.S.I.R.I.S. members were so "well-mannered", "young", "neat", and "well-dressed", it is difficult to imagine them hoisting up huge bull carcasses to drain them of blood, or surgically removing genitalia, anal tissue, etc., muchless gorging themselves on huge quantities of warm bull blood, like a lusty band of ancient Minoans or Celts.

As obvious titillations to ancient history detectives, arcane clues disseminated to mystify the surrounding circumstances (the work of the "Puzzle Palace") invite scholars to "uncover" the sham "cover-up conspiracy", not to mention the obscure Golden Cup Ceremony. The scenario is so devious, that only a team of diploma-mill Ph.D.s employed by the CIA could have conceived it! What better use for 'surplus' graduates in ancient history or archaeology? The scenario incidentally reveals an all too explicable familiarity with the esoterica of the S.S. Ahnenerbe dilettantes, considering the fact that these labyrinthine contortions were bequeathed to the CIA by the S.S. Using the same material—the dissemination for which S.S. theorists were once hung or shot by the Tribunal at Nuremberg—our own CIA, revealing its S.S. affinities, subtly brainwashes us with this garbage with impunity, in subliminal psychopolitical messages. We should be outraged that our government engages in this BIG BROTHER mystical, religious shamanism and huxterism, treating us like psychopolitical zombies; "Uncle Sham" at his worst!

In the ancient Egyptian religion, Hapi—one of the four sons of Horus the hawk or falcon—and one of the four kings of the cardinal points of the earth—is shown as a baboon-god which is the dual namesake for the 'Apis' Bull. The bull and ape are both forms of Osiris, the father and son of Horus, as part of early 'holy trinity' myth copied by Josephus. The military intelligence/Illuminati committees proffered up monkies as aliens at Roswell in 1947, using the shaved and dyed rhesus monkies (which are very close to the original "cynocephalus" ("Chinese-headed") baboons used by the Ancient Egyptians), to produce alienoid/humanoid-looking beings.

An examination of all this stuff makes it ever more maddeningly apparent that BIG BROTHER has been playing games with our minds, planting ancient Egyptian esoterica, either out of inherent bureaucratic plagiarism and uncreative laziness, or to dare some scholarly investigator to eventually discover it. Or did they think this was so slick that we mere 'civilians' would never unravel it? Was this an insider joke for Illuminati-employed Egyptologists, or just a short-cut for lazy Ph.D.s, who plagiarized their scenario from sources so obscure they mistakenly believed we would never discover how incompetent they were? Or, are the Illuminati who control the intelligence community so egotistical about their esoteric beliefs, that they insist on scattering the earmarks of them all about, as they gloat in secret pleasure?

"Apis" is Greek for "Hapi", the namesake for the "Apis Bull" ("Ape-Bull"), involved in the Golden Cup Ceremony ("Apis" contains the apparent root for "ape"). The sacred bull was chosen for a white triangle on his forehead, as another maddening Trilateral symbolic parallel! The bull was referred to as "Osiris Apas" (in Greek, "Osorapis"). Literally, this means "East-Hare-Ape-(Bull)", a sort of animal/god conglomerate typical of the Egyptian religion. So there is "O.S.I.R.I.S.", there are the apes, and the mutilations are the Golden Cup Ceremonies! Gee, I solved the Puzzle Palace's "puzzle of the month"!

Rhesus monkies possess exotic, 'alienoid' characteristics—"cynocephalous", humanoid faces with large, soulful, slanted eyes—with subhuman body size, and similarities to the sacred baboon form of Osiris, convenient for transformation into the "space beings" of the Roswell/MJ-12 hoaxes. Furthermore, a handy supply of rhesus monkies from the Regional Primate Research Laboratory, at Alamogordo (or its predecessor agency) were already being killed in the rocket sled accelerator experiments, as substitutes for human pilots, preparatory to manned flights in rocket planes such as the X-15, leading up to the moon missions envisioned by Wernher von Braun. The monkies were already outfitted with the helmets and G-suits, to simulate human conditions as closely as possible. The original photos showed pressure lines and lacings visible on the G-suits, which would have been unnecessary had the monkies been pilots of flying saucers, which canceled most if not all of the G-force. The original photos which I saw, now appear to be unavailable, except in the memories of myself and those who saw them.

When one of these shaved dead babies is dyed green, and you put his G-suit and helmet on, with those like DEAD eyes looking out from under those droopy eyelids, the effect is EERIE enough to convince some gullible people that they are "aliens". The dead lab animals were shaved, in order for the G-suits to be effective (the pressure with the animal hair would be ineffective). The total effect was in fact TOO WEIRD, and even the government bunglers eventually backed off from that one. The key words here are LAZY and BAD TASTE. The original photos showed the fatal flaws—identifiability of the critters as monkies, and apparently man-made constuming and equipment—since aliens capable of traveling millions of light years through interstellar space, would probably not use conventional sewing machines and lacings to make their garments. Exposure of the 1947 fakery, exposes the ensuing protracted hoaxes. Ergo, the newly created (c. 1985) MJ-12 documents scenario, ex post facto, was also a hoax. The original hoax at Roswell was already out of the bag and had to be altered, since it was obviously bungled. A hoax to conceal a bungled hoax.

The major error in the original 1947 Roswell hoax, after the dead monkies were all dressed up for the rocket sled, was in deciding to go ahead and give them "somewhere (else) to go", without more professional consultation. At that point, some G.I. with bad taste and judgment, probably said something like "...Yeah...that's it..that's what an alien would look like! Let's do it!"

Roswell was the largest town in the general area, the citizens of which had almost all seen saucers, or had close friends who had seen one of more. Because of the fantastic electrical flight characteristics and inadequate control and navigational systems of the earlier saucers, the government was unable to conceal them while developing them in the area. The hoax was an ill-conceived attempt to explain away the many sightings near the secret military bases, where excited post-war saucer experimentation accompanied the influx of German saucers and personnel, immediately after the war, soon followed by more. The hoax was intended to convince the many people who had seen saucers, that they weren't "ours".

The government had its hands full trying to keep the German saucers secret, what with the fifteen thousand German scientific, technical, support and security personnel. All those people had to have recreation, which created even more security problems. The German personnel often went down to nearby Juarez and Ojinaga, Mexico, to blow off steam and whoop it up. Naturally, some of them were arrested and held in Mexican jails after all-night drinking bouts, whoring, and brawls. Getting foreigners out of Mexican jails has always been difficult, and the Juarez jail was a sort of old dungeon which was notorious for its large rats and bugs.

While at the University of Texas, I had a neighbor named Helen Nash. Helen was married to retired A.F. sergeant George Nash, whose father had gambled away the fortune earned with his grandfather's Nash Automobile Company. Helen was from Germany. She had an old ancestral castle over in East Germany, near the Czech border, which the West German government bought from her, since they figured sooner or later, the divided Germany would be brought back together again, and they would have 'title'. The old castle would make a fine tourist attraction. Now that's what I call thinking ahead. Helen's father owned all the pleasure boats on the Rhein. His main boat was called the "Barbarossa". That made me wonder just how far ahead the Germans were thinking. Anyone out there get that? Barbarossa ("Red Beard") is the Germanic myth about an old man who awakens from his slumber every so often, and comes out of his cave to stalk the earth. The myth is an esoteric Nazi code symbolic of the return of a new Hitler, in a Fourth Reich.

At 15 years of age, Helen, who spoke five or six languages, was brought to Alamogordo/White Sands from Bavaria, as a security agent for the German Operation Paperclip contingency of the secret flying saucer/rocket project. One of her main jobs was to negotiate with Mexican authorities, to get German scientists, soldiers, and other personnel out of the Mexican jails, and to act as an interpreter whenever necessary. She was like an extension of the German Embassy, very highly connected because of her aristocratic family. It sometimes cost a lot of money to get the Germans out of the Mexican jails. Helen never denied my accusations that the German contingency she worked with included the flying saucer group, but since she still held the rank of major in German Intelligence, she was still bound from saying more by security regulations. Helen was brought to White Sands as part of Operation Paperclip, while von Braun was at Ft. Bliss, and the entire German flying saucer project was brought to America, because the Russians were threatening to overrun West Germany, and superficially it was feared that they might acquire the technology, though it was more likely that the Illuminati was completely eradicating the "German memory" of the "KT-p2" Projekt.

The decision to execute the Roswell hoax was probably not previewed or fully authorized by the Pentagon, failing to anticipate that their Illuminati bosses would still be relying upon it 38 years later (in 1985, at the time of "MJ-12"). So the old, flawed hoax was buried, and the new revised MJ-12 hoax was created to replace it. No one has come up with the photos which were published not only in newspapers, but magazines as well. That means that, in the 47 years since, the spooks have continually combed the shelves and files of libraries, newspapers, magazines and publishers, and "retrieved" every last stitch of this evidence, except whatever might still be buried somewhere in someone's old pile of c. 1947-1968 magazines, newspapers or other effects.

Down in Roswell, on Mar. 25, 1994, the government liars and their agents and dupes, were ballyhooing up a "conference" over the "Roswell Incident", coinciding with the filming of the T.V. production, "Roswell". They have two main tourist attractions in Roswell. One of them is the "Roswell Incident" hoax, and the other is the "Billy the Kid" hoax. Recently, information has come to light that William Bonny (the "Kid"), was not killed by Pat Garrett, but died Dec. 27, 1950 at almost 91 years of age, in Hico, Texas, going by the name O.L ("Brushy Bill") Roberts.

This was documented by Dr. C.L. Sonnichsen (Alias Billy the Kid, 1955, written for William V. Morrison). Dr. Sonnichsen was a well established historian, who was often published through the University of Oklahoma Press, other Universities, and some private presses. I met him twice, once in the printshop of Karl Hertzog, the typographer for the press of the University of Texas at El Paso, and a second time in Santa Fe, where he attended a Southwest writers' conference, and we had a very enjoyable supper together at the La Fonda Hotel. He was well-acquainted with my old friend, J. Evetts Haley, the western ("cowboy") historian, and with Tom Lea, the painter, muralist, and writer, who wrote and illustrated the book, The Mustang[11]. You can imagine the reaction of the "Kid" aficionados at Roswell, as well as those at Ft. Sumner, where the Kid was supposedly buried, after being 'gunned down' by Pat Garrett. They weren't about to let 'revisionists' put an end to a good thing, since a lot of their tourist income and local color is tied up in keeping things the way they are. They too had conferences, featuring forensic experts from Los Alamos, doing computer analyses of photos of the Kid and Brushy Bill, etc., etc. But if you have an artist's eye, and casually look at the photos of the Kid and Brushy Bill, you can see they are the same person, separated by about 40 years. Roberts had over 22 documents proving his identity as "Billy the Kid". Ft. Sumner advertises the grave site and Kid museum on billboards all around the area. Oh yeah! That "Brushy Bill" thing sure was a hoax! The Illuminati and CIA also oppose such revisionism, because it threatens to destroys confidence in "their" false history.

Jesse James' cousin, Ola Everhard, of Lovington, New Mexico, let the cat out of the bag a few years ago, concerning the truth about the death of Jesse James. Among my childhood friends, were the great-grandsons of Frank James, ("Jimmy" and "Al" Schlosser), and the grandson of a Mr. Shea ("Seay", or "See"?), Tommy Mulcahy ("Mulkey"?). Shea had been in the Army of Northern Virginia. When Lee surrendered, Shea couldn't accept it, and joined Quantill's Raiders in New Mexico. That is where Shea became friends with the James brothers. Later, Shea rode with Billy the Kid in the Lincoln County Wars, and maintained his old friendship with the James brothers, as well as the Kid, for whom he had a good deal of respect. Shea's respect was not easily won, and I don't think it was completely due to the fact that the Kid (temporarily) used an Irish name, William Bonny. That was all explained by Dr. Sonnichsen. I always knew that 'Bonny' and the James brothers (Frank and Jesse) had died of natural causes, after living considerably longer lives than most. Frank James, a published historian, ran a profitable antique business at Valley Mills, Texas, near Waco, where he died of old age. His grandson, Jesse James Howard, raised in the Cimmarron, attended the University of Texas in 1938, wearing buckskins, moccasins, beads, and long pigtails. In the '60s, he jokingly boasted that he had been the "first hippy" at U.T., in 1938. He was Jim and Al's uncle.

Mr. Shea and the James boys (who used the names Bounds and Howard) would get together on their favorite patriotic holiday, the Fourth of July. I remember them getting together 1947, at the Schlosser house across Tornillo street, in Kermit. Shea looked resplendent in his Confederate Uniform, which he wore on such occasions. The get-together was attended by Shea, Frank and Jesse James, "Brushy Bill Roberts" ("Billy the Kid"), and their descendants. I can remember playing with a boy named "Franklin D. Bounds" (named after F.D.R.), who was Jesse James' great grandson.

---

[11]Tom Lea, The Mustang, University of Texas at El Paso Press [ca. 1961].

Many times, Jim and Al had proudly shown me Jesse's favorite rifle, an oddball caliber Winchester saddle gun, which hung on their wall. That gun had been used in the famous Northfield Minnesota Amnesty Raid. And of course, when we played "guns", Jim and Al would play Jesse and Frank, often arguing about which one played Jesse.

I remember on that 1947 Fourth of July, that, as Mr. Shea came striding down Tornillo street toward the Schlosser house, and I played in the front yard with Al, the three old men with canes—Frank, Jesse, and Billy—came in the gate. Al said, "Hey Bill, how'd you like to meet Jesse James, Frank James and Billy the Kid?" I said, "Yeah!", and, as the old men came by, I shook their hands, as they said "How-do, young feller", but Al's sister told his mother, and I was taken into the house and asked to promise to never tell anyone about the 'ghosts' I'd seen.

Jimmy and Al got severely reprimanded for telling me "too much", since Jesse and Frank may still have had prices on their heads at the time. Though I knew the truth, and was sworn to it, and despite the fact that I tried to cover for them by telling their mother that they had told me nothing, the boys were still whipped, even though their parents weren't "mean". The events of that day told me two things: It was true that Jesse James was still alive, and Jim, Al and I weren't good liars.

Frank James, whose family used the name Howard (not Jesse's family, as some thought), and Jesse James (whose family used the Bounds name) had been given secret pardons by the 'carpetbag' governor, Edmund Davis, of Texas. They had previously acquired incriminating evidence on a fellow carpetbag governor, Crittenden of Missouri, and blackmailed him into prevailing upon Davis to give them the pardons. The man shot by Bob Ford, in Missouri, was actually a notorious murderer , wanted "dead or alive", named Charlie Bigelow, who looked a lot like Jesse. It was he who was laid in the grave, at the "funeral of Jesse James", in 1882. James even helped carry Bigelow's coffin, and Bigelow's wife, posing as Jesse's wife, even identified the body for the coroner, as "Jesse's"! Unfortunately, Bob Ford was subsequently killed in a Colorado saloon by a James fan. Mr. Shea, over 103 in 1947, died at 104, in 1948. He had taught his grandson, Tommy Mulcahy, at the age of two, to recite every state in the Union and its capitol, as well as the Gettysburg Address and the Declaration of Independence. The old man had a great patriotic love of America, and was one of the few who knew the Civil War was not about slavery. Out of respect for my friends, I didn't reveal the truth about the James brothers until after their deaths. No one would have believed me anyway, and most won't believe me now.

Jesse James died of natural causes on August 15, 1951, in Granbury, Texas (on the Brazos River, about 30 miles southwest of Ft. Worth) at age 103[12]. Billy the Kid (A.K.A. William Roberts) had died the year before, on December 27, 1950, in Hico, 195 miles west[13]. The two had known each other for over 89 years, and they were almost relatives. The James brothers had come together on July 4, 1947, to Kermit, to talk over the "old days", and to visit family members and their old friend Mr. Shea., and to celebrate Independence Day.

Why do I tell you all these old stories? What do they have to do with the "Roswell Hoax"? These stories have to do with all historical hoaxes, because they show that, as usual, there is often a true story behind the 'official' version. That is because societies have almost always been controlled by an elite, through such hoaxes and false history, such as, that Reinhard Heydrich was assassinated in Bohemia in 1942, Hitler shot himself in the mouth in 1945, Jesse James was shot in the back in Missouri, Billy the Kid was shot by Pat Garrett, John F. Kennedy was shot by a "lone gunman" named Lee Harvey Oswald in 1963, and an "alien saucer" crashed in Roswell in 1947.

---

[12]Dr. Charles L. Sonnichsen, Alias Billy the Kid [commissioned by William V. Morrison, 1955].

[13]C.L. Sonnichsen, Supra.

In order to understand the "Roswell Hoax", one has to know a little about the local history, psychology, and vested interests involved. A whole culture has grown up in New Mexico around the Billy the Kid/Lincoln County Wars stories, as well as the "alien saucer" hoax. On the "old west" folklore, there are museums, 'experts', graves, historical plaques, conferences, historical reenactments and pageants, gunslinger contests, and annual celebrations, and would virtually have the same things on the "alien saucer hoax", if only they had laid the little dudes to rest in proper graves. (Instead, the researchers incinerated the corpses along with other dead lab animals, especially since the corpses were beginning to stink very badly while they were at the hospital). Rhesus monkies, like humans, release their bowel contents when they die, so the G-suits were getting pretty nasty after a few days in the July hot desert sun.

It is the carnival/tourist-trap psychology of the dusty little town of Roswell, which the government has tried to key into, rather than the local military yahoos, in perpetrating the initial Roswell hoax, but the atmosphere of the 1997 "50 Year Anniversary of the Roswell Incident" gravitated—or perhaps ascended—to the level of & folk festival, with people coming from the countryside with all kinds of alien kitsch, folk art, food and beverage stands, bands, and RVs, in hopes of making a few dollars and to have a good time. Most of them didn't even break even.

In respect to the 'alien saucer' hoax, just enough false clues were leaked through covert means, to keep the Big Lie alive, while attempting to conceal the original hoax by retrieving evidence, like stealing my two photos, and buying Bart Wilson's photo. Hindsight is sometimes 20/20. If the government revealed its part in the hoax, or if someone comes along with physical evidence exposing it, the government hoax will be done for, but as for the "folk festival", I'm sure some Roswell entrepreneurs will come up with the idea of a "Great Roswell Alien Hoax Museum". After all, why should the Piltdown Man hoax get all the glory?

The family of my brother-in-law, Paul E. Jette III, a coach at Mount Pleasant, Texas, were early Anglo settlers in the Roswell area. Paul's great-grandfather was John Blazer, whose mill was the site of a well-known skirmish in the Lincoln County War. Some of Paul's family lived at Mescalero, the location of Dr. Robert Goddard's rocket workshop. Paul III and my older sister, Ramona, took their honeymoon at Blazer's Mill, near Mescalero. Goddard, Willy Ley, and Wernher von Braun fired experimental rockets in 1935-37, from nearby Eden Valley. Paul and Mona rode to the old Blazer place in a wagon used on the honeymoons of two previous generations of Jettes, as well as by many others in the family.

Paul Jette, I ("Pop" Jette), married John Blazer's half-Souix daughter, shortly after 1900. He had been the quarterback for the University of Georgia when Knute Rockne of Notre Dame had thrown the first forward pass. He set up the first modern athletic programs in New Mexico, at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque, and at New Mexico State University (then "N. M. A. & M. Univ.", set up with statehood, under Teddy Roosevelt's plan). Then he was the head of the I. N. S. Paul Ill's aunt was the Army nurse present in Roswell when the so-called 'alien' was dissected. She had previously been a captured Army nurse at Corrigidor in the '40s, survived the Bataan Death March, and continued her work as a nurse at Roswell until becoming a Sister of Charity nun. Roswell researchers have been unable to locate her. I know where she is, but don't want her to be bothered by 'UFOlogists'. Her sister, Leona, told me about the rhesus monkies in 1958. The sisters also remembered von Braun and Dr. Robt. Goddard, when they test-fired their rockets at Eden Valley, near Goddard's workshop in Mescalero, in the 1930s. A young unmarried German baron in his early twenties didn't escape the attention of the girls in the small town of Mescalero, of course!

Roswell hoax dupes said the 'aliens' had no teeth, only four fingers on each hand, had "suction cups" on their fingertips, and were "...not human". Their teeth had been removed because military personnel were being bitten while shaving them, and putting the tight-fitting G-suits on them. Their fingertips were nipped off, healing to suction cup-type configurations. Their ears were surgically removed so the space helmets would fit, and they were deafened because the roar of the rocket sled drove them crazy. Their thumbs were surgically removed to keep them from escaping from the rocket sled harnesses, or from ripping or grabbing at personnel. The little guys were usually crushed to death by G-forces in repeated rocket sled runs, or in one of von Braun's reworked V-2s, during tests determining the "GS" a human pilot might withstand.

The strength of these monkies are several times that of humans for their size. (I know about that, since I have a scar on my right hand, slashed at lightening speed by a rhesus monkey at a circus. The nasty cut was difficult to heal, because of infection caused by the filthy nails of the monkey). The reports that the monkies "weren't human", was absolutely correct, since rhesus monkies are East Indian short-tailed monkeys, not humans. There was a switch from the more problematic rhesus monkies, to easier to manage and more docile chimpanzees, around 1952, about the time of the first publicized rocket rides of the chimps.

Following my July, 1993 first edition, the general excitement created by UFOlogy groups and their begged question that the government "concealed evidence of the crash of an alien space ship at Roswell in 1947", Kevin Randle and Don Schmitt published yet another book, The Truth About the UFO Crash at Roswell, in 1994. At page 149, they state: "Even Schaffner admits that earliest launches of rhesus monkeys occurred in the early '50s. He found no evidence that monkeys had been used in 1947." According to their own documentation, the records of the Space Center in Alamogordo say the first use of monkies in rocket launches was on June 11, 1948. Was this "...the early '50s"? And, these were records of "rocket" launches, not the rocket sled, which naturally preceded the flights of the monkies in rockets, in 1948.

G-suits, helmets, face masks and oxygen supplies were required on the rocket sled for the monkeys, to replicate contemplated human conditions as closely as possible. In addition, acceleration on the rocket sled would take away their breath, and if the monkies had died of anything except G-forces, the tests would have been useless. (Incidentally, my Albuquerque friend, Merill Holste, invented the G-suit in the '40s, but the government stole it from him and pretended that a man connected to a large corporation had invented it.) Of course, if records could prove that the "aliens" at Roswell were rhesus monkies, they would naturally be classified, since they could document the hoax, like my photos. I also remember seeing a film on the 1947 rocket sled tests using them, simple as that.

The most telling thing about Randle and Schmitt's 1994 book, is that they attempted to address a question without saying who raised it, in their statement that "another researcher" had examined the "possibility" of rhesus monkies in a crashed V-2 or A-9 German rocket, as the basis for the "crash". I was the one who had raised the issue of rhesus monkies, which was then distorted with the reference to a possible rocket crash. True to CIA form, they didn't advertise my book by mentioning it, because the CIA UFOlogists will only cite 'documentation' they created and control, but Randle and Schmitt looked kind of silly attempting to answer my assertion without citing its source. They got their facts wrong on the rockets too, because V-2s and other German rockets were tested from May, 1946 until 1952, at White Sands Missile Range, by von Braun and company.

Highly publicized books by OSI contractors shows the systematic evasion of my questions, and a persistent asking of the wrong questions. They fall into two irrational groups: (1) The group asserting an alien spacecraft crash; and (2) the group denying an alien spacecraft crash, but asserting an experimental weather balloon crash, and adding that UFOlogists are crazy because they believe in "alien UFOs". The UFOlogists have intentionally made it easy for the OSI pseudo-skeptics, by providing them with assertions and questions which make a denial look correct, except for the weather balloon lie, used to cover the initially bungled rhesus monkey hoax.

The Roswell hoax illustrates how our government went into a relatively remote area—such as the southwest was in 1947—and intimidated and slandered the credibilities of literally thousands of people, with lies that those who had seen saucers were liars, were crazy, were publicity-seekers, or were all those things. Rather than to endure ridicule, most people learned to pretend that they saw nothing, and that the sky was 'off limits' to one's credibility. To hell with Aristotle! Plato's 'Cave Analogy' was now "official U.S. government epistemology".

Not to diminish the importance of understanding the hoaxes concealing the saucers, there appears to have been other monkey business afoot at nearby White Sands Proving Grounds, under the "space program" being hyped by von Braun, as a propaganda tool to get funding for the rocket and the secret saucer projects. It is a little embarrassing to think that the rocket program is a part of the BIG LIE scheme, since the saucer technology is so much cheaper, durable, faster, and much more fantastic. In retrospect, the rocket program appears to have always been a mask for the flying saucer stuff, and a much more monstrous and expensive hoax than the Roswell hoax, having as its purpose the enrichment of the chemical and 'aerospace' corporations, to get their impetus behind the program, as well as to enlist their backing in the concealment of the saucer technology, thereby also fraudulently enriching the oil and automobile companies, and adding their impetus to the program. To paraphrase Hitler, "The State and industry are to be partners; one hand washes the other."[14]

In 1970, I met a newspaper writer at the Odessa American, in Odessa, Texas, where my sister Liz had once been the amusements editor. The writer's name was something like John Behmer. He had worked for several newspapers in New Mexico over the years. Since my reporter girlfriend had told him that I was interested in flying saucers, he told me that if I would come in, he would give me some old photos he had found knocking around in a dusty old file drawer of a southwestern newspaper, possibly in Lovington, New Mexico. The photos were the ones I mentioned which had been sent out to newspapers in the southwestern region by Walter Haut, the "P.I.O." involved in the Roswell Hoax. One of the photos showed three of the dead rhesus monkies in their little G-suits and helmets, and the other photo showed the junky little fake saucer. The saucer was so small, the monkies would barely have fitted into it, with barely room for one of them under the little plastic bubble canopy on its top. It was smaller even than the "Vril" types purportedly built by the Germans.

---

[14]Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf.

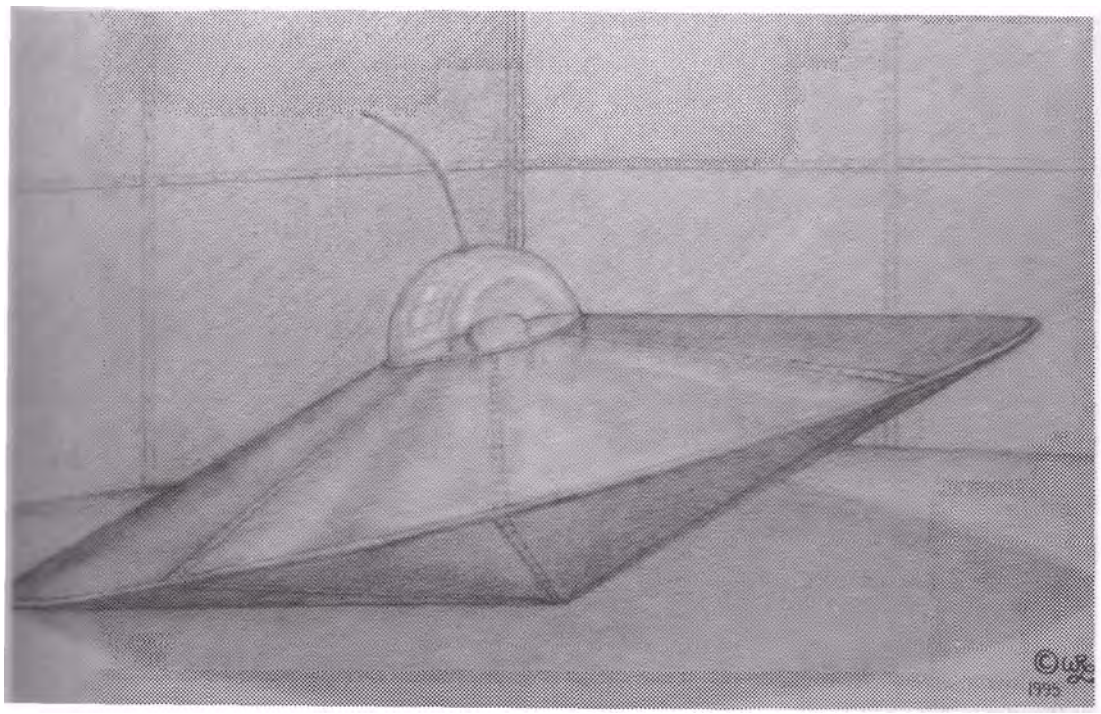
Behmer said I should be careful who I showed the photos to, since the security people had very thoroughly attempted to retrieve all of them immediately after the initial hoax, in most cases before they were published. Somehow, the two old 8" x 10" black and white 'glossies' had survived the purge, forgotten about until Behmer had stumbled across them among old papers in the bottom of the dusty old file drawer he was cleaning out, in a back room of one of the small weekly papers owned by the "Freedom Chain", which also owned the Odessa American. Although I had seen the photos published, along with a third one, in the distant past, and even had a magazine in my collection which had them in it, my examination of those actual, clear and full-sized photos, allowed me to corroborate the rumor that the "aliens" were in fact shaved rhesus monkies, just as I had heard. Unfortunately, I haven't seen the photos or the magazine since 1974, taken by the CIA thief woman who was associated with Jim Parsons (the "M.I.B."), and who had also lived with the French CIA "UFOlogist", Jacques Vallee, for two years. In 1980,1 found books in her personal library in her apartment in Santa Fe, which were stolen in 1974, along with the photos and the magazine, before I even knew her personally. It was obvious that she took the unrelated books for her private collection, while collecting the important saucer conspiracy evidence, such as the photos and my magazine, for the government. When I caught her with the books, she said "...ohh, don't you remember giving those to me?" I answered, "I couldn't have given them to you before I knew you, now could I?"

As an artist, I have been known for my ability to draw accurately from memory. I used to do many of my paintings that way, when I was in Austin. I did a series of large "genre" paintings (with 'ordinary' people in them), usually based on the Austin environs. I would often 'borrow' the face of someone I knew, if it seemed to fit well into the character in a painting. In fact, some of the faces I borrowed were those of some of my professors, usually in jest, in satire, or sometimes worse. One of my large paintings was about 5' x 7', entitled "Winos at 6th and Red River Streets". As one man exclaimed when he saw it, "Hey! I knows dat dude! He's da' one whut sells dem fishin' baits down by da' river, ain't he!" One of my professors was a little startled to find his face on one of the winos who was just rounding a corner to join his friends, with a bottle in a sack under his arm. Using my old skills, I will attempt to reconstruct the two photos.

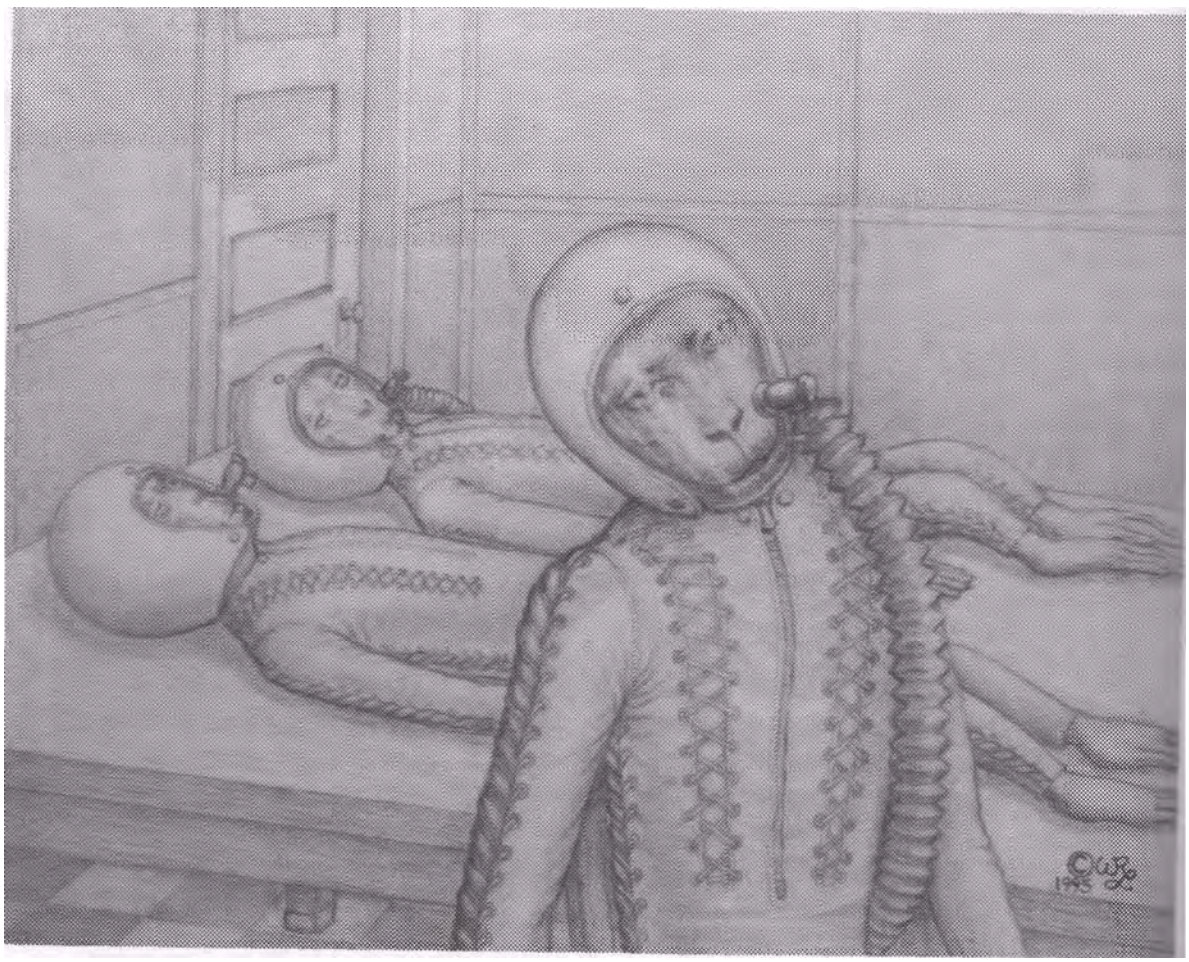
Rulers of a corporate-state society perpetrate as many confusing controversies as possible, so that individual members of the public will become so frustrated to attempting to do their own thinking, that they will finally give up and accept the state's Big Lies, spoon-fed to them through a controlled media.



(NOTE: The fake 'saucer' was about 12' in diameter, and had a plexiglass bubble on it, with a slightly bent automotive radio antenna projecting above it. The rivets, screws, and stock aluminum parts were obvious. It was clear from the environments in which the 'saucer' and the 'aliens' were photographed, that the photos had been made before the 'crash scene' had been 'discovered'.)

The Intelligence personnel who created the hoax, were prohibited from disclosing classified information. Since the secret saucers they used on the bases at Ft. Bliss, White Sands and Holloman, were classified, they could not use one of them as an "alien" saucer. The fake saucer created for the hoax, was apparently the product of amateur metal workers, because the base where it was fabricated did not have a competent design or fabrication facility at the time. It was a pathetic failure, because, had it been an "alien saucer", created by an advanced civilization, capabable of producing advanced technology capable of coming from light years away, it would have been even more advanced than the German saucers or early American prototypes possessed at the area's secret bases.

This early incursion into the special effects, prop-building and hoax-creation, by the "national security" spooks, was apparently a bitter lesson, which eventually led to them getting "professional help" from the movie industry labor pool. They not only produce much better hoaxes today, but have highly advanced cloaking and 'stealth' devices to conceal the saucers, such as special, color-changing surfaces, combined with color and image sensors, which make the saucers look like the background they happen to be hovering or flying in, similar to a chamelion. Anything for a buck, the sky's the limit.



When a Big Lie is afoot, all who know the truth must be given a piece of the action, be discredited, or be eliminated. By maintaining a rocket program, the huge corporations and their employees are committed to supporting it, to acquiescing in the hoax which makes them rich, and sells very expensive rockets and chemicals at our expense. NASA propaganda is everywhere, especially in toy stores. An almost sacrosanct, religious aura surrounds this Nazi Big Lie. Playgrounds have 'space shuttle' toys to ride, 'science' TV programs instruct children on the Big Bang Lie, as if ultimate and immutable truth. This is no different that old Soviet 'space' propaganda, with posters everywhere, showing rosy-cheeked children building rockets in science classes, and colorful and heroicized portraits of "Soviet Cosmonauts".

I'm not an old crank complaining about "somma them new-fangled rockets". I'm complaining about archaic rocket technology, when we have the flying saucer, which belongs to us because we paid for it. It is tantamount to purchasing wagons and horses when we have trucks and cars, or cap-and-ball muskets, when we have AR-15s. Give us what we paid for, not some old piece of mediaeval junk which runs on crap dumped on us at exorbitant prices by the chemical cartels!

CHAPTER IV: SIGHTINGS

My purpose has not been to document an overwhelming number of sightings, in order to sell you on basic truths you should already be familiar with. A vast quantity of misrepresented or fabricated "documented sightings" is the province of the Big Liars and their dupes, while the real sightings are concealed or ignored. Project Blue Book has already buried more good information than I could ever uncover, or need for that matter, and chasing after such material would keep me busier than a one-legged Indian trying to stamp out a grass fire, just as they intend. The sighting I made in 1953 was the only one I needed, to absolutely confirm the existence of saucers in reality. In order for you to separate truth from lie, it is necessary to discern a predominant pattern exhibited by government "truth saboteurs", consisting of the following repetitive strategies:

1. Witness statements which are exaggerated, misstated, falsified, or obliterated; depicting witnesses as ridiculous, seeing things like "...little green men", or a saucer "two miles long", generally portraying them as "nuts", drunks, drugged, or hallucinating; this trick is contrite and easy to spot;

2. overstatement, misstatement, or entire fabrication of important physical data, such as a saucer which "...had fire shooting out all over it, with a strong smell of sulfur", or which was "transparent", "appeared and disappeared"; this creates confusion about how the saucer works, and fits in with "extraterrestrial origin" baloney, or alleged '"hallucinations", "fantasies", "lies", or "mirages";

3. use of false, government-paid or procured witnesses, made to appear as private citizens, often thrown in when an important sighting is made, to confuse the public about what was seen, especially where an articulate witness manages to register a clear statement regarding what he or she actually saw. This pits one witness against the other, in a "war of credibility" which nobody wins, and "neutralizes" the truth. The press often has little alternative but to repeat false, conflicting reports along with whatever true ones there may be, or to print none at all;

4. use of government "experts", high-ranking military know-it-alls, or so-called "scientific" witnesses, often interjected to pose as the 'last word' on a sighting. This attacks the truth, by attempting to impress the reader with the 'high credentials' of witnesses who in fact saw nothing, for the benefit of dupes who are still too ignorant to realize that the government lost its credibility long ago, and that high-ranking ex-military 'experts' rarely buck the system and are liars, even when, as 'part of the plan', they may pretend to be doing so;

5. tampering in commercial film processing labs, which are easy prey for CIA thieves and saboteurs, as I learned long ago; you only get what they want you to have. The citizen who sends film exposures of saucers to such labs, will probably end up with blank, foggy, damaged, too-dark, tampered, substituted, or entirely missing images, the film may be stolen from one's camera, even before an attempt is made to remove it for processing (as in the case of the first roll of film I used to photograph Vicki Landrum and her radiation burns, along with photos of my Peiltochterkompass and other flying saucer equipment).

My first photos of Vicki clearly showed the burns on her arms and legs. These were stolen from my camera by an expert, in Santa Fe, from my camera as it lay in my car, just after my return from Texas. I had to use surreptitious means to obtain replacement photos, and it was necessary to circumvent adverse influences of some of the members of my own family, who were being manipulated by the CIA, via the Masonic Order and U.S. Army Intelligence operatives. Such people may be caught in a conflict between obeying request from (what they think is) the Masonic Order, and concern for the life or well-being of a family member or close friend.

Witnesses are often astounded at what the media reports as their statements, but have no chance to correct these intentional distortions or errors, and usually fail to understand the subtle nuances or scientific reasons for such misrepresented details. Most witnesses are "little fellahs", whose 'day in history' may be transfixed by that one sensational, electric event. If it is made to seem fantastic at the outset, who is going to believe their attempts to correct the distortions?

VICKI LANDRUM, ET. AL.

An example of the 'little fellah' premise I laid out in Chapter I, Vicki Landrum is a persistent, consistent, sticker to the truth. I first heard of her story around 1989 or 1990, near the time of a hearing on her incident, in Washington, D.C. The news report I heard was made around nine years after the incident occurred. The incident stuck in my mind, not only because I have so many relatives in the area where it occurred, but because I had good reason to believe there was a better, truer, story underneath the usual distortions. Some trustworthy relatives had confirmed that it was 'real'. In fact, the government would be hard pressed to cover all the relatives and other reliable contacts I could martial in that area. At the time I contacted her, Vicki Landrum resided only a few hundred yards from my sister's house, and the saucer entourage passed through areas peopled by some of my other relatives. So, despite the phony version of the incident which I had recently seen on the "Unsolved Mysteries" T.V. program, I retraced prior investigators, and determined the purpose of their lies.

I sought out Vicki Landrum in late 1992, and had some trouble finding her, even with the assistance of some of her family members, including her granddaughter. Army Intelligence had already sent a man to check me out at my sister's house, even before I decided to contact Vicki. Once located, the situation I found was not a pleasing one. If Vicki Landrum was a "sensation-seeker" who persisted in her story for profit, as rumors had it, she certainly hadn't done a very good job of it. It was easy to spread local rumors, intended to taint Vicki's credibility or motives, or damage her economic standing in the community, and I found her to be a good woman, not so different from many of the people in my own family. Her health—and wealth—had been damaged by her own government, which had subsequently misrepresented and flaunted its irresponsibility, and trashed Vicki's dignity.

There was very little if any accurate information published on Vicki Landrum before this book in 1993, after which OSI writers and film makers quickly glommed onto her, to obliterate what I said, with more falsified or distorted descriptions of the event. Since that time, Vicki has stuck to the truth and refused to lie like they want her to ....to say she saw 'little green men', "was abducted", or "suffered time loss". Because of this book—the first to expose the Big Lie Mind Control scheme to conceal saucer secrets—the Secret Government has had to rethink its strategy. They can't get around the Landrum/Cash sighting, because it was corroborated by so many other witnesses, and because the victims suffered real physical damage, and most of all, because Vicki hasn't played their game.

The place where Vicki lived was not a fashionable neighborhood, even for the area. It was a somewhat run-down apartment complex, the main office of which was gutted by fire. Some of the people there appeared to be of the borderline (if not actual) criminal type, and it was not a place for the faint of heart or weak of stomach. Neglected, dirty, ill-clothed children wandered about, as some of their parents sat in dingy and darkened apartments. After finding the burned-out shell of the office, I managed to locate the substitute office. I found Vicki only because I have conditioned myself to question everything. Everyone, including the manager, said she didn't live there, so I found her next door to a man who said she didn't live there and he'd never heard of her. Vicki's family was nice, clean, and quiet, out of place in the complex. The apartment was well lit and friendly, with family members cozily gathered about a table, engrossed in a board game. Vicki was a little guarded at first, but soon warmed up to me, because we had some common friends, including one of my old stump-jumping buddies, Richard. She was originally from nearby Louisiana, and was typical of many of her generation, having only a high school education, and a necessity to earn a living as a wage earner. Her fine looking husband was in his retirement years, having worked in harvesting and fishing for many years, and was still working.

In 1980, Vicki Landrum and her grandson, Colby Lee Landrum (then five years old), and Vicki's friend and employer, Betty Cash, were driving at night down a state highway in Betty's car, near Huffman, Texas, after leaving the store where Betty employed Vicki. They had the distinct misfortune of encountering a malfunctioning flying saucer, limping along just above ground, and accompanied by 24 U.S. Army Chinook helicopters, two by two, each sweeping the surrounding pathways with blinding searchlights, looking for potential witnesses and obstructions. The route through which the crippled saucer and entourage was moving, was a swampy, heavily forested, non-residential one, apparently chosen as the most clandestine route under the circumstances, en route to Louisiana, probably back to a base for repairs.

The Chinook helicopters—the large ones with twin rotors—were probably present in case the saucer should have to be "freight-'coptered" back to the base in a harness, in the event it became completely disabled, or may have carried troops necessary to cordon off and secure the area, in case it crashed. The idea also seemed to have been that, with so much commotion created by the 24 helicopters, with blinding search lights and blasting air, in the dark of night, who would notice the saucer?

Electrical energy leakage from the saucer's lower section enflamed the air as it arced to the ground. The helicopter engine roar, prop blasts, and blowing leaves were confusing, deafening and tumultuous, and the lights, flames and radiation created an eerie, frightening, dangerous, and disorienting effect, as the saucer landed on the narrow black-topped roadway, just in front of the car. Vicki grabbed her grandson and bolted from the car, only to be forced back by conditions outside which were even worse. In the few seconds that Vicki and five-year-old Colby Lee were outside, the metal of the car had heated to a sizzling temperature. As Vicki reached for the door handle, her hand was burned. She then use a part of her plastic jacket to open the door, and it was melted. She still had the damaged jacket when I interviewed her. Vicki's hand print was still burned into the dashboard of the car, where she touched it inside. Only microwaves or electrical induction could have heated the car so rapidly and only penetrating radiation, such as ultraviolet, gamma or X-ray, could have caused the radiation sickness and resultant hair loss suffered by all parties, including Betty Cash, who didn't even leave the car. The following photo was taken to replace those stolen from me, showing Vicki Landrum and her burns:

The type of burns perceptible on Vicki's head, in this small photo, are all over her body. They were caused by Tesla's invention, as stated by him, in the article THE PROBLEM OF INCREASING HUMAN ENERGY, (The Century Magazine, June 1900):

"THE FIRST PROBLEM: HOW TO INCREASE THE HUMAN MASS - THE BURNING OF ATMOSPHERIC NITROGEN": "...The flame grew larger and larger, and its oxidizing action more and more intense. From an insignificant brush discharge a few inches long it developed into a marvelous electrical phenomenon, a roaring blaze, devouring the nitrogen of the atmosphere and measuring sixty or seventy feet across."

Vicki, Colby Lee and Betty all experienced microwave (infra-red) radiation burns over their entire bodies. The electrical discharges, which ignited the oxygen and nitrogen in the air, were probably responsible for secondary radiation in the form of ultraviolet or X-rays, which caused them all the total loss of body hair. Little Colby Lee—probably due to his tender age—suffered more severe radiation sickness, and had to endure a great deal of embarrassment and inconvenience, having to wear diapers throughout his elementary and most of his junior high school years, due to the acute and continuous diarrhea he suffered as a symptom of radiation sickness. The radiation burns on Vicki's body are still plainly visible. Colby Lee's diarrhea eventually subsided. At 19 he graduated from Dayton High School. They will suffer for the rest of their lives.

The 24 helicopters were corroborated by a Dayton policeman, a Mr. Walker, who, at the time of the incident, was near Crosby, Texas, where he witnessed the same passing convoy. Vicki has always maintained that she saw a government flying saucer and other aircraft, involved in an "...experiment which had gone wrong", damaging the three of them. Vicki was directly threatened by F.B.I. agents, and a Pentagon official, a Colonel George C. Sarran, who threatened Vicki, first in Washington, D.C., and later by phone, telling her to "...shut up or else...", with the further threat that unless she did shut up, she would be unable to earn a decent living again. (This same threat has often been used and enforced by our secret government against others, including myself.) The only 'official' person to 'appear' to lend any aid, was John Schussler, of N.A.S.A, in nearby Pasadena. He was purportedly fired for continuing to support Vicki's story, but the 'firing' was only to create cover for his new job with the O.S.I. shamsters, as a disinformationist/pseudo-'turncoat' from N.A.S.A. Schussler was only conning Vicki and spying on her. His new job attempting to convince gullible people that the "aliens are here", uses his former N.A.S.A. credentials to create pseudo-credibility. Vicki was under the false impression that Schussler was her friend in 1992, but should know by now that he wasn't.

Texas senators Lloyd Bentsen and the late John Tower, managed to refer Vicki and Colby Lee for treatment at the Scott-White veterans' hospital in Temple, Texas, but they were so rudely mistreated there, that they were forced to leave. In 1985, Betty, Vicki and Colby Lee filed suit for damages. My facsimile clipping follows:

U. S. Contesting Lawsuit Over UFO Radiation

Houston

Three people suing the federal government for $20 million say they do not know to this day what it was that hovered far over their heads and zapped them with radiation almost five years ago.

They claim it was an unidentified flying object that was escorted away by military helicopters. They say they suspect it was a secret U.S. Military experiment. In any event, they sway, the government should have warned residents that a UFO was in their area.

The military says it had nothing to do with the alleged occurrence Dec. 29, 1980, on a rural road north-east of Houston. Even if there were UFOs, a U.S. attorney says, the government has no duty to warn people about them because the government does not know whether they are dangerous.

With such straightforward arguments, the government is urging U. S. District Judge Ross Sterling to throw out a lawsuit filed here last year by former Dayton, Texas, cafe owner Betty Cash, 56, former waitress Vickie Landrum, 61, and Landrum's grandson, Colby Landrum, 11.

The suit claims that about 9 p.m. on Dec. 29, 1980, while headed for their homes in Dayton along a two-lane road about 30 miles northeast of Houston, the three encountered a brightly glowing craft the size of a city water tower. It hovered at treetop level, had red and orange flames flowing from its bottom, and bathed them in intense heat for several minutes before it was escorted away by at least 23 helicopters, they assert.

Their lawsuit, filed under the Federal Tort Claims Act, claims that the government failed to warn them of the UFO and "negligently, carelessly and recklessly" allowed it "to fly over a publicly used road and come in contact with the plaintiffs."

As a result, all suffered stomach pains, vomiting, diarrhea, radiation burns, deteriorating eyesight, and the women's hair fell out and grew back with a different texture, the suit claims. It also says they became highly sensitive to sunlight, suffered blisters and headaches, and that Cash developed breast cancer.

Despite the plaintiffs' report that there were no markings on the "large, unconventional aerial object" or on the helicopters, the lawsuit has recently moved from simply suggesting that the government merely knew about the UFO to saying that the government owned the UFO.

The government has offered affidavits from high-ranking officials that it had nothing to do with the UFO.

Dallas Times Herald

U.S. District Judge Ross Sterling (coincidentally, my distant cousin) dismissed the suit with the right to refile, and I believe it was refiled, and on last report, was still pending. Vicki's attorney, Clyde Ford, Jr., is married to my third cousin, though this fact does not necessarily mean I endorse him, though it seems that his work here has been commendable. He is a former professional with Convair, Atlas Missiles, and General Dynamics, an excellent background for a plaintiffs' attorney in this suit.

At the time of my second edition, Vicki Landrum, Colby Lee Landrum, and Betty Cash, had never been compensated, treated, or indemnified for their losses or injuries, which certainly related to the dire and mysterious circumstances as I found them. Who knows what future medical problems await them? The government, as the proximate cause of the troubles, callously ignored and mistreated its victims, and breached its responsibilities.

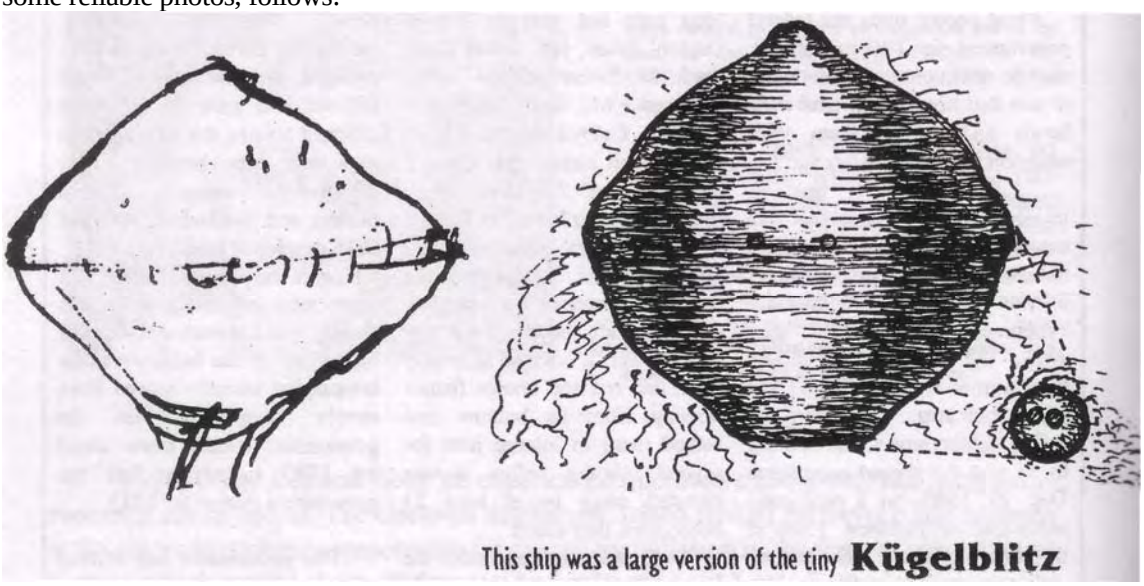
In 1989, hearings on the incident were scheduled in Washington, D.C. Vicki, on their request, went to Washington for the hearings, at her own expense. There was only one brief hearing session, at which the government admitted that the operation was one of their 'experiments which had gone wrong'. All the remaining hearings were postponed and finally cancelled, as Vicki waited in Washington until completely broke, after which she returned home.

Based on my talk with Vicki, and Vicki's description and drawing, the saucer had a dulled, darkened, metallic surface (indicative of stealth technology), and was shaped rather like what Vicki described as an "ice cream cup shape" or "diamond" shape. Vicki's drawing, made on my request, placed alongside the same type saucer shown in some reliable photos, follows:



The use of Army Chinooks, when Air Force, Marine, and Naval aircraft were available in the area, suggests the "city water-tower-sized" ship was an Army or Special Forces troop-carrier, battle 'saucer, or ground weapons control ship. The air was inflamed by electrical discharges which, because the saucer was apparently malfunctioning, were being emitted from the bottom of the limping saucer, each time the pilot attempted power up to become airborne. The discharge 'leakage' about the bottom, which arced to the ground via Vicki and company—probably attracted by the metallic car—drained the energy required to maintain 'buoyancy', grounding and draining the electrical activity necessary to compress the ether carriers and block the gravitational effect on the bottom, to maintain proper flight of the already crippled saucer. The ship was probably experiencing internal dielectric breakdown of essential electrical components. The presence of the car in close proximity to its path, at the time it was crossing above the road, only made matters worse, by forcing the saucer to make a landing on the road, until the car was moved away from it so it could take off again. Under the circumstances, the pilot could not fly more than a few feet above ground, since further internal damage or a sudden loss of power at a higher altitude might have caused the saucer to smash into the ground with sufficient impact to destroy it and its crew. They couldn't just leave it parked. The convoy should have been preceded by a scout copter, to clear the way and make sure civilians were not harmed.

The show which the T.V. production, "Unsolved Mysteries" aired on this incident, was false and exaggerated. Vicki never reported seeing "rotating lights" or a "spinning saucer" at all. The media also falsely stated that Vicki had reported seeing "little green men", or "space beings" through the "saucer's windows". This was an outright government lie. Vicki saw no windows. Red lights seen by Vicki were a horizontal row of stationary discharge electrodes, mounted in an annular line about the middle of the ship. These "lights" (actually emission electrodes) were activated in sequence, one after the other, in one direction around the ship, creating the illusion of rotation. These reddish pulses of current neutralize the "precession problem" I mentioned in the Introduction, by creating a rotation of counteractive force in diametric opposition to the precessive force, thus stabilizing a ship so the pilot has a steady view of the outside.

The government's covert Ufology lunatic fringe contingency tried to discredit the sighting for the benefit of their pseudo-skeptic counterpart, with the silly lie that the ship was an "alien flying saucer" being escorted to a "meeting between aliens and our leaders". (BIG LIE RULE NO. 1: MAKE THE LIE BIG ENOUGH). Such scenarios are often accompanied by fabricated environmentalistic bullshit, such as a desire by "aliens" to "bring us Earthlings to our senses", etc., because our "misuse of technology threatens the whole universe". Give us a break! If the entire earth or solar system were to suddenly vaporize itself in a thorough and complete nuclear explosion, the total effect would be less than that of a flea farting in a tornado.

It is also interesting to note that Whitley Strieber, in his books, or Budd Hopkins, in books such as "Intruders", never mentioned Vicki Landrum, et. al., even though Landrum said they had interviewed her. She said she adamantly refused to say "...what they wanted me to"—that she'd seen "aliens", been "abducted", or "suffered time-loss"—and instead continued to insist that what she saw were "government aircraft", (including the saucer) and nothing more. This was apparently the reason she was threatened, slandered, and never compensated for her health damage and losses, by our wonderful government. It is obvious as to how most witnesses are induced to say what their interviewers want them to, but not Vicki, a tough little lady who deserves respect.

RADIATION DANGERS

Regarding Vicki Landrum's radiation burns, the "flames" described by Vicki are 100% consistent with what Tesla described, as he developed this technology,[15] as follows:

"THE FIRST PROBLEM: HOW TO INCREASE THE HUMAN MASS - THE BURNING OF ATMOSPHERIC NITROGEN: "...The flame grew larger and larger, and its oxidizing action more and more intense. From an insignificant brush discharge a few inches long it developed into a marvelous electrical phenomenon, a roaring blaze, devouring the nitrogen of the atmosphere and measuring sixty or seventy feet across."

---

[15]Nikola Tesla, The Problem of Increasing Human Energy, The Century Magazine [June 1900].

I should also point out that the public is grossly malinformed and misinformed regarding potentially "dangerous radiation". I suffered serious radiation damage after my 13th year, so I speak with some experience. In spite of the fact that I am 6' 3" tall, my growth was stunted in my lower legs by perhaps 4", by radiation. Sound crazy? Read on.

In 1951, in my 13th year, my father wanted me to take an "uptown job", outside our own business (which I sometimes ran when my family was absent). He wanted me to meet the rest of the "business community" in our town at large, beyond the confines of our own business sphere. That was the year my 'growth spurt' occurred. I got a job at a Dunlaps Department Store a few blocks away, sweeping up the store. During rest breaks, I would often go to the shoe department, where I would stick my feet into an X-ray machine used to check out shoe fits in vitro, studying the bones of my feet and toes. The machine was called a "fluoroscope", which used 'soft' radiation, tuned to cause the bones to fluoresce, and to produce an image on the screen, as one viewed his or her feet. During the time I did this, I apparently absorbed dangerous levels of radiation, which, as should be emphasized, were of the so-called 'harmless, softer' variety (i.e., below the frequency of "hard" X-rays, but above the general frequency of ultraviolet rays). Unbeknownst to me, the radiation was killing and mutating the red blood cell production tissue in the marrow of the bones of my feet and lower legs (remember what I said about the transmutation of elements below Atomic No. 19—such as calcium—in U.V. light?).

I soon began to experience so much pain in my feet and legs, that I had to quit the job. I lost weeks of school, laying in bed with strange fevers and leg and foot pain. I became anemic, had nosebleeds, and experienced several other related symptoms. The only explanatory diagnosis by local doctors for my mysterious symptoms, was "growing pains". I had to drop athletics for a year. My time in the 100 yard dash increased from 11 to 15 seconds. My lower legs became "bird-like", the objects of ridicule, as I struggled through my upper body, to make my sluggish legs move faster. My upper body continued to develop, making the disproportionate lower legs look even stranger. There was no medical connection made at the time by my doctor, as we were unaware that the machine at Dunlaps had caused my life-threatening symptoms. I still have problems from it, and have had discoloration around my feet and lower legs since my 13th year.

Though available to any kid or other person who happened to wander into the department store, the radiation was a dangerous, public hazard. Powerful cosmic radiation of very high frequency (the ZPR) penetrates our bodies all the time, passing even through the thickest lead. It passes clear through the earth without incident. Its frequencies are so high and wavelengths so small as to pass between the tightest of spaces within and between the atoms of even the densest of matter. It is when the wavelengths correspond to the resonant frequencies of our bodily atoms, that dangerous reactions occur. Relatively low frequency positive radiation of lowest energy, penetrates the clothing and flesh, and reacts with the calcium in our bones. The bone marrow in the lower body, in children, produces much of the red blood cells needed to maintain healthy life. As a child matures, these lower bones eventually stop producing blood cells, after which the bone marrow in the upper body continues to produce blood cells. At the time I was exposed to the Dunlaps fluoroscope, my body was already in transition to produced in my lower legs. I came very near to dying shortly after the incident. As best I could determine, I crossed the danger line of 'radioactive relaxation', in 1977, 26 years following my exposure. This period varies according to the radiation involved, in respect to the particular matter excited by it, so this was just an educated guess.

Ordinary matter which has been 'excited' by powerful ionizing radiation, may show no detectable outward signs that it can 'relax' at some future date, to produce 'synthetic radioactivity' which is harmful to anyone near it. This is one of the reasons the F.B.I. conceals a book I mention below, and Los Alamos refuses to sell lead which has been used for radioactive shielding, along with the fact that lead shielding may contain some radium atoms (as well as gold) into which some atoms may have been transmuted, by absorption of high energy radiation, during experiments. Since radium emits gamma rays and produces alpha particles of around 4.5 Mev ("million electron volts"), the lead could be very dangerous.

Before 1892, a Frenchman named Gustave Le Bon wrote a book on "synthetic radioactivity"[16]. This book related to the use of ordinary, non-radioactive elements, to create nuclear reactions, thus opening the way for safe nuclear power generators. The book was among those on the F.B.I.'s 'retrieval list', in its 1942 sweep through all U.S. public libraries, book stores, universities, and even private collections and libraries. A copy of the book formerly used by and available to Dr. T. Henry Moray, in his local Utah public library, was confiscated by the F.B.I. in 1942.

In 1943, when Moray was attempting to reconstruct his radiant energy generator of the 1920's (the 50 kw one), he sought the book at the library, and was subjected to F.B.I. threats. Nonetheless, Moray was able to surreptitiously procure three copies of the book from a friend who was a book dealer, for his private library.

Le Bon's book related to techniques 'rediscovered' by me in the 1970s, as well as to the kind of radiation which almost ended my boyhood life for no apparent reason. Similarly, particle beam devices employing ultraviolet laser concepts, in the hands of Secret Government CIA maniacs, are in my estimation the basis for "stealth murder weapons" being tested on cattle, for which the 'mutilations' are their removal of tissue from the cattle to test for organic damage effects. Such weapons, tuned to U.V. frequencies, will disable a victim's T4 immune cells, can cause death by "terminal pneumonia", other related organic failures, cancer (by destroying pl6 and p53 oncogenes), or tuberculosis[17]. This can also be called "A.I.D.S." or "hantavirus", since all these victims—including cancer victims treated with chemotherapy—once their T4 immune cell count drops below 250, will die of terminal pneumonia, brought on by "M.A.I." (Microbacterium Arium Intercellulare), the ordinary 'soil bacteria' we all carry in our systems. In healthy persons, these M.A.I, seek out and destroy cancer cells five times as fast as any known anti-cancer drug.[18]

Despite government misuse, "synthetic radiation" reactors—electric power generators using elements of low atomic number—are safer than any known means of

---

[16]Gustave Le Bon, The Evolution of Matter, publisher unknown [ca. 1890].

[17]Announcement by scientists, M. D. Anderson Cancer Center, Houston, Tex. [Jan. 20, 1994], concerning immuno-suppression by U.V. radiation.

[18]William R. Lyne, Stealth I: De-Population by U. V. Immuno-Suppression, The Leading Edge, Yelm, Wa., Issue No. 76 [Nov. 1994].

energy production, even coal or oil. My conclusions, based partly on my study of Blokhin's book (see bibliography), were further confirmed by my contact with an unnamed Mormon who experimented with and manufactured power generators based on Moray's generators. Unfortunately, Moray's theory and description of his radiant energy invention can't be trusted, as he apparently didn't know how it worked. In addition, he often used fake diagrams to conceal his work from prying government snoops, and the diagrams and drawings available do not provide so good an idea as my drawings do. Some of my designs combined ideas of Tesla and Moray, with some of my own. I conceived most of them independently, before I ever heard of Moray, whose plans bear no similarity to mine. I will give all these plans to the public in other books.

Though I created an "on-sale bar" for my universal rotary power transmission (Appendix A), by offering it for sale to the Japanese public in a 1991 newspaper ad, the appendix clearly bars anyone from patenting it.

My introduction to the 'unnamed Mormon' was mysteriously arranged by a man who sought revenge against the Illuminati, after they had arranged for him to be falsely accused, tried, convicted, and sent to federal prison for several years, for alleged S.E.C. violations, following the discovery by he and his friends of an ancient, revolutionary and simple piece of mining equipment, called the "Clute Machine", which had once threatened the Illuminati monopoly on precious and 'strategic' metals production and banking, many years before. After finding the old machine sealed away inside an abandoned Colorado mine tunnel, the group restored it to working condition. After news of their discovery leaked out to the Illuminati, the group was then Judas-goated into a criminally conceived and orchestrated federal entrapment scheme, involving the use of a federal con-man who wormed his way into their confidence. I will reveal the details of this simple machine in another book. It is already "public domain".

The typical coercive suppression of monopoly-threatening technology by the Illuminati, is carried out mostly under federal S.E.C. regulations, through judicial abuse which is seemingly unrelated to the technology it is used to suppress. When you think about it, this is practically the only convenient way for them to do so, other than outright brutal murder, which lacks the 'cover' provided by "color of law", though murder is at least more criminally honest and complete.

THE U.F.O. CLEANERS

In the early '50s, soon after WWII, my uncle, Angus Thomas Benton, Jr. ("Uncle A.T.") and his wife Ida, often watched flying saucers at night, as they patrolled the skies above the Intercoastal Canal, on the gulf of Mexico, within 20 miles of the Vicki Landrum incident, in Pasadena, Texas.

During the war, A.T. had been a crack antiaircraft gunner on the U.S.S. South Dakota (rear left deck, beneath which a Japanese kamikaze plane crashed and exploded just beneath his platform, killing many of those below deck, as A.T. blazed away, during the "Great South Pacific Turkey Shoot"). Later, the U.S. fleet took possession of the Nagato Maru, Flagship of the Imperial Japanese First Fleet, in Tokyo Bay, in 1945. A.T. was sent aboard in charge of a five-man crew instructed to collect and arrange worthy souvenirs, from which the officers were to take "first pick". Always one to practice fair play, A.T. took his own first pick, including Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto's 'sea glasses', a giant pair of binoculars originally made and presented to the admiral, practice fair play, A.T. took his own first pick, including Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto's 'sea glasses', a giant pair of binoculars originally made and presented to the admiral, who had a keen appreciation for photography and optical science. The glasses were one of twelve pairs made for the Japanese fleet, of which only seven pairs then remained, since the other five pairs had gone to Davy Jones' locker. A.T. dismantled the binoculars, threw away his clothes, wrapped the Nagato's battle flag around half the binoculars, and stuffed them into his sea bag. He paid his best friend to carry the other half, wrapped in his clothes. The Nagato was eventually sank in the Bikini Island hydrogen bomb test, in the '50s, Yamamoto (who purportedly died earlier in the war), with the assistance of an American-trained deaf mute, had used the glasses to read U.S. Admiral William F. ("Bull") Halsey's lips, as he gave commands from the bridge of his flagship, in an earlier engagement from which Yamamoto had wisely decided to withdraw. The binoculars could so magnify a person's face, eight miles away, that it appeared to be only a few feet away. One could also see the rings of Saturn, etc. A.T. and Ida used the giant woolen Battle Flag of the Imperial Japanese First Fleet, as a bedspread for several years (somehow in all this, there is the flavor of Bill Mauldin's Willy and Joe!). The souvenirs are now in the possession of my cousin.

After the war, A.T. and Ida started a cleaning shop in Pasadena, which they called the "U.F.O. Cleaners" (for "Undoubtedly Finest Offered"). A.T. placed Yamamoto's sea glasses atop the roof of his shop, where he and Ida watched the flying saucers at night, as they glided over the intercoastal sea lanes. A.T. said some of them appeared to have "quilted aluminum" on their bottoms. This apparently was the cris-cross ridge patterns of the early stealth technology, developed by the Germans during the wartime years for their U-boats, and adapted to the saucers.

Contrary to 'history', Admiral Yamamoto, Commander-in-Chief of the Japanese First Fleet, may not have been shot down over the western Solomons on Apr. 18, 1943, but may have secretly surrendered to U.S. Naval personnel near Guadalcanal, and been taken to a military jail in the Phillippines, were my neighbor, Antonio Sanchez, probably stood guard over him. When the admiral (Yamamoto?) told Tony in perfect English, that he was educated at Stanford, Tony asked him, "Then why you fight us?" Yamamoto (?) solemnly answered, "That was the most regrettable mistake of my entire career."

"STARS"

The most obvious sightings today, are right under your noses, if you live in certain areas of the country. For over 40 years, saucers have been 'placed' in the skies, locked into stationary positions by the inertial navigation system using the Peiltochterkompass, for use on the Nazi saucers as well as the rockets carrying neutron bomb warheads in the 1945 stalemate. The systems allow saucers to pose as 'stars' as they follow constellations across the night skies, testing new equipment and procedures, and performing experiments and surveillance on us. During the daylight hours, saucers are less visible, and are often concealed by heavy dark clouds which Dr. Wilhelm Reich called "DOR" ("Deadly ORgone Energy"). Such hoverings were documented in the early '50s by Reich, over his Maine observatory, using time-lapse photography with such skill that the government labeled them as "subversion" and "espionage". Reich's photos, which I have seen, revealed erratic movements of the saucers, in contrast to the background constellations which produced consistently parallel, curved streaks of normal stars and planets across the film, as the earth rotated. Since at the time, use of the guidance systems on saucers was still under development, and since the saucers were so electrically unstable, their presence in the time-lapse photos was starkly revealed because they emitted a different light spectrum, and made brighter, 'smeared', meandering blurbs, cutting across the background of fainter stars.

Though Reich—an Austrian Jew—held some rather leftist views, he would have been immediately snuffed by the Russian Communists, and certainly didn't work for them. As a psychiatrist, he viewed sexual repression as the primary cause of fascism. His experiments on what he called Orgone Energy, were the basis for the government's abuse of process under which he was not only incarcerated under allegations of insanity, but also held under a conflicting criminal charge of contempt, for violating a federal injunction against his work, which it was alleged constituted "illegal medical practices", pursuant to F.D.A. regulations.

Reich claimed there is an "Orgone Energy" ("ORGanic Energy"), which is a naturally-occurring, life-sustaining, environment-permeating ethereal energy related to beneficial negative ions, and that Orgone has its antithesis, "DOR" ("Deadly ORgon energy") , a toxic, life-endangering, positively-ionizing substance , related to the 'free radicals' often associated with cancer and other diseases, and manifested in certain types of heavy, dark clouds. He invented a device called a "cloud buster", a trombone-like sliding, variable antenna, which inductively grounded the DOR clouds and "erased" them, conducting their death-dealing energy into a container of water connected to the antenna. Purportedly, the water was converted into heavy water (deuterium). Reich also discovered that his cloud buster could disable UFOs (a discovery which evidently led to his demise).

Reich claimed that, in the presence of great amounts of Orgone energy, his instruments detected dangerous levels of DOR around his laboratory, despite 'radioactive shielding', when 1 gram of radium was placed there in a thick lead container. He at first blamed the dangerous effects on the radium, until his discovery of the flying saucers hovering continually over his lab. This discovery inflamed the government, and marked Reich for death, perhaps because he had stumbled across government "death ray" experiments on the public (including Reich).

Reich claimed the DOR from the saucers was used to create desertification. On October 10, 1954, Reich disabled two UFOs. On October 15, his associate, William Moise, proudly presented Reich's findings to Colonel Wertenbaker, Deputy Commander, A.T.I.C, Wright-Patterson A.F.B., Ohio. Though Reich believed he had "made contact with aliens", he had "made contact with the Pentagon" instead. He had stuck his head right into a Secret Government meat grinder.

On November 2, 1954, Reich embarked on an experimental expedition to Arizona, where he purportedly proved that, by use of his "cloud-buster" to remove DOR being placed in the desert environment by UFOs, grass grew a foot high in previously desertified soil. On return from Arizona, he was arrested by the F.D.A. and jailed in Lewisburg Penitentiary, for violation of an injunction, and was found dead in his cell on Nov. 3, 1957, a week before he was to be released. His books, publications and scientific literature were banned and burned.

In the '50s I saw a film made of Reich outside his Maine laboratory, as he erased a DOR cloud over a nearby body of water and some trees, using his cloud-buster. To his amazement, with the erasure of the cloud, a flying saucer was discovered hovering inside it. Reich's antenna apparently grounded the electrical system on the saucer, and it fell toward the ground, as he and his small film crew ran toward the downed saucer, knocking the camera over in the process and ending the film. The government has since stolen the film. The kind of saucer shown in it was of the same general type seen by me in 1953. It is my belief that either a "stealth ray-gun" or the corona discharges of the saucers creates the "DOR" effects observed by Reich.]

There have been many things written about Reich, much of which is disinformational. Though he made some important discoveries, Reich seemed to be unclear about what was happening, believing that what he was observing were "alien" saucers. It appears to me that Reich had either discovered a dangerous side-effect of flying saucers, or had discovered secret experimentation on the populace and the environment. I tend to think the latter is true, and I would not like to find out that saucers are inherently dangerous. I tend to think that the DOR was the product of intentional "population control" methods and "stealth weaponry" being tested or carried out on the general population and the environment by the Secret Government, since Reich was murdered to silence his investigation.

Saucers from Sandia and Manzano Bases usually proceeded to their initial night-time positions along my southeastern horizon, at about the same time each evening, in military fashion, despite the fact that sunset comes earlier in winter. The best visibility occurs seasonally, whenever the evening trips coincide with dusk...that time between day and night. In the brightness of full daylight in midsummer, a glowing saucer is invisible, while in the half-light of dusk, it is not only obvious, but usually shares the sky with no visible stars or planets to confuse it with. Many take up their positions right in front of cloud banks which are clearly visible along the horizon behind them at that time of the evening, before the darkness has caused the clouds to become somewhat transparent to the stars. It has always amazed me that people unquestioningly view these 'stars'—with clouds behind them—without realizing that clouds are never behind stars!

Saucers from Los Alamos (which is primarily engaged in scientific research), have usually taken up their positions further to my northeast, along the western slopes of the southern Sangre de Cristos, often over the outskirts of Santa Fe. Laser communications beams between the saucers and Los Alamos laboratories, can sometimes be seen, especially when there is mist or dust in the air. Those over the Pecos area to my east usually follow the constellations westward across the night sky where, after around 10 hours of flight, from positions just above the western horizon, they suddenly zip back to their bases just before dawn. The tell-tale things which obviate these saucers are: (1) The off-color (positive, ultraviolet) light spectrum on their bottoms; (2) the overall excessive brightness; (3) the 'hairy' (negative, infra-red) coronal brush fanning out from their tops; (4) the precession, causing excessive and 'overly regular' blinking; (5) the explosive, strobe-like flashes of electrical emissions from an 'anti-precession' stabilizing system (usually used when the saucers are moving slowly); and, (6) the bright red, green, blue, white and yellow emissions of laser communications devices.

These phony stars can be segregated from the real ones, by use of special photographic equipment, using spectrographic means to differentiate the radiation projected by them, or can be detected by amateur photographers by use of special films, filters and lenses, which are available commercially. Detection is also possible by digital analysis of video footage shot with telephoto lenses. At night, it is usually difficult to make out the surface details of these saucers, because of the obliterating contrast between the bright surface corona and the black sky, which defeats the eyes. That is the reason the best photos have been made in bright sunlight, which penetrates the corona clouds and reflects back off the metallic surfaces underneath. Dulled, darkened surfaces have been used, but the saucers still show as obvious silhouettes.

The alarming degree to which many people have become brainwashed is demonstrated by the fact that these saucers are in plain view at night, yet most people ignore them, accepting them as 'normal'. Many younger people (below forty) have never seen the sky any other way. Yet, in many cases, the behavior of the saucers is so outrageous, that only a fool would accept them as "stars", "planes", or "helicopters". They hover for hours, blinking, wobbling, flashing, meandering, beaming out multi-colored lights, and often jumping or shooting around, while numbed-out, intimidated, brainwashed people refuse to allow themselves to believe there is anything extraordinary or unnatural about them. I once pointed a large one out to a neighbor, as it hovered over a nearby government bombing range between Galisteo and Santa Fe. We then drove from Lamy, to Galisteo, across a dirt road to State Rd. 14, up to Santa Fe, then back to Lamy. We drove completely around it, while continually viewing it, yet afterward, my neighbor refused to allow himself to believe he had seen anything other than a 'star', even after I explained how and why one cannot 'drive around' a star!

Another characteristic I noted while viewing saucers many times, as they flew right over Santa Fe at night, is that they appear to imitate small planes, but they seem to have a problem with moving at the speed of a normal plane. If they move too fast, they make brightly glowing, tell-tale streaks, so must move 'too' slow to disguise this (about 20-30 m.p.h.), below the stall speed of a light plane. Some of the strobe-like flashes are not stabilization systems, but are used to hide the faint glows of the saucers' hulls. Also, the fact that it takes a 'slow-moving' saucer too long to pass over Santa Fe, while making no noise, is another dead give-away, especially when a saucer just 'parks' for a half hour or so over the southwest outskirts of Santa Fe.

I once pointed a saucer out to a tenant, as it soundlessly approached Lamy low to the ground from the east, flashing its laser communicators, as it went down not over 250 yards away. The tenant, named Kroy Rubin, was totally unable to relate to the experience as being real. In a couple of days, I heard rumors that a nearby rancher—Joe Miller—had complained that 'dogs from Lamy', or 'coyotes', had killed some of his livestock, within a hundred yards of where I saw the saucer land.

Since publication of my first edition in 1993, the saucers normally visible near my home began to diminish, as the government began to exercise more discretion. More recently, the number of saucers is only a tiny percentage of what it once was.

Shortly after my first printing, I discussed this book with Joe Miller, while attending a small annual community flea market in nearby Galisteo. Joe said he had four young bulls mutilated at that time, which were 'bloodless', with the usual precise, cauterized cuts, etc. The bulls appeared to be air-dropped back into the pasture. The rumor I had heard—that Joe believed "dogs" had mutilated his cattle—was a completely false rumor spread by the O.S.I. Joe said that he had never suspected "dogs" or "predators", since the 'mutilations' were clearly of human, government origin, consistent with the findings of State Police investigator Gabe Valdez, who had performed the investigation. Not only had I and Kroy Rubin watched a saucer go down on Miller's ranch, but had done so while it was either in the process of picking up Joe Miller's bulls, or dropping them back into the pasture. Since Miller is definitely among those like myself, who think Gabe Valdez has done a good job, he has been intensely harassed for over five years by the County of Santa Fe and the Sheriffs department, using any excuse. In 1995 they abused Joe and his wife, and eventually had to pay him considerable damages. The manner of continued abuse indicated that there was a concealed motive behind the abuse, which was not apparent from the circumstances, similar to how I was treated for so long.

I theorized a link between the legal abuse and Miller's corroboration of Gabe Valdez' investigation and theory, since I had been severely abused by the judicial and legal system under trumped up charges based on lies and tampered evidence, at the same time that ex-FBI agent Ken Rommel was conducting a mutilations 'investigation' through the Santa Fe D.A.'s office.

The multicolored laser communications system I observed on the saucer which landed on Miller's land was identical to what I'd observed in the mid south Atlantic in late 1974. This system on the saucers allows for multiple transmissions, as well as complex coding. Unless an observer is in alignment with the laser trajectory, he cannot possibly listen to it, or receive it, and then only if he has the special receiver. The combined or separate beams carry the coded or voiced communications, through modulations in beam intensity and intermittence. A receiver consists of a special scope with lenses, which receives and translates the beams, similar to an infra-red system. The communications system is very secure, outside of personal compromises, and traverses the problem of radio wave blockage or interference from electrical corona discharges from the saucer. The only draw back is the necessity for line-of-sight communications. Those having access are controlled by national security contracts, making them criminally liable and subject to severe penalties (even death) without hearing or trial, for a breach, under "national security laws". These procedures are unconstitutional, but the Trilateral Commission/Illuminati has never been hindered by that, and neither have the Masonic Order, the Jesuits, the Mafia, the K.G.B., the Mossad, or any other secret organization.

I observed this system in October, 1974, in the mid south Atlantic, en route between Savannah, Georgia, and Casablanca, Morocco, while aboard the Kraljevicka, one of the freighters of the Jugolinea, the socialist Yugoslavian national shipping line. Ironically, it was only a few days after I had met and shook hands with Trilateral Commission member Jimmy Carter, a former nuclear engineer and sub commander, as he campaigned for the governorship of Georgia, in the historic part of Savannah near the old Customs House, during a holiday, shortly before the November elections of 1974.

The weather was stormy on that passage, and since I have always enjoyed storms, I had walked out onto the left rear deck just after supper, to observe the sunlight, as it disappeared beneath a hole in the clouds toward the western horizon, on that October evening. I had been on deck for only a couple of minutes when I observed a flying saucer coming out of the clouds around a mile behind the ship. It took up and maintained a steady position, as it began to make laser transmissions, presumably to the ship's communications officer on the bridge. I observed these transmissions for around thirty minutes, before the saucer retreated back up into the clouds above it, as the golden light faded from the window in the clouds over the gusty sea. I sighed in amazement, then walked back inside. As I stepped into the hallway, three of the Yugoslavian officers came downstairs from the bridge at my upper right. The first man—the communications chief—was pushing a little telescopic antenna-like projection in on what appeared to be a small electro-optical scope he had in his hands, upon which I saw what appeared to be calibrations, code letters, lenses, and sensors. As the three officers saw from whence I came, they immediately slowed, and looked at each other and back to the scope, as the officer sheepishly placed it in his upper shirt pocket, and they walked on by, shaking their heads and mumbling pursed-lipped good-evenings, with some embarrassment.

At that time, N.A.T.O. 'war games' were occurring. Though Yugoslavia was not a member, they conducted 'sympathy maneuvers', rolling their tanks and divisions into place along the Soviet borders facing Russia. I knew that a helicopter coming from a ship nowhere to be seen, would not have stayed so long, or come from so far away, or have been taking such risks in stormy weather, way out in the central South Atlantic. 1,100 miles to land in either direction. It should also be remembered that Tesla was a native of Yugoslavia.

Though the Kraljevicka carried the red star of communism on its stacks, its crew and officers were at least 95% pro-capitalist. However, among all of the Mediterranean or Adriatic nations, socialist Yugoslavia was pitifully poor. Those lucky enough and enterprising enough to sail on the Judgolinea in 1974, had opportunities to engage in some profitable smuggling. For those not so inclined, it was like a sentence to prison, away from their families, with pay below that of their international capitalist contemporaries. One young officer, recently married, wanted to take his wife and defect, because he had spent only a couple of weeks with her out of his first two years of marriage. The socialist government required him to work for menial wages on the ship until he had 'repaid the state' for his engineering education. He was too naive and inexperienced to smuggle, but some young members of the crew were already making plenty of money without the benefits of a formal education, because of their 'supplemental' smuggling income. One enterprising young sailor, at the bottom of the totem pole, made fake soles for his shoes out of 'blonde Lebanese' and 'black Pakistani' hashish, wore them ashore and sold them, then brazenly waltzed back up the gang-plank in classy, new and dapper attire, and a pocket full of money.

The captain's pay was round $4,000 per year, yet he was obviously a closet capitalist who supplemented his income similarly, on a higher scale, judging by his smooth demeanor, and the car from Santa Fe in which he arrive at the ship, just before departing Houston. I would tend to think "Russian icons", since I knew the car belonged to a Santa Fe art dealer I knew, of Yugoslavian descent. I recently—over 24 years later--met his cousin in Santa Fe, so I guess my assumptions were correct.

One young crew member, whose ambition it was to become a successful, American-style rock musician, had to wear long-sleeved shirts to conceal the "Young Communist Pioneers" tatoo which he had foolishly allowed to be put on his arm during his earlier years, later concealed in shame, so that other crew members would not point at it and jeer. Only a small number of passengers or crew were K.G.B. informants or agents, as was obvious from their sour and bitter dispositions, and the way everyone avoided them, or behaved hypocritically in the presence of. The young Yugoslavians were generally hostile toward domination by the Russians, and proud of Yugoslavia's long tradition of fierce and heroic warriors. The ancient pride and traditions of seafaring Anatolians could not be so easily erased.

It is unfortunate that in the past few years since the breakup of the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia has degenerated into a war-torn region in which ethnic and religious groups have slaughtered each other, and destroyed many of the beautiful and historic old cities and towns. The root of this squabbling appears to be instigated by the Illuminati, primarily through religious leaders, while seeing to it that plenty of arms are supplied from outside. This is not a tradition of which Serbo-Croatian 'warriors' can be proud, for only warriors who fights for freedom against oppression can be heroes. Shooting your neighbors and their babies, then raping and mutilating their wives and daughters, is not heroic, but yet another black page in history which one would expect to find associated with Ghengis Khan, Stalin, or Hitler, not with the Serbo-Croatians of today's world.

Since this book has stirred up a renewed interest in "government flying saucers" in this growing area, with several new subdivisions nearby, the Secret Government is now being forced by the publicity into finding other areas further away from encroaching population, since people seem to be rediscovering the validity of their own eyesight.

THE MIND CLEANERS

As you may have noticed, the "space alien" propaganda blitzes come in periodic waves, on a regular basis, to continually revive in your mind the corporate lie they have already planted there, that space aliens are "here". As long as we, the tax payers, through our government, continue to supply the money for the personnel, scripts, and productions, Hollywood will continue to use our funds to brainwash and deceive us, under the guise of "entertainment". Lately, the Official Big Liars have settled down to a single 'type' of space alien, which looks suspiciously like an old comic book type, which conveniently also looks like a small human being actor, outfitted with a more easily fabricated costume, mask, and makeup; this also looks like the rhesus monkies of the "Roswell" and "MJ-12" hoaxes. The eyes are sunglass-type dark lenses, which conceal the actors' human eyes. This format was necessitated by the fact that some of the Old Big Lies had not only become difficult to fabricate in a convincing way (four arms, serpent skin, etc.), even for an increasingly more sophisticated audience, but also because a more "humanoid" type "space alien" format has proven to be more believable, and can be more easily faked by actors, makeup artists, costumers, and special effects technicians. The huxters can also point back to the corny Roswell hoax, minus the embarrassingly stupid photos, and, using the MJ-12 documents created in 1985 based on the 'standard' format, which harks back to the 'cynocephalus' rhesus monkies of the originally bungled Roswell hoax. They have returned to the Roswell hoax, like dogs returning to lick up their own vomit.

The scenario has progressed much further out in Nevada's so-called "Dreamland", at Groom Lake, where the government has set up almost an entire base for this fakery. There are some highly classified projects under way at the base, but due to its weird terrain and obscure location, the government also uses the base for one of its special misinformation centers, perhaps to emphasize its need to conceal the projects. Security agents specially trained in the hoax—like Bob Lazar—convince their curious victims on the outside, that they are "ex-employees" of an "Area 51" top secret government project, and go through incredibly complex and expensive manipulations, to convince "specially chosen" (i.e., gullible) suckers, that they are attempting to "alarm the public" about how "aliens from space are taking over". They drug the rubes, take them to a special part of their "secret base", and expose them to "things"—such as a fake little flying saucer with a tiny seat in it—designed to convince them that a small, non-human 'alien' had come to earth in it, so that the dupes will go out and "spread the word". Bob Lazar did this to a somewhat easy-mark gullible friend of mine, who is still unable to accept the fact that our government would go to such extremes to hide flying saucers being operated by it. The government even uses "designer drugs" in this brainwashing project, skillfully making suggestions under their influence, breaking down psychological resistance, and inducing very convincing hallucinations, while the victims remain unaware that they are under the influence of drugs. (Yes, I know what you guys are up to!) The fact remains that many people really want to believe such lies, right along with a lot of the other mystical baloney some people want to cling to, like an old Viking who can't stop swearing to Odin. The old Army "Mind Control" experiments support these hoaxes. That means that the U.S. Army and the intelligence community were probably conducting their original experiments for use on us for the CFR all along, rather than for use on any "foreign enemy". (See Walter Bowart's Operation Mind Control, and John Mark's The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate", for some more related background information.)

The basic thing drastically contradicting this scenario, is that anyone working in such a project—including Bob Lazar—would have a top-secret or higher clearance, and would now be in jail or dead, for violating the national security agreement they signed when their clearance was issued. He would be behind bars or worse, for merely confirming anything seen, known, or even suspected as a consequence of working there. This would happen especially if it were true that space aliens were visiting us, or were taking over. I signed a national security agreement in 1957, when I was only eighteen years old, and in those days, it was understood by most that the penalty could include an "executive termination order" (an order to assassinate a disobedient person).

Though I don't want to scare you, some unfortunates in the more distant past have been lobotomized, incarcerated in asylums and perpetually drugged or sedated, jailed in special prisons, illegally entrapped, falsely convicted and imprisoned, driven insane, crippled, given "dumb drugs", impoverished, had their marriages or families torn apart, turned into homeless persons or vagrants, totally intimidated, socially isolated, or had their credibilities ruined so that no one would believe them. Wilhelm Reich was arrested, incarcerated in an asylum, and murdered there. His arrest came only two days after a discussion he had with Einstein at Princeton, about his investigation at his Maine lab involving discoveries concerning flying saucers.

There seems to be more probability for legal protection today from the kinds of abuse which only a few years ago the government could get away with, while taking their impunity for granted, but the public is much less tolerant to such abuse today.

Consistent with Jefferson's adage that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance", we must forever question everything concerning flying saucers, gravity, and "extraterrestrials", and realize that the Secret Government is responsible for endless misinformation, overstatement and understatement (the "untruth, the half-truth and the truth-and-a-half). We should question outrageous claims of personal experiences which are obviously fabricated by liars, drug-induced dupes, nuts, or secret agents, and remember not to confuse them with legitimate witnesses. Something like "...I met space beings..", does several destructive things. It discredits legitimate witnesses by association, and thereby helps to conceal technology. If you have seen something which does not comport with accepted theories, and talk about it, be forewarned that "truth is stranger than fiction", and can damage one's credibility. Sometimes, too much truth, too soon, is more than most people can handle.

Insidiously, agents of the Secret Government pound away from every conceivable perspective. While some govenment fronts (mostly "UFOlogists") promote the paranormal, others, such as one led by Philip Klass, pose as debunkers, which I call "pseudo-debunkers", in support of the government, which 'officially' denies everything. Paranormalists, pseudo-debunkers, and government deniers form a triangle of withering crossfire, and triangles, as you should know, are strong, rigid shapes, unless they are composed of weak or brittle materials. Rationalists ought to occupy the side held by the paranormalists, who actually belong with the pseudo-debunkers, since their undisclosed ulterior agenda is the perpetuation of 'party-line' relativism (which Klass wouldn't dare have the guts to oppose), based on a Platonist epistemology. In truth, all three sides of the triangle are created and controlled by the O.S.I. The pseudo-debunkers are led by Philip Klass, ostensibly sponsored by the Smithsonian Institution, and Klass, the government spokesmen, and the paranormalists/UFOlogists are all restricted and controlled by the N.S.A./CIA/O.S.I.,

C.S.I.C.O.P. and the "pseudo-skeptic" movement, represented primarily by the Skeptical Inquirer magazine, and The Skeptic magazine, were created by the O.S.I./CIA to make inroads into the humanist/skeptic philosophical movement, and to covertly control it (as they had done with the Libertarian movement) because they correctly perceived a potential future threat from this quarter, represented by reasonable and analytical people like me. The following facsimile clipping, of March 9, 1991, (original in The Santa Fe New Mexican) announced a "debunking" lecture by Philip Klass, entitled "Bringing UFOs Down to Earth" (for which we already know what the conclusion was) as follows (emphasis mine):

UFO Expert To Speak Monday

A recognized expert on sightings of unidentified flying objects will give a public talk Monday at Los Alamos National Laboratory titled, "Bringing UFOs Down to Earth."

Philip Klass, author of four books on unidentified flying objects, or UFOs, said his talk will give the definitive answer to the questions: "Is the world being visited by strange craft from distant worlds? Or, has a large segment of the public, including even experienced military and airline pilots, become unwitting victims of myth and their imaginations?"

Klass is a founding member of a group called Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal.

The talk is scheduled to begin at 3:45 p.m. Monday, March 11, at the Physics Building Auditorium. The auditorium is on the first floor of building 215 in the lab's main technical area, about half a block west of Pajarito Road, south of West Jemez Road. A large wooden sign on Parajito Road shows where to turn.

The "questions" asked by Klass were really statements, in which he purported to arrogate to himself what "...even experienced military and airline pilots" saw, presuming that they were "...unwitting victims of myth and their imaginations." These pilots fly-almost every day, for thousands of hours, for thousands of days. What would they know about what they see? When you board an airliner, you place your life in their hands, but if you believed Klass, you would never ride an airplane again! Experienced pilots have years of training and experience interpreting what they see—weather patterns, cloud formations, other aircraft, velocities, directions, etc., etc.—and military pilots are trained to identify other aircraft and their flight characteristics very specifically. What do the hell do they know? Why, Philip Klass, who flies his CIA desk all over the world...in his dreams...knows more than the pilots do, right? The following facsimile clipping, from the Associated Press, concerns some reports of the 'unwitting victims" (emphasis mine):

Air force tracking UFOs

BRUSSELS, Belgium - This country's air force has joined scores of Belgians befuddled by hundreds of UFO sightings across night skies in recent months.

In the latest report, two air force F-16 jet fighters used their radar screens to track an object that, according to a military official, "exceeded the limits of conventional aviation."

Speaking at a news conference Wednesday, Belgian Air Force Col. Wilfried de Brouwer said the UFO dived from about 10,000 to 4,000 feet in two seconds. At the same time, it increased its speed from 600 to 1,100 miles an hour.

The Associated Press

What do these Belgian military officials, fighter pilots, and hundreds of reporting witnesses know about what they saw? Phil Klass knows better than THEY do, by golly.

Flying saucers are seen by pilots with good eyesight, flying in their vicinity—up in the sky—often from above. Klass has made a "paranormal claim" here again, that hundreds—even thousands—of separate people (including professional aeronautical experts) have "mystically" seen the same things, at the same times. And some of these people were airline pilots, military pilots, radar operators, etc.—recognized "experts" in what they do, which is flying, controlling, and identifying aircraft (really a bunch of bumbling amateurs, in comparison to Klass, wouldn't you say?).

These were not members of some fanatical religion, witnessing an "apparition of the Virgin", etc., but certified, professional, experienced, aeronautical experts, required to pass high level visual and spatial perception tests, who are constantly tested for signs of psychiatric problems, whose experience is relied upon by thousands of people. Klass, on the other hand, has YEARS of experience, in his CIA office, of imaginary flights in his DESK, which, I'm telling you, really does some aerobatics, by golly (only in Klass's imagination).

Klass completely evaded the point, addressing only the allegations of paranormalists, as if they are somehow the ones mystically "chosen" to see flying saucers. Klass's allegations were completely unsupported by "physical evidence" that the people who reported the sightings were making any paranormal claims, or that they believe in anything paranormal whatsoever. By Klass's own standard, his claim was a knowingly false, fraudulent claim, more appropriately called a LIE.

Who is the "unwitting victims of myth and their imaginations"? Klass definitely fits the mold of his own statement. C.G. Jung would call this a "projection" (of Klass's mental fixation, neurosis, psychosis, or aberration, which he "projected"onto hundreds, thousands, or even millions of other people, as if it were THEY who in fact had his problem). Klass (and his O.S.I. mentors) sociopathically chose the paranormalist element—which had absolutely nothing to do with this situation (except they were created by the CIA, the Nazi SS RSHA, and Hans Horbiger) because it represented a weak and irrational position—a 'straw man', set up to be knocked down—intentionally "designed' to give 'mystical' and irrational significance to particular events. Thus the CIA covertly created the opening into which their pseudo-skeptics inserted the 'wedge' of pseudo-reason.

The paranormalists were created by and are clandestinely controlled by the same "forked-tonged' O.S.I. intelligence agency which handles Klass, and harks back to Reinhard Gehlen's Amt VI SS RSHA, which formed the core of the new CIA/O.S.I. in 1946, and as such, was the Nazi 'standard bearer' of Hans Horbiger's parapsychology straw man' in this hoax. The Nazis were the designers and trainers of Klass' pseudo-skeptic C.S.I.C.O.P. program, which is more parapsychological than any of those who made the claimed sightings, because those of C.S.I.C.O.P. SAW NOTHING, because THEY WEREN'T THERE, and presented no evidence of paranormal claims.

As the following clipping shows, Klass drew a 'packed audience' in the 'captive audience' government town, Los Alamos. Most of the audience were instructed by their supervisors to 'be seen' at the lecture, 'or else', in military fashion. Too bad Klass couldn't wave his magic wand and make the burns and radiation poisoning suffered by Vicki Landrum, Colby Lee Landrum, and Betty Cash go away. That is "physical evidence" of the most severe kind.

Klass, pretending to rely upon an Aristotelian epistemology, contradicted himself, and dishonestly deceived his audience with false arguments which begged the questions that "UFO sighters" believe UFOs are extraterrestrial, that they believe in "ghosts" and "the paranormal", and that they are 'chosen' because they believe in ghosts and aliens. These claims by Klass are "paranormal". Also, since Klass believes in a "supreme being" according to recent news articles, he is a "closet paranormalist", by his own standard. I certainly don't believe in ghosts or any other paranormal crap, but I have seen many saucers. These errors, which clearly show Klass's dishonesty, are the false assumptions upon which Klass's entire argument rests, and a false assumption used to win an argument by fraud, is an unforgivable crime to any true skeptic like myself.

In the second column, in which Klass refers to "physical evidence"—which he says is ALL man-made—he inadvertently admits that ALL flying saucers are man-made. Klass must deny that he has ever seen a flying saucer, because, were he to admit seeing one, logic would require him to agree with this book, based on the MOST RATIONAL ASSUMPTION. The following is a facsimile copy of the news clipping from the

Albuquerque Journal, which covered Klass's lecture in Los Alamos, as follows (emphasis mine):

UFO Sleuth Tells Audience Explanations Down-to-Earth

By Rex Graham
JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

LOS ALAMOS - Believers in UFOs hate Philip Klass.

During a colloquium Monday at Los Alamos National Laboratory, it was easy to see why. The Sherlock Holmes of the UFO world said craft from outer space simply don't exist.

In a one-hour talk at Los Alamos, Klass used sarcasm and careful explanations to deflate the authenticity of UFO sightings around the country.

In one case, several people hundreds of miles apart reported seeing a cigar-shaped spacecraft on March 3, 1968. Klass explains that a Soviet rocket that had been abandoned in space burned and glowed as it streaked across the Midwestern sky that night.

One woman who sighted the phenomenon claimed it made her dog shrink to the ground in terror. Klass said it was cold that night and the dog was whimpering from the temperature, and explanation greeted with laughter from the audience of mostly Los Alamos scientists.

"There is not a single piece of physical evidence, a single piece of metal that could not have been made in this world...not a single photograph that will hold up under rigorous scrutiny," Klass said to about 300 people attending the special director's colloquium.

The auditorium has 182 seats, which were all filled. About 120 people sat in the aisles or stood.

Klass, who for 35 years was senior avionics editor with Aviation Week & Space Technology magazine, recounted what appeared to onlookers, pilots and UFO proponents as spacecraft. But he gave simple explanations of events that he said eyewitnesses filtered through their imaginations.

All UFO sightings can be explained, he said, as meteor fireballs, abandoned spacecraft burning up as they fall back to Earth, ball lightning, or even retail UFO kits such as hot air balloons with flares attached.

Klass spends 20 to 40 hours a week investigating reported UFO sightings and is recognized as the nation's leading expert in critical scientific investigations of UFOs. He's written four books on UFOs, including, "UFOs: The Public Deceived."

"(Klass) is hated and detested by UFO believers." said Kendrick Frazier, editor of Skeptical Enquirer magazine, in a telephone interview from Albuquerque. "He comes up with powerful evidence to puncture holes in their claims."

In a June 1990 Gallup Poll of 1,236 adults, one in four said they believed ghosts, and one in seven said they had seen a UFO.

Klass said 98 percent of UFO sighters honestly think they have seen one.

He reserves caustic criticism for authors who fan the flames of UFO mythology.

In a review of a book titled, "Out There: The Government's Secret Quest for Extraterrestrials" by former New York Times reporter Howard Blum, Klass unleashed his trademark blasts. "Blum has written a book that is essentially fiction and labeled it non-fiction," Klass said before his talk at Los Alamos.

It is evil how Klass systematically mixes indisputable facts—such as, that we know of no thing which is not man-made (second column, paragraph two)—with the begged questions of paranormal claims not made by the "sighters", and which Klass could have no knowledge of, because he had no evidence to support such a lie, and would have produced it if he had it. As for the "cigar-shaped spacecraft" sighted on March 3, 1968 (column one, paragraph four), the shape of such an object, seen high enough in the sky to represent the point at which it entered the atmosphere, would not be visible as "cigar-shaped." Besides, I myself have seen similar craft.

On the evening of January 26, 1996, at the Ten Thousand Waves Japanese Health Spa, on the western slopes of the Sangre de Cristos Mountains, above the city of Santa Fe, at approximately 7:00 o'clock p.m., as I sat in a hot tub with several others, I met a young woman who had read my book, just as I spotted a "blinking" aircraft moving slowly above the mountains, about 10,000 feet above our position. I said to her,

"Speaking of flying saucers, there's one right there," as I pointed to it. A heckler across the tub said, "Aww, that's a plane." 1 answered, "If it's a plane, then why did it just park? ....and there's another one right there."

As everyone looked at the two "blinkers", which had just "parked", I said, "The reason for the flashes is to conceal their underlying glow, which you can't see because you eyes don't have time to recover between flashes. When they move faster, they glow brighter, which is why they are going so slow."

At that very moment, the ship on the left lit up a dark green, soft glowing color, as it took off in a large circle which took it right back to its previous position, where it stopped on a dime, and returned to its small, "flashing aircraft" mode. As it was flying in the circle, I asked, "Does everyone see that thing?", to which they all said "Yes!", as I followed it with my arm and pointing finger. It took about ten seconds, and the circle was about thirty degrees across, so at 10,000 feet, it was doing about 2.000 m.p.h. At arm's length, it was about 1" long, and about 3/4" wide, so that means it was about 400' long and 250' wide. It's thickness, based on a proportional estimate, was around 50'. The ship was virtually a five-story building, having the size and shape of the space at a football field with the track around it. It was lenticular in shape, like a lozenge, with rounded edges. The following is a copy of a painting I did of the ship:

There was a 'dark space" around its immediate periphery, beyond which there was a purplish "Tesla corona", which extended out for some distance in advance of the ship, and fanned out along the sides as it moved through space. A ship of that size would be large enough to carry a whole battalion.

When the word reached Richard Sauter[19], another writer, that I'd seen the ship, he called me up from Flagstaff, Arizona, and asked, "Bill, what's this I hear about the 'alien grays' and their underground base under Santa Fe Baldy?" My answer was, "Richard, don't give me this shit. I see you've sold out to the alien liars."

In 1961, some friends of mine, oil operator George P. Parker and his wife Margery, of Midland, Texas, and her brother Gordon (an F.A.A. official) and his wife, told me about the time they decided to 'innocently' walk into a box canyon ("Manzano-Coyote Canyon"), called "Manzano Base", near Kirtland A.F.B., in Albuquerque, back in the early '50s. Their plan was to pose as casual hikers, so they could check out rumors of a government flying saucer base there. Like another friend, the late Bob Guthrie of Santa Fe later experienced, they were surrounded by troops carrying star wars weapons, as a row of flying saucers hovered over them. In dire fear of their lives, they were ordered out, and instructed never to say anything about what they saw. The following facsimile clipping relates to 1980 sightings at Manzano Base (emphasis mine):

U.S. reports UFO sightings

ALBUQUERQUE (AP) - Recently released government reports tell of five sightings of unidentified flying objects near Kirtland Air Force Base in 1980.

But Air Force scientific adviser Jerry Miller says in the report that "no conclusions could be made whether these objects pose a threat to Manzano-Coyote Canyon areas."

Nearly all of the reports are of UFOs spotted in the vicinity of Kirtland Air Force Base and the nearby Manzano Weapons Storage Area. Coyote Canyon is a test area for the military.

Miller was an investigator for Project Blue Book, the Air Force's massive investigation of UFOs that ended in 1969.

Col. John Aday, chief of public affairs at Kirtland, said Project Bluebook concluded that UFOs are no threat to the national defense.

Aday said he had "no idea" what the 1980 sightings could have been.

"I could conjecture all day about what might have been going on out there, but I won't," he said.

The reports were kept secret until they were released in December through the Freedom of Information Act to the Mutual UFO Network, a Texas-based UFO study group. The reports describe the following sightings:

- On Aug. 8, "three security policemen...on duty inside the Manzano Weapons Storage Area sighted an unidentified light in the air that traveled north to south over the Coyote Canyon area of the Department of Defense Restricted Test." The guards saw it "take off and leave proceeding straight up at a high speed and disappear."

- The next day, Aug. 9, a security guard at Sandia Laboratories observed a bright light near the ground in Coyote Canyon, the report said. He tried to radio for help, but his radio would not work.

- On Aug. 10, a state policeman saw a flying object land in the Manzano Mountains between Belen and Albuquerque. The report said that when he reported the sighting to Kirtland, he was told the Air Force did not investigate sightings unless they occurred on an air base.

The above clipping shows that Jerry Miller, a former Project Blue Book investigator until that program ended in 1969, was later re-employed in the 1980s as an Air Force "scientific adviser" (Air Force O.S.I.) at Kirtland, in attempt to dispel clear and convincing reports of government flying saucer work being done 'near' there. Of course Miller the O.S.I. man, copped out, saying he never investigated sightings unless they occurred on an air base! Manzano Base—which they also call "Manzano-Coyote Test (Base)"—had been a "star wars" super weapons base since the '50s, so was not specifically an 'air base' per se, and therefore 'out of his investigative jurisdiction.' "Catcha-22"!

[19] Richard Sauter, "Ph.D.", Underground Bases and Tunnels [1995].

It becomes clearer as to how these double-talk specialists are moved around by the government from one place to another, to sell the public the same kind of evasiveness, and how the evasiveness of Air Force "scientific advisers" (O.S.I. agents) are periodically enmeshed with the likes of Philip Klass and his C.S.I.C.O.P. and pseudo-skeptic ilk. It is Klass's CIA O.S.I. (Office of Scientific Intelligence) job, to pick up where Jerry Miller, of Air Force O.S.I., left off, to 'interpret' (i.e., "debunk") the legitimate sightings of the public, as well as those of guards, air force personnel, state policemen, airline pilots, and certified civilian aeronautical experts, as the result of "over-active imaginations" and "paranormal beliefs". If there is an active imagination at work here, I think it is the imagination of Klass and his ilk, in inventing new false arguments and BIG LIES to counteract the evidence of the personal experiences and 20-20 sightings of seasoned airline pilots and radar operators.

Most of the Platonist mysticism attacked by Klass and his pseudo-Aristotelians, is induced or spread by corresponding Platonist government-funded counterparts, the paranormal front groups, which descend from the Cayce group originally set up at Wright-Patterson A.F.B., Ohio, in the early '40s, including Project Bluebook, to conceal saucer secrets and promote the BIG LIES, based on the original "parapsychology" of Hitler's guru and 'spiritual adviser', Hans Horbiger, the "father of parapsychology".

Georgi Ivanovich Gurdjieff—often confused with Grigori Gurdjieff, even by his own followers—was a deranged, mystical Turkish/Russian occultist[20], who was initiated by Sufi masters, before branching off to form his own twisted philosophy. Gurdjieff produced much suffering in the end, via his 'students', Dietrich Eckhardt and General Karl Haushoffer (Hitler's groomers), who were Gurdjieff s students, along with a host of other monsters. We know a woodsman by his chips, and Gurdjieff's 'chips' were all too often some of the world's host heinous monsters.

The modern Russian anti-Semitic movement seemed to germinate in this mysticism, along with totalitarianism. Decayed mystical philosophies are fertile soil for the growth of other unhealthy mystical philosophies. Almost all the top fascist and communist leaders of the 20th century were students of Gurdjieff, including Mao Tsedong, Stalin, and Ernst Roehm, the homosexual head of Hitler's S.A., who carried out the 'Knight of the Long Knives', the long march of "Kristallnacht".

The Baltic-born Platonist, Alfred Rosenberg, adapted Plato's heirarchy to Nazi society, emulating those in Plato's Republic, the Iron, Bronze, Silver and Gold, with the SS being the Golden "philosopher-rulers" at the top. This heiratic order was in turn derived from Chaldean-based Hermetic and Egyptian esoteric teachings, extracted by Plato from Egyptian and Assyrian sources a few years before Alexander's conquests. The duality so typical of the Nazis and the Trilateral Commission, is based on the myth in which Hermes and Aphrodite loved each other so much that they became one person, an Hermaphrodite. This relates to the Nazi troop management manual written by Ernst Roehm, the homosexual "father of the brownshirts" , who advocated a military "group identity" principal, erroneously alleged to be derived from Spartacism, including the idea that Spartan soldiers laid down on the battlefield and made love before battle, so they 'would fight harder for their lovers'. Roehm was executed by Hitler for turning the S.A. into a homosexual Nazi/Sparticist drag circus. Roehm's manual, based on Gurdjieff s "Synergy", was adopted by the U.S. Congress soon after WW II, as the official troop management manual for all U.S. military forces, which I believe has subsequently eroded individuality, causing progressively poorer performance of American armed forces. There is always confusion and misperception as to what "excellent" military performance is. Those who are impressed with the parades of spit-and-polish, goose-stepping jack-booted thugs in beautiful uniforms, marching in perfect precision, such as those in Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will—a propaganda film commissioned by Hitler—are bound to make the mistakes of history. Who won the war on the field of battle? Was it those who marched so prissy? No! It was American guerilla fighters who continued to fight when 'order' had broken down, at the Battle of the Bulge. The "Redcoats" at Lexington were mostly Hessians who marched and looked rather smart in their beautiful rank and file, but the Minutemen shot them like fish in a barrel. How could they miss?

---

[20]Michael Howard, The Occult Conspiracy, Destiny Books, Rochester Vermont [1989].

Before WW II, Hermann Goering was an "ecologist"—the Waldmeister—keeper of the Bavarian forests. In ecology, one specie is sometimes sacrificed for the benefit of another, in order to achieve a (teleological) "balance of nature". A forest is often "thinned out", because its population may be "too great". By construction, one can move the concept of ecology around to the human race, so they can be "thinned out" like "weeds". My point is that the kind of people who want to control the population—often attempt to convince us they are only interested in 'ecology', also making (insincere) overtures to entice our curiosities about decadent old secret mystery societies, maybe even appealing to ethnic, religious, racial or tribal sympathies—and are the kind of people who will tell you whatever it takes to motivate you at your own level, to support their plans, which may include the extermination of you as an "undesirable" or "expendable person", like a "human weed". I am appealing to your rational self-interest, since it is irrational to sponsor the extermination or enslavement of others, just because you are led to believe you will benefit from it, because sooner or later, in a criminal society, the business end of the gun moves around to you. The individual human life is the ultimate value because you are human.

The kind of people who want to talk you out of the validity of your senses, as tools of cognition, and to convince you that your life is just an illusion, while saying "all things are possible", are trying to trade you a bill of goods for your Bill of Rights. These same people do not want to improve the clarity of your thinking, or to root out and expose the high and mighty power rats who control our government. You will never hear them trying to take power away from the Trilateral Commission-C.F.R. bunch. They only want to throw a monkey wrench into the cogs of your mind, so you will never figure them out, and will do as you are told.

Refusing to believe what one sees is Platonistic and mystical, not Aristotelian and rational. Believing what you see, what you have good reason to believe is true, and what you have good reason to believe others have seen or know, is the rational, scientific approach. It is also reasonable to be suspicious of government truth-saboteurs who mix phony, pseudo-Aristotelian epistemology with Platonist bullshit. It is also rational to disbelieve the sleazy people who will lie for T.V. programs, claiming they were "abducted by aliens". A future plot's "germination" was revealed by a clipping of March 11, 1993, by Cox News Service.

A synopsis of the clipping is as follows: In rural Alabama, a 'documentary' film maker became a "police officer", while another "UFO professional" (Linda Moulton Howe) interjected her "expert" (O.S.I.) twisted opinion that "aliens" are responsible for "bloodless cattle mutilations" in Alabama, near Sand Mountain. Howe's officious covert CIA intermeddling was necessary to fabricate groundwork for her next government-backed film. In the Alabama back-woods locale, there was little of the type of official denials which relied on the "documentation" of ex-F.B.I. agent/federal grant huxter Ken Rommel (which attributed mutilations to 'predators'), with more credence being given to New Mexico State Police mutilations investigator Gabe Valdez' "secret government medical experiments" theory ("..Another theory: Government agents, flying in low-level helicopters at night, are killing animals and removing their organs to study the effects [testing for cancer and other diseases] on livestock living near high-power lines.").

Meanwhile, local skeptic and good ol' boy John Strawn of Albertville saw through the corn, but threw out the baby with the bath water, intimidated by the C.S.I.C.O.P. false accusation that seeing "flying saucers" equated with seeing "little green men". He mentioned a "swamp ape" rumor (Hapi?), probably spread by Nazi/CIA Egyptologists out of the N.A.S.A./O.S.I. center in nearby Huntsville—the "Peenemunde of America"—created by the Illuminist, Wernher von Braun. Again, through a fraudulent mixture of Platonist and Aristotelian epistemology under the "government agent theory" of cattle mutilations, "saucers" were disassociated from "mutilations", and "copters" were switched for saucers, in these sightings by a gullible, back-woodsy 'audience' in rural Alabama. My applause goes to the Cox News Service for a comparatively fair and objective article.

A 1993 example of false propaganda—an AP article in the Albuquerque Journal, of March 12, 1993—regarding Manzano Base (A.K.A. "Coyote Canyon", referred to earlier), stated that the government now calls the "...hollowed out mountain bunker complex" (the '50s 'star wars' flying saucer base in the Manzano mountain box canyon "an old weapons storage site" and "archive of top-secret parts from old nuclear weapons". The article further stated that only "last year", "nuclear weapons" were moved from there to a "new underground storage bunker" at Kirtland A.F.B.

Just before the purported "move" to Kirtland, it came to the attention of federal officers that New Mexico Land Grant heirs own the property in Coyote Canyon, and that the government never acquired title (an 'omission' previously ignored by defense department property procurement agents). Since even N.S.A. rules cannot authorize the U.S. government to claim title, except by proper purchase and deed from the grant heirs, the government's use violates the (international) 1848 Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and is in contempt of Congress, for a fraudulent breach of their trusteeship duties.

So—if the article is even partly credible—the Defense Department high-tailed it to Kirtland with its saucer/star wars paraphernalia, leaving the D.O.E. holding the bag, since the grant heirs now had a legal right to immediate possession of the base, as well as to recover damages for the wrongful ouster, illegal detainer, uncompensated use, and radioactive contamination.

ABDUCTIONS: TRAVIS WALTON VS. VICKI LANDRUM

On Nov. 5, 1975, Travis Walton, a young federal employee of the U.S. Forest Service in Arizona, and his fellow crew members, were leaving work just after dark, driving a pickup slowly toward Heber, over a rocky road through the isolated timberland of Sitgreaves National Forest, northeast of Phoenix. When they encountered a glowing, ovalesque, government flying saucer hovering within 20 feet of the ground, around 8 x 20 feet in size, they stopped the truck, and Walton walked directly toward the saucer, despite the fact that it had its warning beeper on. As Walton approached dangerously near to the saucer, the turbine whined, the saucer precessed, and Walton was struck by an electric arc which passed through him to the ground. Walton was knocked down and struck his head on rocks, causing a concussion, rendering him unconscious. This bolt of high-voltage, high frequency A.C. current, was the 'ether-blocking' current which Tesla used on the bottom of his saucers when hovering. Lucky for the drunk Walton that it was a Tesla current, the high frequency 'skin effect' of which did not really harm him, but must have startled him so much that he lost his balance, fell down, and hit his head.

As Walton laid there unconscious, his fellow crew members panicked and fled in the truck in blind fear. On realizing that Walton had been abandoned in an unconscious and injured state, the saucer crew picked him up and took him to a secret flying saucer flight training base infirmary. Government doctors kept Walton in an unconscious state, probably with chloral hydrate (a soporific), allowing him to regain temporary consciousness only for purposes of an "alien abduction hoax" they enacted, thus attempting to prepare him for later use as a 'witness'. Midgets—or what could have been children or small women—dressed in our standard 'alien' get-ups, stood about him as he awakened. Walton later initially reported hearing one of them speaking in a southern drawl, until they realized Walton was conscious and stopped speaking. Walton wandered about in a dazed state for a while, visiting a saucer flight simulator which was equipped with an astronomical projector, and saw three saucer types—ovalesque, rounded, and sauceresque—all "without angles" and constructed of polished metal. His description of the simulator's visibility and navigation system is consistent with the use of geodetic I.G.S. transponders for navigation, and electronic image converter tubes (I.R.), mounted in the saucer's surface, to project images of the outer landscape and cosmos onto a globular screen surrounding the pilot's seat.

Walton was then subdued and re-sedated by mute, normal-sized people (both men and women), disguised as "aliens" with identical long, dirty blond wigs, makeup, and clothes. Walton's description of the midget participants was consistent with the 'foam rubber masks' and 'sunglass-lens eyes' scenario, intended to hark back to the "Roswell" hoax.

This story bears certain similarities to that of Vicki Landrum, except for the phony aliens about which Walton now lies, and the fact that all the Walton incident witnesses were federal employees. Had Landrum gone along with the program, she and Betty Cash might be rolling in cash from 'their movie'. Nothing has been said recently about the "space alien with a southern drawl", since Walton's initial report. Perhaps that 'alien' was recruited in the Huntsville, Alabama area, by Wernher von Braun, unless they talk "southern" in outer space. You might be a redneck if you use your flying saucer for a chicken coop, and take your barbecue sauce with you on 'mutilations' missions.

Had Vicki Landrum and Betty Cash been more 'cooperative', we would undoubtedly be reading about their "abductions" or seeing them on the X-files, or Sightings. Their incident has become one nagging and persistent ache in the Big Lie program, ever since this book came out in 1993. Prior to that, The UFO Encyclopedia[21] at least admitted that Betty Cash had developed breast cancer, and that Vicki reported seeing a "diamond-shaped" ship, but added that it must have been an "...unshielded nuclear reactor" (since Betty, Vicki and Colby Lee all had apparent and indisputable radiations burns). A levitating, unshielded nuclear reactor? Sure sounds like a government flying saucer to me.

As stated previously in the Introduction, the process of concealment involves obliteration of the "Most Rational Alternative" to the two sets of Big Lies—those of the Klass Psychophants and those of the (George) Adamski Psychophants—so that the generally conservative public buys the first set, the lunatic fringe buys the second one, and the two mutually complimentary sets of lies fit tightly together to exclude reason. The "alien" and "paranormal" issues are so firmly attached to the " belief in saucers", that those who see saucers automatically believe they are seeing "space aliens". With this false idea firmly implanted in their minds, their hearts usually pound so hard in their throats and brains, that their perception is altered, as their imaginations conjure up pictures of pilots with large ("sunglass lens") eyes, large heads, and small noses and mouths, because they have been brainwashed for over 50 years. All they really see is a damned flying machine, flown by human beings, but the cunning interjection of the incredible possibility that aliens are involved, drives the 'quasi-realistic' people into the Klass position (that saucers don't exist), leaving the Adamski mystical masochists behind with the O.S.I, con-artists, as 'partners in martyrdom', while ridicule is heaped upon all witnesses, whether the false ones (the agents posing as irrational dupes), or rational and sane analysts such as myself.

Some government agents posture themselves in an 'anti-government' stance—to convince us they are legitimate seekers of the truth—to put the idea clear out of our minds that they might be government agents, telling whatever stories necessary to motivate dupes at their own levels. Doesn't it give you a nice warm feeling when you hear someone seeming to reflect your every belief...someone you can trust? This is supposed to make you believe whatever they say. Whenever you hear someone like that, question their motives, as they try to exploit you through your's. There is usually some contradiction between their conduct and their vested interests. For example, if Philip Klass really applied the stringent "test" which he says he does, requiring "physical evidence" for proof of the existence aliens OR flying saucers, then he wouldn't believe in God, because he doesn't have physical evidence to prove God exists either. I have physical evidence proving the existence of flying saucers in the form of my Peiltochterkompass. Vicki Landrum and company had physical evidence in the form of their burns and symptoms of radiation sickness, corroborated by the government's admissions.

The argument that the Klass ilk will never make, is that flying saucers are exclusively man-made electro-propulsive ships, and that the alien scenario is an orchestrated Secret Government fraud.

---

[21]John Spencer, The U.F.O. Encyclopedia, Avon Books, N.Y. [1991].

To finally clarify the design and methodology for the Secret Government mind-control conspiracy, I will identify and analyze a sort of eddy current effect, manifested by a syndicated newspaper column called Down to a Science, written by Keay Davidson of San Francisco, written from the perspective of the Klass Psychophants, from the Apr. 7, 1993 New Mexican, concerning the movie, Fire in the Sky, and another movie, Oliver Stone's J.F.K. The article is a small one, which fulfills an important function in a BIG LIE hoax (BIG LIE RULE NO. 2: TELL IT OFTEN ENOUGH). The clipping follows:.

N. Mex. 4/7/93

DOWN TO A SCIENCE

SKEPTICS CORNER: The new movie Fire in the Sky is doing bang-up business at the box office. But viewers should beware, our good friend Andy Fraknoi warns in a recent missive. One of the nation's best-known popularizers of astronomy, and a longtime leader of the Astronomical Society of the Pacific, Andy says the film's so-called true story of UFO abduction is, in fact, based on a "clear hoax." He reminds us of facts that have long been known to UFO debunkers — facts that have been downplayed by the film's promoters at Paramount.

For example: The film's protagonist — Arizona lumberjack Travis Walton — claimed UFOnauts kidnapped him on Nov. 5, 1975. That was only two weeks after NBC had premiered what was (at the time) the most famous movie about an alleged UFO abduction, The UFO Incident, starring James Earl Jones. Curious timing, no?

It gets stranger when you consider that during Walton's absence, his mother and brother seemed unconcerned. They told local law-enforcement authorities that Travis had been interested in UFOs prior to his "kidnapping." Also, he had urged them not to worry if he was ever abducted by saucer beings, because (he predicted) he would return safely! And Walton's credibility was questionable: Several years earlier, he and an accomplice had pleaded guilty to burglary and forgery. They got two years' probation.

For more details, go to your public library and read any of Philip Klass's many books. This veteran aerospace writer is the nation's ablest and wittiest UFO debunker, and he poked as many holes in Walton's fable as there are holes in Swiss cheese. And for a broader view of Hollywood's willingness to make money by twisting history, read Edward Jay Epstein's devastating critique of Oliver Stone's film JFK in the March issue of The Atlantic.

—Keay Davidson

The article is what will call a "triple-lie-repeater", and is a good example from the daily press of how the Secret Government persistently derails the most rational assumptions and manipulates the public, relying upon gossipy news writer dupes to spread repetitious propaganda designed to create bewilderment and confusion, and to orchestrate the staged fight between the Klass Psychophants and the Adamsky Psychophants, as co-conspirators who work together under O.S.I. direction, to dominate the forum, and to exclude reason.

Davidson co-authored a highly Big-Brother-Liar-touted book on the Really Big Bang[22], just chock full of the kind of powerful pseudo-science that one expects from the main author, who just happens to be employed at the Lawrence-Livermore Lab. Davidson is also involved with Klass, The Skeptical Inquirer magazine, and C.S.I.C.O.P. Taking Davidson on his face, he is incapable of discerning subtleties, and is a dupe of the pseudo-rational, polarized thinking of the Klass ilk, though I find it hard to believe that a 'scientist' could be so naive, or worse, stupid

None of this incessant propaganda deserves to be dignified by a direct response, or slightest iota of credibility. I am using specific types of hoaxes as examples of the design format and method for their implementation. Each of these hoaxes (such as Ken Rommel's New Mexico cattle mutilations pseudo-study), becomes "documentation" for other hoaxes, ad infinitum, thus eventually building up a massive 'preponderance' of phony "evidence" to back up one or the other of the two sides of the phony fight. When the fight dies down, they do something to stir it back up. The hoaxes contain mixtures of fact and fiction. The fiction is used to misrepresent the facts, while the facts are misrepresented as fictions, so that the Secret Government always "wins" in the minds of pseudo-rational people.

The two hoax counterparts are complimentary. The frantically defensive, paranoid and mystical posture of the alien-abductions huxters is designed to attract the Adamsky Psychophants and invite the ridicule of the Klass Psychophants, whose posture is designed to attract sadistic bullies and residual pseudo-skeptics, who taunt and incite the paranoia of the nuts even more. The overall effect is to alienate reasonable people from the debate, or to obliterate any appeal to sanity. The pseudo-skeptic dupes pretend to represent sanity, by 'blindly denying what any damned fool can plainly see'.

The Fire in the Sky story is a double hoax—a "hoax within a hoax"—like the Roswell hoax. The "alien" huxters and their news writers, on one side of the hoax, 'versus' the protagonists of the pseudo-rational Klass class, and their news writers—such as Keay Davidson, in this article—on the other side of the hoax, are counterparts to the same hoax. Whether witting liars or gullible dupes, everyone is used to create two deep ruts adjacent to one another, with no room between for rationality or truth. Both the initially bungled Roswell and Fire hoaxes were much later revised, one as the "MJ-12" hoax, and the other as the "Fire in the Sky" hoax. Originally, after Walton was rescued by the flying saucer crew, the government decided to turn the emergency into a hoax—pursuant to a policy already in effect—during which Walton got out of hand, saw more than he was supposed to see, and revealed most of it in his initial 1975 press, radio and magazine inverviews. This caused more harm than good to the intended hoax, so it backfired. This explains the 17-year silence before the "Fire in the Sky" patch-up job (they figured, how may people would have files so old?), similar to the 38-year lapse between the Roswell hoax and the MJ-12 hoax.

The second (Fire) hoax involved Walton's witting participation—enticed by a movie—ignoring his earlier interviews, and used new lies designed to cover up critical facts inadvertently made known to and revealed by Walton in 1975, concerning his free-lance excursion from the infirmary and through the training base facility, including the flight simulator and hanger areas, while in a semi-violent and drugged-up stupor.

---

[22]George Smoot and Keay Davidson, Wrinkles in Time [1993].

These ostensible facts were entirely omitted from the movie, and were replaced by BIG LIES, relying upon the probability that there are just so many pudding-heads out there willing and anxious to believe them.

The mass audiences of movies and T. V. are relied upon to stamp out rationality. Davidson's sole basis for alleging fraud by Walton, was the fact that NBC's The UFO Incident (the Betty and Barney Hill fabrication) was premiered only two weeks prior to the Walton incident (another government fraud), which only proved that the government was already aggressively implementing the abductions format, as borne out by Travis Walton's experiences. Only this could explain why the government hucksters already had their "costumes" and "script" ready to go at the time of the Travis Walton incident. Despite the lies, the facts show:

1. That Walton was injured in 1975, by electrical discharges from a saucer (similar to Vicki Landrum, Colby Lee Landrum, and Betty Cash in 1982), causing his fall and concussion; and,

2. that the injured Walton was rescued and given emergency medical treatment at the secret saucer base infirmary; and,

3. that during this treatment, Walton was exposed to an "alien play" enacted by government personnel, in a corny hoax intended to prepare him for later use as a "witness"; and,

4. that due to the leakage of critical facts, the government eventually paid Walton to lie pursuant to still another hoax, intended to obliterate the original facts of the 17-year-old bungled hoax, and to homogenize the hoax with the newly implemented "abductions" format.

Since there are now many more saucers in use than ever before, more incidents are inevitable. The need for more 'streamlined' hoaxes has resulted in a new wave of government-funded hoaxes. The abductions hoaxes have emerged as the most convenient, since the new age movement has provided an almost endless supply of hypocritical 'spiritualists', willing to lie and fantasize their sexual indiscretions, hallucinations, and nightmares, etc., into "abduction experiences", at $50,000 a whack. A whole new generation of designer drugs are available to neuter, convince or convert people who might otherwise have been lobotomized or killed a few years ago. A few of these 'manufactured' witnesses are actors, a few are paid professional liars, a few are drug-induced guinea pigs, and many more are the inevitable dupes. Skilled CIA psychiatrists are available to guide the dramatis personae through their proper performances, as they become Secret Government "movie stars".

In a letter to Walter Bowart from Julianne McKinney[23], backing up what I said in my first edition, McKinney stated that she had interviewed 125 government mind control victims. One was used in the "Alien" program. Now in her 40s, she was used as a young child because she was "...small and just the right size for wearing the costume of a

---

[23]Letter to Walter Bowart from Julianne McKinney, Director of The Electronic Surveillance Project ofThe Association of National Security Alumini, Silver Springs, Md., June .16, 1994.

'gray', the big-headed aliens with big eyes and a skinny neck which many UFO 'abductees' sketch under hypnosis." She said the head and neck were manipulated by means of electronic gadgetry built into the costume. Here was a case where the Secret Government's "special effects" antedated Hollywood's by 10 to 15 years.

According to McKinney's expert documentation, the Government's special effects have at least caught up with Hollywood's, since the amateurish first attempts made during the Roswell Rhesus Monkey Hoax, and she further stated: "Having been given no reason to believe otherwise, I have personally concluded that so-called UFO abductions, and the events surrounding those abductions and sightings, are a "black" intelligence operation, involving government-sponsored kidnappings, experimental drugs, surgical experimentation, sophisticated electronics and directed-energy technologies, implantable micro circuited devices, experimental aircraft, Hollywood-style special effects, and the exploitation of so-called 'abductees' as sources of ova, sperm and aborted fetuses for use in government-sponsored genetics experiments".

Then, on the issue of "Hollywood", I am certain that the Secret Government controls a lot of the movie business. In late 1974,1 was offered a choice of two parts in an Italian movie being shot at Cinnecitta in Rome, about the downfall of the Allende government in Chile, and the part played by the CIA in its overthrow. The movie was supposedly produced by the P.C.I. (Partito Communisti Italiano) and directed by 'Communist' director Giuseppe Ferrarri. The movie was covertly produced by the CIA, which was behind securing the part for me. The other part went to American actor, John Kellogg. 1 walked away and did not do the part, since my complicity would have indebted me to the CIA. What better way to control the opposition, than to lead it?

99.9% of the audience have never dreamed there could be government backing for such movies as Fire in the Sky, something Davidson could admit only if he were not a witting agent. As a Klass psychophant, he not only pseudo-debunked the movie, but used the occasion to lay the blame for the OSI-created hoax—along with the news media's laziness, stupidity, and prostitution (using as an example Oliver Stone's excellent movie J.F.K.)—on "Hollywood". While many of the news media and Hollywood are undeniably on the take from the Secret Government, Jim Garrison and Oliver Stone—neither of whom sold out to anyone—weathered horrible harassment, and survived to valiantly debunk the Secret Government's hoax concerning the murder of J.F.K., which reflected heavily on the manipulation of party-liners like Davidson, the usual fascist liars who created obstacles to getting to the bottom of Kennedy's death.

Some news writers seek to endear themselves to the Secret Government, attacking the good, the brave, and the true, from among the safe ranks of the evil, the cowardly, and the false, who parrot the Secret Government's favorite lies. Keay Davidson's "scoop" was already stale "canned corn" from the Secret Government's officially approved menu. Where is "scepticism", the spirit of courageous investigative journalism? I learned as a boy, that cowards will side with bullies, for fear of being beaten up by them. Left unchecked, bullies can eventually control a majority through fear alone. The New Mexican is controlled by Robert M. McKinney, from his home in Virginia, uncomfortably close to CIA headquarters. Bully for them! Their fear sustains them.

Insidiously, a major mind-control propaganda center—serving up more Secret Government canned corn—operates out of Sedona, Arizona, particularly through publishers with names similar to "Light Technology Publishing". The ulterior purpose is to conceal the man-made nature of flying saucers and continue the Illuminati mind-control of We the People. Names such as "Holy Light"—with facetious allusions to Illuminism—appeal to dark mysticism, as a typical diametric reversal, by substitution of "dark" ("ignorance") for "light" ("knowledge"). This mass-psychology propaganda preys upon ignorance, superstition, psychosis, and neurosis, and gathers, encourages, and organizes mass paranoia and delusions. Activity is focused on exploitation of the "new age culture", the "collective unconscious" theories of Swiss psychologist C.G. Jung, and some pseudo-Native American 'spiritual' stuff, all thrown into a mystical slumgullion stew of new age groupies and Secret Government liars. This is insulting to Native Americans, seeking to prey upon and use them as cheap 'ornaments' to decorate the bizarre carnival ballyhoo, because Indians are "in", as the Illuminati cashes in on current new age fads, even enlisting some Indians' witting participations. This conjures up some words uttered by the "devil" (read "the Secret Government") in Goethe's Faust:

"Contempt your capacity to think,
Which is Man's greatest power;
Welcome Misty things and sorcery
And the spirit of Illusion,
Then I shall get you surely enough"

There is an obvious predominance of some of the tackiest people on this planet, who, like lumps of dough, have been molded into cookie-cutter images designed by panels of CIA Ph.D.s. This seediness is a mirror-image of the sociopathy of misanthropic Illuminati mind-engineers, based on their underestimation of the 'American character', and that of human beings in general. For such work, 'inductees' must have a lack of individual worth and self esteem—like ideal bureaucrats—as the defective genotypes to be used for transmutation into tacky, pathetic, new age stars, designed and used by the government. Thus insecure, weak people surrender to a phony lifestyle, in exchange for money and (self-delusional) worth, where before there was little. Fringe benefits for the new age 'celebrities', include enhanced sexual, romantic, and socio-economic opportunities, similar to the tacky relationships between the likes of Jim and Tammy Bakker, and their adulating followers. These benefits are undoubtedly part of the appeal to such people, providing a much better life than they might otherwise have, in addition to giving them false patriotic pride in the delusion that they are doing it all "for their country". The CIA (the "devil") calls this "recruiting", and asks each new prospect, "What is the price of your mind?"

The choice of seedy people is obviously an appeal to the lowest common social denominator—a sort of "affirmative action for the tacky"—emphasizing "emotions", "feelings", "the heart", and "faith", etc. ad vomitus, enticing emotionally unbalanced, pathetic people, who need help in tieing their own shoes. This induces already helpless people to stay right where they are, rather than strengthening their use of minds and resources in constructive ways. The end result contravenes the U.S. Constitution, Art. I. Sec. 8, which legally requires the government to "promote" (not destroy) "...the progress of science and the useful arts", by maintaining (not halting) the flow of inventions and discoveries into the public domain, for use by all.

How much irreversible damage has been done by these programs, which are somewhat successful? Are we doomed to a future of archaic technology, delayed progress, planned ignorance, and Illuminati mind-control? Do we expect our government, at some undetermined future date, to suddenly 'fess up', admitting it has been insidiously brainwashing and lying to us, to control our minds and will powers, for our "own good", at our expense, for over 50 years, without our permission? Don't hold your breath. It is time for a reckoning, and further delay will cost us billions, and untold damages of many kinds.

In the face of huge economic losses we are experiencing daily from technology-concealment, some may ask what the harm is, in the government's herding a bunch of naturally superstitious suckers into a new age religion, when they might otherwise have been under the spell of some other form of mystical or 'spiritual' scam anyway? My answer is, such matters exceed the jurisdictional limits our constitution places on our government, and this outrageous Secret Government program for the subliminal manipulation of We the People, is a religious, mind-control, psychopolitical brainwashing scheme, run by BIG BROTHER, which has at least four very damaging results, as follows:

1. It is an unconstitutional violation of our First Amendment rights, in which the government is secretly doing what it is forbidden openly do by law, namely, sponsoring an establishment of religion, abridging the principle of the separation of church and state; and,

2. it fraudulently conceals and misrepresents material facts from We the People, to our detriment and the corporate fascists' benefits; and,

3. it promotes the educational, intellectual, scientific and moral decline of We the People, by concealing knowledge, and inducing dishonesty, psychological disorientation, and detrimental reliance on ignorance, mysticism, and superstition in people who need rational guidance; and,

4. it violates the fundamental democratic right to government by consent of the governed, through secret, subliminal manipulation of We the People, who cannot consent to things being done to us by BIG BROTHER, in our own name, without our knowledge.

Those in the N.S.A. and CIA believe they can do whatever they want to and get away with it, because their activities are "secret". The secrecy protects the Illuminati from the consequences of their illegal acts. Without evidence, what can we prove? There is no legitimate authority for the CIA to extend its "covert operations", under its "Clandestine Services", into our domestic lives, producing the illegal and bizarre effects and damages which these operations show. There was never any legitimate authorization for these unconstitutional activities from the outset, when they were commenced through a fraud on the American People, when the bankers 'created' false authority for the United Nations, the NSA and the CIA at a time when the people were preoccupied with celebrating the end of WW II. Congressional approval of the "National Security Act" was entirely circumvented in secret meetings, such as that held by the Council on Foreign Relations, on Jan. 8, 1968, at their 'home', the Harold Pratt House, Park Avenue, New York City, chaired by C. Douglas Dillon, private investment banker. These operations are approved by the Illuminati, without official status or legitimate authority, to secure their own corporate-fascist power. The fraudulent 'act' was never an "Act of Congress", since it just 'went into effect' through the coercive effects of the power of money and political influence exerted by the C.F.R.

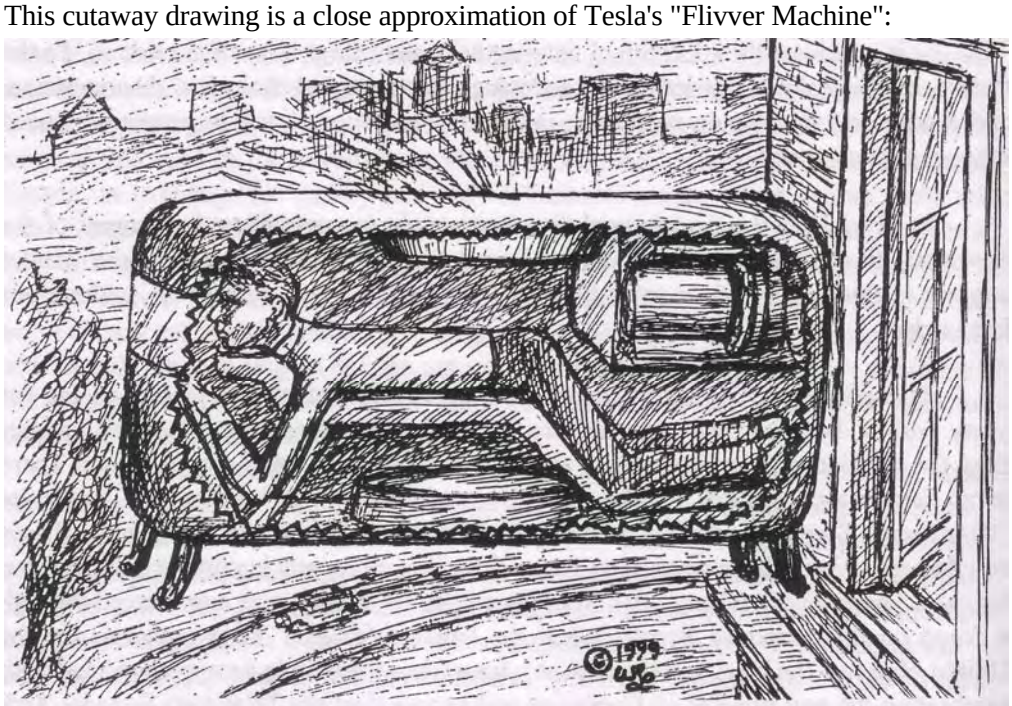
This book gives the public the wherewithal to reverse these sickening policies, and to provide a means for obtaining unheard of freedom and prosperity, through openness, free competition, knowledge, creativity and reason, by rejection of the secrecy which is the basis for the lies, and by our acceptance of flying saucer knowledge...just the kind of things which the Pseudo-Illuminati hypocritically claim to promote.

In 1894, before the Ford Model "T" had been created by Henry Ford, Tesla had already tested his (flying saucer propulsion) theory, as confirmed by statements to the FBI in 1943, by a New York socialite named Marguerite Merrington, who witnessed "metallic plate suspensions"[24], in statements taken just after Tesla's death and shown on a "List of Persons Associated With Nikola Tesla". The FBI/CIA censors missed this small reference, and failed to black it out. They did, however release a misinformational and tampered photocopy of a 9/22/40 article by William L. Laurence in the New York Times entitled "Death Ray" for Planes". In that article, they stated that "only two" of the four parts had been tested, and substituted the word "repelling" for "propelling", as discussed on page 22 and 23, to coincide with misinformation in the HAARP "patent". The copy of the news article I have backs up what I say.

This cutaway drawing is a close approximation of Tesla's "Flivver Machine":



[24]FBI Documents Regarding Nikola Tesla (252 pages released in the 1980s under the FOIA).

CHAPTER V: HOW TO BUILD A FLYING SAUCER

Author's Disclaimer

In consideration of the author's sale, and of the reader's purchase or reading of this book, the purchaser or reader is hearby deemed to understand and agree to the following:

1. That she or he assumes all physical risks of any harm to anyone, attendant to the constructing, testing, flying, or attempting to fly, a flying saucer constructed as herein suggested;

2. that the author assumes no liability whatsoever, either civil or criminal, as to these suggested plans or the theories contained herein, and is hereby released from any and all liability or claim, or allegation of liability;

3. that the purchaser or reader, who is presumed to be an ordinary, reasonable and prudent person, with control over his or her decisions and actions, is urged to respect the obvious and inherent dangers of electricity, the force of gravity, and flight, and to become familiar with pertinent F.A.A. regulations and applicable state and federal laws, if any, and hereby assumes complete responsibility for all such particulars;

4. It is hereby agreed and understood that these plans are hypothetical, provided only for the purpose of the investigation and understanding of flying saucer theory, flight and construction, and that the author gives no warranty, either express or implied, that a flying saucer constructed according to these plans will work or be safe to the operator or others.

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

First, it is recommended that a flying model be built and tested before proceeding further, as it would be very disappointing to build an elaborate saucer which doesn't work. The fundamental principle is simple: to electromagnetically synthesize momentum, employing a high voltage D.C. brush discharge, in the direction of desired acceleration, to draw in and cause the exchange of ether carriers, which also brings in the tubes of electrical force, and to cause the tubes to dissolve in the conductors of the ship, which imparts momentum to the conductors, at 90 degrees to the electric current and magnetic inductance. In order to facilitate the dissolution of the tubes of force, an alternating current of sufficiently high frequency is utilized on the opposite end of the ship, to compress and block the ether carriers and tubes of force, so that they cannot pass out the rear, and are thereby forced to dissolve to impart momentum in the opposite direction. The hull should be accelerated, creating electromagnetic momentum in the desired direction almost instantaneously.

A Tesla coil is used to create a negative D.C. brush discharge on one electrode, and another Tesla coil is used on the opposite electrode, to create an A.C. high frequency, which compresses the ether carriers and tubes of force, and blocks their passage. These two electrodes comprise a "p2"—two different primaries—one—the D.C. brush—which draws in the tubes of force, and the other—the A.C. current—which blocks the ether carriers and forces the tubes of force to dissolve. The D.C. brush produces "negative ("hairy") corona", and the high frequency A.C. produces "positive ("cloudy") corona". It is believed that this system not only creates instant momentum in the direction of the D.C. brush, but eliminates the problem of inertia in the direction of the A.C. high frequency current, so that the rate of acceleration is virtually unlimited, and the destructive effect of acceleration is eliminated, since all parts of the ship and its contents accelerate at the same rate, without inertia. This also applies to instant turns, in which the force of acceleration acts on all parts of the ship and its contents, to re-orient the force of momentum on each atom and molecule, in the new direction, eliminating centrifugal force. The kind of ship shown by these plans however, is of what I call the "linear type", which turns in a curving path, rather than in sharp angles, because this type of ship is easier to construct and control.

In order to properly control the currents from the Tesla coils, specially designed switches, relays, capacitors, dielectrics, inductors and conductors are required. In these hypothetical plans, I provide my own design, which could conceivably be built by a skilled home craftsman. I also describe what I believe to be a control system which will be practical, reliable, and easy to construct, probably similar to what Tesla used on his "Flivver" machine, his manned, electro-propulsive ship of the earliest type.

1. SIZE AND SHAPE

Since this ship is to be of the simplest type, it is no larger than required for one or two people. It is designed to be as small as possible, yet to have the necessary equipment and space for comfort. The general shape of the craft can be described as an oblate spheroid, the shape of a moving "point charge" system. The first manned ship built by Tesla was described as the approximate size and shape of a "gas stove", which would be a sort of long, rectangular box on legs. The legs were presumably stand-off insulators so the craft could get off the ground. I assume that it was of the linear type, with Tesla crouched inside, perhaps on some sort of support, which allowed his hands to be free for the controls, with his head pointed toward a small window at one end. Electromagnets on the "front", with switching and polarity provisions to divert the brush to the right or left, would allow for complete control, with the 'buoyancy' control determining altitude. The bottom and rear would be activated by the high frequency A.C. blocking current. If Tesla wanted to turn right, he would use the electromagnets to divert the brush so that the right corner was pulled, as the air pressure would cause the ship to swing around in a circular turn. To go down, all he had to do was to diminish the current to the top brush.

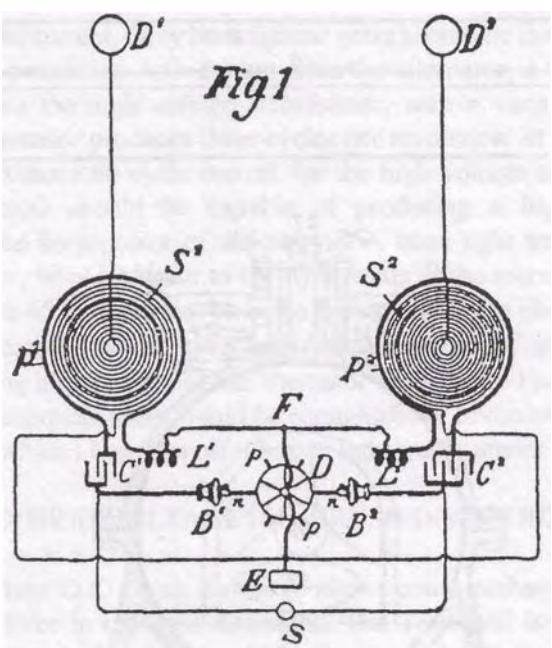
Since the most efficient application of electrical energy is desired, to conserve energy and to transmit the respective propulsive force effectively, with the least expenditure of energy, it is recommended to use rounded surfaces, similar to the design of electrostatic generators, the design of corona rings, or the design used by Tesla in his Wardenclyffe Tower electrodes—rather than sharp points, shapes, or edges—which tend to cause "point discharge", the wasteful and uncoordinated leakage of electric charges into space in a manner which is unproductive.

Since the primary function is to get the ship off the ground and to remain stable while hovering, the upper surface area is generally a horizontal surface, but is spheroidally curved and somewhat symmetrical. I call the electrode from which a brush discharge is emitted at the center top of the ship, the "buoyancy electrode". This electrode is used at almost all times during flight, in addition to an electrode which may be activated at the front of the ship, to cause horizontal acceleration and to turn the ship.

Apparently, the ship will not work without the high frequency A.C. blocking and compressing current to the rear and on the bottom, otherwise, anything with a D.C. brush discharge would take off and fly away at fantastic speed. There is always an "equal and opposite" reaction. In order for there to be a "reaction", there must be a "disturbance to the equilibrium". As the ether carriers continue to exchange, bringing in the tubes of force, there is nothing to prevent them from passing out the other end of the ship, so that there would be no "reaction", and the ship would acquire no momentum. As Tesla said, the A.C. current (at the rear and bottom of the ship), when of "sufficiently high frequency", will draw ether carriers and tubes of force to itself, until they are so compressed that no further action will occur. This is apparently intended to "block" the field of gravity and to block inertia—like Dr. Cavour's 'door', painted with "Cavourite---and to force the tubes of force in the ship's forward conductors to dissolve, so that momentum is imparted to the conductors (and the ship to which they are attached), as J. J. Thomson said.

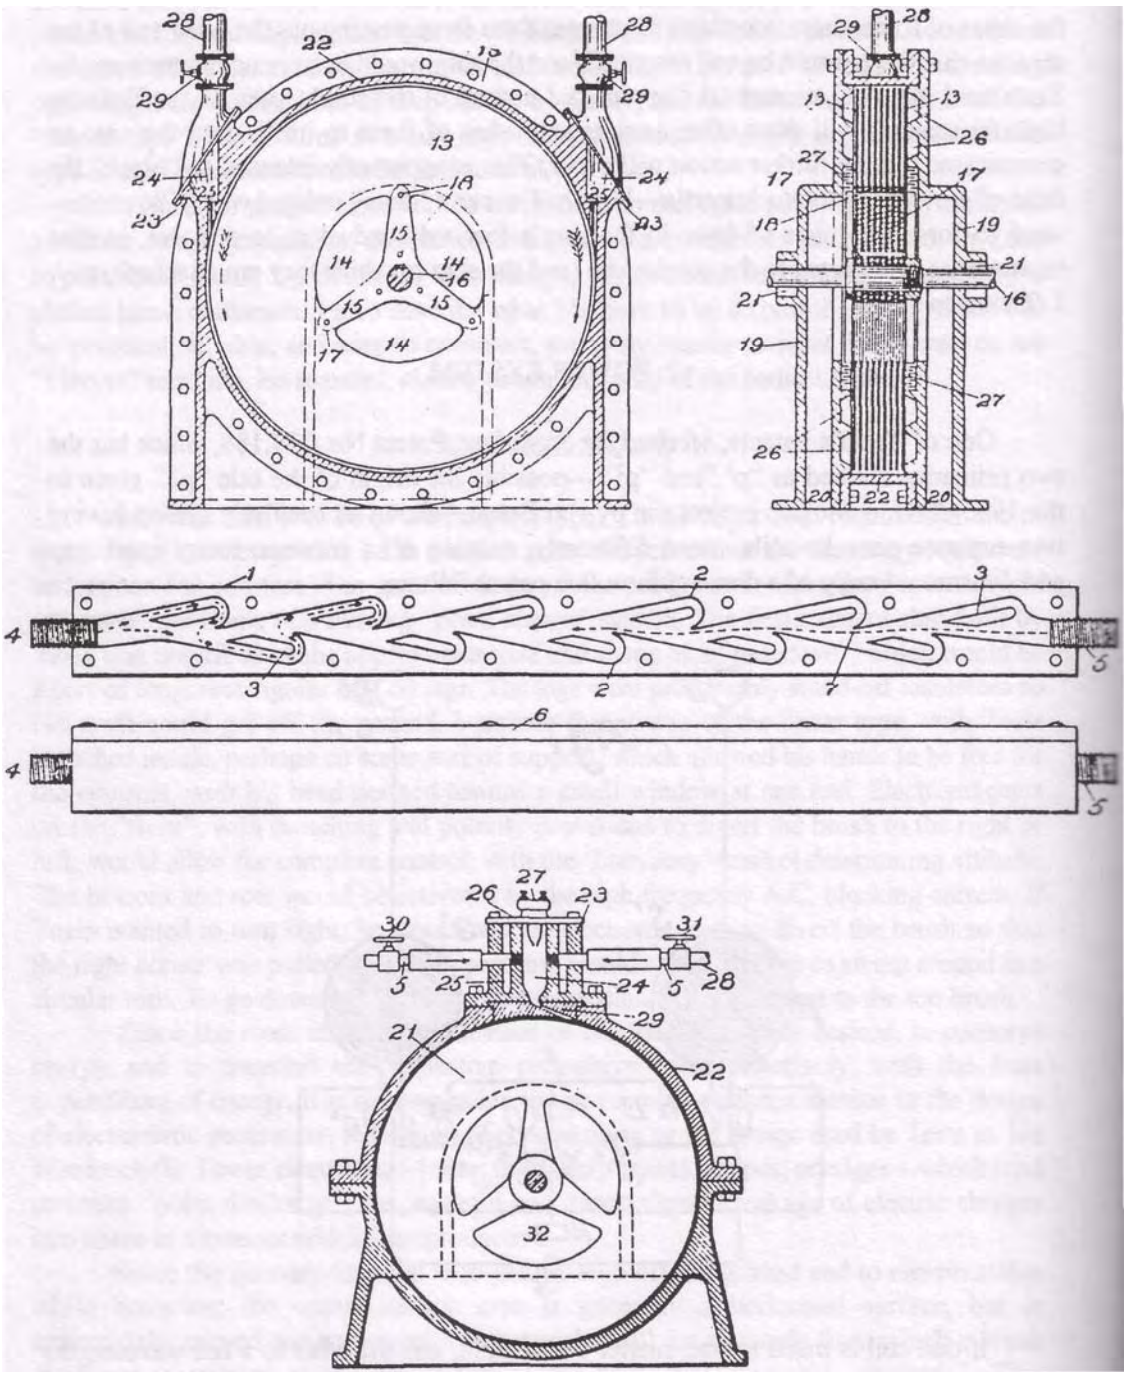
2. POWER SYSTEM

One of Tesla's patents, Method for Signaling, Patent No. 723,188, which has the two primaries marked as "p^1 "and "p^2"—possibly the origin of the title "p2" given to the 1935-38 New Mexico project run by von Braun—shows an oscillator system having two separate pancake-coils, tuned differently, running off a common rotary spark gap and dynamo. A copy of a drawing from that patent follows:



If one coil is tuned to one quarter wavelength, and the other to a full wavelength, they would comprise a D.C. brush circuit and a high frequency A.C. circuit, respectively. The A.C. circuit could be run at all times on the bottom and rear, with the brush being activated at the top to lift off, and to the front to go forward or turn.

I can't recommend a better prime mover than the Tesla turbine, because of its compactness, light weight, and efficiency. Below are excerpts from Tesla's Turbine patent #1,061,206 and related Valvular Conduit patent #1,329,559. Two conduits supply air and gas, respectively, to the firing chamber (second turbine):



The second edition of Free Energy Surprise, when issued, will include my complete set of plans, redesigned, to be constructed using basic machine tools for the home builder.

The turbine shown will produce at least 30 break horsepower and operate at about 30,000 rpm., and should weigh no more than ten pounds, including the valvular conduits and firing chamber.

The firing chamber has a glow plug (the kind used in model airplane engines), and fires in a "reverberatory" way (the explosions come in rapid succession), producing a continuous supply of expanding hot gases, which enter the turbine on its outer edge as shown, and spiral between the disks toward the vents which are near the center shaft. I have routed the exhaust out one side of the turbine, through a single exhaust vent, rather than out both sides as Tesla did, to diminish turbulence, and to free one side of the turbine for the bearing mount and connection to the gearbox and mounting plate. The exploding gases will not blow back through the valvular conduit, which was Tesla's valve system having no moving parts, and will continue to move into the turbine inlet vent, as the combustion chamber continues to produce the pressurized gases.

Judging from the fact that the turbine will produce 30 hp on 125 lbs. steam, it should produce more horsepower on propane or gasoline, and should be adequate.

For the generator, I recommend a heavy duty high amperage automotive alternator, such as the type used on heavy equipment, or a high output, lightweight alternator designed for power generators, normally having an engine of about 30 hp.

It will be necessary to use step-down gearing to reduce the speed of the turbine, so that, at the optimum (most efficient) operating rpm of the turbine (about 25,000 rpm), it will be stepped down to the optimum operating rpm recommended for the alternator. For example, if the alternator is to run at 1,200 rpm., and the turbine at 25,000 rpm., the gearing would have to function at a 20:1 ratio. A battery will also be required to supply the appropriate exciter voltage, and to store electrical energy for appliances and other necessary on-demand current. Only herringbone gears should be used in the gearbox.

By using an unrectified A.C. current from the alternator, it should be possible to route it directly into the high voltage transformer, with a variac to regulate it. For example, if the alternator produces three cycles per revolution, at 1,200 rpm., it would produce the approximate 60 cycle current for the high voltage transformer. The high voltage transformer(s) should be capable of producing a high amperage output commensurate to the horsepower of the turbine. A neon light transformer, producing .030 amps at 15 kv., would amount to only 450 watts in the secondary, for a generator which could produce 45 kw or more. To be on the safe side, you should use transformers for each pancake module which have high voltage ratings of at least 5 kw in their secondaries (totalling almost 50% of the alternator's capacity). I can't imagine that this system would be inadequate. This would be enough power to run about 50 Tesla coils of the powerful types which I have run off the neon light transformers.

3. HIGH VOLTAGE D.C. BRUSH DISCHARGE

The high voltage D.C. brush discharge allows equal exchange of the electric and magnetic tubes of force in opposite directions. The Tesla coil is tuned to one-quarter wavelength, emitting negative pulses which are so rapid that the current continues to flow in the secondary, during current reversals in the primary. This steady D.C, "pseudo-electrostatic" brush discharge has a greater effect on the independent ether carriers, and 'rarifies' them, exerting an elastic, pulling force in the space in front of the ship. This induces the rapid exchange of the ether carriers through the front of the ship, and draws the tubes of force into the conductor. In the D.C., secondary conductor, the tubes of force have nowhere to go, and are forced to dissolve, as new tubes of force continue to be brought in. This imparts momentum to the conductor, which must be firmly attached to the ship.

The thing which makes the tuned Tesla coil the ideal contrivance for this purpose, is the fact that the principles of high frequency inductance make it possible to create very high D.C. potentials, using a relatively small coil, which may be placed flat against the walls of the ship, powered by a compact alternator. This eliminates the need for the large and cumbersome parts of an electrostatic generator, which would produce only a fraction of the amperage of the Tesla coil, and a greatly diminished exchange of the ether carriers and influx of tubes of force. It has also been shown that a D.C. pulse produces a greater effect in Hall effect pumping than a steady D.C. current.[25]

The negative D.C. pulse discharges will leave the inside of a closed hollow conductive vessel—such as a saucer is—and appear on its outer surface, as Michael Faraday discovered, which conveniently protects the pilot, crew and internal contents of the saucer from the effects of electrostatic charges.

4. HIGH VOLTAGE, HIGH FREQUENCY A.C. CURRENT

The high frequency current, required to block the exchange of ether carriers and passage of the tubes of force through the rear of the ship, behaves with a "skin effect", which means it travels over the surface atoms (the "skin"), rather than through the internal mass of the conductor, as well as the skin of other solid conductive bodies. This phenomenon also provides some convenient protection for crew members from the effects of this type current. Aside from the phenomenon of the skin effect of high frequency alternating current, internal circuits must be highly insulated and shielded where necessary, with care given to shielding of the pilot (and crew or passenger) from possible high voltage radiation dangers.

The pancake-type coils have a higher threshold for arcing at a given voltage than cylindrical or conical ones, which makes them best for these very high voltage applications. Care must be taken at all times, in the design of high voltage circuits, that the close proximity of conductors having high opposite potentials is avoided, and sufficiently insulated and spaced where necessary. Silicone rubber, transformer oil, Formica, and plexiglass are good insulators, and there is a dielectric paste which is excellent.

There is a tendency for the air close to the conductors to become ionized, creating pathways for the current to leak and arc through space to other conductors of opposite potential, whenever within range, roughly governed by the parameters of 20 kv/cm., at sea level pressure, adjusted downward for higher altitude and correspondingly lower pressure, which requires that the space be increased for the same difference in potential. Internal high voltage corona leakage and arcing between conductors, components or contacts, can be suppressed by use of pressurized inert gas environments, increased air or gas pressures, solid, rubber, plastic, oil, or paste insulators of high dielectric strength.

---

[25]Beckman Instruments, Inc., Hall Effect Manual, Helipot Division, Fullerton, California.

5. VERTICAL ASCENT AND DESCENT

Due to the tremendous superiority of the electrical attractive force over the gravitational and aerodynamic forces, it should be possible to fly a saucer with a greatly diminished electric power system, but the saucer's control is a very sensitive matter, requiring the ability to activate the appropriate electrodes rapidly, in response to a need to change directions of movement, or to quickly correct inappropriate movements of the ship, because of its great speed and ability to "jump around" without inertial/momentive resistance.

The main buoyancy coil, mounted in an area above the cabin, provides the negative brush discharge, which, when paired with the high frequency A.C. coil, beneath the cabin floor, accelerates the ship upward, as the force is balanced to maintain the saucer at a particular vertical position. The high frequency current used on the bottom of the ship on hovering, seems to be the equivalent to Dr. Cavour's "door", which when shut, stops the gravitational effects from forcing the ship to accelerate toward the earth.

The description in 19th century physics literature, as I documented in Occult Ether Physics (especially the 2nd Edition), implies that a normal gravitating body moving relative to earth, within earth's electric, magnetic and gravitational fields, naturally draws the tubes of force into itself, where they are dissolved to impart momentum.

The downward movement of the saucer can be effected by allowing it to drop by the force of gravity, with power diminished, though it can be effected more rapidly by a reversal of the forces which accelerate it upward, but, to eliminate unnecessary complexity and danger, I don't recommend this for a prototype.

The discharge electrodes shown in these plans are of the "pancake-coil" type, which can be placed parallel to the interior walls of the ship, and will be the recipient of the momentum, which is imparted on the third axis, perpendicular to the flat side of the coil, at 90 degrees to the other two axes, which are the magnetic inductance and electric current axes. Placing the flat coils parallel to the outer walls will therefore orient the momentum perpendicular to the outer surface of the ship.

6. HORIZONTAL TRAVEL

Horizontal travel is effected by a pairing, along the ship's longitudinal axis, of the two electrodes, the D.C. brush at the front, and the high frequency A.C. current to the rear. It was believed at one time, by Heinrich Hertz[25], that two systems of varying current should exert a ponderomotive force on each other due to their variations, but Tesla proved that the "ponderomotive force" is due to the respective rarefaction and compression of the ether carriers, produced by different kinds of currents (D.C, A.C, and rapidly varying electrostatic forces)[26], and their effects on the ether.

---

[25]Ann. d Phys. xxxi [1887], p. 421; Hertz's Electric Waves, translated by D.E. Jones, p. 29.

[26]Nikola Tesla, Lecture Before theA.I.E.E., Columbia College, New York [May 20, 1891]; Nikola Tesla, Lecture Before the Institution of Electrical Engineers, London [Feb., 1892].

B. CONSTRUCTION OF THE HULL

Due to the magnitude by which the electrical attractive force is greater than the gravitational attractive force, tremendous stress is created on the hull of a saucer, which must therefore be constructed very strongly. While a spherical shape readily lends itself to such requirements, internal structuring members and walls should be designed, constructed and positioned for maximum rigidity and strength, to prevent the possible pulling apart of, or crumpling of the hull, as this would be the supreme misfortune.

Construction of entrance and exit ports and other such contrivances, should anticipate powerful stresses, since openings are generally points of weakness. It is desirable that the hull have a smooth and continuous conductive outer surface, which has little or no small diameter protuberances, and as few weak or "blank" spots in it as possible, caused by such things as windows (See "C. Simplified Drawings and Plans" below for available excellent source of technical construction literature with materials suppliers). Windows must be of strong, thick material, firmly attached.

1. POWER PLANT

Since the electrical attractive force is so much greater than the gravitational attractive force, it is logical that a relatively small engine, such as the Tesla turbine, or a snowmobile or motorcycle engine, would be adequate to power an alternator of sufficient power for this size saucer. Tesla designed his tiny turbines and remarkable high frequency alternators for this purpose, and they would be preferable. An independent air intake and exhaust system, separate from the air supply for the cabin, must be provided, with careful attention to preclude the mixture of exhaust gases with the air supply for crew and pilot. Batteries may be sufficient to supply electrical power for a saucer, with a small engine used periodically to recharge the battery system, as needed. As shown below in "Special Supplementary Notation on the WW II German Flying Saucers", construction of manned, 'hot-rod'-type saucers or spheres, perhaps only four feet in diameter, may be feasible, possibly using automotive spark coils (perhaps similar to some of the "foo fighters" seen and photographed by allied bomber gunnery crews, in the skies of WW II Germany). The atmospheric nitrogen-oxygen combustion system invented by Tesla, for the production of electrical energy from the air, is too complex to be covered here, and there is insufficient information as to just exactly how the system was constructed and used to produce useful energy.

2. SEATING AND VISIBILITY

Ultra-light, strong, fiberglass bucket seats with seat belts, are recommended. The closer the pilot's eyes to the windshield, the smaller the windows required for visibility, with care taken to electrically insulate the pilot's head from the ceiling. A spherical shape will provide better visibility than a 'discus' shape, and a wide-angle optical viewer might be provided directly downward, between a solo pilot's legs, if desired. This type of saucer involves a restricted pilot position, but since the saucer is so fast, satisfying flights, over great distances, should be of short duration. Small video cameras such as those often used on race cars or by skiers, having wide angle lenses, might be mounted in the saucer surface, with view screens around the interior of the cabin.

For a small, 'hot-rod' saucer as these plans describe, there are several inconveniences which must be tolerated in the name of practicality and economy. The more wealthy builder will naturally find a way to include as much luxury and high-tech controls, accessories and other facilities as he can afford or desire.

3. FLIGHT SUIT

The flight suit should provide electrical and heat insulation, with ultraviolet protection for the eyes. An insulated, cold-water wet suit might work well. Since a pilot will be looking out ports which are near the hull surface, the helmet should provide extra thick electrical insulation, to prevent arcing or electric shock to the head. In general, the suit should provide U.V. radiation protection, preferably by use of a special plastic already developed for this purpose. (NOTE: It was rumored early in the program, in the '50s, that only women pilots were used, since the male scrotal cavity is particularly sensitive to the electrical radiation problems of the saucers.)

Ironically, the kind of pull-over headgear, used by actors or pilots, often used to fake the appearances of "aliens", might be an ideal design for a saucer pilot's headgear, with thick layers of foam insulation in the top (representing the bulbous brain cavities often depicted on the phony aliens), and the sunglass-lens eyes covers would provide U.V. protection.

C. SIMPLIFIED DRAWINGS AND PLANS

The following drawings, including nomenclature, are presented in a simplified format. The details of each particular part or section, are left to the creative imagination, ingenuity and resourcefulness of the individual reader or experimenter, with the author presenting his own suggested design, predicated to provide the least possible obstacles in procurement of materials and actual construction. The skilled experimenter will also recognize that there are relatively simple methods for construction of a scientifically adequate, test scale model, and only a fool would embark on such a project without making such a test, with care taken to insure that the model is suspended by insulative string running through pullies, so that the power may not drain to ground. Such details of saucer construction as particular metals and other materials, fabrication and technology, are generally omitted from these plans, since a complete, detailed set of working drawings, with accompanying technical literature, could conceivably require ten times the length of this book.

As an excellent source for materials and techniques, I recommend Andrew C. Marshall's Composite Basics[28]. This book even describes honeycomb metals and other metal/plastic bonding and structural materials and techniques, etc., and provides sources for a wealth of expert home-built aircraft construction materials and literature of many kinds. Aluminum, though light, may not be the best metal, because there are so many bonding problems with the metal. I am recommending stainless steel, since the electromagnetic flux used to divert the brush discharge for turning must be able to pass through the outer shell.

---

[28]Andrew C. Marshall, Composite Basics [1994, Marshall Consulting, 720 Appaloosa Dr., Walnut Creek, Ca. 94596]

1. (Special Supplementary Notations on The WWII German Flying Saucers):

In this short summary, I will avoid suspected misinformation, or material which is unrealistically speculative.

There were purportedly several inventors working in Nazi Germany on various types of flying saucers, not all of which were electro-propulsive in concept, meant to operate on rocket, jet, turbojet, or prop-driven reactions of the aerodynamic type. All the video or literary material available to me, concerned this "aerodynamic" type, were either misinformational, or grossly ill-conceived "science" of the La La Land variety, seeming to be mostly contemporary Austrian new age 'thinking' or CIA-concocted garbage, containing only grains of truth. For example, there seems to be valid documentation concerning one example, the Habermohl "Pflugerad" ("Flying Wheel")---which was little more than a re-designed gyrocopter—which actually may have gotten off the ground, though even in the supposed 'documents', was said to be unstable and dangerous to fly. It combined a gyrocopter or helicopter rotor in a wheel shape, concentrically rotating around a ball-shaped cockpit. It experienced several crashes during tests, probably because the rotor gave it too much gyrostability, so that it was unmaneuverable, there being no way to decouple the rotor/gyro from the airframe, during turns or changes in attitude. Some models showed a vertical stabilizer and rudder on the rear of the central non-rotating cockpit section, to turn it in the direction of flight. A rather good idea later used on "jet copters", was rocket or jet engines attached to the rotor, which eliminated the torque problem normally encountered with shaft-driven rotors.

The inertial guidance system ("Peiltochterkompass", or "polar slave compass") was built to meet the requirements of the "full electric" "Kreisel Teller" , because the electrostatic "Faraday cage" effect created by its propulsion system made a normal compass worthless, and the high speeds (c. 9,000 m.p.h.), zig-zag maneuverability, precession, and poor visibility created navigational problems which required a special, non-magnetic compass. The Peiltochterkompass was coupled to a "Meisterkreiselkompass" ("master gyrocompass") mounted on gimbals, which generated its own angular momentum, and operated independent to the earth's gravity and the ship's momentum or inertia. This would be true even if the saucer externally cancelled the effects of gravity, inertia and momentum since, just as the sun transfers momentum to the earth by electrical current, the saucer power system transfers angular momentum to the gyro. Moving freely on its gimbals, the master gyrocompass pointed in the same direction all the time, no matter which way the ship turned, held into position by its angular momentum, as the motor on the slave compass was actuated when needed to turn the compass indicator dial in the direction of travel.

This book is the only known documentation concerning the "KT-p2" project, which from my analysis appeared to be the only true electro-propulsive saucer, and hence true "UFO" possessed by the Germans. In reiteration, any other kind of "saucer" is not a "saucer" at all, but only some sort of jet, rocket, or fan-driven plane, which by coincidence was only shaped like a saucer. There is nothing inherent in the "saucer" shape which makes it particularly advantageous over a conventional aircraft, and in most cases, is a disadvantage, except in the context of electro-propulsion only, and this only if it is desired to have instant 360-degree maneuverability. The "saucer" projects carried out in Czechoslovakia were clearly disinformational, given the fact that von Braun had the electro-propulsive type as early as 1936 by my documentation. This has come as an embarrassment to those who have put so much stock in the so-called "S.S. documents from Wiener Neustadt", which came under the jurisdiction of the CIA and were therefore misinformational. It would be wise of you to observe who among the "UFOlogy" network has been first to make so much of these documents, as well as who among them have been suckered in by them. It is likely that true saucers were available at the Wiener Neustadt base of General Otto Skorzeny, but were not as described in the tampered literature. It appears that the O.S.I. prepared the disinformation, and disseminated it with the help of Skorzeny, who was one of the first to make such deals to stay out of jail. Skorzeny was also crafty enough to conceal several stashes of high tech documentation and plans, so that he could coerce either the Soviets or the Allies into giving him the protection he desired. The O.S.I. directed attention to the misinformation, through UFOlogy channels, just in time to anticipate my book. Many suckers fail to realize that all German saucer materials had already fallen under the jurisdiction of the CIA

O.S.S.), even before the armistice.

One writer/speaker has attempted to distinguish between "saucers of the secret societies", and "saucers which were secret weapons of the Third Reich". What is secret" is secret, and the fact that the electro-propulsive saucers were used by the Third Reich in its air defenses meant that the "secret societies" scenario is only a fantasy ncouraged by the CIA, while the Gestapo clearly could qualify as a "secret society". How secret can it get? My material is obviously more secret than the Wiener Neustadt stuff, and I had no help from the "Knights Templars" or anyone else, and have had to fight tooth and nail all the way to the day my first edition was finally published, and am still struggling. Most of my analysis of the saucer's propulsion system was extrapolated from my 1953 sighting, confirmed by what I have learned from my Peiltochterkompass. In the years since the publishing of my first edition, read by many engineers and scientists, some of whom are experts on German aircraft of all kinds, no one has produced any mention of a "Peiltochterkompass" or the "KT-p2 Projekt", from another German source or any other. This alone proves the German "documentation" has been tampered with, because of the conspicuous omission of this important project.

From these facts, it is my assessment that the so-called "S.S. documents" are either complete fakes, or have been seriously tampered with for misinformational purposes. For example, one type of German ship is referred to in the documents by the name "Kraut Meteor". Despite the fact that this was sometimes how the Allies referred to it on occasion, the Germans wouldn't have called it that in their own documents, which would be tantamount to Idi Amin Dada building an aircraft, and calling it the "Nigger Watermelon". I very seriously doubt that Hitler would have permitted the use of such derogatory and "decadent" American slang to name a supposed 'super aircraft' of the Third Reich. Having already been suckered in once by some of this material, I won't do it again, and I urge extreme caution in accepting and repeating this material, unless you want to be made a sucker out of.

Recently, I was contacted by a California person who sent me a copy of W.A. Harbison's book, Inception (Dell, 1991). He was under the impression that Harbison's book had pre-empted mine. Not so. Harbison's book not only was fiction (and very interesting at that), but was based on the misconception that "German" flying saucers were the first ones, that they used an aerodynamic "boundary layer" air propulsion system purportedly invented by a fictitious American named John Wilson, and that the saucers we see today are headquartered out of an elaborate underground city built under the ice of Antarctica, run by the S.S. and worked by slave labor. Boundary-layer "saucers" would not be true "flying saucers", but would only be unusual "air-planes" shaped like flying saucers.

As proven by my Peiltochterkompass and my sightings and documentation, the German saucers were electro-propulsive Tesla craft (requiring an inertial navigation system, because of the high-voltage electrostatic discharges and "Faraday cage" effects), some of which had 360-degree peripheral maneuverability in 30-degree increments, just as I observed between 1947-53, in the night skies of West Texas.

The purported Schauberger ships (the only information we really have are photos of models built by Felix Schauberger), purportedly built in Czechoslovakia, were supposedly designed to use an "implosion turbine" to generate the power to drive an 'air-blower' intended to propel the ship. As such, it was little more than a (flying?) air conditioning vent, with an unusual engine, and couldn't have gotten off the ground. And even if by some miracle it could have gotten off the ground, it couldn't have gone over 300 m.p.h., with the dumpy design, muchless over 1,000 m.p.h. as claimed by misinformationists, especially since there is not even reliable information that the ship was ever built. It is too easy to say "the Russians got it", and even if it had been built and had flown, it wouldn't be worth classifying, any more than the little engine-powered UFO toys, which at least were more feasible, and are known to actually fly.

There was purportedly a ship designed by Miethe said to be powered by 12 BMW engines—claimed in documents to run on helium—but said to use the "boundary layer" aerodynamics of Prandtl. Such a system, if true, automatically ruled out electro-propulsive ships. It is my belief that if any of the photos are partially real, the purported name and propulsion system were misrepresented, to throw investigators off the possibility of electro-propulsive ships. There is a photo (real or fake?) purporting to show Miethe explaining this type to Hitler on Apr. 7, 1944. It was purportedly tested in November, 1943, which would be only one month after the manufacture date of my Peiltochterkompass, which raises a probability against mere coincidence. For that reason, I believe that some of the photos—but not the usual 'technical descriptions'—of these ships, may be genuine. The drawings of the basic internal structures may also be somewhat accurate, disregarding the misinterpretations given to them. Large, round ball shapes are shown in the drawings, and three of these are shown in the large "mother ships" (what I call "flying submarines"). These ball shapes could have been liquid helium fuel tanks. A "helium power" system could run "BMW engines", as shown by the Papp engine shown in the Appendices. Twelve engines would suggest that each engine drove a separate electrical generator around the periphery of the saucer, which is consistent with the Peiltochterkompass design. The "Miethe saucer" could be from the "KT-p2 Projekt", the particulars (name, power system, etc.) having been obliterated and faked with misinformation. Though labels and nomenclatures of drawings allegedly from Wiener Neustadt appear to have been altered—especially the written documents alleged to have been with them, which contain silly language—some of the physical designs makes sense in terms of electro-propulsive ships, when "corrected" by my material. One sketch shows a manned "Flying Turtle", which is very similar to the ones I saw in the WW II 8th A.F. film taken by a B-17 bomber crew. I saw this film while a member of the 26th Strategic Reconnaissance Wing, Operations Intelligence Division, Strategic Air Command, Lockbourne, A.F.B., Ohio, in late 1957. We viewed the film with other intelligence personnel, several of whom had participated in the actual bombing raids in which the film was shot. My O.I.C., Lt. Col. Edward R. Jirles, was involved with Operation Paperclip, as he was among the first Army C.I.C. personnel in the Rheinland. In fact, he was responsible for hunting down and bringing in the "Werewolves"—the last fanatical holdouts of the S.S.—for S.E.A.T.O. Capt. Weismann still carried 9 pieces of shrapnel in his body which he received as one of the heroes who bombed the Ploesti oil fields in Romania, and was sufficiently recuperated in time to be aboard a bomber for the "foo fighter" incidents. Contrary to misinformation, the "foo fighters" were not radio-controlled, unmanned craft, but were small electro-propulsive ships flown by pilots, probably Hitlerjugend.

German daredevils apparently flew these things around the bombers to disrupt their electrical equipment and ignition systems, and to draw their fire. Disruption of the equipment would have required no special equipment, since their dynamic electromagnetic fields and high frequency corona would have rendered the desired effect on allied aircraft, just as one shut down the electrical system on my father's car in 1957, just outside Levelland, Texas. That ship was about 200 feet long and was egg shaped, similar to the Flying Turtles and to those seen by Lonnie Zamora near Soccorro, New Mexico.

Since the "Flying Turtle" was perhaps the simplest of all the German types, I present a simplified set of hypothetical drawings and plans for it. We have no complete, detailed photos or drawings of its design, other than the 8th A.F. films I saw in 1957, and a preliminary sketch from German sources, which I give partial credence to, and present for you with as good an interpretation as possible. The advantage of the Flying Turtle was its good visibility, and its cheap, compact, one-man, simple "hot rod" design, audaciously sacrificing everything to function, to tear into the skies and interfere with the horrible Allied "fire-bombings" that killed several hundred thousand civilians in the Hamburg and Dresden areas. Because of its oblong ("turtle-shell-shaped") design, the control system on these craft appeared to be simplified, with electromagnets in front to turn the ship. The blast of the air was relied on to pull the ship into line as the force was applied, to get the desired maneuverability in the simplest and most direct way. This explains perfectly how the "Foo Fighters" were able to fly in a spiralling pathway.

The truth of the air combat over Germany reveals heroic tales of young daredevils and wily old veterans, such as Adolf Galland, who not only flew with only one leg and one eye, but parachuted out of several shot-up Gustavs to return immediately to the sky to fight again, over and over, until there were no more planes to fly[29]. Many of Germany's pilots fought hard, well, valorously, and honorably to the bitter end.

In the film I saw, in which the Flying Turtles circled the B-17s helically, along their flight paths, the gunners were unable to shoot them because they moved so fast, although they appeared to hit some of the much slower Me-163 "Komets" (c. 500 m.p.h.) which accompanied the Flying Turtles. The Komets were cheaply built "disposable ships", abandoned in the sky once their rocket fuel was expended. In one shot, a Komet pilot could be seen bailing out. By comparison of both size and speed between the Komet and a Flying Turtle (moving more than twice as fast as the Komet), it was obvious that the central body of the Turtle was larger than the Komet's, and was going at least 1,000 m.p.h., in a helical path. This maneuver would be the result of the pilots simultaneous actuation of both the "up" and "right" modes, in typical "joystick" fashion. These ships must have required a lot of dexterity, like a video game or a skate board. The speed was no surprise to me, since the saucer I saw in 1953 (about 5 years before I saw the film) was going at least that fast when it did its 90-degree turns.

---

[29]Heinz Knocke, I Flew For the Fuehrer.

Since my discovery of how Tesla controlled the brush discharge, to turn the craft, my plans show only one front electrode, with the "buoyancy" coils used to create the "up" and "down" movement. (Actually, an electro-propulsive ship could be flown with only one set of coils, by diverting the brush at the top to 'swing' the ship sideways "pendulum" fashion, but the speed would not be nearly so high.) Since the momentum is imparted to the conductor at 90 degrees to the electric current and magnetic inductance, the flat, pancake types, which can be firmly imbedded inside the ship's shell, are ideal. One would be placed inside the hemispherical nose. A type of simple joy-stick—controlling the electromagnets to the two sides of the front coil—divert the brush discharge in the desired direction, as the body of the craft is swung around by the air to the corresponding curving pathway, turning the craft right, left, or straight ahead.

Intelligence agencies have exerted tremendous effort to obliterate the facts regarding combat reports of German flying saucers, even inducing false reports of post-war German and Austrian "new-age" type researchers, by feeding them misinformation. Some of the researchers even relied on information obtained from the FBI by FOIA procedures. They just can't get it through their heads, that NO CURRENTLY CLASSIFIED INFORMATION CAN BE OBTAINED BY A CITIZEN THROUGH THE FOIA. All such information has been "screened out". Released documents which (once) contained classified references have the classified portions censored. That's what all those blacked out areas are, stupids! In addition, under the National Security Act, completely fabricated information is often released through the FBI, under the FOIA, to mislead researchers who seek to discover classified secrets. What better way to sucker in those who think that certain "documents" released by the FBI are necessarily valid?

So-called 'technical' descriptions, according to dupes or those who pretend to know, are downright stupid. For example, the "Feuerball" ("Fireball") is described as being a 'circular' or 'spherical', remote-controlled craft, from one to two meters in diameter, powered by a flat (radial) turbo-jet engine, which rotated the outer periphery around its axis, creating its "glowing" appearance from the effects of the expulsion of "over-rich" jet exhaust, as it spun around.[30] Even more ridiculous, it contained a Klystron tube (developed around 1939 by the Varian brothers, for Sperry Gyroscope Company, in America), which pulsed synchronously with Allied radar, making it invisible to radar.[31] If stealth technology were so simple everyone would have it.

These descriptions just don't cut the mustard. There was no way to make a remote-controlled device which did all the things reported, and the conspicuous effort was to avoid the categories, "electro-propulsive" and "manned flying saucers".

---

[30]Haarmann, D. H. (1983), Geheime Wundervaffen (supra); Ratthofer, Norbert Juergen (no date), Demnaechst "Endkampf um die Erde", Vienna, Austria;Flugscheiben und Andere Deutsche und Japanische Geheim und Wunderwaffen im Zweiten Weltkrieg, Sierndorf, Austria.

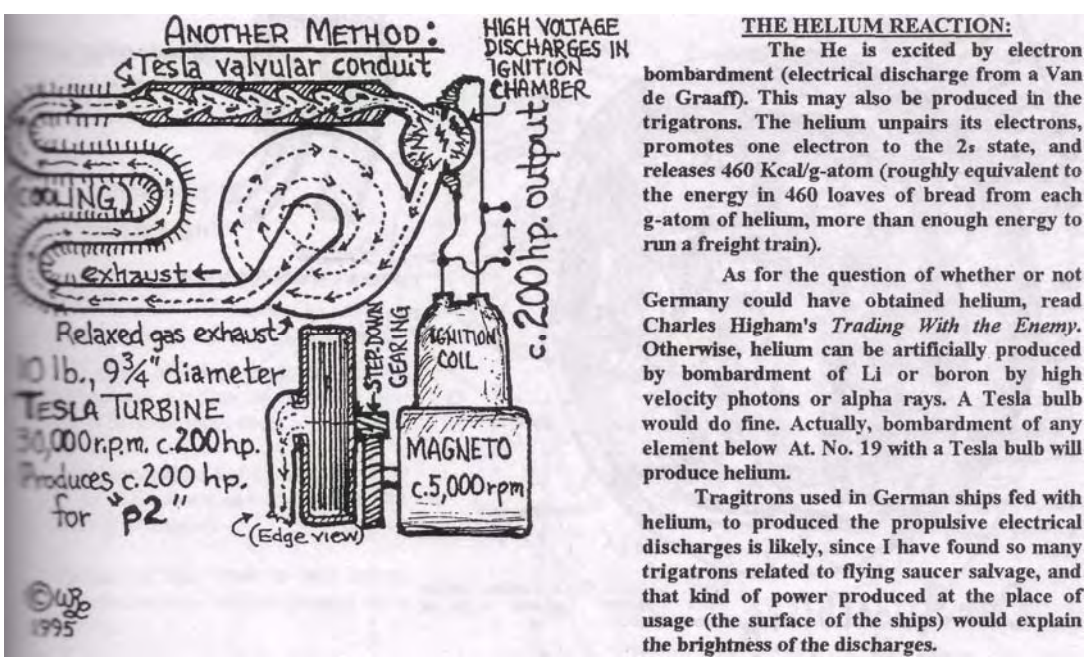
[31]Haarmann, Ratthofer (supra).

2. THE TWO BASIC TYPES OF GERMAN SAUCERS:

1. The ovoidal type, (or "linear type") which flew lengthwise, and included the "Flying Turtles", "Mother Ships", and "egg-shapes" (which in some cases appeared to have more cylindrical shapes, like the "cigar" types, probably due to the necessity to use the most convenient means of fabrication and control at the time); and,

2. the silvery disk type, which flew peripherally, such as the ones seen by my mother, with some alterations to produce the "double-wok" shape seen by us in 1953. There are some very close correlations between the alleged "Vril" ships and those seen by my mother and the entire personnel of the City Hall in Kermit, in 1950, and the ones seen by our entire family in 1953.1 have some friends who saw a ship similar to the Vril type (with a slot around its center), near Pecos, New Mexico a few years back.

If the so-called Miethe ship was electro-propulsive, the "12 BMW engines" idea was probably misinformational. A "boundary-layer/flying air conditioning vent"-type ship couldn't have lifted off with the 3" tank cannon and turret alleged, even with 12 BMW engines. The measly vents would have carried insufficient thrust, and the air friction would have literally burned up the ship. Consistent with my mother's information from Roswell and Alamogordo friends in 1948, helium was probably used as fuel in the German KT-p2 ships, which is the probable reason the Zeppelin program was abandoned, since all the helium was needed for flying saucer fuel. Besides, why have Zeppelins when you can have flying saucers, using similar construction techniques? The helium reactors and the KT-p2 ships probably worked as follows:



THE HELIUM REACTION:

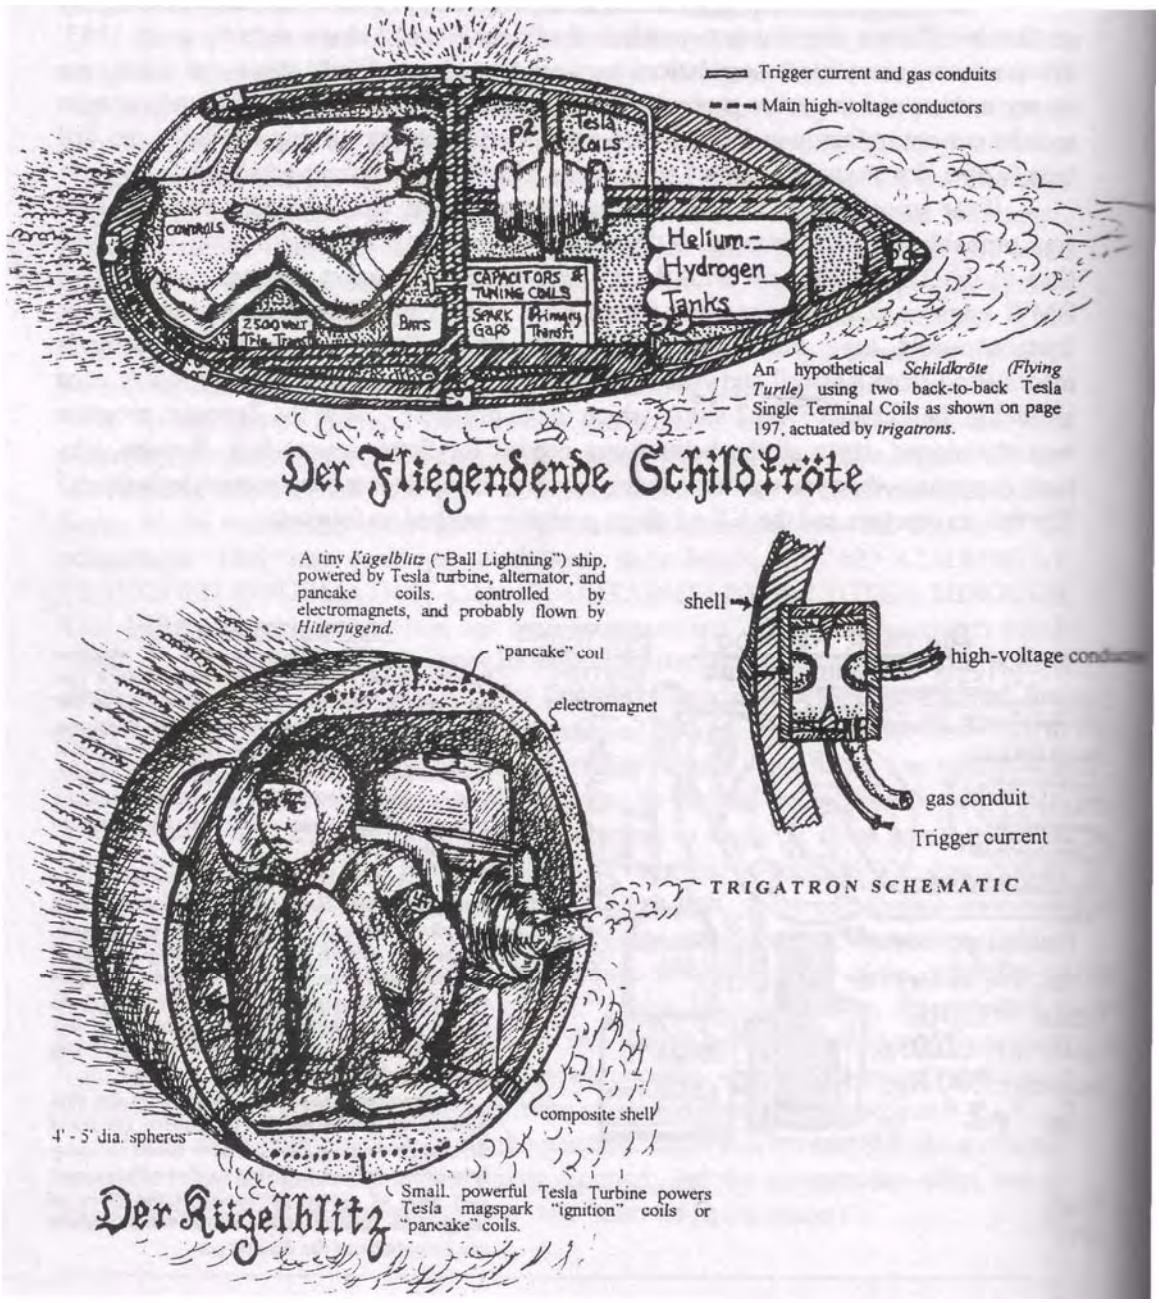
The He is excited by electron bombardment (electrical discharge from a Van de Graaff). This may also be produced in the trigatrons. The helium unpairs its electrons, promotes one electron to the 2_s state, and releases 460 Kcal/g-atom (roughly equivalent to the energy in 460 loaves of bread from each g-atom of helium, more than enough energy to run a freight train).

As for the question of whether or not Germany could have obtained helium, read Charles Higham's Trading With the Enemy. Otherwise, helium can be artificially produced by bombardment of Li or boron by high velocity photons or alpha rays. A Tesla bulb would do fine. Actually, bombardment of any element below At. No. 19 with a Tesla bulb will produce helium.

Tragitrons used in German ships fed with helium, to produced the propulsive electrical discharges is likely, since I have found so many trigatrons related to flying saucer salvage, and that kind of power produced at the place of usage (the surface of the ships) would explain the brightness of the discharges.

(NOTE: It is probable that a large Tesla coil system (2 coils for each direction, one for AC. and the other for D.C.) surrounded the cockpit area, triggered in 12 peripheral directions by "trigatrons"—triggered, helium-filled spark gaps—fired by 2,500-volt

D.C. trigger currents, actuated by relays connected to the Peiltochterkompass. These could have controlled the discharges on demand, on the hull, thus easing problem of handling such high voltage currents. German technology on trigatrons was first made available to American electrical engineers at large, in 1946[32]. Very little of this information was declassified even by 1959.
The following illustrations regard my view of various German WWII ships:



[32]Published Proceedings of Institute of Electrical Engineering [Proc. IEE, Vol. 93,1959].

VRIL-TYPE SHIP - KT-p2 MOMENTUM
(negative brush discharge)
Pancake Coil around cabin
Fuel
Bottom A.C. Pancake Coil
(positive corona)
Slot around periphery is insulation gap between D.C. brush current and A.C. blocking current.
Top and bottom are insulated from one another.
Top is supplied with pseudo-electrostatic brush current, to create upward and lateral momentum.
Bottom is supplied with high frequency A.C. to block inertia and gravity.
Pancake Coil around cabin
Insulation Ring
Electromagnets
Primary Secondary
Peiltochterkompass
Master Gyro Compass
Tesla Turbine and Alternator
The ring of electromagnets controls location and direction of brush, to give vertical or lateral movements.
Peiltochterkompass has 14 contacts, 2 for the 6v D.C. motor and 12 to sense the master gyro compass.
Tendency of the brush to spin creates precession of ship, which is greatest when hovering.
©1999

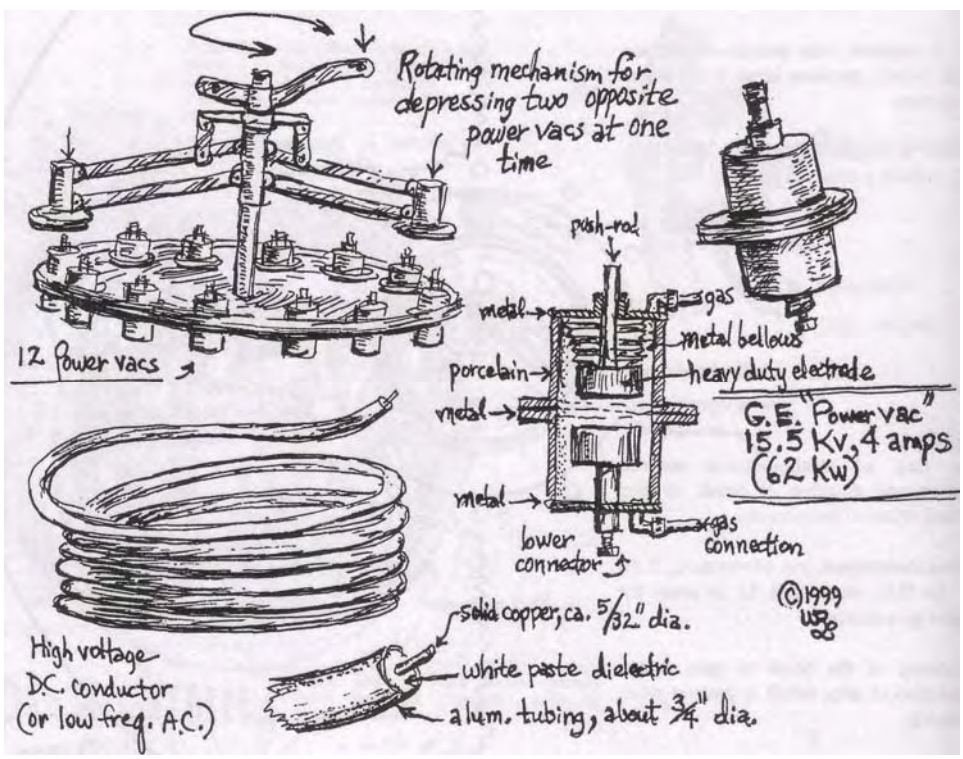
ALIENS211

3. Recent Notes Regarding American UFOs

In 1995, just after I had completed the manuscript for my second edition in August, an "Aurora" crashed and burned near La Luz, New Mexico, just to the north of Alamogordo and Holloman Air Force Base. This material developed too late for me to include in the second edition.

Around five days after the crash, while at the intersection of Old Pecos Trail and Rodeo Road at the southeast corner of Santa Fe, I saw a gray, 'pug-nosed' stake bed truck which had exited 1-25 from the south, as it stopped at a light. It had a CIA license plate on the center front of its bumper. As it turned left to go west on Rodeo Road—which goes across the south side of Santa Fe—I noticed that it had a tarpaulin on its bed covering some debris. It went west to Cerrillos Road, turned north to Siler Road, then made a left down Siler, and took a right down a street leading to a recycling center which I often went to. There, it unloaded its 'salvage'.

The following day, I examined the debris, and even dissasssembled a component. The salvage included the following (drawn to the best of my recollection):

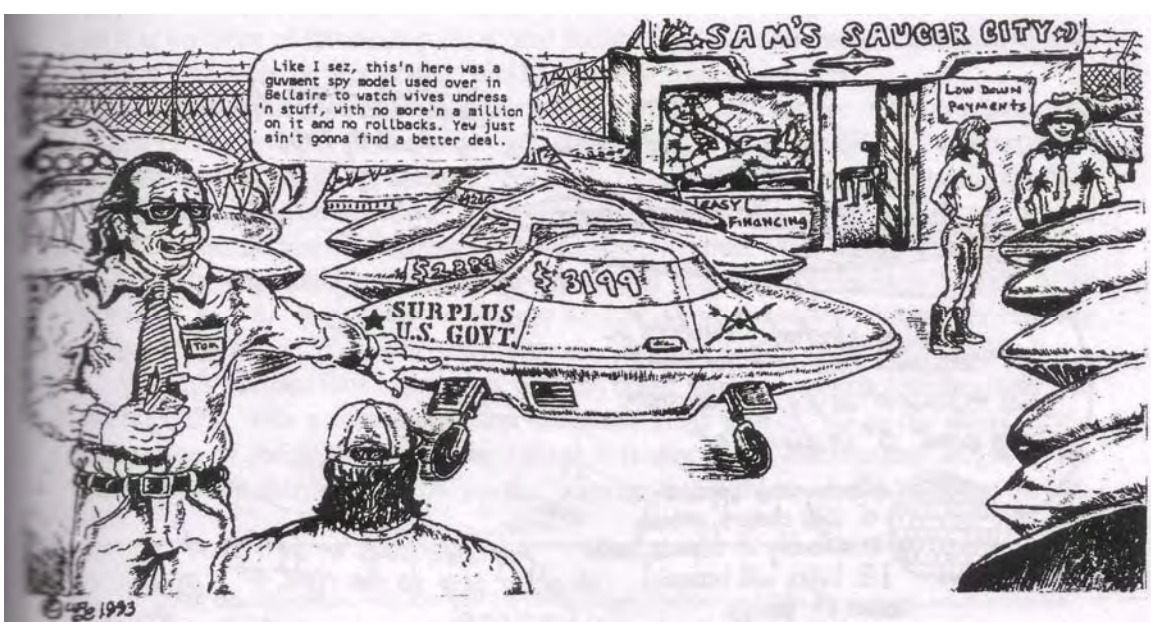


The debris was blackened from the burning, and someone had taken a sledge hammer to the dish, in attempt to deface it, but failed to break a single "power-vac". The entire assembly appeared to be a high-amperage switching system which carried 15.5 Kv current to two places at a time, totalling twelve in all, in bipolar pairs. This seemed to confirm the rumor that the "Aurora" could hover and use "UFO-like" electro-propulsive technology, in addition to its normal turbojet power.

It is interesting that the name "Aurora" is used for this craft, since the discoveries by Kristian Birkeland and Hannes Alfven, that the Aurora Borealis is a giant current from the sun into Earth's north pole, which transfers angular momentum from the sun to the earth, and showed the relation to Tesla's electro-propulsive technology and Dynamic Theory of Gravity.The principle was illustrated by the sighting made by myself and several others as I sat in a hot tub at the Ten Thousand Waves Japanese Bath House near Santa Fe, on the evening of Jan. 26, 1996 (illustrated on page 181). The brush discharge extended above and ahead of the ship as momentum was transferred to it from the ether carriers.

The usual practice in handling debris from a crashed classified aircraft, such as the Aurora mentioned above, is to separate it and haul it to the four winds, using several salvage yards, to avoid detection or identification of the debris, but how could I have missed it with the CIA stakebed, only days after the Aurora crash, coming from the south, with a tarpaulin-covered pile of debris on its bed? Why didn't they just fire off flares to signal their arrival?

Word apparently reached the CIA that I had examined the debris, since the salvage yard owner created some phony reasons to ban me from his yard. He said he had to play ball with the spooks, or they won't bring him any more salvage. The time will eventually come when debris from salvaged saucers will become as common as that from old cars, and there will even be "used saucer lots".

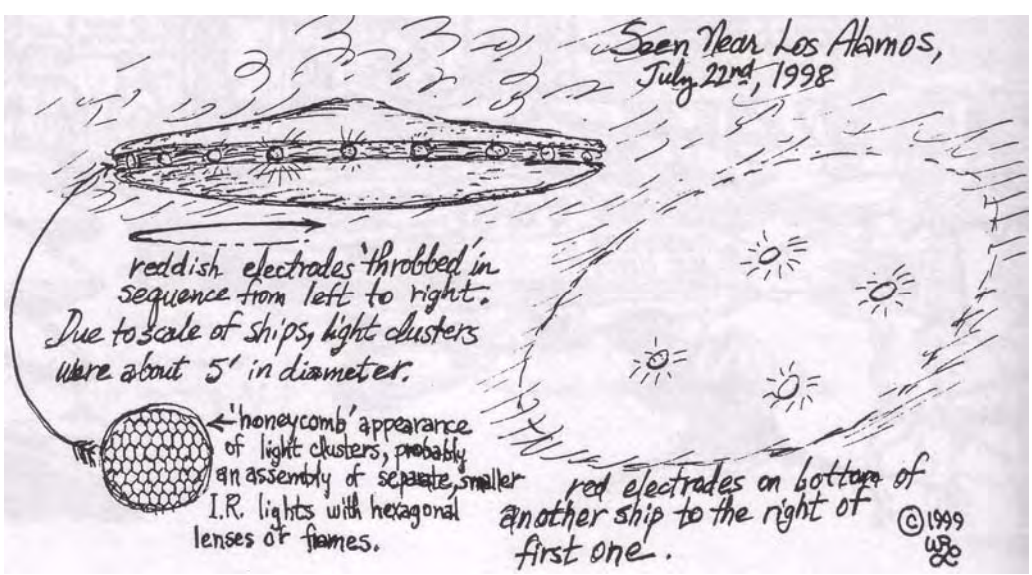


The oblong, lozenge-shaped ship with rounded edges, was about 10,000 feet away, and executed a perfect, circular flight in around ten seconds. Since its circle was around 30 degrees across, its speed was around 2,000 mph. It was around 3/4" long at arm's length, which means that it was around 400 feet long, about 250 feet wide, and appeared to be about 50 feet thick. In other words, the ship was about the size of a five-story building which occupied the shape of the area inside the track around a football field.

On July 19, 1998, 9:21 P.M., my son and I sighted a couple of huge, saucer-shaped ships, as we exited Furr 's Food Emporium, a large grocery store on St. Michael's Drive, on the southeast side of Santa Fe. The ships were hovering and maneuvering between Santa Fe and the 'tech' areas to the south of Los Alamos National Laboratory. Due to the apparent distance to these ships—at least five miles—and their relative size, they were very large, several hundred feet across.

One ship hovered horizontally for a short time, while the other appeared to be hovering at an angle, showing its bottom, which had four large, red lights on it. The horizontal ship had a single row of red lights around its middle, in what appeared to be a trough. These round red lights, which had to be around five to ten feet in diameter, 'throbbed' in sequence, from left to right, becoming bright then dim, one after the other. These were apparently to stabilize the ship's precession, and the fact that they 'throbbed'—increased and diminished gradually in power, rather than "flashed" abruptly—indicated that they smoothed out the transition of force from one electrode to another. This would produce a more stable effect to counteract the precession problem.

The large lights each had a hexagonal, 'honeycomb-like' pattern, indicating that they were composed of many smaller infra-red lights, each mounted in hexagonal frames. This was probably because of the difficulty in getting larger I.R. lights, and the fact that, even though one light might burn out, the others would remain to function until the burnt out lights could be replaced. The I.R. emissions seem to have the opposite effect on the brush as a magnetic field, inducing the brush to follow the beam to counteract its tendency to spin, since the spinning creates the precession when the ship is hovering. The I.R. lights are to stabilize the ships. Here is a simplified drawing:



4. MY FLYING SAUCER DRAWINGS AND PLANS:

Preliminary Technical Background

Having determined that a DC. brush discharge induces movement in the direction it is pointed, by "rarifying" and stretching the ether, Tesla did intensive research with the phenomenon of rotating brush discharge, and how it can be controlled.[33] This research led up to Tesla's proof of concept, by 1894. The rotation of the brush, caused by rotation of a magnetic field, is the apparent cause of precession of spinning bodies, and of non-spinning flying saucers. Since the brush induces movement in the direction pointed, its rotation causes the precessive oscillations. This is also consistent with the rotation of the brush clockwise in the northern hemisphere, and counterclockwise in the southern hemisphere. Since a spinning body carries electrostatic charges as it spins, it generates an invisible brush which moves at a slower rpm, to create precessive movement. Here, Tesla artificially created a rotating brush by inductance, in a non-spinning body.

P^2 (or p2) is apparently two primaries, since two identical pancake secondaries can respond at different wave forms, determined by tuning in each of the two primaries. At one-quarter wave, the secondary will create a D.C. brush discharge. Referring to the illustration on page 197, Tesla's patent #723,188, Method of Signalling, P^1 and P^2 are the two differently tuned pancake coil primaries, each having identical secondaries, run on the same system, which makes them appropriate for electropulsion.

An electrostatic generator is unwieldy and has a low output for its size. The problem Tesla faced was how to produce a pseudo-electrostatic D.C. brush with his small, light-weight high frequency coils. In reiteration, in the page 197 illustration, the coil to the left can be tuned to a quarter wavelength, to produce the brush discharge, while the coil to the right is tuned to a half or full wave, constituting a high frequency alternating current. The brush enables the ether carriers and tubes of force to enter the ship's conductors (the metallic shell), while the other coil compresses the ether carriers so that no tubes of force can pass, so that the ship will have no inertial resistance to hold it back, and it can be accelerated quickly as well as turned on a dime.

Since the direction of momentum will be normal to the surface of the conductor, the brush can be diverted around a curved surface which is perpendicular to the direction of desired movement. It was necessary for Tesla to learn how to control the position of the brush, since a brush-control system (magnets) would make it unnecessary to have a cumbersome system of different coils for every direction. With a simple two electrode system, the ship could be propelled in any desired direction. As stated by Tesla[34], "The rotation may be reversed by a magnet kept at some distance. " "...the fact that the brush turns, as far as I could observe, in any position, would speak for this view."

In his vacuum tube expriments with the brush, using concentric (double, inner and outer) bulbs, with a central emission electrode, Tesla stated: "As to the cause of the formation of the brush or stream, I think it is due to the electrostatic action of the globe and the dissymetry of the parts... ", saying that if the two bulbs had been perfect, concentric spheres, with identical quality and thickness of glass, he thought the brush would not form, since "...the tendency to pass would be equal on all sides. "

---

[33]Nikola Tesla, Experiments with Alternate Currents of High Potential and High Frequency (Lecture before the Institute of Electrical Engineers, London, 1892) McGraw Publishing Co., New York (1904).

[34]Nikola Tesla, Experiments, etc. (Supra) p. 48.

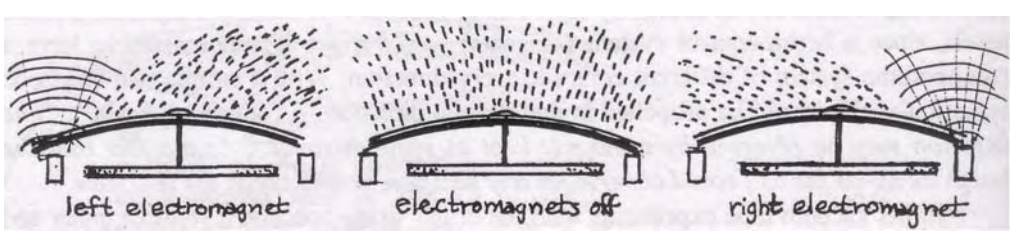
In 1899, after the London lecture, Tesla stated that he had developed what he called his "single terminal coil"[35]. The new coil, which could be in a cone shape or of the "pancake" type, could be tuned to one-quarter wave to produce the brush discharge by means of impulses which have a negative preponderance, or tuned to the half or full wave, to produce the high frequency A.C. current. As said by Tesla earlier[36], "...in alternating currents of very high frequency the positive and negative impulses are not equal, but that one always preponderates over the other. "

The D.C. nature of high frequency quarter-wave pulses have been similarly analyzed in modern times[37], as follows (in pertinent part, emphasis mine): "Since electromagnetic effects are not transmitted instantly from point to point in space...there is a time lag between changes in charge and current distribution on the dipole" which "...allows some of the energy to continue flowing outward even though conditions at the dipole may have changed to indicate an inward flow of energy...as ij some of the electric and magnetic field has become detached from the dipole or 'shaken off' by the oscillation. " The intensity of the emitted wave is dependent upon the increased frequency, and the time lag becomes more significant, since "...the power radiated varies as the fourth power of the frequency. "

Tesla moved his primary to the outside of his new "single terminal coil", with each turn of the secondary (inside it) having progressively increased spacing and insulation, as the potential increased between the turns, toward its single center terminal. This allowed for higher voltages with greater effect, since the vector product of the electric and magnetic force in a region of space determines the extent of electromagnetic momentum imparted.[38] Since, as Thomson said, momentum is imparted to conductors at right angles to the magnetic inductance and current, it naturally follows that Tesla's single terminal pancake coil is most appropriate, because it's flat profile allow it to be conveniently positioned in the ship's peripheral spaces, parallel to and inside its outer surfaces, which conserves space inside.

The first of my proposed ships, of ultimate simplicity, has an electromagnetic turning system, with two coils used for vertical buoyancy, and two coils used for horizontal flight. Two sets of electromagnets mounted peripherally to the front coil are used to divert the brush to the right or left.



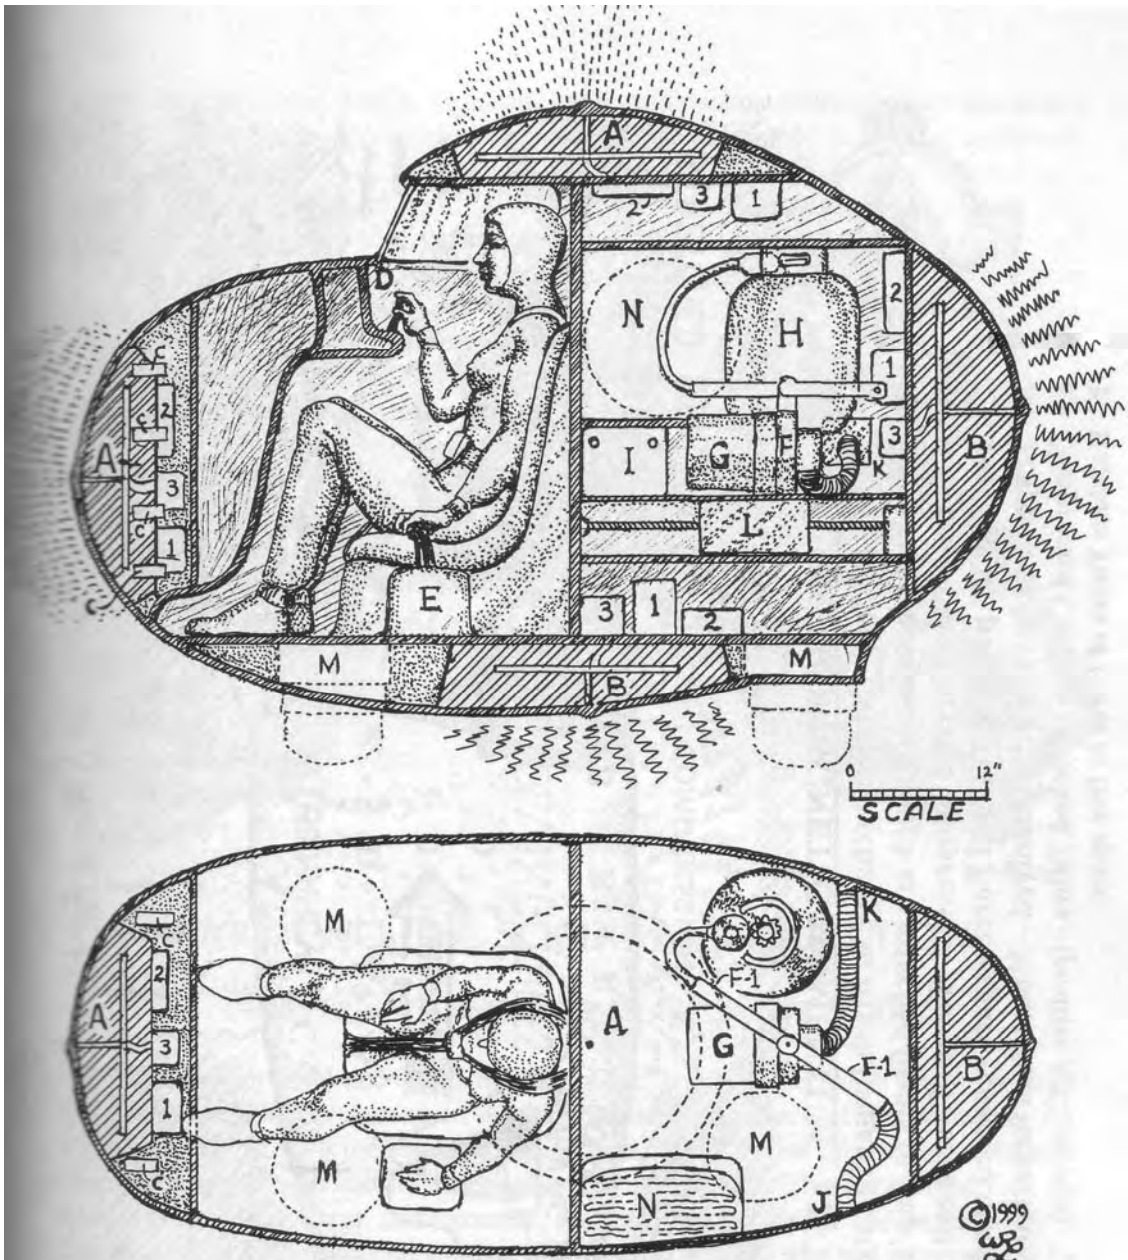
---

[35]Nikola Tesla, Letter, Some Experiments in Tesla's Laboratory with Currents of High Potential and High Frequency ELECTRICAL REVIEW, N. Y. (1899).

[36]Nikola Tesla, Experiments, etc. (supra).

[37]R. L. Armstrong & J. D. King, The Electromagnetic Interaction, Prentiss-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, N. J. (1973).

[38]J. J. Thomson (supra).

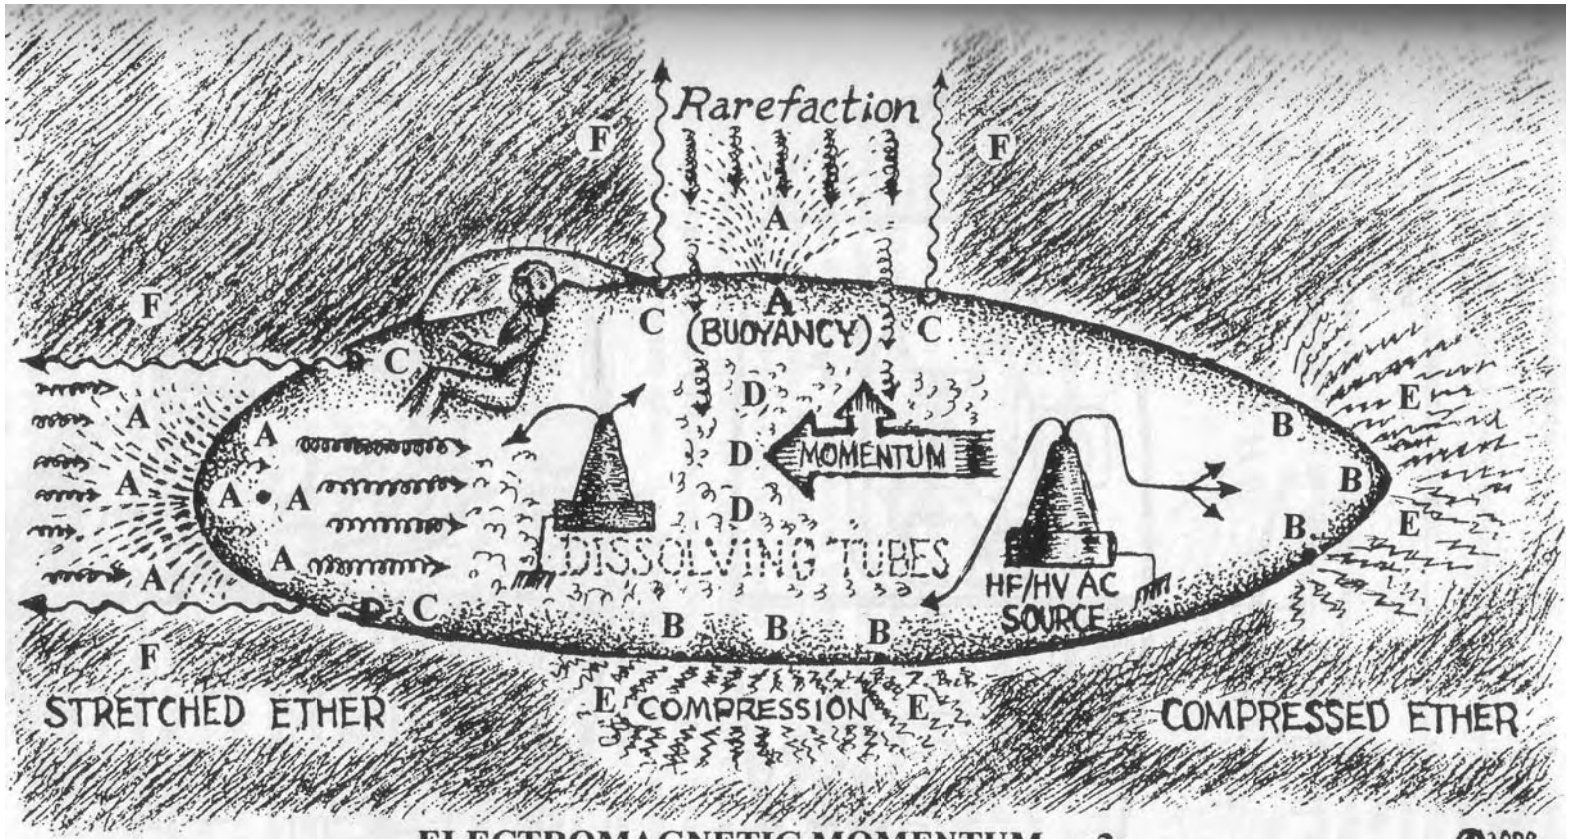


THE FIREFLY

A - D.C. Brush Pancake Coil Modules
- 1 - transformers
- 2 - capacitors
- 3 - spark gaps

B - High Freq. A.C. Pancake Coil Modules
- 1 - transformers
- 2 - capacitors
- 3 - spark gaps

C - brush control electromagnets
D - Turn Control Joystick
E - Power and Vertical Controls
F - Tesla Turbine
F-1 - Valvular Conduits
G - Alternator
H - Propane Fuel Tank
I - Battery
J - Engine Air Intake
K - Engine Exhaust
L - Adjustable Ballast & Servo
M - Pneumatic Landing Buffers
N - Emergency Ballistic Chute



ELECTROMAGNETIC MOMENTUM - p2:

©1998 WL

A - D.C. Potential - Carriers exchange in Brush (negative corona) - Tubes of Force enter conductors which are attached firmly to ship's structure

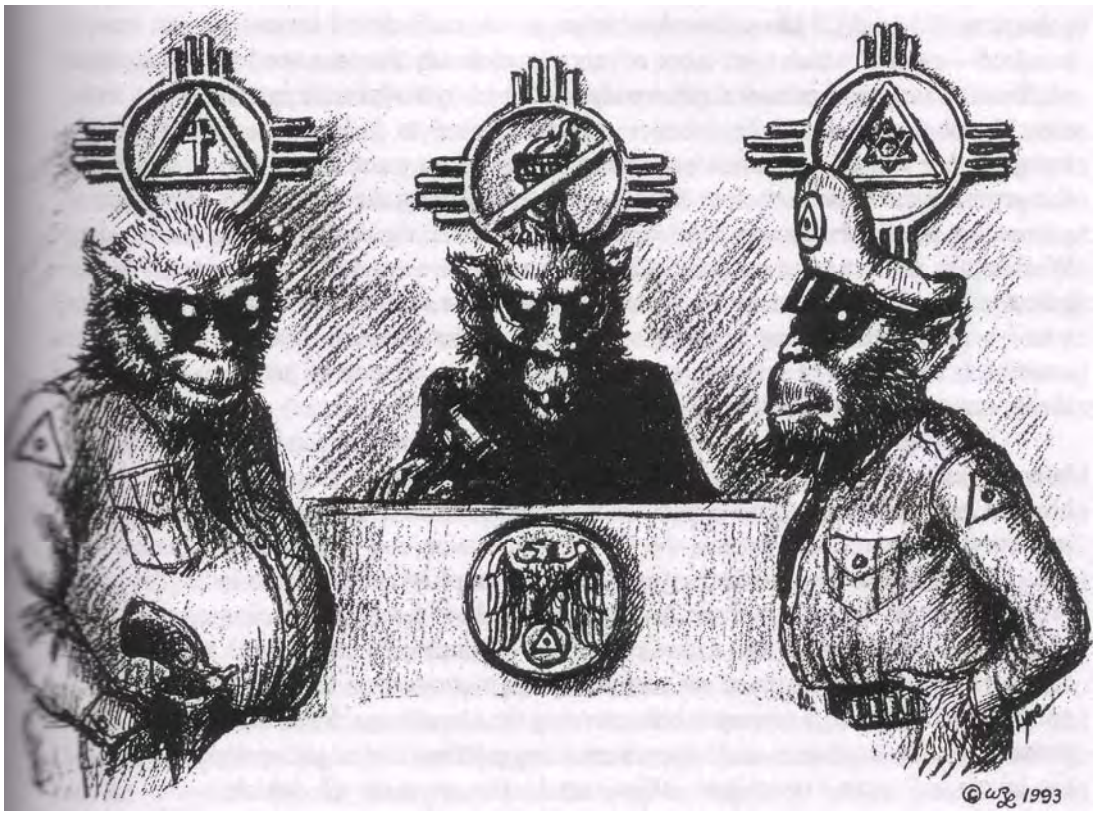
B - A.C. Potential - Carriers compressed - Tubes of Force exit blocked

C - Tesla Bulbs polarize Tubes of Force - space rendered conductive

D - Trapped Tubes of Force Dissolved - Momentum imparted at 10^{40} x fg

E - Compressed Carriers - Blocked Tubes - (positive A.C. corona)

F - Random Tubes of Force in free space



PART TWO: THE SOCIAL MANIPULATION

CHAPTER VI: CANNIBALISTIC FASCIST LITIGATION

Between 1986 and 1992, my family and I were subjected to intense judicial harassment which had nothing to do with the subject matters of approximately six fraudulent and abusive judicial proceedings filed against me or otherwise government instigated, which were mostly disguised as "property" suits. This harassment took up almost all my time, energy, and resources, and destroyed my family. The lead attorney in this abuse was a Jesuit-trained attorney of Sicilian extraction, who had prosecuted G.I.s for the J.A.G., during the Vietnam War. The Jesuits are especially known for their collaboration with the CIA's mind-control experiments such as the MK ULTRA Project.[1] This attorney was what I would call a "judicial torture specialist". Every horrible, dirty, underhanded, cheap trick imaginable was used in this litigation, and the CIA's involvement was obviated by the immunity from judicial discipline which the perpetrators enjoyed, in spite of their overtly unethical conduct before the New Mexico courts, as well as the joyous, sadistic relish with which the judicial turds carried the dirty dealings out in the name of "justice".

During the same approximate period of time, I filed a patent application which was to 'sound out' the patent office to either obtain a patent or see if the P.T.O. is really as corrupt as I'd heard. I have numerous other novel, undisclosed inventions—at least a hundred—most of which were more advanced technically than the one I sought a patent on, but the simpler mechanical, thermodynamic and hydrodynamic invention was more clearly novel, and would be a better sounding board to feel out the patent office's integrity. My strategy was also designed to avoid exposing a more valuable invention to the prying eyes of the corporate-state monopolists, during the supposedly secret patent proceeding. Patent examiners have their many offices in the outlying areas surrounding Washington, D.C., tucked away in little offices which are not under close scrutiny by the patent office. The examiners often have semi-illiterate or mentally retarded secretaries who have no idea of what is going on, so that under-the-table dealings between the examiners and the large interests can be conducted, in violation of patent rules, without the ignorant secretaries getting wise.

---

[1]Cathy O'Brien and Mark Phillips, Trance-Formation of America

One invention I had developed in 1978 had already been stolen by a creep who had been given a new, false identity in America, by the U.S. Army C.I.C., after being brought here under Operation Paperclip at the end of WWII. His specialty seemed to be industrial espionage, and he had the CIA's cooperation and protection in whatever he did. I later received confirmation that the CIA employs such people in an on-going program to steal technology from inventors to be sold to fund their black operations.

The stolen invention was a new kind of solar voltaic cell, created with a new kind of construction technique carried out with a new mass-production technique for producing solar voltaic chips on a conveyor belt, carrying the chips through several chambers. The process used hydrofluoric acid vapor, containing positive and negative dopants, applied to layers of pure, crystalline silica sand, the crystals of which were to be electromagnetically polarized and positioned, before being fused with microwaves. Between the silica crystals, layers of 'sputtered' metals were applied for conductivity. I chose hydrofluoric acid vapor to carry the dopants, since it would etch them into the sand crystals. The process eliminated the very expensive and tedious process involving the growing of silicone crystals in a high temperature furnace, after which the crystals had to be sliced into thin wafers with a diamond saw. Instead, I used silica sand crystals produced in nature. In addition, my automated process was designed to further decrease the price of the cells. Cheap, but durable materials and processes were used throughout. This process became the new industry standard, and has made $millions—maybe even $billions—for the CIA-friendly industrialists.

Within 10 days of the theft of my plans for this invention, a Michigan pal of the thief filed a patent application. The thief also stole over 80 ounces of highly purified iridium (a platinum group metal, worth over $80,000.00 at the time), which I had extracted from ore concentrate, at great risk to my life and health under the circumstances. The patent neglected to include the part about using pure silica sand, and used only the more usual sliced crystal wafers, along with the rest of my ingenious new process. I reasoned that the exclusion of the sand technology was because it has the capacity to make solar voltaic cells so cheap that you could use them as roof shingles, and the invention would become public domain in only 17 years. Such a technology would soon greatly diminish dependency on fossil fuels and electric power companies.

The patent concentrated on my manufacturing process, which increased the efficiency of solar voltaic cells by almost 100%—from around 12-14% to 25%. The invention was then sold to ARCO, a company created by Robert O. Anderson of Roswell, former president of the Bilderberg Group, as I have already mentioned.

The proceeds of this sale were apparently shared by the CIA and its technology thieves, phony inventors, and developers.

My patent application—the one for the transmission invention—was for an off-the-shelf, universal, variable, dynamic transmission, which could be produced as an hydraulic or pneumatic one, in a multitude of forms and sizes. I knew that there was nothing like it on the market or in the patent office, though there were several inventions which had come close, passing right by it, yet missing it completely. Some had parts or sections similar to it, used in ways that showed a complete unawareness of the simple invention lying only inches away. Due to their failures to see the invention, their inventions were no more than inoperable and inefficient conglomerations. My drawings and basic parts of the application and invention are shown in Appendix A. I dedicated this invention to the public in my first edition of 1993, to prevent the corporate thieves from profiting from it or keeping it out of public use.

I knew that under the constitution, the patent office was obligated to grant a patent on this invention, once it became apparent that it was a valuable, novel creation like no other.

By allowing corporate thieves a preliminary look at a patent application, they can decide whether or not they are interested in it. If so, the examiner can run the applicant ragged with all kinds of bureaucratic procedures and fees, intended to force him to abandon his application. Once the applicant abandons his application, the corporation can apply for a patent on the exact, same, identical invention, receive a patent, and grease the palm of the examiner. This prevents the public from using the invention for at least 20 years (about three years are taken up in applying for the patent, and an additional 17 years are added to that), thus slowing down progress, so that the vested interests can continue to promulgate their archaic technology. By the end of that time, if the corporation has chosen not to put the invention into service, it is usually forgotten about.

There I was with a series of CIA-instigated abusive lawsuits against me, and at the same time, a pending patent application. Between the Oct. 25, 1978 invention and metals theft, and the 1993 publication of the first edition of this book, at least four murder attempts were made against me, all of which I could connect to the CIA and its technology thieves. There were probably more murder attempts than that, but the other attempts were more difficult to identify. One of the murder attempts consisted of having children give me food in a restaurant which was contaminated with salmonella, on the same day that a "notice of abandonment" was mailed by the patent examiner from Washington, D.C. The only people who could have known of the mailing of the notice, were those the examiner told , in violation of the rule of secrecy. That occurred in 1992, at which time I began writing this book in earnest, with the determination to publish it, since another murder attempt could succeed, and it would be attributed to "natural causes", and no one would ever know why.

The courts, through a series of judicially corrupt and abusive orders, based on lies, repeatedly held me in contempt without notice or hearing, struck pleadings necessary to protect my civil and property rights, and prohibited me from filing pleadings, in violation of my due process rights. They deprived me of some of my property, forced the abandonment of a patent application, destroyed my family, and subjected all four of us to vicious, treacherous and abusive orders, manipulation, anxiety attack, and intentionally inflicted emotional, physical, mental and economic distress. They impoverished me and sapped my physical, emotional, financial and mental resources. I wanted, and still want, revenge. Can you blame me?

The local trash who carried out these filthy acts were small-time toadies, drug dealers, money-grubbers, property thieves, trashy and crooked realtors, title examiners and insurers, yeggs, and socialist bureaucrats. The people who directed this "machine", were part of a corporate-statist, coercive-monopolist, fascist elite. What this elite fears most is a truly free, creative, laissez-faire, free-market economy, in which a broad base of people participate and prosper. Their "machine" is designed to maintain their control. My many unpatented inventions were the result of intensive research and creative activity I engaged in between 1976 and 1986—ten years. It is my intent to give these inventions to the public to further punish the elite, along with this expose of flying saucer electric propulsion technology, as my revenge for having subjected my family and me to the judicial abuse and deprivation of presence of mind, money, civil rights, human rights, and property.

The civil judicial system is a trap devised by corporate-statists, to ensnare and devour all those whose interests conflict with theirs'. The involvement of the N.S.A. and CIA is incidental to their functions as pawns in the game, under Trilateral Commission orders, to protect the corporate/state alliance from damaging scientific and technological breakthroughs and leaks.

The President is a member of the Trilateral Commission, and he gives the orders which the Commission gives to him. An example of the behavior of this hierarchy is the Gulf War bombings of Iraq in 1992 and 1998. The IMF and Bilderbergers want possession of Russia's natural resources and basic industries, such as the phone system and other utilities—the things people must pay for every day—the same things the elite owns here. Russia's loans from the IMF seem to be unsecured, as the Russians have held back on using their major national resources as collateral, while trying to get on their feet as a free market economy. The elite wants them to use their vast natural resources and utility concessions as collateral for their IMF loans, so they can be induced to default on their loans, with the elite then coming into possession of these resources through bankruptcy and foreclosure procedures.

Russia has an oil deal with Iraq which they need to achieve a valid credit rating, and to pay off existing IMF loans which are continually overdue. The Russians are on their knees, and the IMF and Bilderbergers do not intend to let them get on their feet until they control Russia's natural resources, the same as they control them in America. The bombings of Iraq are designed to prevent Russia's recovery, and primarily have nothing to do with anything else. The impeachment proceedings against President Bill Clinton have been designed to turn the heat up to force him to bomb Iraq for the Banksters. That way, the Russian-Iraqi oil deal will go sour and the Russians will be unable to repay their loans. It is hoped that, through this continual ruin of Russia's attempts to succeed as a free market economy, the Russians will eventually be forced to surrender their resources to the Banksters.

Now that Clinton has bombed the Iraqis once more, he probably won't be impeached. After all, the whole series of incidents involving Monica Lewinsky were orchestrated through a Pentagon set-up, in which a Pentagon employee—Linda Tripp—tape-record her conversations with Monica Lewinsky, another Pentagon employee. This could not have occurred without the approval of national security authorities, something which has never been mentioned in the whole mess. Otherwise, for one Pentagon employee to tape record their conversations with another, regarding the President, would be considered as espionage.

With the supposed crumbling of socialism, the American civil judicial system remains as a disguised means for a secret corporate-socialist state to continue to force its will upon those in its disfavor, favoring litigants within the parameters of its secret agenda, and denying the claims of those who are not. On the face of it, since this system serves only the elite, and provides no benefits to the ordinary American, the system should be abolished, and our rights restored. This includes ending the emergency status which has been protracted to suspend our rights since 1933 (though some think since 1913). We ordinary Americans should not support a civil judicial system which fails to support us and is only for the powerful to keep us under their control. It has been abolishing our natural rights for some time, and should itself be abolished. It no longer serves the interests of the people, and has broken down. We are the damned bosses, and have no duty to serve "the system".

Legitimate conflicts should be handled through a private criminal justice restitution system, or private civil court system, devoid of corporate-socialist conflicts of interest. Only cases which meet a preliminary burden of criminal jurisdiction should be allowed to be filed. The rest should be resolved by mediation, or perhaps "Tanistry" (the ancient Irish system based on Phoenician law).

With these suggestions in mind, we are now going to play a new game, in the following three parts, which I call (1) "The Ninth Amendment Quiet Game", (2) "The Article One (Sec. 8, cl [8], and the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments Property Game", and (3) "The First Amendment End-Run Game" (also referred to as "The Ol' Statute of Liberty Play").

The Patent and Trademark Office's ("P.T.O.'s") rules are designed to loot isolated, individual, dreamer-type—typically eccentric or naive—inventors, some of whom may have only one good idea in their entire lives. Like beneficial insects being ensnared by giant, evil spiders, they are lured into the trap, encouraged by government/corporate propaganda, to seek patents. Corporations, which invent NOTHING (except high-toned slogans and logos), collaborate with the Patent Office, successfully stealing inventions from a steady flow of inventor-sucker applicants with stars in their eyes. This book blows the cover on that scam.

The creativity which has been the hallmark of the American experience is rapidly diminishing with the oppression of our creative people, by denying fair compensation and credit, while exploiting their creative products. Inventors come to the P.T.O. as trusting fools, and under its weird rules, the P.T.O. stabs them in their backs, helping the corporate thieves steal their inventions. If these inventors had other inventions—which most of them do—they would make no further disclosures—which most of them don't—in order to avoid repeating the trauma and disappointment of multiple "patent rape" by the U.S. government and corporate state. I can now speak for these hapless inventors, since I was among them.

While not all inventors' claims are valid, the P.T.O. condescendingly grants many token patents for worthless, inoperable 'paper' inventions, simply because the applications are filed by patent attorneys, conform to the P.T.O.'s weird bureaucratic idea of proper applications, and present no real threat to the vested interests. Though such inventions may be harmless, inoperable devices, the patents may contain disclosures which work to the benefit of the corporations, by creating the false illusion that the 'little fellah' has rights too, provided he goes into hock for a high-priced PATENT ATTORNEY. This false illusion helps maintain the flow of suckers to the patent office. Meanwhile, more valuable applications are denied for purely formal reasons, since the inventions are to end up in the hands of corporate thieves, who may at their whims suppress or confiscate them, obliterating the true inventors with a wall of litigation they cannot even begin to penetrate. Though I have been abused many times by my government, I refuse to dissolve in despair like so many others whom the P.T.O. and the civil litigation system have permanently crushed.

A patent as we know it does not secure anything, except the right to attempt to enforce it in court. The true nature of the right is the inalienable property right of an inventor, to the disposition of wealth he created. Property rights are not created by the government, and an inventor owns his invention whether or not the government grants a patent, which is not true security. "Invention" is an individual, creative process. While we patronize—purely as a legal fiction—that corporations are individuals, we should not extend this fiction to consider them to be inventors of creative products. Corporations should be absolutely prohibited from seeking a patent, or from holding a patent or the rights to one, until after a patent has been granted to the true individual inventor(s). Furthermore, the P.T.O., under our Congress—which is constitutionally mandated with the duty to secure to inventors the properties of their inventions—should have their provisions completely restructured to accomplish the exact constitutional mandate, no ifs, ands, or buts. It is well-known to every real inventor in America, that the system fails to work as intended, and must be changed for the better or abolished.

A. THE REAL ISSUES: THE WAVE OF THE FUTURE

The groundswells in the EAST are moving toward us like a TIDAL WAVE, which the bureaucrats will be caught up in for the same reasons as their Soviet counterparts; they will eventually have to find some form of productive work, after a flabby lifetime of sponging off the taxpayers; many bureaucrats who anticipate the future are already engaged in damage control. (It is even rumored that they are wearing bullet-proof underwear.) A bureaucrat of any kind will never be anything but a leech to the common man. In every socialistic society, the bureaucrats are the disgusting toadies who sell out their fellow citizens, in exchange for a small share of the loot stolen by the power elite. Bureaucrats are not entitled to gloat over the failure of the communist system, since people who live in glass houses shouldn't throw rocks. The issue is not simply whether the state permits religious freedom—as some would like for you to believe—but whether governments have legitimate power to execute, imprison, or punish citizens, or to confiscate their money ('taxes'), or property (or inventions), or in general, their wealth, for the "public good", for bureaucratic convenience, or for the political recalcitrance of their owners or creators, by having disbelieved, mistrusted, or defied the government, or for having refused to obey, or to believe what their government ordered them to believe, or for having followed or advocated a political philosophy or personal, moral lifestyle which was officially declared to be undesirable or prohibited, even though legal; or for having simply asked the question of whether bureaucrats really serve the interests of everyone; or for having suggested that they serve only their own interests and those of an American corporate oligarchy, similar to that which ruled Soviet Russia or Nazi Germany, and still rules certain Central and South American countries (such as "United Fruit Company"), or China (i.e., such as "EXXON", or the "Communist Party", etc.); or for suggesting that they represent illegitimate, usurped authority of a corporate-fascist state, rather then the proper, constitutionally-ordained, limited power delegated by self-governing, sovereign individuals, who lack the authority or right to delegate more authority to any government; and finally, whether such agencies as the P.T.O. operate in conformance with their duties to the American People, which the Constitution originally mandated Congress to enforce.

We can never have a "kinder, gentler society", so long as there is a gestapo-like I.R.S. to force us to pay for the extermination of Iraqis who are in the way of the Trilateral Commission's plan to confiscate the natural resources, monetary system, and industries of Russia, or so long as the doctrine of eminent domain is legal in America.

So-called communist states are in reality, corporate states. Chernobyl was no accident, but rather the inevitable result of corporate-state arrogance, brittleness, recklessness, irresponsibility, negligence, oversight, and insanity, born of seemingly immutable and concentrated monolithic power. The corporate-statist Federal Reserve Banksters exert coercion through police-state agencies like the I.R.S., F.B.I., C.I.A., N.S.A., A.E.C., D.O.E., N.R.C., and S.E.C. etc., to enforce exclusive commercial, industrial, or governmental franchises granted either by or to the state, or through partnerships with the select corporate providers of "public services", who enjoy matrimonial bliss in the convenient (for them, not for us) fascist marriage between "...the state and industry...". In Soviet Russia, the corporations were composed only of members of the Communist Party. Here, the party is replaced by "public corporations", which differ only to the extent of a greater amount of mixed-economy socialism, and some possible token collectivistic participation by the public as "stockholders".

To induce productivity of inventors, public policy must reflect a false illusion of freedom and opportunity, so that the trust of inventors can be maintained. After all, if the people don't present the illusion of freedom, who will trust the Patent Office?

Like their Soviet counterparts, the American government enhances corporate-state power, by assuring the accumulation of technologically creative products by coercive-monopolist corporate partners, through fraud upon individual creative people and the people as a whole. By misfeasance and abuse of the powers of Congress, under U.S. Const. Art. 1, sec. 8 cl. [8], the Patent Office promises a patent under the Constitution, as a means of enforcing a seventeen-year monopoly through litigation, in the name of the inventor, as an inducement for inventors to disclose and to share their discoveries with society, for the advancement of science and the useful arts; that is their "bait". But the P.T.O.'s real bosses are not "the people", any more than those of the Soviet bureaucracy. Its rules have been redesigned since the days of Jefferson and Franklin.

Patent applications are like ripe plums to the elite, all for the picking. Any significant energy, transportation or manufacturing breakthrough automatically becomes a national security secret, which allows the government to remove all evidence of a patent application, to confiscate the invention, and to prohibit disclosures to the public under the secrecy acts. After confiscation, the work is then turned over to the usual corporate-state companies, so they can manufacture secret equipment to be sold to the government at huge profit.

An example was the invention of an artificial fish gill, which separates hydrogen and oxygen in water, on contact, and could be used to power a hydrogen-powered car, etc. (NOTE: Paradoxically, the taking of such discoveries by the secret government, in our name, obliterates our knowledge of the technology. Nonetheless, it becomes public domain one year after the government's acquisition—by about 1974 for the fish gill device—but since such secrets are rarely declassified, we may never know about them.). Other discoveries, which cannot be construed as national security secrets, are steered into the hands of their corporate partners through abuse of P.T.O. procedures, to the disparagement of the individuals who created them, and to the detriment of the public.

If a discovery represents a threat to obsolete technology being sold by the coercive monopolists, the discovery is concealed, and the public never uses it. In many cases, inventors who protest, or refuse to give up their inventions, are fraudulently labeled as "criminals" or "con-artists", by the government, which often adapts abusive prosecutions under the Federal Securities Exchange Commission regulations, or the I.R.S., etc., for the purpose of eradicating competition to their corporate partners.

The greatest threat to the freedom of the people, is official government secrecy, particularly concerning energy and transportation, and coercive, obsolete technological (economic) slavery, enforced by a fascist judiciary which takes its marching orders from the N.S.A., CIA, Trilateral Commission, and the Illuminati (which in our context, involves the upper echelons of the "Knights Templars", and the Jesuit Order—including some within the American Masonic Order...a small, powerful sect some of whom may be found within the Shriners, the Knights of Columbus, the Knights of Malta, the Bilderburgers, or any other secret group, such as the CIA. Some American Masonic lodges have been converted to the Illuminati Order, through the influence of the "Old Prussian, Northern European, White Freemasonry" which was infested by the Nazi "Ahnenerbe". These same powers exist within the Jesuit Order, especially those derived from French and Bavarian sources, after the time of Napoleon. Either way, they get us coming and going.

The greatest threat to the central banks and their underlings—which control basic mineral resources, refineries, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, and public utilities, and other public service cartels fueled by these—is the development of autonomous home-generated power systems, which can power cheap transportation and home industry, and heat and power homes. To make this threat more complete, such power systems should generate their energy from water (hydrogen and oxygen), from the air (combustion of nitrogen and oxygen by electrical spark-discharge), from the earth-atmosphere electrical potential, from cosmic radiation, from magnetism, from non-radioactive nuclear reactors, or from wind and solar power, which the government cannot justify the regulation of because they are safe. The development and use of such systems is completely consistent to the achievement of a pollution-free environment.

The courts insure the cartels against such threats, by secret national security judicial proceedings, binding all judges and courts against all free individuals, under the unconstitutional laws involved.

Corporate-state power rests on control of primary resources, insured by judicial suppression of threatening technology, thus artificially maintaining our dependency. At the top, they are well aware of the existence of numerous inventions which will destroy them, such as the flying saucer, through cooperation with the P.T.O. and N.S.A. Several such inventions have been invented by me, or are represented by my own versions of what I suspect are suppressed prior art, although they may have in fact been my own discoveries. Sometimes you can never know for sure, because of the secrecy and suppression. On occasion, government scientists with top-secret clearances approached me to deny the government's possession of what they believed I was working on, presumably to induce me to disclose a particular discovery to them in a patent application, so they could acquire it through national security priorities. Since I have already been suckered in several times, I won't do it again, and advise all other inventors to do the same. Unless you're a huge corporation, they'll rip all energy inventions off.

The national security confiscation of inventions creates a convenient shield, so that no patents are granted. The discoveries remain secret, never become public domain, and even the inventors are denied access to them. The government chooses who manufactures them, without the knowledge or permission of the inventors. The inventors are denied knowledge of income and value in the secret usage, and the hugh potential profits possible by otherwise public usage, as well as the related benefits of prestige, recognition, and fame. The inventions are appropriated by force, and the inventors given whatever the government decides, if anything. The inventors are threatened with criminal sanctions for disobedience, under national security laws, without the right to public trial. We never benefit, science and the useful arts are not advanced, the constitutional provisions are unenforced or destroyed, and our government has betrayed us. The individual's most private intellectual rights and property—his mind and its creations—has been raped by the fraud and force of his own government. In many cases, inventions are stolen by the CIA, which then creates its own fake corporations to secretly sell the stolen inventions to the government, producing more income for "black operations".

The whining and whimpering by corporate statists, about Japanese or Asian competition, is dishonest, undignified, ignorant, and disgusting. American corporations are at fault for their creative incompetence, and their compromise of the principles upon which a creative and competitive free-market society is based. Those who fear a free world should not be taken seriously. It is they who would drag us into another war for their benefit, by playing on old sentiments, to force us to fight and die for their "right" to screw us and not even kiss us.

The argument that the Japanese do not practice free-market economics internally is impertinent for three reasons, which are: (1) That the competition should be between the best products for the best prices, rather than between nationalities; and (2) that since the U.S. is not practicing free-market economics internally either, the corporations are equitably estopped to complain about the Japanese system; and (3) that since the system which promotes and protects the greatest degree of individual creativity and laissez-faire will be the actual "winner", only these parameters and no others should be considered, in the interest of everyone in the world, regardless of nationality. This is also in the interest of the national security. Trying to bilk a bunch of old veterans of the Pacific war into thinking it is in our interest to erect protectionist barriers, is a lie, and will only hurt the Average American, and empower the elite.

No credit is due to the P.T.O. or judiciary, in the demise of socialism or statism, since they are part of that system, and are still supporting it. All credit belongs to creative people—individual freedom fighters everywhere—whom the corporate-state is against. As part of a world socialist system, our corporate-statists enjoy a greater degree of fascist privilege than their foreign colleagues, and are not entitled to gloat unless they resign. A protest against socialist bureaucratic deadbeats in Romania, Byelorussia, or China, is a protest against them here. The historical clock is ticking away like a time bomb, and they don't know how to diffuse it. Chernobyl was an alarm in the early morning of vast change. It was no wonder that there were no bureaucrats fighting or resisting Big Brother at Tiananmen Square, Concord, the Alamo, or the Little Bighorn; bureaucrats need Big Brother, and Big Brother needs them. Why would bureaucrats want freedom, which would take away their illegitimate jobs and power? Why would bureaucrats, who apparently represent defective human genotypes who are incapable of independent, creative or productive work, want a free system, in which their only remaining means of survival would be as uncreative and incompetent—although more honest—thieves? Why would bureaucrats want completely safe nuclear reactors, which would take away their excuses for regulatory busy-work, and threaten their cozy corporate partnerships?

For obvious reasons (as some may have noticed), our bureaucrats and some large American corporations have been helping Communist bureaucrats in Russia to resist change. That is because, although change is inevitable, they want to insure that those in control in the future represent the interests of the Trilateral Commission, as did their Communist predecessors, and that renegade, truly capitalist people do not end up in control. If true capitalism were to take root in the east, it might even spread to America. More than anything else, bureaucrats fear the insecurities of normal life in a free society, because the security of their guaranteed jobs has crippled their creativity, which is the primary means for the survival and flowering of civilization and the Human Race. They will have to learn to walk all over again.

B. THE SOCIALIST BUREAUCRACY: A CONSPIRACY WITHOUT LEADERS

It has been estimated that out of every five people, three of them must work extra to support the remaining two who are useless government employees or dependents.

The conspiracy between the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the N.S.A., the New Mexico Judiciary, and other bureaucratic, corporate-fascist entities, are united in the suppression of competing technologies, and the continual theft of ideas and wealth from inventors, thinkers, independent scientists, artists, writers, designers, etc.,—or their heirs, grantees, vendees, or devisees. These thefts perpetuate the corporate-fascist system, which is without actual leaders, although there are people who pose as purported leaders. How, you may ask, can such a vast organizational structure continue to function without leaders? First of all, they have almost unlimited funds from us to waste in the process. Secondly, the organizational structure is maintained by a common belief in "collective superiority"—a religion of sorts—promulgated by the Illuminati, which means our bureaucracy is careening down the same road as the alleged leadership of the former Soviet Union, their flunkies. If one examines the so-called leadership structure of the Soviet state from its ineeption—now rendered more obvious due to the relative openness ("Glasnost")—it is apparent that there NEVER WAS any leadership, but rather a mass of people who followed what were proffered by the Communist Party leadership as leaders. The Soviet people followed this pseudo-leadership blindly, until it became apparent that there was no control or leadership, when the system was unable to feed them, and it imploded, as the people realized that all there was, was themselves as individuals, believing the BIG LIE told to them by Marx, Engels, Lenin, Trotsky, and Stalin, all members of the Illuminati. The wall of credibility was broken away by the harsh reality that the gigantic bureaucracy was bleeding the citizenry dry, while living high on the hog, while attempting to sustain the fictitious collectivist juggernaut. It was Immanuel Kant, Georg Hegel, Marx and Lenin who propagated the Illuminati lie...the half-baked idea that "...each idea contains the germ of its own dissolution"—and that contradictions exist in reality. But the untruth of that premise should now be corrected to say that "each FALSE idea contains the germ of its own dissolution".

The germ of dissolution within the false premise of both the communist and corporate-state Illuminati philosophies, is that each fails to recognize the fact that man qua man's primary means of survival is the creative process, and that an ideal society is one which maintains the conditions under which individuality—required for this human, individual process—is maximized. A society in which the "means of production" (i.e., incorrectly thought by the communists to mean all property, but which in reality is the individual) is in the hands of an imaginary, leaderless, collectivist state, ruled by a fictitious "mass, collective unconsciousness or consciousness", is the diametric opposite of one which will foster maximum development of the individual creativity of its citizens.

The single greatest enemy of the creative process is dependency (created by fear and a desire for unearned security) which is the hallmark of any socialist state. Creativity, above all, demands the greatest degree of individual social, intellectual, and economic courage and independence from the shackles of any group. The Florentine Renaissance saw a rebirth of creativity and wealth, because of a rediscovery and emergence of the concept of individual rights, which liberated Europe from the shackles of Byzantine Christianity (comparable to today's "religious right") which fathered the Dark Ages. Where people were burned at the stake or impaled if they uttered anything deviating from the 'divine plan', individualism and creativity were practiced only in secrecy, in a society of shared poverty. A long struggle by humanists eventually brought change, and we are still in the Renaissance, continuously struggling to maintain it, while various Illuminati mystics have sought to bring it to an end, and to usher in a Neo-Dark Age, with them as the secret elite.

There is a great difference between the "THIEVES of Light and Knowledge", and the true "BRINGERS of Light and Knowledge". The deluded mystical Illuminati Trilateralists falsely depict themselves as the "bringers of light and knowledge", while other mystics (Christians, Jews, etc., unwittingly controlled by the Illuminati) openly make war against knowledge, as evil, based on their ignorant misconception that knowledge is the product of "Lucifer". This variation creates a false contrast which makes the Illuminati look better. Meanwhile, the Illuminati confiscates the most valuable knowledge, required for them to control the world, gladly assisted by the conspiracy of insane bureaucrats, secret agents of the state, and the "religious right", on their behalf.

The power-mad Trilateralists-Fascists sustain their power by theft, suppression and concealment of the most valuable technology and knowledge from the people, through the national security machinery of the state, in pursuit of the dual goal of state ownership of the purported means of production, and deprivation of the peoples' means for achieving or maintaining freedom and democracy. They are attempting to return us to a dark age of mystical insanity, to worship the concepts of "collective consciousness" and "cooperation", as "gods", with the essential creative people as slaves, in a "New World Order" (actually an "Old World Order") created and run by them. The religious right is only a temporary pawn in the game. Naziism was their last attempt in this direction, but failed, because their leader, Hitler, like Napoleon, got out of hand, and bit off more than he could chew, just like the Soviet Communist leaders. How many chances does the Illuminati get? Their "Kali Ma" is insatiable, because more people, whom the Illuminati fear, are being born each day, while many are killed each day in fake wars.

The dissemination of knowledge which represents a threat to the secret dictatorship of the Trilateral corporate-state coercive monopolists, is no different than the Florentine humanists defying the fanatic psychopathic criminals who ran the Byzantine Empire. The insanity of those Holy Roman Emperors was exposed by Plotinus, in his Secret History of the Byzantine Emperors, detailing how the Empress Theodora (an ex-whore and dancer from the Circo Massimo) horribly roasted her own child to death in a bronze ox. Her mate, the "Holy Roman Emperor" Justinian, drove 40,000 Mithraists into a hippodrome in Asia Minor, and exterminated them.[2]

The Trilateral Commissioners, like other bureaucrats and professional thieves, produce no wealth, goods, or services, and for all practical purposes, are "on welfare". Yet these welfare bums use our money and resources to pay for the army of bureaucrats which serve the corporate-state, and not us, with their boots on our heads. All hail, Kali Ma!

Psychologically, socialist bureaucrats by nature are uncreative people who are instinctively intolerant of creative people, who constantly remind them of their own creative incompetence and socio-economic parasitism. It is as if certain defective humans are born to serve the Illuminati. A belief in bureaucratic-socialism is a thin veil covering one's own feelings of self-hatred, fear, and creative insecurity. In America, the existence of this velvet dictatorship is not felt through the iron fist of a Gestapo (short for Geheimnistadtspolizei, meaning "secret state police"), but rather through an invisible, deceptively diffused, choking web of bureaucratic regulatory entanglements and litigation, backed by police who go into action only when social ostracism, subterfuge and intimidation fail to obtain compliance, to use physical brutality to execute court or other bureaucratic orders. Though the people are aware of the problems, they are unable to specifically identify them, since the public media controlled by the Trilateral Commission continuously obliterates and confuses the facts.

There is no genuine support for bureaucracy by rational citizens. Only insecure, deluded, or power-mad bureaucrats take pride in such work, and only stupid or gullible citizens believe that these bureaucrats act in their best interest. In spite of the tintinnabulations of a vast army of yapping attorneys and bureaucrats of every guise, representing Trilateral interests, the people innately know the horrible truth, and it has made them weary, and it despairs them to know that they are not truly free.

It is not a thankless task they do, as some self-deluded bureaucrats may pretend; it is a "useless" task which throws monkey wrenches in everyone's cogs. Anyone with ethics would either commit suicide out of remorse or loss of self esteem, or dismantle their agencies, resign, and never seek power again. How they resist the temptation for self-destruction, in the face of such massive public disdain, is an enigma. In the end, they will be martyrs to stupidity and injustice.

---

[2]Otto Benesch, Art of the Northern Renaissance.

There is no accounting of the full extent of the vast waste created by the bureaucracy. Intelligent people will desert the bureaucracy, and find places in the private sector of society. It is all simply a matter of using one's creativity to produce and survive, in a life one can enjoy and take pride in. This simple goal has been artificially made to seem more difficult by the chaos created by the Illuminati, mostly through those in public disservice.

C. TRAITOR JUDICIARY

Members of the American judiciary and bar associations have betrayed a sacred trust and duty to enforce our Bill of Rights, and are hated by the people for breaching that duty. A seemingly impenetrable wall has been gradually built up by the massive volume of past legal decisions and precedents, creating a barrier between the judiciary, and the people who are entitled to demand its sendees. There is massive disrespect for the judiciary and legal profession, which is responsible for a great deal of the crime committed by helpless people, who see no other way out of their problems—created mostly by the government—since the)' lack access to the system.

This one segment of our government is singly responsible for greater damage to us than all the other dangerous subversive and other traitorous elements in our history. They have intentionally misinterpreted our Bill of Rights and Constitution, pretending to misunderstand the concept of natural rights upon which our civilization is based. The general public disdains all lawyers and judiciary because of this, even though many of them as individuals do not have an articulate understanding of their rights. Many Americans who have the most profound ('practical' rather than theoretical) understanding of their natural rights, are among those we generally refer to as the "common, ordinary, working people of America".

The failure by our judiciary to protest, stop, or reverse the erosion and destruction by government of constitutionally guaranteed protections of our inalienable rights, gives aid and comfort to the enemies of democracy (and the enemies are among us), and this negligence is recognized by the people as treasonous. The only response to a more flagrant public hatred of lawyers, for example, was a widespread program of false propaganda which the bar associations unleashed on the American public in 1992, as if the only problem was one which could be cured by false propaganda, when the fact is, our judiciary panders only to those whose vested interests give them a stake in corporate socialism, because the newspaper and other media giants of the Illuminati control the political process through which they are elected. If they do not obey their bosses, replacements will promptly be found. For that reason, corrupt politicians are more persistent than honest ones, which are few and very far between.

A government which abuses the rights of the individual—any individual—because of his individuality, or his conflict with a voting consensus—will get no genuine respect in return. What may be misinterpreted as "respect", is only fear. I think it was either Henry David Thoreau or Walt Whitman who said something like, "When the rights of the many shall take away the rights of the one, the rights of the many shall suffer". It naturally follows that when the 'rights of the many' suffer, the power and jobs of those responsible should be abolished by the 'many'.

The New Mexico judiciary often writes its civil opinions in a psychological lock-step which unerringly elevates procedural bureaucratic rules over just results, because a computer can do that for them. What else should one expect in a red-necked backwash? Their 'judicial software'—designed by the corporate-state judiciary—gives them the most bureaucratic answers, and relieves them of the responsibility to think, sustaining the most extreme positions their supposed discretion allows, continually increasing government power. Only judicial incompetents take such opinions—so lacking in merit, and corrupted by compromise—seriously. The gross lack of cognitive skills—in decisions produced in 'canned English', on legal word processors—exemplifies what I call the "new judicratic callousness". This cognitive incompetence, which began to emerge particularly in the '60s, has finally oozed all the way to the top of the judicial garbage pail, as if the weight of so much fresh garbage has forced the most putrefied, liquefied slime to the top.

Teams of clerks, 'paralegals', and secretaries with word processors, mechanistically dish up superficially formal, substantively deficient opinions which are replete with juvenile smart-ass-type retorts—the only 'original' remarks in the opinions—to the protests of their victims. A computer can have no greater knowledge than its programmer or user, cannot replace human consciousness, and cannot truly conceal the lack of cognitive skills of a judge. We can do without the entire civil judicial system as it now stands. The lack of reasoning skills has finally percolated clear to the top, because the Illuminati wants it that way. They don't want judges who think, but judges who obey.

When something does more harm than it does good, you simply don't have it anymore. There is no inalienable right to file a civil suit, and no constitutional mandate to have a civil judicial system. The Constitution merely states the limitations of such a system, and since these have all been destroyed by the present Illuminati system anyway, let's end it, and avoid future headaches, expense and injustice.

GAME NO. 1: THE NINTH AMENDMENT QUIET GAME

Like pleadings in a court, a patent application discloses one's creative product. I wanted to plumb depth and intent...to confirm or deny my suspicion that I was being forced to deal with devious and evasive bureaucrats, out to help the Illuminati steal from us private 'suckers', with the help of a phalanx of those pompous corporate pederast-whores we call "corporate lawyers", backed by beady-eyed, obedient, fascist. Dobermann-Pinscher-type political cops.

The State of New Mexico and its judiciary, for example, perceives its vested interests as being tied to the history of nuclear weapons development and the nuclear energy industry, as well as the petroleum and coal industries. It is also tied to the tradition of a perennial carpet-bagger "Santa Fe Ring" syndrome, payoffs and bribery, public works money scams, and bullshit politicians, all so easily manipulated by the corporate-state bag-men, the N.S.A., C.I.A., or F.B.I. The system involves uranium open-pit or strip-mines, numerous 'star wars' projects, top secret bases and 'experiments', secret gestapos, weapons tests, and countless security measures and employees. All these magnify the opportunities, to manipulate the judiciary under clandestine "national security laws". It also involves vast amounts of 'federal' (i.e.

'our') funds, as a reward to the "state" (bureaucracy), for following Illuminati orders. Befehl ist Befehl! Very few private citizens question the concept that the New Mexico judiciary has been 'punked out' by the Feds.

They finally pushed me over the edge. This book was a "landmark" decision, unlike those of judges who grovel in obedience to the government and its corporate masters. It is a significant departure which directly challenged the arrogance of power, and advocates a course of action by creative individuals, to bring about an eventual reversal of events against the corporate-state and a corrupt judiciary. It is a kind of 'technological Ghandiism', advocating a passive resistance by creative people, to the "consensus-fascist" system which utilizes deceit, secrecy, subterfuge, character assassination, and the manipulation of the judiciary and public opinion, to fabricate stare decisis and a consensus, used to support its own actions and rulings, usurping and concentrating more illegitimate power each day. Such a fraudulent system is a threat to the survival of a truly free and creative civilization, which we have never fully attained, but can still possibly do so. We must keep our hopes alive, and cannot reserve our challenges until after the present system has already erected a system of gulags, in a role reversal to the policies of Stalin, Hitler, or Mao.

I long since came to the conclusion that there is no one out there responsible for "justice", so I intend to mete some out myself, or at least to incite some inquiry which can lead to justice. The exclamation will undoubtedly be heard: "Well, who does this guy think he is anyway? We'll just tighten the screws on him, and shut him up for good."

The answer is: I am an individual, independent, creative citizen, who is completely proud of what he is and what he advocates, with a completely clear conscience in respect to his motives and actions, despite the derogatory rulings of petty bureaucrats, none of whom can ever say the same. I only regret allowing myself to become a victim of the judiciary and its bosses. As they say in the law, "Where there's a wrong, there's a remedy." It remains to be seen that the 'remedy' is not in the law, but elsewhere. This book may be considered as my "96 Theses", nailed to the government's door (ala Martin Luther's 96 theses nailed to the door of the cathedral), in a new kind of "reformation", involving a new international philosophical movement of creative, autonomous individuals. I believe I represent the future in this endeavor.

A SYSTEM IN CONTEMPT OF OUR RIGHTS

Though my views on the legal profession may seem harsh to lawyers, I will say to them that the only hope for obtaining the future respect for their profession is by restoring the highest values within the legal profession, for the Bill of Rights, as absolute rights, which is precisely what the constitution says they are. Deal with it.

Since the litigation against me was incessant for over seventeen years, the judicial harassment, along with harassment of any kind encouraged from anyone else, amounted to a permanent denial of my rights to free speech and press. Since the public deserves to know the truth, it was imperative that no more time was wasted, and I published my first edition.

Those in the judiciary probably won't like what I am saying, and would probably like to put me in jail to shut me up, although it has been their usual method to use more indirect tactics, such as citing me for contempt and fining me in the district courts to intimidate and impoverish me or silence my criticism, by constant vexatious orders, including some which not only struck pleadings, but physically removed them from the record to prevent me from further documenting their abuses. Their intent was clear, and my book has proved their assumptions wrong. The connections between attorneys, judges, and the CIA is well-known to some, and while I could point out specific people, it should suffice just to say that the CIA people are there, illegally, all over "city hall".

Let there be no secret; while I respect what the bench is supposed to represent, I see almost no one on the bench who meets up to acceptable standards. As my rights (nature) permits, I have a personal contempt for gutless judges, because the bench deserves better, if it is to exist at all. I actually believe that more acceptable people might be found, despite what everyone says, though I could be wrong. Judges should be completely objective, fair, unbiased, and with unswerving adherence to the Bill of Rights, without regard to the race, religion, ideology, credo, or 'accident of national origin' of litigants—both plaintiffs and defendants, even "Texans"—or witnesses. We should settle for nothing less. This selection should be made strictly by testing procedures which are adopted by Congress. Only those who score the highest should be our judges. This "objective system" would result in more representation by minorities anyway, because those who have been abused should be more inclined to take the Bill of Rights seriously, anyway, and should score higher on the tests. The highest standards for the judiciary are imperative. Though the ideal will always be diminished by practice, we must start at the highest level.

My personal contempt is for gutless, simpering weaklings, who appease sociopathic thug civil attorneys, and the criminal plaintiffs they represent, by allowing them to bend them like pretzels, to obtain fraudulent judgments and orders, and who lack the strength of character to do what is right, and yield to undue influences and pressures, to do what is wrong. I have contempt for those who have unjustifiably shown contempt for me, my rights, and the rights of all individuals, by implication. I have contempt for those who betray their sacred duty to preserve and protect the inalienable rights of the people. Even 'second best' is unacceptable.

It takes no courage by a judge or a court, to maliciously attack the rights of a single pro se individual, or to characterize him as "litigious", because he seeks justice in protection of his rights, and restitution for wrongs done to him and his entire family. Such decisions are no more than cowardly repetitions of the acts of thugs whom the courts have a duty to sanction. In this way, the courts have damaged the rights of all individuals, by attacking the rights of one individual, and by joining with the gangsters and pandering to the worst elements in society. It places our courts right in bed with the criminals and other socialist free-loaders, including rich corporate ones, which makes it a form of prostitution.

Decisions by the judiciary which are unconstitutional for violation of our Bill of Rights, are void, for lack of jurisdiction or of legitimately delegated (or "delegatable") authority from us (as the "consenting governed"), to render them. Such decisions deserve no respect, even if they are 'unreversed' ones, and are grounds for impeachment, because they represent more than mere opinion, but constitute official acts which consciously ignore or destroy particular constitutional inalienable rights of the people without any legitimate authority, as definitive "high crimes and misdemeanors" which are attempted to be passed off on us as "law". Until we have a congress which is capable of identifying such acts and investigating and prosecuting the same, we will never restore our American Republic.

Perhaps it is obvious that I am not being "nice". I am not in the mood for "nice". The time for "nice" is past. To put it more bluntly, there is nothing in my copy of the Constitution which says I have to be nice to blood-sucking parasites whom I hate, because they have violated my inalienable rights, my life's work, my property rights, and savaged my family. I am not asking them, who owe me, for anything, since it is the resources of victims like me which feed their parasitic lifestyles. The actions of the P.T.O. and the judiciary show that they are completely devoid of the spirit of the American system, or concern for human rights, as envisioned by the genius of Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin, both inventors. It was no coincidence that they and all the other signators of the Declaration of Independence died as paupers. In their day, the corporate-state system—called "mercantilism"—gave rise to the American Revolution. That revolution is betrayed multiply by the P.T.O., the judiciary, Congress, and the bureaucracy, who do not deserve "nice". They deserve revolution.

The government has perverted our Charter of Liberty and made it into a tawdry wall decoration—a relic of the past—in pursuit of rigid, socialistic, bureaucratic convenience and "order", truly in sycophancy to coercive monopolists (A.K.A., "mercantilists"), who are favored as their natural partners, in a collective ownership system, in which the government gets the power, the cartels get the money, and we producers of all the wealth, are naturally the slaves. Public dissent has been perverted to illegal demands by a minority whose beliefs happen to mesh with corporate-statism, induced by the government to make their demands upon the judiciary and government, seeking to enforce their personal beliefs upon us, and to punish disobedience as a crime. This threat to return to a corporate-state socialist neo-dark age must be stopped. These symptoms of the disintegration of our great society are caused by the misfeasance and malfeasance of the judiciary, bureaucracy, and government of, by, and for itself.

GAME NO. 2: THE ARTICLE ONE (Sec. 8, cl [8]) AND FIFTH AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS PROPERTY GAME

I have something in store for the "creativity thieves". "Really!" (they exclaim). I have done this before, and I know its works.

In anticipation of the present state of affairs, I took care to see that I had another, superior product "waiting in the wings" as it were, invented long before my birth by someone else, used in a new way, to obsolesce my invention, as my insurance from the anticipated theft. A creative inventor should always be able to "out-create" common idea thieves. While this may be untrue for many of the poor little inventors whose less prolific discoveries have real merit, yet are stolen nonetheless, leaving them without a remedy, because they have no funds for attorneys, this is not completely the case with myself. Though I may lack the large sums required for attorneys—as pointed out by the crappy little patent examiner, though no interference had been declared—I am not a poor little inventor with only one idea; I have hundreds of them, and more to come, at my own discretion, on demand. I am rich in ideas, and rich in the ability to have them. They can take away one, and I'll produce two more to replace it. Then I'll see to it that foreign competitors receive the two new ones, just to punish the thieves in America. All I have to do is describe them. Foreign industrial spies are everywhere. They scoop up every American suggestion as it is uttered, and proceed like ants to convert them to reality. I must warn the coercivists, that their days are numbered by the lag in progress their suppression has created. The tigers are at the gates, and who will make them respect natural rights, even yours, after you have set the example of abuse and neglect?

Since I am not rich and powerful (in terms of money and influence), the only recourse I now have is to exercise my right to determine the disposition of my more valuable, undisclosed inventions. They are mostly very simple, but highly unusual. For example, in comparison to the invention for which I sought a patent, they greatly depart from the relative degree of novelty. Consequently, I will not share my other inventions with the P.T.O., or with the sick government which employs it, and it will never control what else I have in my bag of creations. In this way, it has betrayed and caused the constitutionally ordained patent system to fail. I will also urge other inventors to refuse to play its game. It is the government which has, in fact, abandoned a legitimate patent system. People cannot be forced to invent, as shown by the example of the recently fallen communist states. Now perhaps creativity and freedom will evolve.

Like the New Mexico judiciary, the P.T.O. exaggerated bureaucratic technicalities, in order to circumvent the obvious merit involved, and attempted to treat everything as if it represented "nothing". This was to protect the corporate thieves from the "doctrine of anticipation", in their patent application, similar to the courts' treatments in the case of the real estate and tort claims, to avoid the doctrine of res judicata. I expected both of these frauds, and was proven correct by the courts and P.T.O.

The implication can now be constructively drawn from the rulings that I am just a "frivolous type of person", and that my other inventions—which I may transfer to foreigners— do not represent a loss of any valuable technology from this country, in the P.T.O.'s view, in which it deferred to the false validity of the New Mexico litigation. We can be confident in the 'correctness' of their rulings, since my credibility was systematically impugned, and there should be no cause for worry, and they should relax, since nothing I said had any merit, in their opinion. I had intended to use the profits—under the remote possibility that my anticipations of corporate/government fraud turned out to be unwarranted—to finance further disclosures and patent applications on my other inventions, for the mutual benefit of myself, American industry, and the advancement of science. The P.T.O. and New Mexico judiciary stopped this meaningless process. Bravo, bureaucracy! The P.T.O. need not inquire into whether or not it delayed or obstructed scientific or technological progress, or abatement of the environmental/energy crisis, since none of my inventions could have helped to bring this about. It is the government, and it is never wrong.

ENERGY SLAVERY AND INVENTION THEFT

I decided in late April, 1991, that if I can't have what is rightfully mine, I will not share my other inventions with the American government, and will file no more disclosures or applications. I conceived the particular invention in 1967. It is admittedly 'low tech' in comparison with my many other inventions, which range over several fields, and include new means of nautical, aeronautical, and automotive propulsion, numerous energy and power generators, new aircrafts and aerodynamic applications, boats, engines, electric motors, wind, solar, magnetic, super-conductor, and laser applications, semiconductors, manufacturing processes, chemical and metallurgical discoveries and processes, as well as numerous types of "safe" nuclear electric power generators, all but one of which uses no radioactive materials whatsoever. They eliminate the need for a nuclear regulatory commission, or "W.I.P.P.", as well as all the monumental expense, "busy-work" jobs for bureaucrats, and other associated waste, problems, and expense to taxpayers and productive people. In general, my inventions are to liberate people from corporate energy and political slavery. In reality, no ethical person has anything to lose by the widespread use of such inventions. This entire freight train of ideas was derailed and abandoned by the P.T.O. and the National Security Agency (of the Trilateral Commission). When Nikola Tesla took almost the same approach as I have, the.F.B.I., with the aid of a specially trained German S.S. nurse, tortured him to death, learned the location of all his secret files, and impounded them under the "Alien Properties Act", even though he was an American citizen. Those secrets ended up in the hands of the Nazis, thanks to our F.B.I. That was in 1943. The Nazis traded the materials to the Rockefellers and the U.S. government, during a 1945 stalemate, and a large part of them are now stored in Los Alamos, New Mexico.

New Mexico could have built itself a new 'clean' industry future around my discoveries, but its officials viciously kicked me in the teeth. This shows how ignorant people can be led to cut off their noses to spite their faces. Some of you readers may be familiar with "...the Bear, the Bison, and the Muskrat..." (the code names for the top "Soviet" bombers in 1957—designed by an American, rejected by Congress, and, as we should not be surprised—sold by him to the Russians).

New Mexico won't make a dime off me now, or create a single job, and can continue its self-made bondage to government jobs and the large corporations, for judicially abusing me and damaging my credibility. For this they get nothing! Blinded by petty jealousy, they couldn't see that they were being "motivated" at their own level by the CIA. The issue is not what "this Texan" gets or doesn't get, but rather who gets what I still have, and it won't be them. For slumbering lethargically away on their rights, people must buy foreign-made goods which are superior to American goods, all because they failed to control the corporate state.

For example, in 1980,1 conducted what is now called "cold fusion" research. I obtained pronounced heat results using several methods, one of which requires no input energy once the reaction is initiated. I do not describe it as "fusion". The process—now well-known, because later explored in Utah—was not good enough in comparison to better ways I developed, so I abandoned it. I then intentionally leaked the process—with the addition of some ingenious misinformation—to one whom I suspected to be a spy, because I had already been ripped off several times, and wanted the personal satisfaction of watching the thieves turn slowly in the wind of ridicule, as they choked on their own snot.

In the form I leaked it, the process is a very inefficient use of the true principles involved. It will, when properly designed and constructed, produce a continuous, external current of 50 KW, almost indefinitely, using a non-consumed, cheap, easily obtained, 1-mole fuel sample. The Utah experiments yielded relatively smaller net gains in energy, because the scientists were attempting to proceed according to accepted methods. I watched them beat their brains out unsuccessfully trying to explain it, with pleasure. Of course, there are readers who will disbelieve me, refusing to concede that an amateur scientist could explain what the experts have failed to explain. The answer can be found in my book, Occult Ether Physics. As it turned out, the spy, who is still a friend of mine, was working with some Mormons who were unconnected to the Trilateralist rats who had ripped me off before. He was sincerely doing what he thought to be the right thing, by taking the information to people who at least had the guts to try. No mon, no fun, I won. Poetic justice. They shouldn't have stolen my secrets, and denied credit where it was due. The spy is to be credited however, for properly interpreting the obvious undermining of my credibility by the state/Trilateralists, all the way back in 1980, as proof of the value of my inventions, and for placing the discovery into the public domain in the most spectacular way, which I believe was their intent. They sought my secrets after a very powerful New Mexican had benefitted from a 1979 theft of one of my inventions, which worked very well. That beneficiary will eventually suffer a loss as a result of my present actions, and the "domino effect" applies to aligned interests.

Another good example: My cousin (a mathematical and electrical and computer engineering design genius), was pursuing an electrical engineering degree, and was forced by circumstances to drop out of college in 1957, taking an approximately $2.00 per hour job with Texas Instruments, in Dallas. Within a few months—when he was nineteen—six full-fledged engineers were required to execute his designs. In 1957, he showed me his original circuit design for the integrated circuit, drawn on a small scratch pad. For this discovery, Texas Instruments gave him a $100.00 bonus. This circuitry was incorporated into America's first satellite, and was a great "miniaturization" breakthrough. Credit was shared among two of six engineers who worked under Mark, building the things he designed.

In 1970, T.I. fired him, because he had no Ph.D.; he received no credit, and only a pathetic wage for his billion-dollar discoveries. T.I. also later marketed his personal, hand-built computer, which he left in his office when he moved out of it, as their "Table Top Computer". He received nothing for that either, and did not fight for his rights, although he now works for a company he created, designing perhaps the world's best medical computers, which are used by the foremost medical facilities, including the Mayo Clinic, the Einstein Institute, and the San Francisco Medical Center. He should be at least a multi-millionaire, but because he is a pre-occupied, somewhat reticent, creative genius, his rightful millions went to common thieves. So much for Mark Daniel Broussard, genius.

The first major invention I lost, was one I invented in 1948, at age ten. My own father gave it to the patent thief. The thief filed his application for patent in 1950, just after my twelfth birthday. This invention is everywhere. The second major invention loss was attributable to my own negligence, by allowing a friend to use it on his competition drag-racer, built in the shop of Jim Hall, the well known car builder/racer, in Midland. Texas, in 1967. It was appropriated by Hall and ended up at G.M., and was initially used on the Hall-built Ford Chaparral, Grande Prix, CanAm, and Indy cars driven by the Unser family of Albuquerque, where Jim Hall is from. The discovery is used throughout the high performance automotive and racing field today, and has even appeared on mam high-end sports cars. I discovered and tested the first automotive "ground-effects" system, when I was fourteen years old, in 1952.

Such situations as these are commonplace. The few stories the public hears about, involve inventors who survive the onslaught of corporate intrigue and power, and find competent legal representation. From creativity studies[3], it is known that creative geniuses are often neurotic to the point of being semi-disabled, as a direct result of their creative abilities, and vice-versa (that certain disabilities and illnesses are often related to a higher creativity)[4]. In fact, a "neurotic phase" in the creative cycle, is generally recognized. This phase usually precedes the "productive phase". In such phases, the consciousness is often altered to increase the probability for a "bisociation of two or more previously unrelated matrices, on the pre-conscious level"[5]. The phases are often intentionally self-induced by creative individuals, as the price they must pay for their creative productivity. While we all benefit from this phenomenon, the inherent naivete or disabilities of inventors makes them vulnerable to con-artists, the government, doctors, lawyers, and corporate thieves. Where such individuals are looted from and denied reward, they may afterward pursue generally four courses of action, which are: (1) To continue in a more or less permanent state of neurosis, in which they no longer produce; or (2) continuing as usual, masochistically getting their teeth repeatedly kicked out; or (3) becoming 'normal', and never creating again; or (4) continuing to use their creative process to obtain revenge and to change the system. (I have opted for this last alternative, and advocate that other creative people do the same.)

It is in the interest of everyone to see that our creative geniuses receive just rewards for the work they do. Failure to do so will leave our problems unsolved. If society punishes them, it is punishing itself.

TRIUMVIRATE OF INJUSTICE

The P.T.O. is the "Vacuum Cleaner of Creative Minds" for the cartels. The judiciary is the "Extinguisher of Competing Claims" for the cartels. The lawyers are the "Hit Men of Problem People" for the cartels. The cumulative effects of this triumvirate of injustice, is to enslave humanity, and to bog it down in its problems, with the cartels posing as the "saviors apparent", by dosing out whatever stolen "solutions" it chooses, at the most opportune moments of prolonged agony—usually created by them—calculated to extract the greatest degree of continued dependency. This cycle can be broken and rectified only by restoring justice for those who will provide the solutions. Ironically, the P.T.O. may find itself unknowingly registering some of my inventions in the future, under international patent treaties, but may never know which ones were mine. They've already issued several patents on some of my inventions anyway, stolen by their friends. My 100 or so other inventions will still benefit mankind, with the exception that American corporate thieves and others will be eliminated from the major action, by those of my choosing, who will receive the benefits in the particular fields of application. Not only will the American corporate thieves be deprived of the opportunity

---

[3]Creativity and Learning (an anthology edited by Jerome Kagan, the Beacon Press, Boston, 1967).

[4]Dr. Edgar Mayer, Genius and Prolonged Illness, WISDOM MAGAZINE, Vol. 3, No. 25, May 1958.

[5]Jerome Kagan (supra).

for theft, but will be deprived of profits, and will be punished by their foreign competitors. Didn't they 'trade with the enemy' during WWII? Turn abouts fair play.

The only track record I have in patents is for being ripped off. I hold no patents, so, at my option, it is only a matter of determining who gets to rip me off, by giving the edge to competitors of the 'domestic rats', rather than to allow them to rip me off, through the P.T.O. or other con-artists. The thieves who have profited from my prior inventions will know this is no joke.

For a prolific, yet relatively poor, inventor like myself, there is no protection under the U.S. patent system as it now stands. I have so many good inventions that there is no way for me to proceed with applications and disclosures, because the system is almost too expensive and time-consuming, even to process a single application, much less over a hundred. And the answer is not to provide federal funding for an army of legal creeps in Washington, to process the applications of "poor inventors", because that would only create increased abuse and leakage of patent secrets to the Illuminati. I could be swamped with interference proceedings on a single application, leaving all other applications abandoned on bureaucratic technicalities, such as failure to respond in time, caused by judicial interferences. The P.T.O. has stated its rigid position on such interferences in my first application, and would not consider them, so I will no longer consider them. The P.T.O. therefore, always has the option of throwing the game in favor of the corporations, to unjustly enrich and empower them. The system as it now stands cannot meet the constitutional requirements, is unjust, and like the judiciary, will collapse under the weight of its own self-created bureaucratic flab, duplicity, incompetence, and deadwood.

Where some of my inventions are composed of several novel elements, each of which would support an independent application, requiring conceivably months of work to segregate to the satisfaction of the P.T.O., the problem is further complicated. In the case of one single application, over three years and considerable work and expense have been consumed. The U.S. government in general is to blame for this quandary. I cannot leave my work stored in notebooks, or in my mind, only to have the P.T.O. reject a future application as abandoned, on the basis that I have 'secreted' it away, when in reality, the past shows that I can't secret something away which I never had an adequate opportunity to disclose, or to protect after disclosure. They won't consider such a defense, since I tried it and know. So the P.T.O. has its rules, and I have mine.

I was plagued by Trilateralist/Illuminati invention-thieves, who looked for opportunities to steal other multi-million-dollar discoveries so they could get filthy rich. while I languished away in poverty and legal problems created by them, with my credibility destroyed by the corporate-state fascist judicial yeggs.

Therefore, I will simply see to it that the general public or foreign competitors end up with my inventions one way or the other, and there is nothing the corporate state can do to prevent it. If I am to be ripped off, I appoint the public or foreigners, or both, as beneficiaries, rather than my own government and its fascist corporate partners. I had rather give my discoveries away even to enemies than to see traitors profit from them. In the future, this writing can be referenced in retrospect, to confirm the fact that a warning was given beforehand, stating how the problem developed, and that the government refused to take any action until it was too late.

I now lay the blame at the feet of the P.T.O. and the American Judiciary (particularly in New Mexico), and the manipulatory corporate-fascist U.S. government.

History often shows in retrospect, injustice, stupidity, or wrongdoing. I don't relish being viewed in the future as a tragic loser who was ripped off without a fight, so this testimonial fixes the blame for future problems, enabling the future to judge whether the government was rightfully convicted by me, and whether the ends of true justice were served. Those who put my name in their judgments will now have some of their names placed in mine, in the court of public opinion. Now it is their turn to defend themselves.

GAME NO. 3: THE FIRST AMENDMENT END-RUN GAME (A.K.A. THE Ol' STATUTE OF LIBERTY PLAY)

But these actions (or non-actions) are insufficient to adequately punish the corporations or the U.S. government and its judiciary, or to hold their feet to the fires of creativity, so I have yet a third part to my revenge, which involves the most symbolic of all invention rip-offs. If it previously appeared to be of value to anyone, to deprive me of that one patent, or to deprive me of some small property holdings and rights in rural New Mexico, or to smash my life, that value will eventually be seen as a huge blunder on the part of the P.T.O. and the New Mexico Judiciary, which directly triggered (1) my refusal to make further disclosures to the P.T.O. of my other inventions; (2) my transfer of inventions to foreign competitors; (3) my publishing of my research and inventions; and (4) the publishing of this crazy old book, SPACE ALIENS FROM THE PENTAGON: FLYING SAUCERS ARE MAN-MADE ELECTRICAL MACHINES, © Wm. R. Lyne, 1993, 1995, 1999.

CREDIBILITY ROULETTE

Without actual proof of what I assert, the government will have to be content with the unanswered question of whether or not I really have the inventions and knowledge I claim, and whether their conduct will be worth it in the long run. The government will just have to gamble with my credibility, and take its own risks as to whether my punishment will be real or fantasy. We can play "credibility roulette", with this book (the pistol) pointed at its head (the most valuable secret of the Illuminati).

It is not necessary that my book be taken seriously by the government, since, in response to my legal pleadings, the legal numskulls said that my requests that my constitutional rights be observed, protected and enforced, were all just "fantasy and fiction", and "frivolous". In the government's view, this book should be considered as written with "tongue-in-cheek", and not intended seriously. Meanwhile, you who are individuals (the "reading public") can examine my book, do some research and experiments, and decide for yourselves its value, in spite of the Illuminati's attempts to mold your thoughts beforehand, with over forty years of BIG LIES.

Bureaucrats naturally underestimate the power of the individual, since they are collectivists who lack a concept of individuality. I would have said this much sooner had it not taken me so long to gain the opportunity between harassments. Even though I am aware of the danger to my family and myself, and since there have already been several murder attempts, any one of which could have succeeded, I say this while there is an opportunity to do so, to remove their motive from the equation. Besides, it is really they who are afraid of the truth.

I have no duty to exclusively share my ideas and discoveries with a degenerate government which maintains illegitimate power by punishing, impoverishing, stealing from and enslaving individual creative people whom the government sanctions as its victims, through perverted laws, awarding the victims' productivity to itself and its corporate thief partners, under the banners of the "public good", "justice", and "national security". Government-backed coercive monopolies are criminal conspiracies, which should be prosecuted, abandoned, denied support by all people, and deprived of the fraudulent and illegitimate use of our government by consent of the governed, as a deceitful and fraudulent means of private coercive control and power.

If American citizens are unable to dismantle this system, by withdrawing consent they never gave in the first place, by deprival of the legal method to do so, creative people must now create a unity of purpose, to "go on strike", to use the ultimate power of individuals to deprive the system of power, for treasonously militating against the most fundamental human right of all, the right to the freedom and protections which are essential to the exercise of the individual creative process by all, in a creative and abundant civilization, rather than one ruled by the fraud, deceit, extortion and the brute force of coercive monopolists, through bureaucrats they control, who should each have to earn their own bread, rather than to mooch from us.

The thing which has made America great is its Bill of (human) Rights, guaranteed by our Constitution as absolute (inalienable) rights, required to maintain the conditions essential to the free exercise of the creative process, as civilized man qua man's fundamental means of flourishing and survival. Whether called socialism, fascism, communism, bureaucracy, coercive monopoly, or any other name for dictatorship, the rights and conditions essential for creativity are being destroyed. An awareness of these facts are bringing some individual Russians and Chinese to their senses. Humanity is composed only of individuals, who are not "national resources", each of whose right to life is an end in itself. Individuals must engage in a peaceful revolution to overthrow the insanity of collectivism, and to re-establish the human creative rights necessary for humanity's survival and flourishing, in peace, throughout the world.

The judiciary as it now stands is traitorous, lending aid and comfort to the enemies of democracy and our Bill of Rights. Not a single yellow government judicial or legal son-of-a-bitch has stood up on his hind legs and protested this, as a treacherous failure of sacred duty. The 'legal profession' is the single most treasonous conspiracy in America, and is an indispensable part of the corporate-state conspiracy. The damage done to me by the P.T.O. and the New Mexico judiciary, is a symbol of their damage to all. Whether they justify their acts through phony-baloney double-think, judicial decrees or "office actions", I have been provoked into justifiably punishing them through rightful means, for the good of civilization, by exposing them, withholding my future disclosures, and by disposing of my own creative products as I deem fit. in a way predicated to bring the maximum detriment to them and their kind, even at the future expense of millions of dollars lost to myself, which I will never see anyway, because of them. The public must know the truth about how the cartels are oppressing all people by suppressing knowledge, especially flying saucer technology and other secrets relating to energy and transportation.

D: AMERICAN DISSIDENT TRIALS, MURDERS, TRIBULATIONS, AND MASSACRES

Some readers may ask what this chapter has to do with flying saucers. This 'secret' is only one of many. The disease of secrecy threatens to take over everything, until every citizen obtains information only on a "need to know" basis, just as if he were in the CIA. That is the logical conclusion of a totalitarian police state. This book is about how a jungle of LIES has been created, by perverting all the instruments of a purported "democratic" society, for the ostensible purpose of protecting something called "national security", but which, if left unchallenged, will eventually lead to our complete enslavement. At this very moment, I hear the roar of the jet engines of military fighter planes, as they greedily slurp up expensive fuel, when a flying saucer operates on practically nothing. To some deluded people, the roar of the jets is synonymous to "protection" and "freedom", but to me, it is the sound of "waste" and the "draining away of the abundance created by the sweat and blood of the American People". In the words of Patrick Henry, "Is life so dear and peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery?"

When life-threatening violence is stirred up against you by the CIA, with law-enforcement personnel instructed to provide no protections, you cannot take matters into your own hands to obtain justice, because that is what they want you to do, and almost anything you do might become an excuse to throw you into jail, where your life can be snuffed out in a minute. Though the things they are doing mark them as the lowest of sociopathic criminals, you must understand that the only way to defeat them is to refuse to make the wrong, impulsive move, so they can't depict you as a "violent", "bad", or "mad" person, and treat you accordingly. You must design effective countermeasures, and carry them out.

I once naively believed that, under the "Anglo-American System of Jurisprudence", only a "real" criminal could be convicted and sent to prison. What a delusion! It came home to me in 1980, that in New Mexico, they can and do frame, convict, and send innocent people to prison, and that this is one of the easiest places in America for them to get away with it. This is nothing new in America, witness the examples of Wilhelm Reich, Sacco and Vanzetti, Leonard Peltier, and a host of others. The only difference is, that the Feds have learned from experience, and do it slicker today, thus confining the knowledge of their criminal behavior to only a few dissidents and perhaps their trusted friends.

A lot of what this book is about is how I managed to avoid a million pitfalls, and survived long enough to tell you these things. To avoid legal entanglements, I intentionally excluded the names of many people, even after an attorney friend in Santa Fe advised me to include the names, on the basis that "the truth" is a "good defense" to a suit for libel. But I didn't hear him guarantee representation in case I was sued because of following his advice.

I am sick of lawsuits. Putting in the names could provide a "wedge" for potential instigators of suits, to further impede my informing you on the corporate-state Illuminati conspiracy. An unwanted libel suit against me, a pro se party, could enjoin my efforts. This book is not intended as local petty gossip, or a local-type expose, to be applied only to the local scene, but is a handbook for analyzing and defining the same methodology at work everywhere. Most of the yeggs are weaklings who have already surrendered their identities as individuals anyway, so why flatter them by giving them identities they really don't have? And, of what use is a "good defense" to a lawsuit, when there are no honest attorneys to take cases before judges who get their marching orders from the Illuminati? We can turn the tables by denying them the satisfaction of filing suits, to make money for attorneys, or to make them "heroes". We must boycott this fraudulent legal system.

One's attorney can be compromised, intimidated, or just plain "bought off, in several unsuspecting ways. One way is the "referral service", in which they are given another case, providing plenty of income over a longer period of time, with ultimately greater career benefits and prestige. Another way is to accuse them of "Rule 11 violations" (frivolity), threatening to drag their name through the mud of ethics and contempt proceedings, and hit them with fines and sanctions, etc., unless they drop the case and concede victory to the other side. Other ways are to use sex or drug inducements, or plain old physical threats or intimidations. The state tort claims liability act allows state-employed members of the A.G.'s staff to "pay off' your attorney, in settlement of a claim against the state, without you ever knowing about it, dismissing the suit, while your attorney pockets the money. This is just plain old bribery, but they can and do get away with it. Another way is to appoint your attorney to a position such as county attorney of this or that county. Every single one of these tricks were used on attorneys employed by me. Once your eyes are opened to these tricks, the possibilities abound. The bottom line, however, is that most attorneys are yellow, money-grubbing Shylocks, who avoid controversies like the plague, except those they fabricate.

"Sacharov-type dissident trials" in America are similar to those of the former Soviet system, and the Chinese Communist "mass propaganda show-trials". Of the two, the Chinese system is most like ours, prohibiting publicity in suppression cases, to avoid arousing public suspicions in a so-called "democratic society". The victim's rights to freedom of speech and press are often denied without him ever realizing it. In China that hardly becomes an issue. Our system is becoming more "Chinese".

The CIA ingeniously creates "Kafkaesque" judicial harassment which is seemingly unrelated to the object, appearing to be 'random litigation', difficult to connect to its real source. Constantly tampered and stolen evidence, missing, falsified, and incomplete records; constant set-ups, falsely induced situations and trickery; judgment executions, threats to confiscate and sell your personal property, constant, unannounced visits to your home by sheriffs deputies and process servers; perjury and false witnesses, constant false allegations, personal attacks, assaults on credibility and character; induced breakup of one's family; sham trials, false contempt proceedings, compulsory appearances, interruption of work, harassing discovery proceedings and orders, reduction of earning capacity, fines, expenses, grillings over every detail of one's personal life and invasion of privacy; all gradually building a false record against an innocent victim, and a massive computer information file which is readily available to the government criminals perpetuating the judicial terrorism, so that any information which they wish to exploit can be instantly programmed into the next phase of their plans. In America, this can be harsh, because it is covered by the hypocritical illusions of "freedom" and "due process".

Does this sound like America? It is and has been a reality for me, and it has been made to appear to be the result of "property dealings"! In reading this book, you should ask yourself if the kind of person I am, who would devote so much of his time to science, art, creativity, philosophy, and "true justice", would be capable of creating 17 years of litigation for himself, just so he could remain poor, and be unable to realize anything from his dreams? Why would anyone who had never gotten anything out of any lawsuit, except less than was already his, have any reason to remain involved in court proceedings which in the past have only unjustly deprived him of time, money, energy, property, joy, life, and countless other things? Very few, if any, of the "newsworthy" aspects of this abusive litigation were ever reported in the press, after the initial "Big Bird" publicity, since the guilty parties suppressed publicity in subsequent harassments, knowing further wide publicity could arouse questions of legitimacy among ethical citizens, to possibly redound in my favor.

It is immaterial as to whether or not a victim discovers the motive or identifies the true instigators, who are able to misuse the power of the state to conceal their crimes, the knowledge or evidence of which could prove a cause of action for violations of 42 USCS secs. 1985 and 1986 (Civil Rights Act). Ha! The victim will be unable to continue the (undesired) conduct, and "suing" is out of the question, because the harassment takes all his time, energy and money. Designed to disturb bis mind and autonomous nervous system—like the attacks of S.S. "psychiatrists" in pre-WW II Nazi Germany—the victim's inability to pursue the (undesired) conduct is the object of the litigation. The negative reinforcements are designed to create "conditioned (neuromuscular) responses", like Pavlov's dogs. The process is designed to destroy the victim's individual identity and will power, by invading the privacy of his mind and body, through "object lessons", compelling him to take the desired course of action or non-action, as if he had done so willfully.

After the psychopolitical earmarks of the process became obvious, I became determined to produce this book, once and for all, even if I had to write, illustrate, print, bind, and distribute it myself. As it turned out, I actually did all that in my original edition of 1993, and first reprinting of 1994.

I would like to point out that, the techniques through which the CIA has sought to perfect "mind control", is best demonstrated by experiments in which they actually created "Manchurian candidates", such as John Charles Whitman, who shot over 22 people beneath the tower of the Main Building at the University of Texas, in the summer of 1967. By directing certain psychological harassments and conditionings toward particular unsuspecting subjects who meet psychological profiles revealing their vulnerabilities, they subliminally induce them to follow a certain course of action. Since I was present during the Whitman massacre, and almost got hit by one of his bullets, the situation got my attention. Did you know that as a Marine, Whitman was trained with Lee Harvey Oswald, at the same Marine "assassin school" in Japan? Whitman, from Florida, was also one of those "good Catholic boys" who had made it to Eagle Scout. At the time of the massacre, he was being treated at the U.T. medical center, by the same CIA psychiatrist—a Dr. Smith—who had previously treated Jack Ruby while he was in jail in Dallas, for killing Oswald...until Ruby died of cancer of the knee, thus neatly tidying loose ends, such as the possibility that he might talk. Whitman also had a terminal tumor (in his brain), planted by injection, which he supposedly knew nothing about, but I believe he found out about it. Two murders, two tumors, same psychiatrist, and the same CIA connections and training. As was pointed out by Jim Garrison, former New Orleans D.A., David Feme had engaged in extensive medical research on behalf of the CIA, developing field methods for causing cancer in unsuspecting victims (such as giving them an injection of turpentine). Does this ring any bells?

In order to discover how to defeat the Illuminati and our crooked judiciary, one can refer to a book given to me by the Air Force in 1958, written by Duane Thorin[6], a former "psychopolitical" victim. Thorin was a Navy warrant officer and helicopter pilot, who based his book on his experiences as a P.O.W. in North Korea in the 1950s. He was also the person who inspired James Michener's The Bridges at Toko Ri (which was made into a movie starring William Holden).

The fictional hero/victim in Thorin's book discovered that the psychopolitical "interrogators" used "mood control". After discovering what a victim wanted most of all—such as a simple bar of soap, because the prisoner wanted to bathe—they deprived him of it, thus controlling his moods, intended to psychologically break down and override his conscious resistance, until he gave them what they wanted. The interrogators concentrated their "work" on leaders. This method worked on many, if not most victims, but not on the hero in Thorin's book, who discovered that he could exercise his individual discipline and knowledge to defeat the criminals, either by pretending to want something he did not want, conditioning himself to want nothing, or simply playing a cat-and-mouse guessing game with the criminals.

In my case, they were firmly convinced that real estate was the way to control me. However, "...the wheels of justice turn exceedingly slow, but grind exceedingly fine", and since judicial psychopolitics and abuse are not "justice", the "grinding wheels" of our judicial system are crumbling and running out of time as the system is being squandered on abuse, and is not respected by anyone, even the people who run it. Truth and justice can flow from falsity, but lies and injustice which are artificially made to flow from the truth, will eventually destroy the system, demoralize those who run it, encourage defections, and destroy the liars, by invoking the wrath of the public. Today, the self-esteem of lawyers and judicial professionals, and respect for them by the public, is at an all-time low. The public hates them, and a revolution is at hand.

The CIA motive in my case, was clearly to conceal flying saucer and other alternative technology, and to coerce my compliance to their wishes, by psychologically imprisoning me through judicial abuse, while silencing me with false contempt orders and litigation ad infinitum, concealed from the public by suppression of publicity, lies in the court records, and occasionally lies in the press.

During the most intense six-year period of this litigation, my typical day consisted of my arising at around 4:30 A.M. with pleadings boiling in my mind, to commence drafting the day's pleadings. I would then begin typing them up, while checking legal authority carefully to be sure my points were correct. As the clock moved toward the deadline—I had to complete the typing by 4:00 P.M., eleven and a half hours later—I would be working at a feverish pitch which barely left time to travel to Santa Fe, to reproduce pleadings, to serve them on the opposing side, and to file them with the District Clerk.

As an example of the kind of energy and research the CIA puts into these kinds of activities, I present the following facsimile news clipping from around 1980:

---

[6]Duane Thorin, A Ride to Panrmuniom. Henry Regnery Company, 1956.Z

CIA attempted to hide 'mind control' project

The Washington Post

WASHINGTON - The Central Intelligence Agency in the 1950s sought to use Georgetown University Medical Center in Washington to hide "a cover organization for highly sensitive projects" in "biological, chemical and radiological warfare," it was learned Saturday.

Top secret CIA documents made available to The Washington Post disclosed this purpose without mentioning any university's name. They spoke, too, of plans for research in "psychological fields," "natural toxic psychosis" and "what makes people pass from mild disorientation into delirium and coma" - all fields that fit then into the CIA's aim to investigate mind control.

An informed source said these and other documents referring to "research on terminally ill cancer patients" pertained at least in part to CIA aims at Georgetown University.

The documents provided some of the first specifics on CIA goals at Georgetown since the disclosure last week that in the mid-1950s the CIA channeled funds through the Geschickter Foundation - a foundation directed by a Georgetown professor, Dr. Charles Geschickter - to establish a secret base for sensitive studies.

Dr. Matthew F. McNulty, head of the Georgetown University Medical Center, on Saturday said nearly two weeks of research and interviews have turned up no evidence that any research ever was done on medical center premises on the CIA's behalf or with hidden CIA financing.

But he also conceded that he is still far from completely informed or sure of what happened there in the 1950s and 1960s.

The evidence, he said, is that the CIA indeed tried to establish a secret mind-control research center at the university.

And he called this "an abuse of an institution's integrity and independence of operation and decision making," and an attempt to distort a place that should "always be overt, not covert."

"They didn't approach us above board or by open declaration," he said. "They apparently utilized foundations and institutions of repute and through them obtained the services of scientists, but never with any disclosure to the institutional leadership responsible for the conscience and ethics of Georgetown and other universities."

Back in 1975, when the CIA job was offered me, the Oil Queen had somehow gotten the idea that I was a "junkie", a misconception she derived from a conversation about "smoking dope" (marijuana), which she thought meant heroin. She then offered a "deal sweetener", saying that, if I accepted the offer, her associate, a (CIA) psychiatric nurse named Pat, who worked in an Albuquerque hospital and lived in the Sandias, would provide me with 'any kind or amount of drugs I wanted', at CIA expense. As I later learned, the CIA had sent this nurse to our O.S.O, meetings in 1966. This kind of CIA hypocrisy has now come to the attention of the American public, and they want it stopped.

Believe it or not, the 'justification' used by the CIA for keeping O.S.O. under surveillance, was because Howard Rourke, the fictional hero in Ayn Rand's novel, The Fountainhead, had used dynamite to destroy a building he had designed! By some twist of 'reason', they used a fictional 'incident' from a novel, to construe our philosophical/literary study group as a potential threat to the 'national security'! The sickening truth was, that our very reasonable group (which advocated 100% laissez-faire capitalism, along with the dismantling and abolition of the CIA) unknowingly conducted its weekly philosophical discourses for the ultimate benefit of the CIA spies sent to keep an eye on us. Seeing no mad bombers in our midst, and knowing a good thing when they saw it, they just glommed onto us like parasites, using us as a surrogate 'think tank'. They were as smart as cancers, and just as insidious. They learned to walk like us, talk like us, and think like us, but no matter how hard they try, there is usually something in their act, such as contradictions between premises and lifestyles, which shows them to be counterfeits. Their behaviour is the best argument I know of, to support the existence of "aliens". The following two clippings show the kinds of "subversive" activities sponsored by O.S.O. in the late '60s, at U.T.:

This ad was purchased by the Organization for Students of Objectivism after the Texan staff's third failure to print the information contained herein.

THE AYN RAND PROGRAM

Sundays at 10:00 P.M.

KUT-FM (90.7 m.c.)

Jan. 7: Theatre and Motion Pictures I
14: Theatre and Motion Pictures II
21: The Role of Law
28: The Press I

Feb. 4: The Press II
11: Neitzsche-ism
18: Humor
25: The Draft

Mar. 2: Romanticism vs. Naturalism
9: Robber Barons
16: Interview with Nathaniel Branden
23: Psychology of Literary Preferences
30: The Student Rebellion

Sponsored by the Organization for Students of Objectivism—a university student organization.

ORGANIZATION FOR STUDENTS OF OBJECTIVISM will meet from 7:30 to 9 p.m. Thursday in Business - Economics Building 261. Those attending will hear a recording of a speech by Nathaniel Branden on "An Introduction to Objectivism." The public is invited.

In 1976,1 had began researches in metallurgy—particularly on the platinum group metals, primarily for energy uses—and in 1978, had succeeded in 'dropping' (precipitating in a high-temperature metallic solution) a considerable amount of indium, by a rather simple, cheap, and novel method. I had already lost a great deal of these metals in some accidents along the way, but in 1979, I had a 99.9% pure 80 ounces minimum of iridium, valued at approximately $80,000.00 at the time. Due to my lack of knowledge, I was unable to identify the metal until Oct. 23, 1979. The only person I told about this, was the Paperclip-connected neighbor, who had gained my confidence. Meanwhile, only his yegg, named "Dave", knew the location of the metal in my home. The metal was in the form of finely divided powder, which only he could have identified, or known the location of.

In early 1979,1 had been tricked into another legal involvement, by the yegg, Dave, who had once done an ingenious arson job for the CIA in the Caribbean. He was a former member of the State Police who had been kicked out after running over and killing a child while drunk on duty. He had also worked on a sheet metal crew with my former father-in-law, at the Brown and Root shipyard in Houston, during WWII. As far as I could determine, they were all closet homosexuals. Dave was not a Mason, but the rest of them were. He was also the only one of the group who had never become a millionaire. Brown and Root apparently had a whole cluster of 4-F closet queen Masons working in their shipyard sheet metal shop, one of whom was from the Brown family itself. The 'defense work' allowed them to avoid the draft. It seemed to me that the connective thread here was a closet homosexuality within the good Ol' boy Masonic network. If this sounds like sexual bigotry, please bear in mind that these guys are not civil libertarians, but coercive monopolist crooks who will kill to conceal tiheir secrets.

The real estate fraud was induced by Dave through a young man—also named "Dave"—who sold his body to some of these closet queens, and who has since been sent to the nut-house several times. As I overheard Dave remark to the young male whore, "First set him up, then knock him down" (referring to me). The male whore was also a student of a Santa Fe (closet bisexual) C.F.R./Illuminati/naturopathic physician, whose Chicago father sold platinum metals to the U.S. government. The neighbor knew I was involved in platinum metals research, and hired Dave to investigate this for him and a group from Chicago, including the naturopath and his father. Many of these Chicago associates were Europeans who were given new identities under Operation Paperclip, following Hitler's 1945 stalemate deal with 'us'.

The operative's approach was to get me to go out to remote mining locations to explore for minerals and stake out claims. As any con artist knows, the 'bait' is a promise of something to the 'mark' (me), which in this case, was the claims. It was contemplated that, while in the process of prospecting, I would eventually disclose the details of my platinum research, source of mineral concentrates, and method of recovery.

The claims which I staked out, however, were not for platinum metals, but for a 97% pure silica sand. In this respect I had developed a new and cheaper mass-production method for the manufacture of solar-voltaic chips, which were also more efficient than previous ones. The details of this research were also disclosed, along with the location of my purified indium, and the preliminary plans which I had prepared on my new solar-voltaic system, based on the sands. Dave was a tall, skinny, over 60, southern redneck hick, who was an unlikely candidate for closet queen or industrial spy. It seems the CIA prefers "closet queens" or other people who seek to hide skeletons in their closets, because of the blackmail potential, as a means of CIA coercive control over operatives.

On June 14, 1979 (my birthday again), Dave came by to go to the claims, but it rained, so he came again on the 15th, to go to the San Pedro Mountains, to do some 'work on the claims'. After considerable walking, we returned to the pickup for a rest and some water. Dave, who was diabetic, drank fruit juice, as I drank water from a large canteen. The water tasted strange and moldy, and I wondered why a diabetic would drink fruit juice rather than water, since it contained sugar. We returned to our work, and I walked across the claim to check a location point, as Dave sat near the truck, nervously clutching my bag, in which I usually carried a pistol, Little did I know, but he was just waiting for me to die. This was only one of several attempted murders, and I have always wondered if an occult principle was involved, since the attempts were often made on or near my birthday.

While walking along near a rock ledge, I suddenly passed out, fell off the ledge onto the top of a large clump of cholla cactii, and literally impaled the lower part of my body on them. The excruciating pain and rush of adrenaline revived me from my unconsciousness, and I painfully removed myself from the clump, and extracted as many of the spines as I could—some of which pierced to a depth of over an inch—and returned to the truck to pull out many more. While bending over the seat in the truck, I discovered a plastic 'baggie' in the floorboard, containing crushed Angels de Dios (small, white, highly poisonous mushrooms). Their smell was identical to the moldy smell and taste of the water I had drank from the canteen, the taste of a fungus.

In the succeeding few days, during which I experienced stomach cramps and mild hallucinations which were symptomatic of mushroom poisonings, I realized incredibly that the operative had spiked the water with the Angels de Dios in a murder attempt.

On Oct. 25, 1979, two days after telling the neighbor about my identification of the iridium, Dave entered my house and stole my metals, along with my plans for the solar-voltaic system. Within about two weeks, the neighbor's crime-partner in Michigan announced "his" discovery and patent application on my process. On Oct. 26, 1979,1 received a call from the neighbor, who invited me to his home, where he asked me to become a "partner" with him, "...to process the black sands for platinum metals" (with proof in hand, this offer showed that he not only hired the operative, but due to their frustrated efforts to discover my source of platinum concentrates, had mistakenly concluded that my source was from black sands). I did not respond.

Within about three or four days, I received a call from Steve Reynolds, a Chicagoan who was the New Mexico State Engineer. Reynolds explained that the had been requested by the neighbor and a group of "Chicago investors", to urge me to accept an offer by them to back me in a "metallurgical laboratory", to be built on my property. I did not respond. (The "property" involved was later taken away in the abusive lawsuits.)

In early 1980, the neighbor invited me to a gathering at his house, attended by the naturopath and his wife. The offer was repeated to me, and again, I did not respond.

In October, 1980,1 was again invited to the neighbor's house, attended by a larger group, including the Chicago associates referred to by Reynolds (who were connected to what was once Meyer Lansky's "Chicago Syndicate", unbeknowest to Reynolds, who were cozy with the CIA). The neighbor and his associates threatened me by saying "You don't burn the mob". I answered that I could not possibly "burn the mob", since I had no dealings with them. They then proceeded to tell me all of the bad things which 'the mob' could do to a person. Again, I did not accept their offer. "The Mob" was the CIA.

In 1982, a second murder attempt was made, coinciding with the occupancy of the 'cocaine cartel' tenant who was the Columbian doctor's former wife. The would-be murderers worked with a St. Vincent's Hospital nurse (whose father was a Dade County, Florida banker involved in money laundering). The nurse was also married to a Columbian. Incredibly, all these people were also former members of the U.S. Peace Corps in Colombia, which is how they became associated with Klaus Barbie's cocaine cartel. The tenant furnished antibiotics supplied by her former husband, while the nurse furnished diseased sputum from the hospital. They attempted to grow a "killer germ", using yogurt as the medium, into which the germs and antibiotics were added. This concoction was added to some food and fed to me, on June 14, 1982 (my birthday again). My reaction the following morning, was a congested and sore throat, and yellow bile discharges. That attempt followed my 44th birthday, just like the June 15th, 1979 attempt. All the tenants from two separate residences were gone, having moved out during the previous night and early morning. The evidence they had carelessly left behind was all over the place, most of which I still possess. The communist lady and her live-in boyfriend (a Hearst heir), left a candle burning against a wall, in an arson attempt foiled only by my discovery, just in time.

The criminal investigators for the Santa Fe Sheriffs department refused to allow me to file reports, either on the 1979 or the 1982 murder attempts, or related criminal activities. All of these people were among those I referred to in Chapter II (under "I Meet Torquemada and the Medellin Cartel"), who were involved in the drug dealing, communist/fascist politics, and money laundering, using straw-owners throughout Santa Fe County, the "Banana Republic" of North America.

In October, 1983,1 was visited for the first time in New Mexico, by my 19-year-old son from my first marriage. My former in-laws—who were such great 'pals' with George Bush and wife, from their 1950s Odessa, Texas days—had managed, through threats, intimidation, political power and subterfuge, and the pure weight of money, to break off all contacts between my children and me after 1976, followed by a 1979 disappointment of a promised visit which was canceled. The sudden 1983 call from my son had re-established those broken contacts, but only for criminal purposes, I would later discover.

Between 1970 and 1976, during the trips I made to visit my children in Odessa, I had stayed at my parent's house. Ector County Sheriffs deputies would sometimes come to the house at night unannounced, enter the house without knocking or permission, search the house, and attempt to intimidate me or provoke a physical response, without probable cause, a warrant, or even a knock on the door. I knew that the Ector County Sheriff at that time was connected to the Chicago Mob also. You would be surprised to know how I came to know this fact.

Leading up to June 14, 1979 (my 41st birthday), my children had arranged to visit me in New Mexico for the first time, and I was very excited and happy about that. The in-laws canceled those plans at the last minute. The following day, the first of the four murder attempts was made by Dave, the old pal of the ex father-in-law, also connected to the neighbor, all being connected to the CIA. These traumatic events led to a break between my children and me. They were holding my children hostage to coerce my joining into the Mob/CIA operations.

I was then "excommunicated" by the in-laws from their church (the Eisenhower Church of Christ, in Odessa, Texas), to which I had never belonged. My children were forced to attend this open "excommunication ritual", thus subjecting them to Christian-Satanist "ritual abuse", using the entire congregation to buttress it. Though I am opposed to such "witchcraft", there was nothing I could do about it, since I didn't know about it until four years later. The children were forbidden by the church to associate with me after being raised by me as good, clean and clear-thinking Atheists, for the first six and seven years of their lives, without psychological problems or other complications. The children were suddenly and forceably twisted completely around backward by this archaic and alien Satanist/Christian (they always co-exist, being mutually dependent) "religion", which worshipped a grisley 2,000-year-old myth and non-existent dead body of "Christ", based on the fantasy of "Christianity", created originally by Josephus (A.K.A., General Arius Calpurnius Piso)[7], on the old Luciferian model, to trick the Jewish revolutionaries in Rome and Jerusalem, into accepting a wimp "messiah" intended to make them docile.

My son later told me that for all those years, his grandmother forced him to sleep on the floor, in a closet, in a sleeping bag. That was his "room". This from greedy, stingy, sadistic "Christians", who were worth millions. The last time I had visited with him in 1976, he was twelve, and a world class swimmer, the champion of the West Texas Aquatic Association. He had Olympic promise. The following year, at age 13, he began to "mainline" (to intravenously inject) methamphetamine, and continued to do so for several years, during which the "Christians" concealed this information from me.

In 1982, in a sudden (and suspicious) turnabout, my son was "sent" to me, not to visit, but to attempt to get damaging information on me, so they could 'put me in jail', to atone for their guilt. As a good example of "...good Christian upbringing", my son had become a "meth-head". They wanted to make it look like a case of "...like father, like son.."—to misplace their guilt on me.

During my son's first visit, he made secret trips to the residence of a well-known Santa Fe judge, who lives in the nearby Eldorado subdivision, where he was encouraged to make out false police reports against me. He later admitted that the grandparents had arranged it all, and had threatened to disinherit him. The trip had been planned between the judge and the in-laws, with the promise that my son could gain 'penance' for what he had 'done to them', by helping them to 'get me'. So there was the victim of heinous Christian-Satanist child abusers, who had turned to drugs, his life practically wrecked for good, seeking 'forgiveness' from the criminally insane "pillars of the community", who had by their insanity, driven him into the streets, in his childhood.

A large part of the political arrangements in this scenario, were being carried out by the first cousin of the "Oil Queen", the retired Texas Ranger, George Renfrew (who also worked with the CIA), who was also the brother to my first wife's cousin's wife. I had actually broken bread with this man on several Thanksgivings, in Crockett, Texas. My son was apparently making clandestine visits to obtain instructions from this 'Strange Ranger'. I eventually found out about some of this, when a weirdo tenant filed a suit against me, and attempted to use the false reports against me in court. On realizing that the State of New Mexico was highly liable to me for the blatant CIA fabrications, the evidence was withheld by an embarrassed detective, who then sought to conceal the identity of the judge and the retired Texas Ranger, whose presence in the arrangement I was already aware of. The very gravity of this monstrous plot were about as outrageous a violation of a citizen's rights by high government authorities, as I have ever had personal knowledge of, and yet they happened to me.

At this time, I was having difficulty in separating things which I knew were connected to my former in-laws, from those connected to the CIA, until a succession of events revealed that they were all connected to the CIA, because my former in-laws had connections to George Bush, who was director of the ClA, and had several high level CIA employees in their family. Out of what appear on the surface to be "private-public conflicts", one may be led to more closely examine the facts, and to realize that the CIA is not a "public" institution, but a private one, created under the directions of the Federal Reserve Bank, and the group of other private bankers who perpetrated the fraud of the [7]Abelard Reuchlin, The True Authorship of the New Testament, The Abelard Reuchlin Foundation.

National Security (Pseudo) "Act" on us in 1945, under which the CIA was created from the Gestapo's Reichsicherheitshaupt Amt VI.

During this time, my former wife was shot at along highway 285, by the retired "Texas Ranger", as shown by the following facsimile clipping from The New Mexican, which I entitle "The Big Ol' Bad Ranger Takes a Shot at a Pregnant Woman":

Santa Fe Police Report

SANTA FE - The following incidents have been reported by Police:

●The way the woman driver told it in a sheriff's report, she was driving along I-25 when a light blue pickup hauling a horse trailer started tailgating her. After several miles the truck began to pass and as the woman looked out the driver's window she saw a man pull out a rifle and fire. The bullet went through her windshield.

The above can be attributed to that 'nice man'—George Bush—once in Washington, as a favor to an old "A-hole buddy", to motivate me to "go back to my first wife". Strange bedfellows indeed.

After the shot at my wife, she immediately became ill and miscarried our first child she was carrying within a couple of days, and almost died in the process. So the Ranger had actually committed the murder of an unborn child, and almost killed my wife as well. Perhaps that was his intent.

I found it hard to believe that the Rangers and the CIA would employ a man who would shoot at a pregnant woman, and be involved in a plot to drive away my second wife, so my first wife could "get me back". The plot was so bizarre that it reminded me of one of those old movies where some hillbillies in the Ozarks went out with their guns to bag 'em a husband for their homely sister. These people seemed to be too stupid to take "No!" for an answer. They failed to understand that even if they ran off my wife, and offered me the position of "King of the Whole Goddamned World", I still wouldn't "go back" to my first wife.

During my son's second visit, in January of 1983,1 was almost killed for a third time, by a Santa Fe naturopath and his wife, who had been dosing me with minute quantities of arsenic for years, and finally gave me a couple of larger doses, to "send me home" for good. This couple, whose parents were connected to the C.F.R., were closely connected to the Paperclip-connected neighbor who hired the first and second assassins in the 1979 and 1982 attempts, and sued me in 1987.

In January of 1983,1 went to the naturopath to obtain relief from back pains caused by work. The doctor applied accupressure and a massage oil to my back, which seemed to contain abrasive grains of something. That was probably not obvious to the doctor, since the back is more sensitive than the hands. The doctor probably thought the arsenic compound was so finely ground that I couldn't feel it. I simply though that was the way it was supposed to feel. He asked me to come back the following week for a "second treatment", which I thought was odd, but on his advice did so, on Feb. 4, 1983.

Between the first and second treatments, I had bloody bowel discharges which the doctor said was "...your system, flushing out harmful substances". Little did I know, but they were the symptoms of arsenic poisoning. During the second treatment, the doctor began to ask me personal questions regarding tax matters, which I thought was odd, especially when I discovered that his wife was also present, hiding beneath the covers of an adjacent treatment table. Again, the oil applied to my back had an abrasive effect.

In the evening following the second treatment, I began feeling nauseous, with pain across my kidney region and liver, as if someone had placed a steel band around my lower rib cage and tightened it. I awoke in the middle of the night with dry heaves and yellow bile. At that point, in deep despair and pain, I knew that something was drastically wrong. I remembered a conversation I once had with the doctor about "homeopathy", in which he had remarked that "arsenic is easy to kill someone with because it is cumulative, and you can give them only a pinhead amount each day, over a long period of time, and eventually kill them whenever they reach the toxic limit." At that point I realized the massage oil contained a granular form of arsenic which the doctor had obtained from the mineral formations at Ojo Caliente, a natural spring, where he often obtained such minerals supposedly for his homeopathy work, and had ground it with his mortar and pestle and added it to the oil. We called the Poison Control Center and confirmed my symptoms as arsenic poisoning, and I immediately took a hot bath to remove as much of the oil and arsenic as possible, and returned to bed. The bath should have been a cold one, because the hot bath only opened up my pores for the arsenic to enter faster, I now believe. At 5:00 A.M., my wife dragged me unconscious from bed, and with the help of her seven-year-old son, got me into the car and rushed me to the St. Vincents Hospital emergency ramp, from which I was wheeled into the E.R. in a dehydrated, semi-conscious state, with no pulse. They immediately began rehydrating me with electrolyte salt solution, as I began to go into convulsions. Three litres later, I was completely normal, the electrolytes not only having rehydrated me, but were the perfect chelation solution to completely eliminate all the arsenic from my system. I felt wonderful, where only moments before I was on the verge of death.

On learning that their murder attempt had been barely defeated by our timing and awareness of their plot, the naturopath eventually began to suffer remorse, calling me up on two separate occasions to confess, and to seek my forgiveness. I recorded both of these calls, then duped the tapes. The second call came around a week after the 1987 lawsuit filed by the neighbor, and he was afraid of being drawn into it. I believe my phone was tapped by the neighbor, who overheard the calls and became worried that the naturopath was crumbling. The lady sneak-thief was hired again to steal the tapes, but got only the dupes, at the same time that she got the aerial photo trial exhibits, which cleared the way for the Paperclip-connected neighbor to win his suit.

Around two weeks later, on a flight from Kathmandu to Nepal, the couple's Lufthansa airliner was seen to explode on the descending glidepath on the eastern side of the Himalayas, over Burma. Call it "poetic justice" if you will, but I call it a "cowboy hit", by people who sought to conceal the truth. The naturopath and his wife, along with 22 others, were killed.

I received cryptic confirmation within a few days, that the couple had been sacrificed by the CIA/ Illuminati, as a means of attempting to placate me. But I have always believed it was to conceal the connection between the murder attempt and the large corporation which ended up with my solar-voltaic manufacturing process, and continues to make millions on it.

In the ensuing period between 1986 and 1991, my son served two prison sentences in Texas, both drug-related. His grandfather, who had lunch every week with the D.A. on a regular basis, simply had him put away because he had become an embarrassment to him as a deacon of the church. I found out about my son's conviction over six months later, through neighbors who were suing me. They kept track of stuff like that, because they were small-time cogs in the CIA's drug dealing machine involved in distribution of drugs being smuggled into the country to finance "black operations".

Though I am strongly moved by the "profit motive", these people kept me in continual poverty, induced me into business 'traps', and screwed up every money-making plan I had, ranging from real estate, metallurgy, and inventing. This book is the latest of my ideas to make a decent living, even though it has been on the stove for over thirty years. Since you are reading it now, they have not completely succeeded in stopping it, even if I don't make any profit. The NSA and CIA continually exert their influence through the big book dealers to suppress this book, spreading the disinformation that it is "permanently out of print" or "unavailable", which it never has been.

I have wondered if being part Indian sets a person up for persecution in America, either genetically or culturally. There seems to be a sort of pacific reticence which reflects a different attitude toward one's relationship to the earth and society, and a tendency to live and let live, to quietly mind one's own business. It seems that nothing invites the interest of a sadist more than a person minding his own business. The perfect chump. The ideal scapegoat.

In the 1870s, Jack Wilson, the Kiowa-Cree sachem (A.K.A., "Wovoka, the Paiute Messiah", founder of the Ghost Dance Cult) married into the Richardson Clan, in Anahuac, Texas, becoming James M. Richardson's son-in-law. Richardson ordained Wilson as a preacher of the Primitive Baptist Church, and Wilson in turn ordained Quanah Parker, all on the same day. Thus was created the Native American Church, complete with the peyote sacraments of Wilson. Richardson was my great-great-grandfather. We have an old family photo showing Wilson when he was in his early twenties, several years before the earliest photo of the Smithsonian's.

Most of the American Indian scholars have erroneous or distorted histories of how the Native American Church started, and have no history at all that Jack Wilson ever lived in Texas or had a family there. They usually trace the church's origin to Quanah Parker, failing to realize that Parker was ordained by Jack Wilson. The Primitive Baptist Church was originally called the "Primitive Baptist Church of England" when the Richardson's originally settled in the colonies in Virginia, since Benjamin Richardson was originally a Tory. After the American Revolution, The Richardsons were run out of the colonies, and settled in Mississippi. Afterwards, James M. Richardson fought as an American in the battle of 1812 in Mississippi, during the British invasion, and distinguished himself militarily, so the "...of England" was dropped along with the Richardson Tory sympathies. James M. Richardson then married a Natchez princess and moved to Texas, founding the first Protestant mission at Buna.

Jack Wilson apparently came into Texas to gather peyote for his Kiowa-Cree-Paiute ceremonies, and somehow fell in with the Richardson clan, was ordained by Richardson as a minister, and married Richardson's half-Indian daughter. After fathering some kids, he disappeared back to his native Nevada, where he founded the Ghost Dance Cult, which contained elements of the original Primitive Baptist Church fused with ancient Kiowa teachings. The family apparently never realized what had happened to him. Quanah Parker, a half-Anglo Comanche, went on to found the Native American Church, including Wilson's peyote teachings.

It is my belief that the Kiowa are related to what Homer, the Greek poet, referred to as the Akiavoi or Achians, which to me means "East Quay People". As such, they shared the ancient Egyptian religions beliefs which were common to many ancient peoples. The Ghost Dance Religion taught that the Indians could "...dance all the dead Indians back to life", and in the meanwhile, the Whites would shrink until they disappeared. This theme contains elements from the ancient Egyptian religion, with significant variations. The U.S. Army officers did not like this idea, even though no violence was advocated.

Ironically, Wilson's movement—a sort of "American Gandiism"—eventually resulted in the senseless massacre of thousands of peaceful, innocent, already defeated Indians, by the U.S. Army, particularly at Wounded Knee, South Dakota. Clearly, the Illuminati did not want peace. They wanted the old 'fighting' Indians, so they could slaughter them. The technique is always the same. Bring in a 'new' enforcer, unfamiliar with and fearsome of the Indians (or other targets). Savage the dignity of a leader, by demanding compliance to something which serves merely as the provocation of a refusal, as the pretext for a violent 'enforcement', as 'justification' for murder or genocide, the same as with the Waco massacre, Tianenmen Square, or Wounded Knee.

I finally concluded, after being judicially tortured, imprisoned and impoverished by the CIA, that there just ain't no justice. To the Indians following Wounded Knee, the written and spoken word—in the guise of fiction, poetry, prose, or mythology—was a way to reach out for sanity, since protection by "law enforcement" authorities—from the violence of thugs induced by their bosses—was systematically denied. Yet it was merely the spoken word, singing and dancing which led to the extermination of the Souix leadership. A helpless warrior in the traditional sense, with his hands tied from doing what is rational and just, could be depicted in the most unfavorable light, like a Crazy Horse, and shot to pieces.

But I knew that I would have the last laugh. He laughs best who laughs last. I have the lasting satisfaction of knowing how bitter it will be for small and cowardly men to look back on their evil lives as they approach death, futilely searching for worthy deeds, only to come face to face with themselves as lowly cowards, with criminal genes from degenerate parents, educated in corrupt schools, destined to waste their meaningless lives taking empty pleasure in filth, degradation, lies, gangsterism, and ill-gotten dollars. And what an inspiration for their children! Criminals breeding more criminals.

When I was around 13, Max Evans, the western writer (who has a large dose of Indian blood), gave me a young bald eagle with a broken wing, to nurse back to health. We placed a splint on his wing, and I kept him until he was strong enough to fly, then set him free. Perhaps a year later, in the Davis Mountains over a hundred miles to the west, as I walked with a group of other Scouts through Apache chief Victorio's last stronghold, the eagle appeared and circled over my head, whistling shrilly, before perching on a nearby cliff to screech out to me, as the other Scouts watched in amazement. I explained to them that the eagle was "Screechy", a young eagle I had taken care of, thanking me for his life, freedom, and health. I have never been able to approve of eagles in zoos. I composed the following poem a few years ago, in honor of all political prisoners, and eagles in zoos:

A BIRD'S RELIGION

Freedoms just a word that most have only heard, but freedom's a religion, well known to every bird;
a religion of life, of love and liberty,
a bird's just not alive unless it can be free.

If a bird prefers a cage to the freedom of the skies, he must depend on others for his food, or else he dies;
but the death of the spirit is the saddest loss of all,
for a mind which never rises can surely never fall.

To fly among the clouds or the limbs of a tree, to land and mate and build a nest, and raise a family;
to love the other birds, being happy to be free, is the only life a bird should live, the only way to be.

For we humans, our mind is our sky, and independent thoughts are the wings on which we fly;
there are people locked in cages, their minds soaring free, while prisoners outside the cages have thrown away the key.

THE KENNEDY EXAMPLES

At around 11:00 A.M., Nov. 20, 1963 (two days prior to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy), I had just arrived at my American history class at Sam Houston State University, in Huntsville, Texas, taught by professor Glynn Turner. The girl who sat behind me—a Miss Rather (newsman Dan Rather's younger sister)—had brought a copy of the San Antonio Light to class. The headline was something like "J.F.K. TO BE IN DALLAS IN TWO DAYS", with the Kennedy motorcade route advertised on the front page. I was somewhat familiar with the Texas School Book Depository neighborhood, since I had applied for work at a printing company in an adjoining building, in late 1962.

As a boy, my "blood brother" was Charles "Dusty" Warren, II, a Cheyenne-Cherokee cross, who was also the son of the Chief of Secret Service for presidents Truman and Eisenhower. Mr. Warren had absorbed five would-be assassin's bullets, in several attempts upon the lives of those two presidents. Through my friendship with Dusty, I was somewhat familiar with some basic security precautions established by his father, such as, that under the circumstances, a motorcade route should not be advertised. I also knew that, in a city such as Dallas, Secret Service agents would normally have been stationed in at least every other building or house along the way, and that, in no case, would the limousine be an open-topped convertible, especially where so many high buildings and potential assassin's perches existed, in a large city having a recent history of assassination attempts and other violence over politics.

The legendary loyalty and bravery of the Cheyenne made the choice of Dusty's father as Secret Service Chief a good one. Unfortunately, Mr. Warren was replaced during the Kennedy presidency, although he apparently remained on the security team.

On Nov. 22, 1963, since Dallas literally seethed with people having motives to kill Kennedy, it was a wisely chosen city for the assassination, with so many likely suspects to blame. For example, a disgruntled Madam Nhu, of Viet Nam, was in Dallas, brought there by anti-Kennedy political supporters. Her husband, Ngo Dinh Nhu, and his brother, the American-backed leader of Viet Nam, Ngo Dinh Diem, had been brutally and incompetently murdered by CIA Station Chief William Colby, and agent E. Howard Hunt, on Nov. 1, 1963, supposedly on orders of J.F.K.

Ironically, Hunt was photographed at the Kennedy assassination site three weeks later, near the "grassy knoll", just after rifle shots were fired from it. Dallas resident, General Edwin Walker, graduate of N.M.M.I. and of West Point Military Academy (and the youngest American commander to enter the Po Valley of Northern Italy, during WW II) had been kicked out of the Army by Kennedy, and had written a book saying it was because of his patriotic, anti-Communist views, and John Birch Society membership. There were scads of Cuban refugees, and veterans of the Bay of Pigs fiasco. There was Jack Ruby (a former Marxist-Leninist from Russia, later 'turned' and recruited by the CIA), who had been fingered by Bobby Kennedy in his book, as the key Chicago union figure who had set up the hit of a union boss, in order to enable the Mob to take over the Chicago union (there's the Chicago Mob again!). The CIA knew a 'good thing' when they saw it, a virtual Pandora's box of varied possibilities to cover up their assassination of Kennedy. On Nov. 20,1963,1 knew these things.

On seeing the headline and motorcade route, I picked up the paper, stood up, and said "They are going to kill J.F.K. in Dallas, day after tomorrow, right here" (pointing to the street in front of the Book Depository). Incredibly, the professor and our entire class engaged in a 50-minute discussion of the Kennedy assassination, on Nov. 20, 1963, two days before it occurred, within 200 miles of Dallas.

In another incredible coincidence, Glynn Turner's (the professor's) brother, Matt Turner, would later be identified by New Orleans D.A. Jim Garrison, as the CIA agent sent out of Washington after the assassination, to clean up 'loose ends' (i.e., to eliminate any witnesses who could tie the CIA into the killing). Most of these "loose ends" were various and sundry scum-bags, prostitutes, petty criminals and other borderline characters, who had various pieces of knowledge which implicated the CIA, through the many people who were to be exposed in the eventual investigation. The 'coincidental' killings and mysterious deaths of so many of these people is what raised so many eyebrows during the ensuing controversy, following the assassination. Turner soon became the Bexar County (San Antonio area) Democratic party Chairman, appointed by you-know-who.

A few days after the assassination, the professor Glynn Turner invited me over for supper. Conveniently, Turner's brother-in-law, a Navy admiral, was there, in uniform, to ask me some questions, centering primarily around how I came up with the idea that Kennedy would be killed in Dallas, two days before it happened. I realized in retrospect that the 'supper' was actually an O.N.I. de-briefing, to determine whether I possessed personal knowledge of an assassination 'conspiracy'. The fact that I possessed no personal knowledge of a conspiracy, probably saved my life, I realized in retrospect. My best answer was that all of the apparent official indicia were there, to point my mind in the direction of an "insider-job" assassination, so my prediction was based on probability.

In the televised films of the assassination, I could see an agent climbing up on the trunk of the presidential limousine, in an attempt to shield Jacqueline Kennedy, then pounding his fist on the trunk after it was too late to do anything—a 'frustration-gesture' which said "I told you so!". It was more likely that Mr. Warren had been replaced as the head of Secret Service because they didn't want the wiley old Cheyenne to throw any tomahawks into their well-oiled assassination machinery. Had his procedures been followed, the assassination would probably have failed, though he had never faced such a concerted conspiracy in any of the three attacks against Truman and Eisenhower.

After the arrest of Lee Harvey Oswald, everything followed a classic K.G.B. "A-Apparat" ("Assassination-Apparatus") pattern, copied from the old Soviet N.K.V.D. As Oswald's 'second', Jack Ruby had developed 'sleeper agent' status with the Dallas police, and during a prisoner transfer at which he was conveniently present, he performed a classic Soviet-style assassination of Oswald, shoving his .38 directly up under his rib-cage, before 'gut-shooting' him, thus insuring little chance of his survival. This was S.O.P. under the old K.G.B. rules, after the apprehension of Oswald, to shield the assassins (in this case, the Illuminati/government plotters) from Oswald's possible testimony, but according to evidence discovered and relayed to the F.B.I. by Oswald himself, two days before Kennedy was killed, it appears in retrospect to be the way it was planned from the start, although police tried to kill Oswald at the theater in Oak Cliff, just after the assassination, but Oswald jammed his thumb into the gap between the revolver's hammer and cylinder, a stunt he had learned in his CIA training, which is why he had a bandage on his hand when Ruby shot him. That was the reason Oswald screamed "I'm being made a patsy!" at the moment of his arrest at the theater.

Though Oswald did not shoot Kennedy, he had extensive personal knowledge of the whole operation, as a member of the hit team, extending over several states. The CIA had copied the old KGB procedures used by Ruby and the rest of the hit team, and the film showed that Ruby was very thoroughly trained and rehearsed for the hit. It is simply unlikely that a mere 'nightclub owner' would have been so familiar with such assassination procedures, or be able to carry them out with such finesse, without such expert training. Jim Garrison also identified Ruby as the CIA 'bagman' in the Dallas area, providing liaison and money to the various Cuban and other CIA-sponsored groups or other catspaws, a likely place for an ex-Mob man, who probably did a lot of skimming.

In early 1962 (before my Peace Corps training), I had organized and led a Young Americans for Freedom picket line, protesting "conventional warfare in Southeast Asia", outside a United Nations meeting in Midland, Texas, at which the U.N. announced its sponsorship of 'limited warfare' and 'counterinsurgency tactics', ostensibly to diminish the risks of all-out war. I viewed it as of an ulterior way for the Illuminati to 'blood our troops', in preparation for the coming Viet Nam war, to which the 'limited war' was to be escalated. This would ultimately maintain the Illuminati munitions manufacturers in the lavish lifestyles to which they had become accustomed.

In early 1963, two men matching Oswald's and Ruby's descriptions were seen taking a shot at the right-wing, closet-gay, General Edwin Walker, from nearby Turtle Creek Drive, in Dallas. This was a psychopolitical 'stage setting' for the future, intended to 'alienate' Walker from the future conspiracy, in which Dallas was the last of five alternative assassination locales, which could be actuated during Kennedy's political tour. The first four locations—Miami, New Orleans, Houston, and San Antonio—had been canceled as the tour progressed, leaving Dallas as the final and last chance for the hit, which was planned at least as early as Nov., 1962.

Kennedy's intent was to stop the escalation, and shut off the anticipated Golden Pipeline to the Illuminati, who killed him because he double-crossed them, after making deals with them to get elected. Kennedy's apparent original complicity in this war-for-profit-and-political-power scheme, was revealed by his formation of the Green Berets—as 'der Fuehrer's' personally sworn S.S. elite—and the 'closet Nazi' new uniform designs for the new counterinsurgency teams, which gave birth to the S.W.A.T. ("Special Weapons And Tactics") teams, almost identical copies the old Nazi Waffen S.S. and S.A. uniforms. "Jack-booted thugs", anyone?

Aside from his plan to shut off the planned Vietnam War, the thing which most surely contributed to his assassination, was Kennedy's issuance of debt-free currency, around a month before the assassination. This is the actual truth, Kennedy issued constitutional, gold and silver-backed dollars, which was cutting the cojones off the Federal Reserve gang. That currency change was immediately rescinded after the assassination, one of the first orders of business. Astounding but true, it proved that Kennedy was not a Keynsian, Fabian Socialist, but a 'hard-money' man, a constitutionalist, and a Libertarian, Jeffersonian Democrat.

J.F.K.'s older brother, Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., was originally groomed for president from childhood. After his inadvertent death in a bomber accident in WWII, Jack became his replacement. Joseph P. Kennedy, Sr. ("Papa Joe"), US. ambassador to Great Britain, was in the IUuminati, like the Rockefellers, and was likewise a Nazi collaborator and spy (F.D.R. blocked his prosecution for treason and espionage). The Kennedy boys even sat on Hitler's knee, during their visits to Berchtesgaden, the Fuehrer's Alpine retreat. The boys had been clandestinely raised to be American IllumiNazi leaders. After all, Bobby and Jack had 'proved' themselves, by supplying Senator Joe McCarthy the documentary "dirt" used in his hysterical H.U.A.C. hearings.

Jack Kennedy made promises he apparently intended to break, by first hiring 'Fabian Socialists' (Cambridge-trained closet fascists) in his administration, then firing them one by one, as he began to move away from the 'secret' fascist orientation which got him the power. Kennedy showed all the earmarks of heading toward a third, more Libertarian position (as I gleaned from Kennedy's book, Profiles in Courage, which gave a more 'real' profile of Jack Kennedy's rather undisclosed leanings). Kennedy was apparently purging male fascist types—affiliated with the Illuminati and national security establishment—from the government, similar to F.D.R.'s purge of pro-Hitler/Mussolini fascists from the cabinet of his second administration, and Mussolini's purge of International Socialists and Communists from his second administration (Il Duce was originally an International Socialist).

Kennedy had made public condemnations of "clandestine organizations" less than a week before his death, which many were led by the misinformationists to mean the John Birch Society, which I discounted, since close Kennedy family friend, Cardinal Cushing, of Boston, as well as Jacqueline Kennedy's cohorts—Oleg Cassini and Cholly Knickerbocker—and her father's family (the Auchinclosses), were sponsors of the Birch Society. The Birchers appeared to be anti-Kennedy (which could have been orchestration intended to create cover for his undisclosed agenda), but were not para-military.

No..... Kennedy was talking about the CIA, not the Birchers. The CIA misinterpreted Kennedy's statements so the public wouldn't know there was a squabble between Kennedy and themselves, or the Federal Reserve Bank, only a week or so before they planned to kill him and blame it on the "right wing" or "Castro".

Kennedy's purge shouldn't be interpreted as a patent homophobic bigotry, but rather one which frequently involved CIA-connected homosexuals, who were in high ratio among the Templar-Illuminati pederast variety, such as a whole nest of them who were classmates in the '30s and '40s at New Mexico Military Institute ("NMMI"), in Roswell, New Mexico. Those 'good Ol' boys' were lavished with lucrative defense contracts during the three or four wars since, or were placed in prestigious government or military positions. Like the graduates of a particular secret P.O.W. camp—non-coms included—they have all been well taken care of, to the man. Several of them who were directly or indirectly victims of the Kennedy purge, were naturally implicated in the assassination. Just take a good look at the defense contracts for the Viet Nam War.

During WWII, Joe Kennedy, Jr., like many other 'Illuminati sons', was to be kept safe in the special P.O.W. camp in Bavaria, near the Swiss border, in Adam Weishaupt's old stamping grounds. On allied bombing raids, 'certain' bombers made 'protected' landings, and their personnel escorted to the special camp, where they were treated like royalty by the German command. Joe Kennedy's plane was accidentally shot down, or crashed on landing, killing him. These arrangements related to the traitors mentioned in Charles Higham's Trading With the Enemy, who through special connections to Hitler and his financial supporters, acquired these cushy accomodations for young officers who were in their families or spheres of influence.

Joseph Katzenbach, Kennedy's A.G., and graduate of Yale law, class of '47, learned international law in the camp, supplied with all the books and materials he needed, by the Third Reich. Similarly, several others 'vacationed' there throughout the war, to emerge at its end as 'hero' P.O.W.s. I have personally met at least six of these former "P.O.W.s". Some of them have gone into politics, some are in banking, international trade, defense and government contracts, hotels, etc., but all of them are, or were, well provided for, and kept "safe", except for one poor non-com I knew who just happened to be on one of the special planes, as a crew member. His 'reward' was being a high school teacher. He wasn't treated like 'royalty' by his Nazi captors. He was a Sephardic "crypto-Jew", whose spirit was broken.

Without their special connections, these IllumiNazis would have been no more capable of achieving success than anyone else, in a truly capitalist society. Almost all of them had marriages arranged through Illuminati-aristocratic channels. Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy's eminent family connections included direct ancestry from most of the royal families of Europe such as the Hapsburgs, including Lorenzo di Medici, of Firenzi, Italy, the renaissance era inspiration for Nicola Macchiavelli's The Prince. Do these matters indicate more than what Ayn Rand called the "aristocracy of pull", revealing an actual unconstitutional, clandestine perpetuation of power through inherited "titles of royalty"? The coincidences are too strong to be ignored. The particular lineages appear to be those considered by the Templars to have been directly descended from Jesus Christ.

The Kennedy assassination will be kicked around for many years to come, but I will say here and now that it was engineered by the CIA, on behalf of the Federal Reserve Bank, the CFR, the military-industrial complex, and the National Security thugs.

THE HISTORICAL EXAMPLES

Where people are free to produce and trade, there should be no problem. Food production is the ultimate key to freedom, and the freedom of people who produce it are essential to a free and independent society. Even "rich soil" can be created by any one, provided they have the freedom to do so. To the contrary, control over food production is one of the primary Trilateralist priorities, ergo a war against farmers and ranchers.

The Illuminati is precipitating world-wide death on what should be the eve of world freedom. The "cattle mutilations" experiments appear to be a research and development project, in which flying saucer-borne "death ray" guns are used to shoot cattle, after which tissue is removed from them to examine for particular damage to the reproductive and immune systems, for the purpose of developing "stealth murder weaponry", in which human victims may be murdered in such a way that their deaths appear to be from 'natural' causes. "Population control" and political assassination come first to mind. This is to make possible perpetual Illuminati world control, based on the original scheme devised by Hassan I Sabbah (founder of the Order of the Devoted in 1093), based on the pantheistic teachings of the Persian, Abdullah (c. 11th century), whose teachings included the Tibetan Bonpas Doctrine Of the Non-Ego, which had come to Persia through the peripheral gnostic Sufi teachings of the Roshiniya and Thuggee murder cults seeking to overturn Islam and restore goddess worship, and to control the world by assassinating and replacing leaders with their kind.

In the 1920s, Stalin exterminated the last resistors to the Red Army—the Kulac "peasant" farmers of the Ukraine—because of their rejection of communism and their emerging prosperity and strong middle class. This holocaust sacrificed the 15-foot thick "rich black soil" of the Ukraine, and the people who farmed it, to the Soviet Thuggees, using Illuminati-procured American food, money, and machinery, to supply the Red Army, under the "Lend Lease Program". In payment, Illuminati arrangers like Armand Hammer acquired such looted art treasures as the Faberge eggs, from the Swiss bank vaults of V.I. Lenin. 'Soviet' agriculture never recovered from the loss of the Ukrainian Kulacs ("fists"). The Ukraine and its rich black soil—without the Kulacs—is just so much untilled prairie. The tattered remnants of those Kulacs were beginning to regenerate. The Illuminati could not allow this fertile region to once again supply needed food and profit for a re-vitalized Ukraine, which could capitalize on feeding and strengthening a large part of the world, and threaten Illuminati food control.

On the eve of Peristroika, the Chernobyl disaster was arranged by the Illuminati, to poison the blood and soil of the Ukrainians, to deprive the food and spiritual resolve needed for them to break with the Soviet system, to rebuild their former strength and health, and most of all, to resume the food production of the fertile Ukraine. The Ukraine was dealt yet another devastating blow, by the spewing of radioactive poisons out upon the Ukrainians. The Kulacs were originally Germanic peasant farmers imported by the Czars, to farm the Ukraine. Actor Jack Palance, an Ukrainian by birth, described the Chernobyl disaster as "a desecration".

The Ukraine lost 7 million Kulacs in Stalin's pogrom, another 7 million in WWII, and several more millions in Stalin's insane "purges". Were these sacrifices to Kali Ma, on behalf of the Illuminati murder cult, or an English-American conspiracy to exterminate "all Germans", or both?

As stated in Chapter I, Synopsis of Facts, No. 14, "Morgenthau's Pastoral Policy"[8] was a factual reality, as I learned in 1968, on the very night that L.B.J. announced that he would not run again. On that evening, Texas Governor John Connally sponsored a "Gala for the Arts", to which I was invited. The L.B.J. message was delivered to an astounded Connally, during the Gala, just before the intermission. Prior to the Gala, as I enjoyed a libation with other graduate students, within a block of the Main Building at U.T., a young Ph.D. candidate in history, stated that his dissertation was on the Treaty of Versailles. I brought up Morgenthau's Pastoral Policy, stating that I had heard that it was a hoax.

The student smiled, then said "Come with me". We walked to the Main Building (the "Tower") at U.T., and went to of an upper floor where the papers of L.B.J. were then stored, until the Sid Richardson Research Center (then under construction) could be finished. The student entered a vault and emerged with a document. He asked me if my hands were clean, instructed me to hold them out, and placed the 1919 document into them for my examination. It was stamped with a reception number and seal of the Versailles Committee, and signed by president Woodrow Wilson. It truly advocated the "extermination of all Germans", and the "...reduction of Germany to a pastureland...", because the "...Germans are an inherently warlike race". It was proof that the Illuminati had no stake in the Germans as a "race", and had manipulated them with false "Aryan" propaganda via the S.S., which was founded by the Illuminati later that same year, after Morgenthau's Pastoral Policy had failed at Versailles. It is a well-known fact that at the time, president Wilson was so sick that he was of an easily-manipulated puppet of his CFR/IIA 'controllers', and died soon afterward.

---

[8]A document drafted by Hans Morgenthau, Sr., and presented to the Versailles Treaty Committee, Paris, 1919, by president Woodrow Wilson, the original document being among the collected papers of president Lyndon Baines Johnson, now kept at The L.B.J. School of Public Administration, The Sid W. Richardson Research Center, University of Texas, Austin.

In 1919, Colonel E. M. House was one of those nutty, megalomaniacal Texans who, like all modern self-proclaimed Zionist messiahs, declared himself the be "God". As the adviser to President Wilson, he went to Paris to establish liaison between an American group and its British counterpart, which called itself the Round Table, which had grown out of British diamond and gold magnate Cecil Rhodes' fanatical world government concept, having as its goal the establishment of world-wide British imperialism. Rhodes was a disciple of elitist aesthete, Professor John Ruskin of Oxford (a proponent of the Pythagorean 'Golden Mean' and other Hermetic theories), and a follower of Adam Weishaupt and Illuminism. In his will, Rhodes instructed Lord Rothschild to expand the Round Table, which, like the German S.S., was structurally patterned after the Freemasons and Jesuits. At Paris, a new organization arose, which mooted and replaced the League of Nations, called the (Royal) Institute for International Affairs ("I.I.A."). In New York, it was called the Council for Foreign Affairs ("C.F.R."). The two groups merged at Paris, in pursuit of a British-American dominated world government. The group was financed by Rhodes and his friends, the wealthy international bankers. "Morgenthau's Pastoral Policy" was one of the group's earlier plans. When it failed, they financed the S.S. and chose Hitler to lead Germany.

By exterminating the Germans, Britain and the U.S. would have moved a step closer to British-American world imperialism. The C.F.R. used both right and left strategy. It financed the Russian revolution, helped set up the S.S. in 1919, financed Hitler's rise to power in the 1920s (in fact, chose Hitler from among several candidates, in 1923), and promoted international socialism through the U.N., which it founded through their agents who were guiding U.S. policy in 1945. That was the "New World Order" of which Hitler spoke, which was to come about after the 'weak' had been destroyed in the coming war. That 'order' has been in effect since the close of WWII, at least on paper, except its founders have never been able to fully put it into effect. They cannot figure out how to tell us it is "the law", since there are so many little stumbling blocks in our constitution standing in its way, such as the phrase "...this Constitution...is the Law of the Land", and "...these Sovereign united States". The C.F.R. is currently engaged in destroying U.S. sovereignty, and now envisions a New World Order embracing both Communism and 'state-capitalism' (i.e., fascism). The U.S. and Britain are apparently the leading models for the new world fascist state, which will be, like that envisioned by Hitler, composed of "national-concentrationist" entities which have no real sovereignty. In the future, any one of them which gets out of line, will be thrown into a war with its neighbor, as the U.N. troops arrive—like the cavalry—to 'settle' the dispute. If one speaks of the "Illuminati" today, he must include the C.F.R. They must weaken us to make the plan work.

When Wilson went to Paris in 1919 to present the "American" plan (to exterminate the Germans), to the Versailles Committee, what was to become of the German "real estate" (what we know as "Germany") after the Germans had been mass-murdered and buried under Morgenthau's plan? Did Morgenthau have any ideas about what to do with that empty German "pastureland"? And what about all the gold teeth fillings, eye glass frames, jewelry and other personal valuables? Soap, anyone? Lampshades?

Hans Morgenthau, Sr.—the author of the policy—was an anti-Zionist, 'emancipated' Sephardic Jew, while his son, Hans Morgenthau, Jr., was a Zionist. As you may know, Theodore Hertzl, also Sephardim ("Sun-Hare-People", or "Aryan") was astounded in 1897, when the Russian disciples of Karl Marx—the Ashkenazim from Moscow—showed up in Basle, Switzerland at his first International Zionist Congress and took over his organization. Both the Sephardim and the Ashkenazim ("East-Canaan-People")(also called the Khazars, which means "Goose-Hares") came from the same type of Osiris/Sun-Hare/Isis/Sun-Goose-worshiping Aryan/Canaanite stock, yet had a different history since about 1,500 B.C., but Morgenthau probably didn't realize it, or care about it for that matter. Such "world power" types, including Hitler, Rhodes, House, etc., were megalomaniacal-messianic flakes anyway.

Like many other "German Jews" (Sephardim), Hans Morgenthau, Sr., had an almost pathological fear of the "Ostjuden" (Ashkenazim)—those Uralo-Altaic-speaking-Tartar Khazars, whose kingdom in 600 A.D. stretched from the Black Sea to the Caspian. These Schythian-related people had originally been converted to Talmudic Judaism around 679 A.D., and to a Sephardic like Morgenthau (whose families had for centuries lived as the Nobility of Jewry), the Ashkenazim were considered inferior, illegitimate, "counterfeit Jews", because their (particular branch of Canaanite) lineage had not descended from the "Hebrews" or "Children of Israel" who purportedly were "enslaved by the Egyptians"... "followed Moses into the Promised Land", and "lived under King David or Solomon" in the United Monarchy of Israel, nor were they part of the Diaspora from Babylon. To Morgenthau, they were no more "Jewish" than the Phoenicians, Sumerians, Finns, Turks, Scythians, Ukrainians, Celts, Scots, Irish and Britons, etc., to whom they were related.

After about 1,000 A.D., the Ashkenazim were moved around all over Russia, Poland, the Ukraine, and Lituania, and had, as an oppressed people, emerged as the controlling group in the Communist Revolution. Stalin, Trotsky, Lenin, Molotov, Kruschev, Beria, and numerous other Communist leaders were often of the Ashkenazim. This affiliancy to the Communists (Trotsky had recruited and trained his Red Army Cadre in the Bronx in 1916-17, financed by the Jacob Schiff, Kuhn and Loeb and other international banking firms headquartered in New York), and to the Zionists (whom they had taken over), undoubtedly reinforced Morgenthau's fears desire to appease the Ashkenazim, Zionists, and Communists. In 1917, the international bankers, with the aid of German foreign minister Zimmerman, arranged for Trotsky's cadre to take their famous train ride through Germany, to rendezvous in St. Petersburg with the returning P.O.W.s from the Russo-Japanese war, who had been indoctrinated (courtesy of the bankers) while still in the Japanese prison camps, with Bolshevik propaganda, and trained into the Red Army structure specified by Trotsky.

Perhaps Morgenthau thought Germany would make a nice new Bolshevik or Zionist homeland for the Ashkenazim in Germany, and keep them out of America, after which they might show their eternal gratitude to Britain and America, and buy lots of goods and make deals as part of the scheme. Was this a plan of appeasement of the Ashkenazim? It is hard to imagine that the bankers sincerely wanted a Communist world, in which they would be economically "equal".

In the 1920s Ukraine, the acts of Stalin—the former priest, who knew that soil alone produces little food—weren't 'accidental', and neither was the Chernobyl disaster. No Ukrainian would have done it to his beloved. Even a communist would not have done it. Only the Illuminati stood to gain—like their Nazi and Communist spawn—as a bunch of Thuggee incompetents, whose only harvest was death and destruction.

How they gonna keep 'em down on the collective farm, once they've seen California or Montana? Ukrainian farmers can grow food anywhere. They do it from Northern Canada to South Texas, attracted to the rich soils of North America—scientifically named for Ukrainian soils—like iron to magnets.

Farming in today's Ukraine is pitifully low. Despite relatively large incentives offered to young people to take up farming in the Ukraine, there are few takers. A lot of the food comes from areas where agricultural people survived, more or less overlooked by Stalin or the Illuminati. Moldavia provides some food, from the rich soils near the Moldau and Diestr Rivers and tributaries. Women from the Ukraine, Moldavia and Georgia travel over a thousand miles to Moscow in the warmer months, to sell fruits and vegetables on the streets. Many of these women have university degrees.

The Illuminati wants to maintain control of the C.I.R. during its transition to "capitalism", to make sure that their favorite brand of mixed-economy, corporate-state fascism predominates. An increasingly productive Ukraine would encourage a transition to true capitalism. State-capitalism and Laissez faire capitalism are immiscible. The present food shortage in the C.I.R.—created by the Illuminati to slow the transition down or make it impossible, while gaining transitory control—is due to the physical and psychological shock of Chernobyl, and the inability to recreate capitalism while eliminating the controls of the old Communist system. Originally intended to force the Ukrainians and the C.I.R. into starvation, it instead accelerated the breakup of the Soviet Union. Now the Communists are back in control.

The phony "fuel crisis" of 1974 was created to regain control over the American economy which the Illuminati had lost between 1970 and 1974, largely from "hippy technology" which had evolved in the pseudo-communes of that period, through a significant outburst of alternative energy creativity, greater independence, and greater economic resiliency, which caught the Illuminati by surprise, as the Viet Nam War ended. This development was due primarily to an increased appropriation of materials, techniques, and equipment, by ordinary citizens and entrepreneurs.

The Illuminati-created 'fuel crisis' was tantamount to the "leveling laws" of 19th century England, in which a high tax was levied on window panes, to oppress the nouveau riche who had arisen during the English industrial revolution. Those too poor to afford the new taxes on window panes, had to get rid of them, with a drop in socio-economic rank. Without these accouterment to their homes, they were unable to entertain guests in the same fashion as the elite, and to thereby acquire the social status necessary to rise in the business world. Ironically, as if an added penalty under the "American leveling law" (the false 'crisis'), Americans seeking new solar equipment and window panes, to alleviate the 'crisis', would have to buy supplies and equipment from the same Illuminati corporations which had created the crisis. This quandary spurned more creativity, and even more economic resiliency.

The preoccupation of the Illuminati with regaining control of the runaway American economy, resulted in their loss of control over the Soviets. We suffered a considerable set-back, while the Uluminati got much richer, thanks to government favoritism, but our set-backs were somewhat offset by increased economic toughness.

The "Watergate Conspiracy" (another hoax within a hoax), was instigated in the wake of the fuel crisis, to compound political disillusionment with economic distress, in attempt to collapse the American economy. The break-in and subsequent 'leak' to the press was engineered by the Illuminati through the F.B.I. and CIA, using the same people who murdered J.F.K. Their idea was also to stop Nixon from freeing the Chinese, or opening up the new Asian markets. The Illuminati "divide and conquer" concept requires a divided world. Nixon was erasing too many barriers, making too much peace. They merely exploited the natural weaknesses of Nixon and his cabinet.

The Illuminati divides Texans and New Mexicans to maintain control of the mineral and oil wealth in the two states. The illegitimate accumulation of fabulous wealth by the military-industrial complex, was procured by creating divisions between the Americans, Soviets, Chinese, the West in general, and the Middle East, primarily through religiously motivated exterminations, wars, and revolutions. Can you see them giving up without a depression or another war? And who shall fight whom?

The Illuminati exploits dormant hatreds, creates divisions upon which wars, economic exploitation and deceit are built, motivates all parties at "their own levels", and sets up each new play of the game. They divide the Muslim world against itself, and use "Christianity", "Judaism", "oil", economic interests, ethnicity and nationalism as wedges, to create more homogeneous societies which are more easily steered into bigger international wars and Illuminati control. The Christians-versus-Muslims squabble in post-Communist Yugoslavia requires a closer look at the big picture.

Through us, the Illuminati backed ultra-conservative oligarchic Muslim Saudis and Kuwaitis against 'socialist' Muslim Iraqis, in the "Gulf War", in order to keep the Golden Pipeline to Wall Street Illuminati banks intact, and to keep the Russians out of the international oil markets, because they have vast petroleum reserves. The Illuminati deftly plays all things to all people, like bisexual whores at a transexualist convention.

The constant irritation of the Iraqis by the U.S. government is a dangerous game. It is only a matter of time, if such bullying continues, until angry Arabs rises up and "sting" America like a stirred up hornet's nest. It is a grave mistake to consider the Arabs easy prey for our military. A look at the past few years shows that the constant assault on Muslim Arabs has not only solidified their political resolve, but made Americans the unwelcome "ugly Americans" in that part of the world. How long will it be until a nuclear weapon is detonated in New York City or West Palm Beach?

The Illuminati is not an Illuminati, but a Pseudo-Illuminati, "bringer of darkness", what the Tibetans call the "black magic" of the pre-Buddhist Bonpas murder cult, so powerful and feared in Tibet that few will speak about it. It was the cult written about by Theodore Illion[9], who visited the cult's underground headquarters, where he was invited to join the elite and refused to do so. He escaped, was hunted throughout Tibet by the cult, escaped, returned to Germany, and lived to write about it. This was undoubtedly the "unknown underground masters" of whom Hitler spoke. How does this significantly differ from the CIA?

---

[9]Theodore Ilion, Darkness Over Tibet, (reprint of 1937 original, Adventures Unlimited Press, Stelle, Illinois, 1991).

CHAPTER VII: FROM THE EASTER BUNNY TO AUSCHWITZ: THE RELIGION OF EINSTEIN AND THE NAZI NEW-AGERS

The previous Chapter VI was the consummation of the over 17 years of overt judicial harassment which ensued the moment George Bush took the reins of power at the CIA, and ended with his Presidency. Bush is a pal with fellow Trilateralist and Republican, Robert O. Anderson, the man who controls the North Slope of Alaska and the HAARP project, though Anderson would now probably disavow any connection to ARCO, which he created. Chapter I can be thought of as a kind of "Revolutionary Manifesto of Laissez Faire Capitalist Creatology"—(i.e., a manifesto of a radical and new artistic and scientific religion, based on the "Science of the Creative Process").

The Illuminati originated with "luminism", or Mithraism, related to the myth of 'Osiris the Beautiful Hare", an over 6,000-year-old religion, devoted to sun-worship. As a solar god, Aestre (Easter, Auser, Oser, etc., the "East Hare of Light and Goodness" [Ahuramazda]) is also the origin for "Aryans" ("Hare-ians"), or worshipers of Osiris. These included Moors, Greeks, Turks, Mongols, Norse, Schythians, Scots, Irish, Celts, Semites, Arabs, and Syrians, etc. Many tribal names derive from the "hare" word, often combined with the "duck" or "goose" word (emblematic of Isis, Osiris' mate), as do many other words in Asia, the Middle East, North Africa, Europe, and North and South America. For example, "Schythian" means "Duck-Hares", a word which is "Scutari" in Turkish.

The word "Aryan" did not originally denote a race, but rather a religion. However, it later came to be misinterpreted as a race, by the leaders of neo-Pagan religious movements of the 20th century.

THE "MODERN ILLUMINATI" AND THE NAZIS

In 1776, Adam Weishaupt, a Bavarian Jesuit priest, and professor of Canon Law at Ingolstadt University, "reinstituted" the secret, "Illuminaten Orden", infiltrating the Bavarian Masonic Lodges and instilling the Johanite Gospel, requiring a compulsory belief in "Almighty God", and excluding Atheists and Jews, converting the lodges into instruments of mystical and racial control. Though declining in 1790, the Illuminati was still alive, resurging again in 1912, particularly in 1914 Austria, fabricating the pre-Nazi "Thule Society", a "neo-Gnostic" racist group, teaching that "Aryan was good, and Semitic was evil". This was begun by Joseph Lanz von Liebenfel's Ostara religion. Members were apparently unaware that they were worshippers of the "Easter Bunny", and that they, as Germans, shared a common racial origin to many of the Jews. The program against Masonic acceptance of Atheists or Jews, eliminated their potential influence. The Illuminati had a secret world government plan, maintained by compartmentalization, implementing mystical and racial national concentrationism. A 'schism' created between Christian (Prussian) Masons and Atheist and Jewish (and later Zionist-Atheist) Masons, was similar to the Lutheran Reformation, in which Martin Luther's anti-Semitic book, entitled "The Jews in the Catholic Church", isolated German Christians from the ideologically competitive 'foreign' influences of the Roman Catholic Church, by pointing out Jewish financial influence in Roman Catholicism.

During this time, the Illuminati made inroads in France, via the Jacobins and French Masonic Lodges, during Napoleonic regimes, and into Spain as the Alumbrados, who soon found themselves being sponsored by the Duke of Pachucua, a knight of the Spanish Royal Court, in Mexico. This eventually gave rise to the Penitentes in Mexico and the North American Southwest, in which secret members became known as "Pachucos", named for their earlier official sponsorship by the Duke of Pachucua, and their American origins in the Mexican state of Pachucua. Like the Thuggees of Asia, some Pachucos were required to perform certain criminal acts, and openly wore tatoos on their bodies, later concealed in the folds of their hands, after the F.B.I. outlawed them, declaring them criminal and subversive. As a boy, I knew many of them.

According to one of my uncles, a 32nd Degree Mason, and a Catholic, of "Cajun" origin (who was never excommunicated for his Masonic activity), the American Masonic Lodges refused to accept French Masons into American Lodges, after the time of the Marquis de Lafayette (a friend of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, converted to Masonry by Jefferson), because of the infiltration of the French Masonic Lodges by the Illuminati.

When it went out the door with the expulsion of the Emperor Maximilian, the Napoleonic Austrian puppet government of Mexico left behind the Mexican National Anthem, Under the Double Eagle (Unter den Doppel Adler), an Austrian march (written by Richard Wagner, the German composer) referring to the "double eagle", a symbol which can be found before 655 A.D. on a gold and enamel purse cover from the Sutton Hoo Ship Burial (now in the British Museum). The emblem was carried by German and Austrian Christian Knights Templars, during their crusades against the Muslims, and is a Masonic symbol often seen on Shriner rings. The symbol had already found its way into the Roman Empire during the days of the emperor Trajan, when Germanic slave-artisans from the north were imported to decorate Roman architecture and monuments. The double eagle became popular during the time of the first 'Holy Roman' emperor, Constantine Porphyrogenesis ("Born of the Purple"), the son of a German officer in the Roman Legions from Trier, and a Hungarian mother.

When my ancestors, the Fosters and the Richardsons, brought the Mexican Napoleonic-dictator, Generalissimo Santa Anna, before General Sam Houston, after his capture at the Battle of San Jacinto, they first tried to hang him, until they saw the double-eagled Masonic ring on his finger. Instead, they sent him back home via Washington, where the Mexicans eventually decapitated him, double eagle ahd all. The ring showed his membership in the Jacobin/Alumbrado lodge of the Napoleonic regimes. Sam Houston was a direct descendant of Phillip II of Spain, and according to the Templars, Jesus Christ.

John Baptiste Lamy, Jesuit Archbishop of the Archdiocese of Santa Fe, refused the Holy Sacraments to Penitentes, unless they swore an oath disavowing the Penitente/Pachuco secret sect. Lamy excommunicated those who refused, thereby also stealing much of the lands of their "brotherhood", El Rancho de Nuestro Senora de La Luz (The Ranch of Our Lady of Light), and several others, the titles to which were granted to their predecessors-in-title, by the "pre-Napoleonic/Illuminati" (Alumbrado-influenced) Spanish king, Phillip II, who was also a Hapsburg (from the House of Esterhazy ["East-Hare", or "Osiris", whose 'house' was at Busiris, in the Sixth Nome of Lower Egypt]). The Penitentes represented a "fundamentalist schism" to the Illuminati that Bishop Lamy knew and loved so well, and represented a threat to the exclusivity of secret control by the Jesuit Order, which is jealously intolerant of any secret organization other than itself, in any territory it controls. The "Penitentes" represented an undisciplined, unexpected, and intolerable branch of the Illuminati, which had fused its elements with those of Native American Indian populations, and had to be "pruned back" by the Jesuit Order in the 19th century, and by the F.B.I. in the 1950s. Some have even said that J. Edgar Hoover was a Jesuit priest.

Figuring into all this was the "Holy Grail" and the "Golden Cup Ceremony". Its earliest known pre-Christian origin seems to be from Indo-Sumerian traditions, which related to the Uralo-Altaic-speaking tribes in Western Siberia, from which the Schythians (Scot-Irish), Turks, Koreans, Japanese, Finns, Celts, Sumerians, Hittites, Minoans, Britons, Saxons, and many other tribes descended. Incorrectly thought by some to be Buddhist, it was actually practiced by the more ancient, pre-Buddhist, Bonpas religion, of Tibet, which worshipped "black magic" and "Kali Ma" ["Bloody Mother", the "Goddess of Chaos"], with obvious affiliation to the Thuggee cult, the Society of Assassins, and the Death's Head S.S. Black Order ["Schwartze Korps"]).

The Bonpas, Thuggees and Assassins believed in a "collective consciousness", and that, as the population of the world increased, this collective consciousness was "weakened" by being shared by too many people. In service to "Bloody Mother" ("Kali Ma" or Kali Matrakis), they believed in killing as many people as possible—preferably everyone—so as to strengthen the "collective consciousness". Unlike the S.S., Bonpas, Assassins and Thuggees wore white robes with red sashes. (In one photo however, Hermann Goering can be seen wearing a white SS uniform with a white belt having a thin red line on it.)

In 747 A.D., Padmasambava brought Buddhism to Tibet. He supposedly killed or drove all the Bonpas out, but they just went "underground"—figuratively and literally. Padmasambava "ceremonially" incorporated the main idea of the Bonpas—the Doctrine of the Non-Ego—into Buddhism. The original ceremony of the Bonpas, entailed actual cannibalism, in which the hearts of sacrificial victims were eaten, and their blood drank in the Dance of the Red Tiger Devils}[0] The Buddhists however reject actual cannibalism.

The "Holy Grail" or "Golden Cup" myth survived in Germany through the Nibelungenlied (the bloody pan-Germanic epic, in which Attila the Hun is believed to be the wise old uncle). Descended from Tibetan and Uralo-Altaic/Sumerian origins, the Golden Cup myth eventually became associated with the libation cup of the Celto-Nordic peoples. As explained in Plato's Timaeus, the ten Gods of Atlantis commenced their gatherings by collecting the blood of a young bull in the golden cup. This is evidenced by the two beautiful, Late Minoan, golden Vaphio Cups, found in the Peloponnese, upon which are depicted several ancient Minoan "cowboys" lassoing young bulls.

The Golden Cup, or Holy Grail, eventually became the double symbol of "knowledge", and of "pure blood", in the diseased minds of Nazi theorists. Among Heinrich Himmler's list of required reading for S.S. initiates, was Crusade Against the Grail and Lucifer's Court in Europe, by Otto Rahn, Colonel, S.S., a member of a society called the "Ahnenerbe". "Lucifer" (meaning "Light-Hare", from "Luci-" +

---

[10]Tibetan Yoga and Secret Doctrines (Wentz Oxford U. Press, London).

"-fer") identified the Illuminati (and Naziism/Trilateralism) as an "Osirian" cult, with the "Holy Grail" (Golden Cup and bulls) as one of their sacred myths.

In the 7th century, A.D., the Christian Holy Byzantine Emperor, Justinian, drove 40,000 Mithraists (worshippers of Osiris) into a hippodrome in Asia Minor, and exterminated them. Justinian married a dancer, Theodora, whom he met at the Circo Massimo in Rome. Over 1300 years later, Hitler also married a dancer, Eva Braun. Justinian reinstituted "proskynesis" (the Roman salute, "Hail, Caesar!"). (Incidentally, Caesar, Kaiser, and Czar mean "Goose-Hare", in reference to the Sun-Goose...Isis...and the Sun-Hare...Osiris.) Hitler did likewise. Hitler and the Thule society eclectically copied the fanaticism of early Christianity, and several secret societies, combined with the aggressive expansionism and organization of the Roman state.

The Ahnenerbe Society ("Society for the Study of Ancestral Heritages", i.e., Indo-Germanic racial research), was supposedly racio-theological in nature. In Jan., 1939, Ahnenerbe was incorporated into the S.S., and already had fifty branches, led by Prof. Wust, teacher of Sanskrit at Munich University. Meetings of the general staff of the S.S. began with Yoga and a Bonpas/Bhuddist "Sesshin". The Ahnenerbe, which maintained constant contact with Tibetan Bonpas lamas, also contained the mystical Black Order ("Schwartze Korps"), the S.S. "inner circle". Ahnenerbe's general manager, S.S. Colonel Wolfram Sievers, was hung by the Tribunal at Nuremberg.

Ironically, a majority of the ancient "Sea People" tribes from whom many of the Israelites under Solomon's short-lived 10th century, B.C. democracy derived, were originally "Aryans", both in terms of race, and in terms of the worship of Osiris. This is confirmed by the word "Israel", meaning "East-Sungod-Hare" ("Is-" = "east"; "-ra-" = "sun-god"; "El" = the Babylonian Saturn ["Sa-" = "sun"; "-turn" = "hare"]), related also to the Ural ("Hare-El") mountains, and Mt. Elbruz ("El's Burg" or "El's Mountain", in the Ukraine) a couple of the 'Aryan' ancestral regions.

The upshot of this tangled, mystical baggage, collected by various confused segments of the human race, is that "racio-religions" are one of the many excuses that "races" or "tribes" have used for exterminating one another, or even themselves, hi the Illuminati, we meet ourselves coming back, because both Hitler, the Austrian, and Einstein, the Jew, were members of it.

The Trilateral Commission (The "Three-Sided Commission", in reference to the triangle) IS the Illuminati. The triangle with the "all-seeing eye of God", is the triangular top of the pyramid with the eye, as seen on the dollar bill. It was used in the 1937 Los Alamos "p2" project, by von Braun. It is also a Masonic and Rosicrucian symbol. Originally, it was the eye of Ra-Bel or Ba'al (Ba' + El), the Sun God, and of Osiris, symbolized by the "Apis Bull at Memphis", with the sun disk on its head, which is the "golden calf mentioned in the Old Testament. Since the 'Osirian' Ba'alamites were still the religious leaders of so many of the Israelites, the Rabbis created a 'new' religion, in which the "old gods" were disavowed (or rather recreated in disguised new forms).

More specifically, the "modern Illuminati" is a secret group of world power mongers, whose title suggests that they are "illuminated" (i.e., possessed of some special or great "mystical secrets" or "wisdom of the ages", which we normal individuals do not possess). This is a bunch of crap, because David Rockefeller and his clique have no greater knowledge than you or I, except for the criminal knowledge that any gang of "Thuggees" have. The Illuminati have knowledge concerning the technological secrets which they have stolen and secreted away from the world, to maintain their dictatorship by secret economic control, and to protect their secret resources from the threat of advanced technology which could free the people of the world from their control. This is not "higher" knowledge, but "lower knowledge".

Osiris ("The Beautiful Hare"), as a sun god, originally represented sunlight, and later "knowledge". This was reflected in Greece and Rome by Helios or Prometheus ("Pro-Mithraist") the "...bringer of light and knowledge...". To fundamentalist Christians, this was evil, because it was the same as Adam's eating of the apple, and "...partaking of the tree of knowledge...", which "...took away man's innocence..."(i.e., ignorance). The fact that an evil group calls itself "The Illuminated Ones", claiming "higher knowledge", does not make real knowledge evil, but good. That is what this book is all about. What is truly evil, is stealing and hiding technological knowledge created by individuals for the good of themselves and a civilized human race.

The evil "Set" (brother of Osiris) was obviously related to the origin and namesake for the Judeo-Christian "Satan" ("Sa-" = "sun"; "-tan" = "dawn"), which was synonymous to the Minoan Minotaur ("Min-" = "A-min" ["East-Min", or "Amon", the Memphis fertility goat-god], combined with "-taur" ["bull/hare"], to form a fertility goat-god/Apis Bull/Hare/sun-god which roamed about the Labyrinth, tormenting the damned sent there, beneath the isle of Thera ("She-hare", the Minoan name for "Ashera", a form of Astoreth, the female flying [Canaanite] form of Osiris). This was the derivation for the Christian "Purgatory". The "immaculate conception" of Christ, is similar to the ancient myth in which Isis (sister and wife of Osiris) "immaculately" conceived of Osiris, and gave birth to Horus, while Osiris was entrapped by Set in a knot in the trunk of a Tamarisk tree which was used as a roof support for the house of the King of Byblos. This ancient story originated in Western Siberia with the Uralo-Altaics, as a mating of the Sun-Hare, Osiris ("Heru-") and the Sun-Duck, Isis ("-Khuti"), giving birth to the Sun-Hawk, Horus ("Heru-Khuti", or "Hare-Duck"!).

George Bush and the rest of the Trilateralists would clearly like to force all of us to believe in their "god", whoever or whatever that is, and we are just no damned good unless we do. Again, the upshot of all this is that we're swimming in mythological garbage here, and we simply cannot allow ourselves or anyone else to predicate our political decisions on their personal, mystical, subjective religious concepts, and should settle only for government by reason, rather than a dictatorship based on "faith" in someone's personal or mass religious mythology.

The kind of thinking behind the Ahnenerbe/Nazi madness, could just as well have supported a movement by neo-Pagan "Aryans" (i.e., German Safartic {i.e., "Aryan"} Jews) to use a holocaust of their own making, based upon similar religious horse shit, as a pretext to "purify their race", by exterminating what they might have decided were "non-Semitic" Aryans, such as Gypsies, Khazars, Germans, or other Asiatic peoples who had converted to Judaism, rather than to have been born into it, via some of the "tribes" delineated by the post-Solomonic Rabbis, after the 10th century B.C. creation of the ancient kingdom of Israel. By such thinking, they could have exterminated the Christians, as "non-Semitic, heretical Jews". The prejudice of German Jews toward Asiatic Jews is well-known in some quarters, as reported by Meyer Levin (author of Compulsion, a true story about some murderers on a cross-country killing spree), during his promotion of The Diary of Anne Frank, when German Jews tried to take away the manuscript because Levin happened to be of Asiatic origin, and not pro-Communist.

The astonishing conclusion from all this, is that the modern Illuminati are a group of powerful and wealthy coercive monopolists—actually unfit and incompetent business men and industrialists—who sustain their power and wealth as a group, through theft of advanced technology, and concealment of it through mystical "mind control"-type manipulation of society. If known to the general public, this technology would break the coercive monopoly, and reduce things to the normal realm of capitalist competition and survival of the fittest. For this reason, this book is the greatest threat to Illuminati power ever seen, because it discloses the technological secrets and true origin of the flying saucer, as their best kept secret, and makes the construction of a flying saucer a possibility for anyone having competent technological skills, and wishing to build their own.

EINSTEIN WAS A NEW-AGER

The work of Albert Einstein is useful to the Trilateral Commission, not only for its fuzzy thinking, but also because of its support for the Big Bang, and other Big Lies of Big Science. Einstein was undoubtedly a great mathematician, but metaphysically and epistemologically, he was an idiot.

Einstein was philosophically an existentialist, religiously a Cabballist, and epistemologically a Platonist. It is odd that the "Father of Existentialism", Edmund Husserl, had two main students, Jean-Paul Sartre, a Zionist, and Martin Heidegger, a Nazi. Einstein was a follower of the former, and Hitler was deified by the latter. Einstein's theories were influenced by the Kabalah as well as existentialism, which relies upon a Platonist epistemology—one based upon Plato's Cave Analogy, which holds that our knowledge of reality is like that of an observer in a cave, outside of which a caravan passes between a fire, also outside the cave, and a wall inside the cave, casting a shadow of the caravan on the wall; according to the analogy, we cannot know reality, but see only a "shadow" of it. In keeping with this cave analogy, Einstein continually referred to what he called an "apparent effect", as if his eyes and senses were unreliable tools of cognition, or means for acquisition of any valid facts about reality.

Einstein applied his peculiar existentialist and Platonist epistemological and metaphysical misconceptions to physics, thus protracting many cognitive mistakes into this supposedly "exact science". His fundamental errors included his fictitious concept of time, caused by his Platonist epistemology. The existence of what he referred to as a space-time continuum concept, was a begged question. He said that space is curved, attempting to attribute a geometric configuration or "grain" to unarticulated space. He was so subjective, that he thought what he called an "apparent effect" (his subjective manifestation of Plato's cave analogy), affected the whole universe, in a giant contradiction, based on the Platonist concept that man could not know reality or the nature of it, but only an "apparent effect" or "shadow" of it, which existentially had no relation to what anyone else knew or perceived. So why did he even bother to say it?

In reality, "Time" is a fiction created by man, to measure the rate at which events occur in the universe, and to interrelate them to each other within the spatial context on and around our earth, as it moves through space, and to measure cyclical movements having distinct relationships to all other events, particularly the movement of our planet in the solar system. A specific "time" is marked by a fictionalized, 'frozen moment' or position in space, in respect to a particular cyclical measurement of the clock and the calendar—two mathematical computers used to measure "time". Our earth moves around the sun, while our solar system moves around our galaxy, which in turn moves around the edge of the Milky Way, which in turn moves around the outer reaches of the Magellanic Clouds. Our earth and everything on it, and everything else in the universe, can never be in the exact same place ever again. Any rational person should be able to see why "time travel" is a physical and metaphysical impossibility. But, if you can be tricked by the Illuminati into believing it is possible, then you can be tricked into believing any other Big Lie they arbitrarily choose to tell you.

In reality, we can know that, by the nature of reality, all events always occur in the instant present, and are irretrievably locked into their contexts in respect to all other events occurring at that same instant, throughout the universe, whether we are aware of them or not. References to "the future" or "the past" are purely fictitious, though we may reconstruct events as they occurred in the past intellectually. Single events cannot be displaced out of their contexts, without reference to their relationship to the rest of the universe at the time they occurred. 'Time travel' is also an epistemological impossibility, because a jump forward or backward in the fiction of "time", would require a physical jump of the whole universe from one configuration in one place, to another configuration, at a far distant place, instantly. This is too much to ask of the universe, just to satisfy the subjective, psychological whims of an Einstein. Only the present exists, forever, and reality is everything occurring or existing in that same, instant present, everywhere. We can know the nature of reality, without having to know all of its events and minute features.

Of the two epistemologies, the Illuminati propagate the Platonist one (and Einstein's theory of subjective 'time travel' and the 'forth dimension', etc.), because it supports the complete upheaval of a rational, Aristotelian epistemology based on the primacy of the senses as valid tools of cognition, and supports the mystical Platonist epistemology based on faith, which allows the public to be misled by, and to accept the Big Lie. The Big Bang cosmography is only a cosmological extension of this Big Lie.

The laws of physics are determined only by a true philosophically sound reasoning process. Einstein's fundamentally subjective and unsound reasoning errors were responsible for the wrongness of his theories, which could not be corrected by all his mathematical mumbo-jumbo. His peculiar metaphysical aberrations were manifested in his well-known formula, purporting to show the interconvertibility of "energy" and "mass", as follows: "$E = MC^2$" ("Energy [the ability to do work] equals mass times the velocity of light, squared"). The formula 'equivocated' an abstract concept (the "ability to do work") with the manifestation of a physical concretion ("mass") multiplied times the velocity of light, squared. This was sort of like saying something like "work equals a rock times the velocity of light, squared." The formula doesn't say how much work can be done, or anything else, for that matter.

"Energy" E, is the "ability to do work", while the "velocity of light" ("C"), is the velocity at which electromagnetic radiation is said to be transmitted from one point in space to another. To equivocate the abstract concept of "energy", with mass times the square of the velocity of light, can be considered as of an attempt to explain how much work a particular mass might accomplish, measured by the quanta of radiation it might hypothetically be converted into, as a "non-inertial" form of dynamic energy stored in electromagnetic radiation in space, as well as a measure of how much potential electromagnetic energy is stored in a particular quantum of mass, but it just isn't true.

Einstein's contradictory theory presupposes that mass is not "energy", since, only during some non-spontaneous process of interconversion of mass into radiant energy, or radiant energy into mass, could "work be done". Mass appears impertinent, and "C = E/R" (Tesla's equation, which excludes mass) appears true, saying that, at C, Energy E, is divided by resonant frequency R. 'Massless' radiant energy, or "cosmic radiation", is dynamic energy stored in transit in space, by the vibrations of the ether. I define space as a volume, which is never empty, but contains an ether, and omnidirectionally interpenetrating radiant energy, of many frequencies. The energy level of radiant energy is determined by its frequency. This radiant energy is the ZPR.

An interesting aspect of Tesla's equation, is that while the resonant frequency, R, divides the quanta of energy, E, at the velocity of light, C, the reactance of the electromagnetic radiation varies as the fourth power of the frequency; the higher the frequency, the higher the reactance. This means that "p2" is more effective at higher frequencies, since the time lag between changes in charge and current distribution in the dipole, is enhanced by the limitations of C. This permits the dipole to continue to "shake out" charges on the peak negative pole, both during and between negative peaks. At 3/8th wavelength tuning, the positive and negative wave components cross and neutralize one another at the neutral pole, between the negative peaks at the opposite pole. The principle that the negative pole will continuously shoot out negative charges is also effective at 1/4 wavelength tuning, with the exception that the opposite pole will be peak positive rather than neutral.

Unlike Einstein, Tesla believed that the velocity of particles were not limited by C, and even advanced examples in which he asserted that particles had exceeded C, because the speed at which they were propelled by light depends on the voltage and frequency of the radiation. Mass or radiation in themselves do not represent "energy", since "work" requires the application of force to mass, which is ignored in the Einstein equation, but was automatically assumed by Tesla, who knew that space is full of potential energy.

The odd paradox under Einstein's theory is that radiation traveling through space would do no "work", and therefore could not be "energy". The only way light could be energy, would be if, as Einstein said, "it gets tired", in which case some of the force originally emitted at its source, is transferred to, and does work on, some of the 'space' (the ether) through which it is transmitted, but this case contradictorily requires the existence of something Einstein denied, the ether. His statement concerning "light fatigue" was inconsistent to his equation saying that 'space' has no mass, and thereby agreed with Tesla's equation, which was not plagued by this inconsistency, since it concerns only dynamic force in radiant form, as an "ability to do work".

Another major difference between Tesla and Einstein, was that Tesla conceived the so-called "atomic energy" possessed by an atom, as radiant force being transmitted into an "atomic reaction" by the cosmos. It may be for this reason that the "Tokamak" and other "fusion" reactors, using a "magnetic bottle" to contain their reactions, produce no net work. The extremely strong magnetic fields must create impenetrable barriers blocking reactions between the "atomic fuel", and the "outer cosmos" (i.e., occluding the ZPR). Like obsolete nuclear fission reactors, "fusion" reactors are intentionally designed as dangerous, behemoth structures, to be operated only by a corporate/state socialist ("competition-prohibited"), Trilateralist power company, providing little competitive threat to conventional hydrocarbon-fueled generators.

Einstein's equation excluded resonance, as the time-relative distribution of force in light per distance. The radiant energy stored in space is relative to voltage, which in turn relates to the frequency of the radiation, and the time it takes for it to be transmitted from its point of emission to its point of "reconversion" into inertia, momentum, or heat, or its expenditure on the ether, as it in turn is converted into mass. Mass has inertial characteristics which are not reflected, because the laws of inertia are said not to apply to electromagnetic radiation, which is 10^{40} times stronger than the gravitational interaction.

This implies that energy, like time, may not exist, but is only a convenient fiction, since inert, static mass does no work, and neither does radiation while in transit in space. The equations of Tesla and Einstein are in direct conflict, because Tesla's equation is consistent with the universe as a dynamic, ever-changing, eternal, infinite perpetual-motion system, while Einstein's equation describes the universe as a finite, temporary, Big Bang-type event, expanding from an ultimate, fictitious, 'original explosion', which is continually winding down. Of the two equations/metaphysics, the Illuminati naturally prefer the latter, since it supports their sales at the gas pump, and the suppression of flying saucer technology via their Big Lie Program.

Energy can only be expressed in reality, during "changes in form". Of the two equations, only Tesla's equation can be correct, since it is the only one taking resonance into account, which is the rate per second at which electromagnetic oscillations or "beats" occur. Without oscillations, nothing is converted in form. The frequency of electromagnetic radiation is the "beats per second", and the level of "force" or "voltage" at which work is done. The more beats per second, the greater the work. Before 1902, Tesla already had numerous patents for the use of "radiant energy", both from "synthetic sources" and from "the natural media" of the universe.

The Nazis and the Trilateralists stole Tesla's flying saucer invention, and the U.S. government helped them take it to Germany, and now conceal it from us. Nikola Tesla was an Atheist/humanist, who detested mysticism, Einstein, Communism, and the Nazis. Einstein's beliefs were consistent with the Nazis, Communists, Trilateralists, and the U.S. government. A naive Tesla tried to warn the U.S. government about German militarism before WW I, and was naturally ignored, because the Illuminati already had a big new war planned, and intended to make billions selling munitions. Meanwhile, Communism—an experiment in world slavery created by the Illuminati, as a mystical religion based on the worship of the "collective consciousness", accepted on faith rather than reason—came into existence, failed, and has finally collapsed, after murdering off literally hundreds of millions of people, in service to "Kali Ma". This shows how heinous, criminal conduct often originates with the Illuminati's appeal to "faith, rather than reason", as a means of mind control, inevitably followed by mass murder.

I have a dream that some day the United States will truly separate the "state" from "religion" and mysticism, whether that of the Illuminati, Christians, Masons, Buddhists, Bonpas, Moslems, Jews, Communists, New Agers, "Scientologists", "Environmentalists", or "Synergists".

In 1979, I went to the National Security Resources Study Center (now The J. Robert Oppenheimer Research Center), at Los Alamos, which was opened to the public in Oct., 1977 by President Jimmy Carter (whom I had met in Savannah, in October, 1974, during his campaign for governor of Georgia). I sought basic information on hydrogen, and could not find it, but what I did find was astounding. Though simple data on hydrogen was 'unavailable', I discovered the plans for the hydrogen bomb! I also discovered the inadvertent "glossed" references to Lorentz' purported measurements concerning the excess positive charge of the hydrogen nuclear proton, and his postulate concerning the electrical cancellation of gravity. When I requested a "bibliography on Tesla" from the librarian, she said "...all information on Tesla is classified".

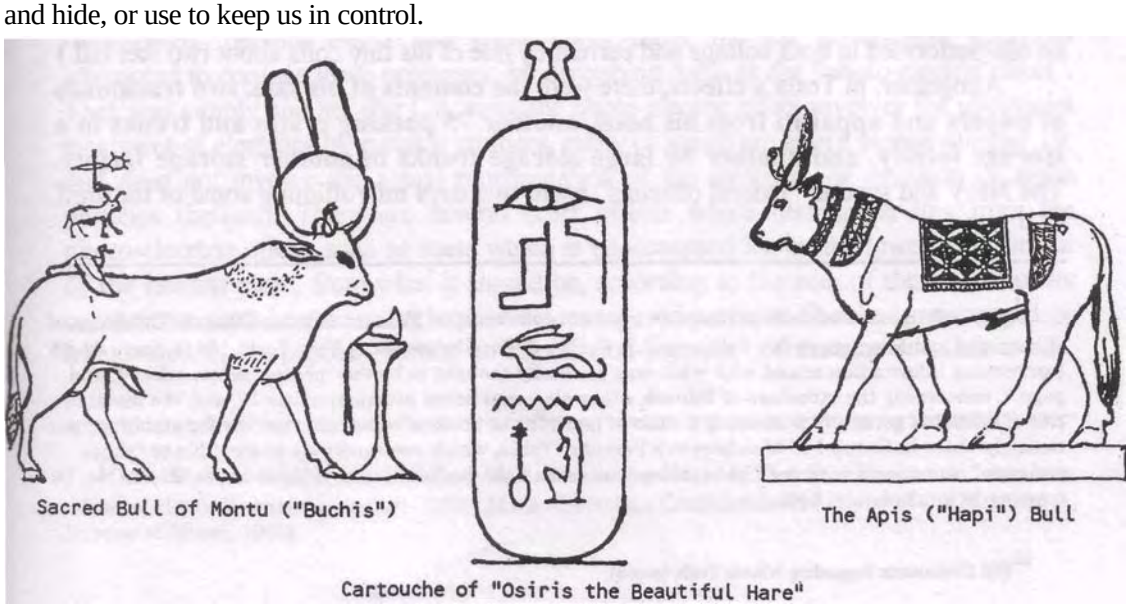
On my return to Santa Fe that evening, at a restaurant, I angrily proclaimed my disgust with the research facility, to a student from Harvard sitting next to me, for refusing my request for Tesla information, while making the plans for the hydrogen bomb available to me. The Harvard student went to Los Alamos, photo-copied the hydrogen bomb plans, and published a pamphlet on them at Harvard, creating a sizeable controversy. The center was almost since closed down.

Edward Teller, "Father of the H-Bomb", declared in 1979 that all secret information possessed by the government belonged to us, because we had paid for it, and that it should be made available to us from one year of the government's 'acquisition' of it. The H-bomb plans were probably intentionally planted by the Illuminati, to punish and scapegoat Teller, and to 'justify' increased "security measures", for the ulterior purpose of continued government suppression of other, beneficial energy secrets, having nothing to do with war or "terrorism".

Nikola Tesla originally intended to give his flying saucer invention to the Geneva Convention, for use in the prevention of war. He was disillusioned when the League of Nations fell apart, and began to conceal his discoveries. Tesla died a pauper in 1943, and the government illegally confiscated all his known papers. Today those scientific papers (over 80 large trunks, around a box car load), are stored in secret vaults at Los Alamos, still classified, over 56 years later. The main reason for the continued secrecy is the flying saucer, as well as things which we can only imagine.

In the end, the Illuminati perpetuate their power through mysticism, exploiting the interplay between Judaism, as the precursor to Christianity, and Christianity, as an heretical offshoot of Judaism. Naziism, an Illuminati "synthesis"—a slop-pot of the concepts of the Bonpas, Templars, Gnostics, Christians, Jews, and Mithraists—could never last, but accelerated the work of scientists working for the governments of the world, and produced a lot of discoveries in a very short time, for the Illuminati to steal and hide, or use to keep us in control.



CHAPTER VIII: A TASTE OF OTHER ENERGY SECRETS

Part of the "social manipulation" of course involves the use of the mass media and instrumentalities of the state to suppress not only the flying saucer technology, but also other powerful technology. This small section is included to tantalize you with the possibilities of what I refer to as "suppressed energy secrets". There are many of them, and many more variations. This information is included to also give you a glimpse of the outright fraud of the "nuclear power" industry and the D.O.E. ("Department of Energy", formerly the A.E.C. or "Atomic Energy Commission"), and its concealment of viable and safe options to the monstrosities which they have foisted upon us, called "nuclear power generators", which represent a gross misuse of the principles involved, for which responsible scientists and engineers should be subjected to criminal fraud charges. The scientists themselves are bound by national security secrecy orders, the violation of which would subject them to criminal prosecution for treason or espionage.

To whet your appetite, please find APPENDIX B: Excerpts from Joseph Papp's Patent No. 3,670,494, of 6/20/72, Method and Means of Converting Atomic Energy into Utilizable Kinetic Energy.

Around 1980, I stumbled not to my surprise, upon more suppressed energy secrets[11]. Most of this type of information hitherto publicly available, 'disappeared' from public access after 1942, due to the 'national scouring' operation by the F.B.I, which I mentioned before, which was not as complete as they would have liked. In fact, they missed some important material, due to their ignorance, being guided chiefly by the Relativist Quantum Mechanics, who failed to understand Tesla's technology. For example, on Tesla's death on Jan. 8 (not the 7th as most documents say), 1943, the FBI got involved in investigating as to whether or not anything of a national security interest was involved in Tesla's effects. In the opinion of John G. Trump[12], head of the government's Office of Scientific Research and Development, Technical Aids, Div. 14, NTRC (predecessor agency to the CIA's Office of Scientific Intelligence), "nothing of any value was contained", and there was "no reason to retain" custody of Tesla's effects. (Trump was also a professor at M.I.T., and had his feelings hurt by Tesla's 1938 review and critique of M.I.T.'s huge Van de Graaff generator~with its two thirty-foot towers and two 15-foot diameter balls, mounted on railroad tracks—which Tesla showed could be out-performed in both voltage and current by one of his tiny coils about two feet tall.)

Altogether, in Tesla's effects, there were the contents of his safe, two truckloads of papers and apparati from his hotel, another 75 packing crates and trunks in a storage facility, and another 80 large storage trunks in another storage facility. The Navy and several "federal officials" spent two days microfilming some of the stuff at the Office of Alien Properties storage facility in 1943, and that was it, until Oct., 1945, soon after von Braun's residency at Ft. Bliss, Texas, at which time Wright-Patterson's Air Force Research and Development Command people took a closer look. They had all previously completely missed the boat in their attempts to interpret Tesla's technology—according to the false Relativist physics—mainly because of the snotty report by their "expert", John G. Trump. Even the FBI has failed to grasp the significance of the note concerning Ms. Marguerite Merrington's witnessing of Tesla's 1894 "metallic plate suspension", and to black it out, in the Tesla papers released under the F.O.I.A. It wasn't until von Braun and company disclosed that their flying saucer technology was based on Tesla's 1890s discoveries, that our government knew what they had, and what the Nazis had already acquired in the 1930's from Tesla's files. Quite a lot of Tesla's technology had already leaked through several sources before the FBI's scanty look into it in 1943, fully seven years after von Braun's "p2" project at Los Alamos.

---

[11]This information initially surfaced in a set of books entitled Popular Science Library. The Story of Electricity and Magnetism (six volumes, P.F. Collier & Son Corporation, New York, 1941), pages 81-83 (concerning information mixed with what was generally thought to be the "photo-electric effect"), and page 7, concerning the structure of lithium, other elements below atomic number 19, and the instabilities of elements generally possessing a ratio of neutrons-to-protons which are "too low for stability", particularly those in Group I of Mendeleyev's Periodic Table, which are especially susceptible to "photo emission", some even with red light (cesium), or green light (sodium), but all those below atomic No. 19 transmute in ultraviolet light.

[12]FBI Documents Regarding Nikola Tesla (supra).

Practically the only thing they were looking for was technology related to the atom bomb, and since Tesla had stated that so-called "atomic energy" didn't come from the radioactive elements themselves, but from "cosmic radiation", they decided he was crazy and neglected his documents until the war was over. This concealment by neglect was the apparent result of Nazi/corporate-state influence in the government and F.B.I.

The data I found around 1980, which showed that all the elements below atomic No. 19, actually transmute in ultraviolet light—some in ordinary daylight—conflicted with Relativistic Quantum Mechanics. The products of these light-element transmutations, brought about with low energy bombardment, are alpha particles (stripped helium nuclei, each carrying a +2 charge), and beta particles (electrons, each carrying a -1 charge). On purchasing at Los Alamos salvage, two withdrawn volumes on the physics of X-rays[13]. These books showed the existence of the transmutation process. I realized that this information and all its reasonably construed implications, had been known by some scientists in both the U.S. and Soviet governments for years. These concealments apparently had nothing to do with "national security", and the two "governments" were apparently in conspiracy to protract archaic technology. Some governments, huh?

Due to prior public access to these secrets, and the possibility that some 'uninitiated' persons might still know about them, the liar government scientists attempted to confuse these processes, by describing them as the "photo-electric effect". That was simply another Big Lie, since the photo-electric effect involves the ultraviolet ejectment of electrons by suitable emitters, many of which are above atomic number 19, and does not involve the actual transmutation of the elements, or emission of alpha particles (helium). There are several other effects which distinguish this from the photo-elecrtric effect, such as mass which is unaccounted for by the lower total weight of the helium atom, from what it should be, according to the sum of the weight of its component parts, representing equivalent energy or particles liberated, rearranged or transmuted in the process, similar to the "fusion reaction" of the sun. In other words, this simple process can release or absorb (the same difference) the energy equivalent of the fusion reaction, in an externally reversible "K-capture" process, in which a K-orbital electron of an appropriate element "falls" into the nucleus (is "captured"), converting a proton into a neutron, transmuting the element into one with one more neutron in the place of the former proton. It is my theory that ZPR and aether-borne energy contained in the space encompassed by the electron prior to its capture, results in the emissions observed, which are "squeezed out" when the electron is captured by the nucleus.

---

[13]M.A. Blokhin, The Physics of X-Rays (State Publishing House of Technical-Theoretical Literature, Moscow 1957); Howard M. Stainer, X-Ray Mass Absorption Coefficients (U.S. Dept. of the Interior, Bureau of Mines, 1963).

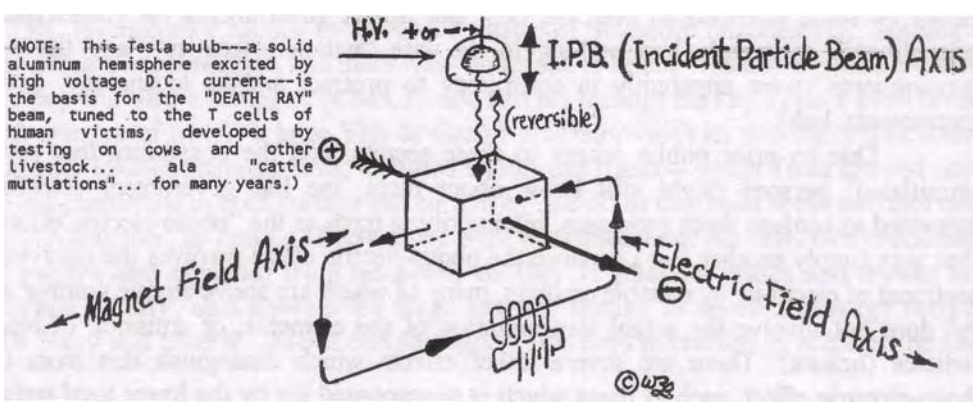
In this process, neutrinos are emitted as the element goes up the atomic scale, and are sucked back into the atom as it returns to its former element, over and over, if the process is continued, in a sort of "continuous nuclear orgasm". Here, we have another "table-top"-type fusion reaction, which has been concealed, primarily by treating it as an insignificant 'anomaly', which is then avoided and summarily dismissed.

A similar process occurs in nuclear excitation of a light element, in which an electron orbit is distorted by a magnetic field, or is excited a by a U.V. incident particle beam, and repeatedly becomes excentric, so as to "gather" energy in the "L" orbit, then emit it in the form of ionizing radiation, as the electron "falls" back into the "K" orbit. This process requires a carefully synchronized and controlled excitation at the specific NMR frequency of the element, under a specific magnetic flux density.

I soon realized that most of the "free energy" processes can be produced by using a medium in a "box", to transform electromagnetic power from the ZPR. Based on these processes, I developed the idea of what I call my "Triax ("three-axis") System", composed of three axes at 90 degrees to each other, which are: (1) The magnetic field axis; (2) the electric field axis; and (3) the particle beam axis (or "atomic axis", which may also be considered as the "momentum axis" in respect to its use in flying saucer propulsion). Any two of the axes may be used to produce the third, as follows:



A magnetic field will separate positive and negative charges, by turning negative charges in one direction, as positive charges are diverted or emitted in another direction (negative charges may be easily turned, while the positive charges are very difficult to turn). The charges may be collected on separate plates, to create an external current, and vice-versa. The incident particle beam directed at a sample of one of the light elements or a compound of them (often better), placed in a "triax box" with a magnetic field across it, causes the manufacture of positive and negative charges. The positive (alpha) particles charge the first plate, while the negative electrons pass into the second plate, being drawn into the circuit by the positive potential of the first plate—created by the presence of the positively charged alpha particles—and are drawn through an external circuit load, to perform work. These particles may be steadily recycled in an oscillatory fluorescent process which may be continued ad infinitum, so long as the load placed on the external circuit is not dropped too rapidly.

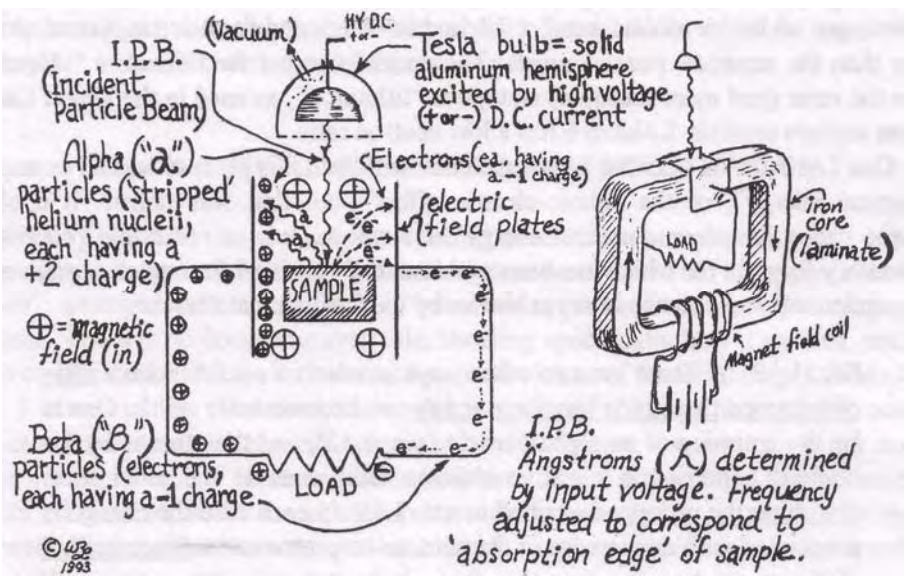
The trick is to transmute an element into a temporarily radioactive isotope of very short half-life, after which it quickly returns to its ground state, with the emission of photon energy extracted during its synthetically radioactive reaction with the ZPR:



Using a one-mole sample of lithium 6—or lithium niobate crystals, manufactured by Union Carbide—this process will produce a continuous external current of 50 kw, indefinitely, unless the load is dropped too quickly, in which case a small explosion can occur. This can be 'fail-safed' by use of a computerized control of the incident particle beam in respect to the load, in conjunction with an appropriate device such as an ultraviolet laser. More simply, an incident particle beam device can be easily fabricated using the Tesla bulb shown, which may be controlled with an FET (field effect transistor), which senses a change in the field strength and instantly diminishes the current to the bulb.

Lithium is the most active of all elements, and is perhaps the most unstable of the "light elements". In some cases, transmutation can occur in an incident particle beam of less than 7 volts according to the Blokhin book (in the biblography, and many other similar X-ray references), which gives specific product emissions for most elements (unless "classified") in respect to the frequency of an incident particle beam used at specific voltages. Powerful ionizing radiation can be used to charge field plates, or to produce 'pure electrical energy". The energy produced, is vastly greater than the electrical energy required to initiate the reaction, because it comes from the ZPR ("starlight"), and need involve no radioactive fuels or wastes.

These processes were explored by Tesla prior to 1900, and by T. Henry Moray, of Utah[14], while in Sweden in 1912. Tesla used aluminum and some Group I elements, while Moray used spudomene or lepidolite—lithium-aluminosilicate rocks—which he called his "Swedish stone", to which he soldered triple-distilled germanium, producing semiconductor devices (which he called "valves") almost twenty years before Shockley, who got the credit. These rocks are almost everywhere in Northern New Mexico, especially found in pegmatite dikes. Sheepherders in the vicinity of Dixon (where the government mined lithium for the H-bomb), carried pieces of lithium ore in their pockets in winter, to warm their hands. The moist hands provided the electrolyte contact, and penetrating cosmic radiation (the ZPR) did the rest. The lithium-aluminosilicate elements are all below atomic number 19, and in compound form are supposed to work better than the separate, pure elements. The normal number for lithium is "lithium 7", while the rarer (and more unstable) isotope is "lithium 6", as used in the Union Carbide lithium niobate crystals. Lithium 6 has a low neutron ratio.

One Los Alamos scientist I discussed this with said this process was an example of "chemical energy", or the "photo-electric effect", but that was untrue. It could be perhaps called "nuclear chemical energy", I suppose. It is a reversible process, the explanatory formula for which has been systematically omitted from nuclear engineering texts, under national security laws, as shown by the following statement:

> Sec. 1.19: "...There are two other ways in which a nuclide with a ratio of neutrons that is too low for stability can become more stable. One is by the emission of an alpha particle (sec. 1.12), and the other is by the nucleus capturing a negative electron from outside the atom, thus reversing the process described in sec. 1.16. In each case the change is associated with an increase in the neutron-to-proton ratio. Since neither of theses modes of radioactive decay is important in connection with nuclear reactors, it is unnecessary to consider them in further detail."[15]

And so, two separate possible "other" ways to produce atomic energy—both using non-radioactive light elements—are concealed. The primary justification for the concealment of these two processes is rationalized (for over forty years, since 1952 or earlier) because they are possibly being used to generate electrical energy on flying saucers and other secret projects. Although the processes are allegedly unimportant "...in connection with (archaic) nuclear reactors" of the kind desired by the Secret Government, protected by the sham A.E.C./D.O.E. cover, it is obvious that the use of these concealed processes might literally destroy the obsolete petroleum and atomic energy industries as we know them today.

---

[14] T. Henry Moray, The Sea of Energy in Which the Earth Floats, Cosray Research Institute, Salt Lake City, Utah (4th Ed

[15] Samuel Glasstone and Milton C. Edlund, The Elements of Nuclear Reactor Theory. D. Van Nostrand Co. Inc., Princeton, 1952 (emphasis mine).

These two (reversible) processes, combined in the continuous, oscillatory reaction, appear to be the same as that responsible for the helium power system already mentioned in respect to the helium-powered "...twelve B.M.W. engines..." purportedly used on WW II German flying saucers, and in respect to the Papp engine shown in the Appendix.

Can you imagine carrying one of these little generators around in your hand, from your house to your car, airplane (flying saucer), boat, or on camping trips, etc., to provide whatever, non-polluting electrical energy you wished, more than you could probably use?

It comes clearly into focus at this point, that the culprit vested interests are in the petroleum industry, or rather in the Wall Street monopolists who took over almost all independent petroleum production in the 1950s. I say this even though I could stand to inherit many thousands of acres of proven gas and oil mineral rights in southeast Texas. Since the Trilateral Commission or Masonic crooks within my own family will probably rip off those mineral rights somehow, before I inherit them, and obliterate all evidence, I probably won't get them anyway, so why should I care? What is more important, is replacing this archaic technology with "free energy" generators.

TESLA'S 'SPECIAL' GENERATOR: HOW DOES IT WORK?

Nikola Tesla discovered a simple, 'special' generator—the complete secret of which is locked away in the Los Alamos vault—which was constructed of "...copper, aluminum, and iron", arranged in "...a peculiar way", and had weak magnets or only unmagnetized iron cases. There is no document available, showing specifically how it worked, and only Tesla's cryptic comments on its construction, with claims of fantastic output. The closest things I know of are Tesla's homeopolar generators. Judging from them, and his invention of the standard electric meter used by the power companies on our homes, together with some actual experimentation and tests, I have extrapolated the fundamentals of Tesla's invention, since the electric meters are constructed in a 'peculiar' way, are composed of the three metals, and have weak magnets which can be reversed and 'oscillated'.

In 1979,1 took two old 115-volt Tesla electric meters—which are at least 70 years old—and connected them together in a 'peculiar way', attempting at first to measure two separate 115-volt currents coming into an apartment. There are four unlabelled posts on each these old meters, so I didn't know how to connect them, so I just took a shot in the dark. Due to the manner in which I connected them—which apparently was wrong—the two meters behaved strangely. At a low current drain, the disks rotated faster than when the current was greater. At a sufficiently high current, the disks stopped, hummed loudly—which I refer to as "snoring"—and even reversed, at a still greater energy consumption in the apartment. As the current usage went up and down, there were commensurate changes in the "snoring" and disk directions in the two meters.

By actually using more electricity in the apartment, less usage was recorded by the meters, as well as the main meter for my entire complex, and the electric bill for my whole complex dropped by about one-third. The meters were generating power, perhaps enough to power the entire apartment. Sometimes, when the disks were running in reverse, the meters were generating more power than that being used, and when they were running slowly in the opposite direction, the meters were generating less, but overall, the one-third drop in the bill indicated they were running that apartment, one-third of my complex.

Mr. Dort—the Virginia man whose father invented the special generators stolen by the Nazis and used on their "Electro-U-boats"—said that, when the 'snoring' was at its peak and the disk stationary, that the meter was at the "center of load", which meant that the amount of current being used was equal to that being generated by the meters! When the disks reversed, the 'meters' were generating more current than that being used, and were putting electricity back into the grid! After I removed the old meters from the circuits, my bill increased by one-third. By that standard, I may have been able to reduce the usage to practically zero, by connecting meters the same way in the other three residences, or by running all my current through the meters.

Under the generally accepted theory of electric power generation (inductance), a magnetic field and conductor are required. A dynamic conductor must 'cut' stationary magnetic 'lines of force', or dynamic 'lines of force' must expand and contract across a stationary conductor, to create the cutting action necessary to produce current in the conductor. Since energy is expended by use of alternating current to create an expanding and contracting magnetic field, the use of permanent magnets—which require no current to create their fields—is considered most efficient, except where it is desireable to have a reversing magnetic field in the core. The Tesla electric meter has weak magnets, which Tesla said was necessary so the magnetic fields could be reversed and alternated. The meter wouldn't work if it had very strong, completely polarized magnets. There are two basic ways the Tesla 'meter' can be used as a generator, as far as I can tell:

1. Mechanical: The disk may be rotated in the weak permanent magnet field, by a small motor connected to the shaft of the aluminum disk, generating an electric current in the disk. The current rises until sufficient to cancel the magnetic field, which it then reverses, as the current in the disk collapses and reverses, due to the reversed magnetic field, and the system begins to oscillate. An alternating output current is induced in the windings of the two sets of pole-pieces which are above and below the gap in which the disk rotates.

2. Electromagnetic: With this method, the current is run parallel through the windings of the pole pieces of two separate meters, creating a magnetic flux which alternately passes through the disk, and into the lower pole pieces, creating a current at right angles in the disk, which creates a thrust which rotates the disk in the weak magnetic field of the permanent magnets. When the current in the disk is sufficient to cancel the weak permanent magnetic fields, the disk stops, then "vibrates" ("snores"), as it rapidly and alternately reflects and transmits both the current and the magnetic fields, producing an output alternating current in the pole piece windings.

According to Mr. Dort, aluminum is the best "reflector", copper the "most active" (electronically conductive), and iron the "magnetic core material". Dort said his father's magnetic drive was based on a Tesla generator. Based on the drive system stolen from Dort's father by the Nazis, and used on the Electro-U Boats, Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz promised Hitler a "miracle at sea". How did the Tesla generator work?

The particular Tesla generator used by Dort's father—and the Nazis—was one which was being developed by Tesla in 1895, in conjunction with his developments concerning the liquifaction of air. Tesla knew, from Lord Kelvin's discoveries, that more heat is absorbed by liquified air when it is re-gasified and used to drive something, than is required by theory, in other words, that the liquifaction process is somewhat anomalous or 'over unity'[16]. Just prior to Tesla's completion of his work, and the filing of a patent application, Tesla's laboratory was burned down, destroying all his equipment, models and inventions. Immediately after the fire, Linde, in Germany, filed 'his' patent application for the exact same process, which recombined some of the heat energy produced in compression of the air, to drive the process, just as Tesla had done.

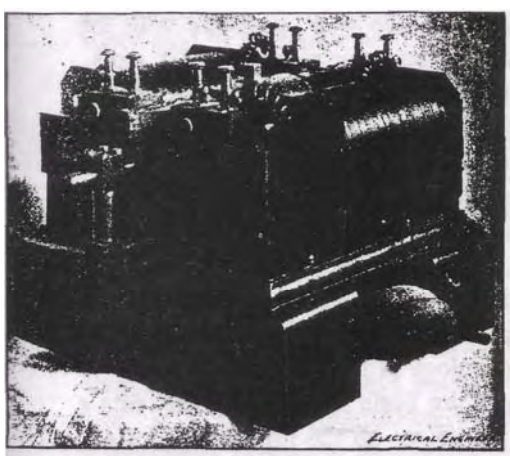
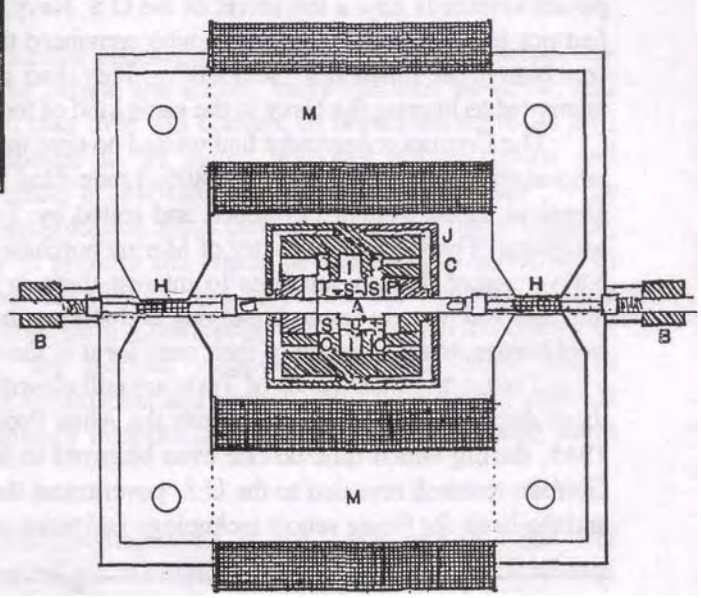
Tesla had combined the liquified air process, with his pneumatic piston-driven oscillator, even prior to the fire and Linde's patent application. In addition, he had calculated that, for every 200 pounds of iron connected to the device, a full horsepower was added to it. Can you imagine how many horsepower were added by the connection of the oscillator and liquifaction device to the body of a submarine? If hypothetically a Type XXI German submarine were retro-fitted with this oscillator, and its displacement were 2,700 tons, that would produce an extra 27,000 h.p., only a small part of which would be needed to drive the oscillator, which involved very little friction and force to produce a large current.

The Tesla oscillator developed by Dort's father, used on the Nazi Electro-U-Boats, is shown in my following simplified, clarified illustrations, based on Tesla's originals:



At the left is a photo of Tesla's earlier oscillator, which was unfortunately destroyed by fire in 1895. Projecting at its bottom right is a tube for connection of the compressed air line. Across the top are electrical posts to carry exciting current to the windings (around the outside), and from which generated power is extracted.



To the right is a schematic of the oscillator. M is the laminated iron core. H/H are the gaps in which the two small inductors on the shaft vibrate, cutting magnetic lines of force crossing the gaps. The square enclosed mechanism in center is the air-powered mechanical oscillator which drives the horizontal shaft. B/B are the shaft bearings.

[16] Nikola Tesla, Startling Prediction of the World's Greatest Living Scientist (Article, the North American, May 18, 1902).

The inductor-shaft of this oscillator was driven by the small pneumatic piston, powered by the liquid air. The shaft needed to vibrate only about 1/16 inch, producing a mere 'hum', which Tesla said was capable of vibrating a system of considerable weight "..many thousands of times per minute"[17] (standard 60 cps would be 3,600 times per minute). It is assumed that the increased horsepower from the iron of the sub, was combined thermodynamic energy added to drive the liquifier, as well as energy received by the oscillator from the same ELF transmitter which could also send messages. The iron could maintain the flow of heat liberated from the air as it was being compressed and cooled, and from the iron where it was stored, back to the air (in a Carnot cycle) when being expanded to drive the piston. At the same time, the iron could act as an antenna to receive earth's electrical energy being regulated by the 'transmitter' at a distance, electrical energy of stationary waves traversing the earth from pole to pole, as finally confirmed by Tesla during his 1899 Colorado Springs experiments. The iron collected electromagnetic energy from the earth system to be added to the electrical power of the oscillator as it was driving an Electro-U-Boat's motors and charging batteries. As stated by Tesla in 1898[18], (in pertinent part): "Primarily, I contemplated only the sending of messages to great distances in this manner." "Now, this idea I extended to a system of power transmission."

The windings on the oscillator were about 50 miles in length, and its inductive-capacitive system allowed it to operate on a frequency which was consistent with the earth's, at a wavelength of about 925 miles, with a frequency close to 13.5 c.p.s., sometimes mentioned in relation to Naval ELF communications. Was this part of Tesla's long wave system for "transmission of electric energy without wires", which he said he had completed just prior to his death, as shown in the FBI documents? Is the Navy's ELF ("Extremely Low Frequencies") system not only for communications, just as Tesla said, but also for broadcasting energy to submarines—just as Tesla also said? This submarine power system is now a top secret of the U.S. Navy. They could have had in 1943 if they had not listened to their "experts", who convinced them Tesla was crazy, something they can blame on Einstein's "R.Q.Ms". They had paid no attention to Tesla when he attempted to interest the Navy in the same kind of technology in 1901[19].

The German government had wasted no time in taking Tesla seriously. When Tesla's laboratory was burned down in 1895, Linde filed his patent on the liquefaction of air, identical to the system developed and tested by Tesla in conjunction with running his oscillator. The German Ministry of Marine purchased Tesla's turbine right after the U.S. Navy rejected Tesla's attempts to interest them in it first. By 1905, German chemical interests had already begun liquefying and storing thousands of gallons of liquefied air in steel bottles, in anticipation of their need for it in the coming submarine warfare.

Today, the discoveries of Tesla are still classified, over 56 years after his death, yet these discoveries laid in storage with the Alien Properties Custodian between 1943 and 1945, during which time no one even bothered to take a look, until after the war, when German research revealed to the U.S. government that Tesla's discoveries were valuable, and the basis for flying saucer technology and many other still classified developments.

---

[17] Patent for Tesla's Valvular Conduit, No. 1,329,559, Feb. 3, 1920.

[18] The Sun, New York, Nov. 21, 1898.

[19] The Transmission of Electrical Energy Without Wires As a Means for Furthering Peace, Nikola Tesla, ELECTRICAL WORLD AND ENGINEER, Jan. 7, 1905.

CONCLUSION

In his original foundations for the Bavarian Illuminati, officially instituted by Adam Weishaupt on May 1,1776, his stated purposes were good:

"Princes and nations will disappear...
Reason will be the only code of man. "

Weishaupt recognized no divine power outside of Man, and often referred to "...Nature and Nature's God".

The original purposes of the Declaration of Independence stated by Thomas Jefferson and other American revolutionaries, on Jury 4, 1776—only two months after Weishaupt's declaration—were good, also referring to "...Nature and Nature's God", just as Weishaupt had done.

The original purposes of Michael Bakunin, in the founding of his Internationale (the Alliance Internationale Sociale Democratique), in Switzerland, in 1864, was good...seeking an instrument to destroy the tyranny of the confiscatory state, and motivated by a genuine horror of his own experiences under despotism.

The original purposes of Theodor Hertzl, in calling together the first International Zionist Congress, of March, 1897, in Basle, Switzerland, were good, advocating that "...sovereignty be granted us over a portion of the globe large enough to satisfy the rightful requirements of a nation," intended by Hertzl to be guided by the individualistic premises of Friedrich Nietzsche.

The problem with these and similar endeavors, is that the Pseudo-Illuminati—by whatever name we know of it—lurks behind the scenes, more ruthless, powerful, and thorough than ever, always poised to take over and convert all organizations to its own use, in a manner diametrically opposite to its stated purposes. Organizations and movements originally intended to create a new religion of "reason and nature", were converted into ones for the mass psychological mind control of society, using religion, political mysticism and superstition to prohibit the higher development of mankind, to conceal technology, truth and higher knowledge, and to create and maintain a false economic dependence on Illuminati-controlled governments and the archaic technology of Illuminati industries. Meanwhile, the medical establishments and world health organizations are controlled and used to distribute and conceal population control methods developed and expedited by secret military weapons laboratories, so as to maintain world populations at "controllable levels".

The Illuminati, hypocritically styling itself as the "...Bringer of Light and Knowledge...", preys upon the sincere beliefs of religious people, and promotes irrational, mystical, superstitious or exploitative ideas or means, contrary to what might have been initially good purposes, showing the consciously designed, sociopathic conspiracy to control the world through deceitfully planned ignorance, mysticism, dependency, and the promotion and exploitation of weakness.

Philosophy—the "master control" of rational scientific thinking—has its "first laws"...irreducible primaries which must first be accepted by presupposition, before further rational thought may proceed. These first laws must rest on the facts of reality, before we can reach other reliable conclusions, such as that involving a possible 'origin'...if there was an origin...of the universe. This question was first begged in religious 'creationist' myths of the most infantile sort, just as UFOlogists begged the question that flying saucers are extraterrestrial. A god in the image of man, space aliens in the image of man, and 'extraterrestrial' flying saucers in the image of man-made flying saucers. On the issues of God, the Big Bang, Space Aliens, and Flying Saucers, rational people have been crowded into a corner as the 'nut cases', defending the "irrational" positions of the nonexistence of God, the infinity of the universe, the absence of evidence of aliens, and the terrestrial origins of flying saucers. That time has now ended. The Big Liars can prevail only by exerting absolute control over the press, public speech, and the media. They are now frantically multiplying their redundant Tired Old Big Lies in the public media.

The Illuminati eventually came to secretly advocate the use of unethical and murderous methods by its members, to cause unnecessary struggle and conflict of every kind, and to exploit mystical religious or political organizations, racial concentrationism, and military nationalism, in order to set up conflicts needed to create constant chaos and instability, in the midst of which they maintain and increase their wealth and economic control.

The Jesuit and Masonic orders fell to Illuminati control, as did Bakunin's Anarchist Internationale (expropriated by Marx and his Communists). The American Government fell to Illuminati control, via exploitation of the conveniently covert natures of the CIA, FBI, NSA, the Masonic Order, the Jesuits, the Trilateral Commission, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Bilderberg group.

After the 1919 failure of "Morgenthau's Pastoral Policy" to exterminate the "German race", at the end of WW I, the S.S. was formed later that same year, as an experiment in mass psychological control, financed by the World Bankers, the Rockefeller Commission (now the Trilateral Commission), acting through the S.S., under the auspices of the Hogg Foundation for Mental Health and "Eugenics Program" of the University of Texas, and the American Psychiatric Association. Their purpose was the control of the world through religion. To this end, a new religion, called "OSTARA "—'designed' by Georg Lanz von Liebenfels—was promoted through the S.S. and the Thule Society. This new Nazi religion used ancient religious mythology as its basis, falsely depicting the 'gods' as "aliens". For example, the Egyptian God of Darkness, Apepi (Apophis), a serpent, was claimed to be a "reptilian alien god" which lived under the Great Pyramid at Giza.

In the mass-psychology experiment, the Nazi alien religion was used to stretch the credulity of the German people, so they would believe whatever Big Lies their government told them. It was decided in 1923 that Adolf Hitler was to lead the German people in this experiment, to culminate in a mass suicide of the German people, in a "Wagnerian tragedy", then to fake his own suicide and make his secret exit. After the fall of Germany, and "destruction of the weak", the Illuminati "New World Order" was to come into being in 1945, as the United Nations.

Hitler handed over the flying saucer secrets to his benefactors in the Trilateral Commission, in a secret deal cut between the World Bankers and Industrialists, Trilateralists, CFR, Rockefellers and the Nazis, with the U. S. government acting as "security guard." The Nazi alien religion has since been promoted covertly by the U. S. government to conceal the flying saucer secrets, so that "UFOs" can be depicted as "alien technology", and kept from the people.

With the fall of the Soviet State, the U.S. political leadership soon began to bully and officiously intermeddle into the affairs of smaller, troubled, disadvantaged countries. Wars, pseudo-justified as "humanitarianism", are incredibly lucrative for IllumiNazi war industries. In March, 1999, through NATO, the U.S. began bombing Serbia, ostensibly to "save the (Muslim)ethnic Albanians from the atrocities of (Orthodox Christian) Serbians", following an undisclosed agenda to establish the authority of a "New World Order", which I call InterNaziism, disguised as humanitarianism. After the French Revolution of 1789, Robbespierre became known as "the humanitarian with a guillotine," in a "reign of terror". An "humanitarian with laser-guided bombs" is no less a terrorist, and has no business sticking the American nose into an ancient, foreign religious squabble, using this "wedge" as a pretext to establish world InterNazi authority.

The mainstay of the IllumiNazis are their monopoly of energy, minerals, raw materials, war materiel and military weaponry, related technology, and the media and communications industries through which they control information. The flying saucer represents their single most important technology, the continued secrecy of which is indispensable to the maintenance of Illuminati world control, because of its incredible fuel efficiency, speed, and electrical performance characteristics—all of which conveniently make the hoax more convincing—which mandates a priority of utmost urgency, to be pursued by them "at all costs". That is the reason these secrets have thus far remained concealed behind the Nazi "alien" religion. Meanwhile, our physicists and aeronautical engineers stand idly by in their dumb government jobs with their thumbs up their butts, awaiting their next checks.

The exact same Nazi alien religion is being promoted covertly today by the U. S. government and the Illuminati, through fancy, well-financed TV productions, books, movies, UFOlogy and New Age groups, which spread the lie that flying saucers are "extraterrestrial", to serve the dual purpose of concealing flying saucer technology and hypnotizing the American masses. We have an InterNazi government.

IN THE NAME OF THE FREEDOM-LOVING PEOPLES OF THE WORLD, I HEREBY TAKE BACK THE FLYING SAUCER SECRETS THE ILLUMINATI STOLE FROM US, SO THAT WE MAY LIBERATE OURSELVES FROM THE ILLUMINATI, AND CREATE A PROSPEROUS NEW FREE WORLD CIVILIZATION, BASED ON THE CREATIVE PROCESS, INDIVIDUALITY, PEACEFUL LIFESTYLES, FREE TRADE, FREE TRA VEL, AND LITTLE OR NO GOVERNMENT

BIBLIOGRAPHY

ELECTRICITY, MAGNETISM AND WAVES

R. L. Armstrong and J.D. King, The Electromagnetic Interaction, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, N. J.

U. S. Army Research and Development Laboratories,Image Intensifier Symposium, Oct. 6-7, 1958, Corp of Engineers, Warfare Division Branch

Bethge, O., Kleen, Werner, Translations from Annalen der Physik (1931)

Edwin H. Hall, Amer. Jour. Math. ii (1879), p. 287

D. E. Jones (translator), Hertz' Electric Waves, p. 29

Langmuir, Physik. Z., 14 1273 (1913)

John R. Pierce, Electrons and Waves, Doubleday & Company, Inc., Garden City, New York

H. A. Rowland, Ann. D. Phys., clviii (1876), p. 487

J. J. Thomson, Phil. Mag. xxxi (1891), p. 149

J. J. Thomson, Recent Researches in Electricity and Magnetism (1893), p. 13

Zeiten Schrift, (1994), p. 64

ELECTRO-PROPULSION, ETHER PHYSICS AND RELATIVISM

Hannes Alfvén, Existence of Electromagnetic Hydrodynamic Waves, Nature, vol. 150 (Oct. 3, 1942), pp. 405-6.

Beckman Instruments, Inc., Hall Effect Manual, Helipot Division, Fullerton, Ca.

Arthur C. Clarke, Electromagnetic Launching as a Major Contribution to Space Flight, J. Brit. Interplanetary Soc., Vol. 9, 1950, pp. 261-67

Barnard Ebershaw, Antigravity Propulsion Devices, R. & D. Associates, Inc., P. O. Box 873, Concord, N. C. 28025

Michael Faraday, On the Possible Relation of Gravity to Electricity, Britannica Great Books, Vol. 45, pp. 670-73

R. A. Ford, The Perpetual Motion Mystery, Lost Technology Series, Reprinted by: Lindsay Publications, Inc., Bradley, Illinois (1987)

George Gamow, Gravity, Doubleday & Co., Inc., N.Y.

George Gamow, Thirty Years that Shook Physics, Doubleday & Co., Inc., Garden City, N. Y.

Paul R. Hill, Unconventional Flying Objects, Hampton Road Publishing Co. (1995)

Dr. Franklin Kilpatrick, Free Energy Secrets!

Carl Frederick Krafft, The Ether Vortices, Borderland Sciences, Garberville, Ca (1987)

Carl Frederick Krafft, The Structure of the Atom, Borderland Sciences, Garberville, Ca (1987)

R. E. Lapp and H. L. Andrews, Nuclear Radiation Physics, Prentice-Hall, Inc., N. Y. (1950)

Eric Lerner, The Big Bang Never Happened, Random House (1991)

William R. Lyne, Occult Ether Physics, Creatopia Productions, Lamy, New Mexico 87540 (1997, 1999)

John-Erik Persson, About an Alternative to the Lorentz-Transformation (Hägersten, Sweden, 1997)

Gary Taubes, Relativists in Orbit, Discover (Mar. 1997)

J. A. Wheeler, Geometrodynamics, Academic Press (1962)

Sir Edmund Whittaker, A History of the Theories of Aether and Electricity (Revised and enlarged edition, 1951) Thomas Nelson and Sons, Edinborough

ION PHYSICS, RADIANT ENERGY, AND ARTIFICIAL RADIOACTIVITY

M. A. Blokhin, The Physics of X-Rays, State Publishing House of Technical-Theoretical Literature, Moscow, (1957), Reprinted by U. S. Atomic Energy Commission, Office of Technical Information.

G. Breit, M. A. Tuve and O. Dahl, A Laboratory Method of Producing High Potentials, Dept. Of Terrestrial Magnetism, Carnegie Inst., of Washington (published in PHYSICAL REVIEW, Vol. 35, 1930).

Dr. Sam Cohen, (Red Mercury), America Online: DJIBO, (3/5/95)

Dr. J. Franklin Kirkpatrick, Free Energy Secrets! (ca. 1960)

Samuel Glasstone and Milton C. Edlund, Nuclear Reactor Theory, D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc., Princeton, N. J. (1960)

Gustave Le Bon, The Evolution of Matter, (publisher unknown, c. 1890)

E. A. Moelwyn-Hughes, Physical Chemistry, Pergamon Press, N. Y., London, etc. (1965)

T. Henry Moray, The Sea of Energy in Which the Earth Floats (4th Ed., 1960), Cosray Research Institute, 2505 S. 4th St., Salt Lake City, Utah

Garrett P. Serviss (editor), Electricity and Magnetism, Popular Science Library (six-volume set), P. F. Collier & Son Corp., N. Y. (1941)

Howard M. Stainer, X-Ray Mass Absorption Coefficients, U. S. Dept. Of the Interior, Bureau of Mines (1963)

WORKS OF NIKOLA TESLA

Leland I. Anderson, editor, Bibliography: Dr. Nikola Tesla (1856-1943) (2nd Enlarged Ed., 1956), The Tesla Society, Minneapolis, Minn.

Thomas Commorford Martin, The Inventions, Researches and Writings of Nikola Tesla, The Electrical Engineer, New York (1894)

FBI Documents Regarding Nikola Tesla (232 pages released in the 1980s under the FOIA)

John T. Ratzlaff (compiler), Tesla Said, Tesla Book Company, Chula Vista, Ca.

Nikola Tesla, Colorado Springs Notes 1899-1900, Nolit, Beograd, Terasije 27, Yugoslavia (1978)

Nikola Tesla, Experiments with High Potential and High Frequency (New Ed., 1979), Omni Publishers, P. O. Box 216, Hawthorne, Ca. 90250

Nikola Tesla, Lectures, Patents, Articles, Nikola Tesla Museum, Beograd, Yugoslavia (1956)

TESLA MAGAZINE AND NEWS ARTICLES

Dr. Nick Begich, New Uses of Tesla Technologies for Global Control, Extraordinary Science, Colorado Springs, Co., (Jan-Feb-Mar, 1995)

William L. Laurence, New York Times (Sept. 20, 1940)

Frank Parker Stockbridge, The Tesla Turbine, The World's Work (Mar., 1912)

Nikola Tesla, The Transmission of Electrical Energy Without Wires as a Means of Furthering Peace, Electrical World and Engineering (Jan. 7, 1905)

Nikola Tesla (Letter, Tesla to Westinghouse Co., July 7, 1912), microfilm, Library of Congress

Nikola Tesla (Letter), Some Experiments in Tesla's Laboratory with Currents of High Potential and High Frequency, Electrical Review of New York (1899)

Nikola Tesla (Letter), New York Times (Feb. 6, 1932), p. 16, col. 8.

TESLA BIOGRAPHIES

Margaret Cheney, Tesla, Man Out of Time, Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, N. J. (1981)

Inez Hunt and Wanetta W. Draper, Lightning in His Hand, The Life Story of Nikola Tesla, Omni Publications, Hawthorne, Ca. 90250

John J. O'Neill, Prodigal Genius, The Life of Nikola Tesla, David McKay Company, Inc., New York

TESLA'S DEATH RAY (Misc. References)

Nikola Tesla, Tesla's Startling Results in Radiography at Great Distances Through Considerable Thickness of Substances, Electrical Review of New York, Mar. 11, 1896.

Nikola Tesla, Tesla on the Hurtful Actions of Lenard and Röentgen Tubes, Electrical Review of New York, May 5, 1897

Grindell Matthews, Diabolic Rays, Popular Radio, Aug., 1924

The Death Ray Bobs up Again, Chicago Tribune, July 22, 1930

Tesla Discovered Death Ray in Experiments He made Here, Colorado Springs Gazette, May 30, 1934

Interview on New Death Beam; Portrait, New York Times, July 11, 1934

CREATIVITY, CAPITALISM, PHILOSOPHY & EPISTEMOLOGY

Bruce Bliven, The Analysis of Genius, Wisdom Magazine, Vol. 3 No. 25, May 1958

Eliot D. Hutchinson, How to Think Creatively, Abingdon Press, New York

Vera John-Steiner, Notebooks of the Mind, Harper & Rowe, New York

Jerome Kagan (editor), Creativity and Learning (an anthology), Beacon Press, Boston (1967)

Dr. Edgar Mayer, Genius and Prolonged Illness, Wisdom Magazine, Vol. 3, No. 25 (May, 1958)

Ayn Rand, The Fountainhead, The Blakiston Company, Philadelphia (1943)

Dagobert D. Runes, Pictorial History of Philosophy, Littlefield Adams & Co., Patterson, N. J. (1963)

INTELLIGENCE, CONSPIROLOGY, THE OCCULT & THE ILLUMINATI

Jean Michel Angebert, The Occult and the Third Reich, McGraw-Hill Book Company

James Bamford, The Puzzle Palace (1982)

E. A. Wallis Budge, The Egyptian Book of the Dead, Dover Publications, Inc., New York

John Roy Carlson, Undercover, The Blakiston Company, Philadelphia

Gregory Douglas, Gestapo Chief (three volumes), R. James Bender, P. O. Box 23456, San Jose, Ca. 95153

Jim Garrison, On the Trail of the Assassins, Warner Books, New York (1991)

Stephen Goode, The CIA, Franklin Watts, New York (1982)

G. Edward Griffin, World Without Cancer (Part I and II), American Media, Westlake Village, Ca (91350

Charles Higham, Trading With the Enemy, Dell, 1983

Michael Howard, The Occult Conspiracy, Destiny Books, Rochester, Vt.

Theodore Ilion, Darkness Over Tibet, Adventures Unlimited Press, Box 22, Stelle, Illinois

William R. Lyne, Stealth I: De-Population by U.V. Immuno-Suppression, The Leading Edge, Issue No. 76 (Nov. 1994), Yelm, Wa.

John D. Marks, The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate" - The CIA and Mind Control, W.W. Norton & Co., New York/London

Victor Marchetti and John D. Marks, The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence, Dell Publishing Co., Inc., New York (1980-84)

G. R. S. Mead, Thrice Greatest Hermes, (Vol. 1-3), Hermes Press, Detroit

Hans Morgenthau, "Morgenthau's Pastoral 'Policy" , (document authored by Morgenthau and presented to the Committee at Versaille, 1919, by Col. House), collected papers of President Lyndon Baines Johnson, L.B.J. School of Public Administration, Sid W. Richardson Research Center, U. T., Austin, Tx.

Cathy O'Brien and Mark Phillips, Trance- Formation of America, Reality Marketing, Inc., Las Vegas, NV (1995)

Louis Pauwels and Jacques Bergier, Morning of the Magicians, Stein & Day, Publishers, New York

Ronald Payne and Christopher Dobson, Who's Who in Espionage, St. Martin's Press, New York

Douglas Reed, The Controversy of Zion, The Noontide Press, P. O. Box 1248, Torance, Ca. 90505

Abelard Reuchlin, The True Authorship of the New Testament, Abelard Reuchlin Foundation, Kent, Wa. 98064 ($5.00)
Richard Sauter, Underground Bases and Tunnels (1995)
William R. Shirer, The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, Fawcett Publications, Inc., Greenwich, Conn.
Christopher Simpson, Blowback, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, New York
Dr. Charles Sonnichsen, Alias Billy the Kid (1955)
William Stevenson, A Man Called Intrepid, Ballentine Books, New York
Tibetan Yoga and Secret Doctrines, Wentz Oxford U. Press, London
Jan Valtin (A. K. A. Hermann Julius William Krebs), Out of the Night, Alliance Book Corporation, New York (1941)
T. H. White, Once and Future King, Berkley Medallion Books, New York

WW II GERMAN/NAZI TECHNOLOGY, MISINFORMATION, AND PSEUDO-SCIENCE

Current Biography, 1939-52
Christof Friedrich, Germany's Antarctic Claim (Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions), Samisdat Publishers, Ltd., Toronto
Christof Friedrich, German Secret Weapons of WW II, Samisdat Publishers, Ltd., Toronto
Haarmann, D. H., Geheime Wunderwaffen. Hugen Gesellschaft Für Politisch-Philosophische Studien E. V., Hoerstel, Germany (1985)
W. A. Harbison, Projekt Saucer Book One: Inception*, Dell, N. Y. (1991)
Heinz Knocke, I Flew for the Füehrer
Rudolf Lusar, German Secret Weapons of the Second World War, Neville Spearman, London (1960)
W. Mattern, UFO's - Last Secret Weapons of the Third Reich?, Samisdat Publishers, Ltd., Toronto
Jorge Resines, Secret of the Schauberger Saucer, Borderland Sciences, Garberville, Ca. (1988)
Heinz Schaeffer, U-Boat, Ballentine, N.Y.
Henry Stevens, Report No. I, Report No. 2, German Research Project, P. O. Box 7, Gorman, Ca. 93243-0007
Henry.Stevens, Report No. 3, Rumored German Wonder Weapons, Fantastic German Submarines, German Research Project, Gorman, Ca. (1996)
John Toland, Ships in the Sky, Henry Holt & Co., N.Y.
Vladimir Terziski, Close Encounters of the Foo Fighter Kind, T. R. Z. Consultants, Los Angeles (1994)
Vladimir Terziski, UFO Secrets of the Third Reich, (video), T. R. Z. Consultants, Los Angeles (1994)
Icirus Productions, Top Secret German UFO Cover-Up (video)
UFOs and Star Wars (video), Adventures Unlimited, 303 Main St., Kempton, Illinois

* - misinformational
 -misconceptual
 -misinformational/misconceptual

LINGUISTICS & ANCIENT HISTORY

Linus Bruner, Malayo-Polynesian Vocabulary with Semitic and Indo-European Roots, Occasional Publications (Vol. 10 Part 2), The Epigraphic Society, 6625 Bamburgh Drive, San Diego, Ca. 92117
Otto Benesch, Art of the Northern Rennaissance
L. Sprague de Camp, Lost Continents, Dover, N.Y. (1970)
Iron Thunderhorse, The Mysterious Dawnlanders, Ancient American, Issue #19/20 (July-Oct, 1992)
Kathleen Kenyon, Archaeology of the Holy Land, Praeger Publishers, New York
Plotinus, Secret History of the Byzantine Emperors
N.K. Sandars, The Sea Peoples, Thames & Hudson, N.Y.

PROPAGANDA AND PSYCHOPOLITICS

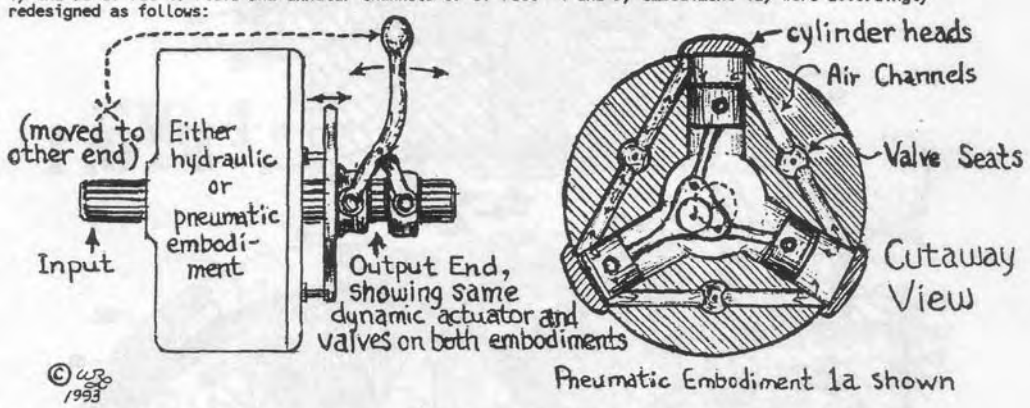
Bill Barry, Kidnapped, Penthouse Magazine (c. 1978)
Walter Bowart, Letter to Walter Bowart from Julianne McKinney (Director of the Electronic Surveillance Project of the Assn. Of Nat. Security Alumini), Silver Springs, Md. (June 16, 1994)
Giant Comics, U.F.O. Flying Saucers, Western Publishing Company (1968)
Frank Edwards, Flying Saucers - Serious Business, Bantam, N. Y. (1966)
Jacques Ellul, Propaganda - The Formation of Men's Attitudes, Vintage Books, New York
Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf, Houghton-Mifflin, Boston
_____ Hunter, "Brainwashing", (unlocatable, though primary book on subject)
Dino de Laurentis (film producer), Horst Wentlandt (associate producer), The Serpent's Egg (film)
John Spencer, The UFO Encyclopedia, Avon Books, N.Y. (1991)
Duane Thorin, A Ride to Panmunjom, Henry Regnery Company (1956)
Gladys & Marcella Thum, The Persuaders: Propaganda in War and Peace, Atheneum, New York (1974)

APPENDIX "A" - Giving to the Public the Dvna-Lvne Universal Variable Pneumatic or Hydraulic Transmission System

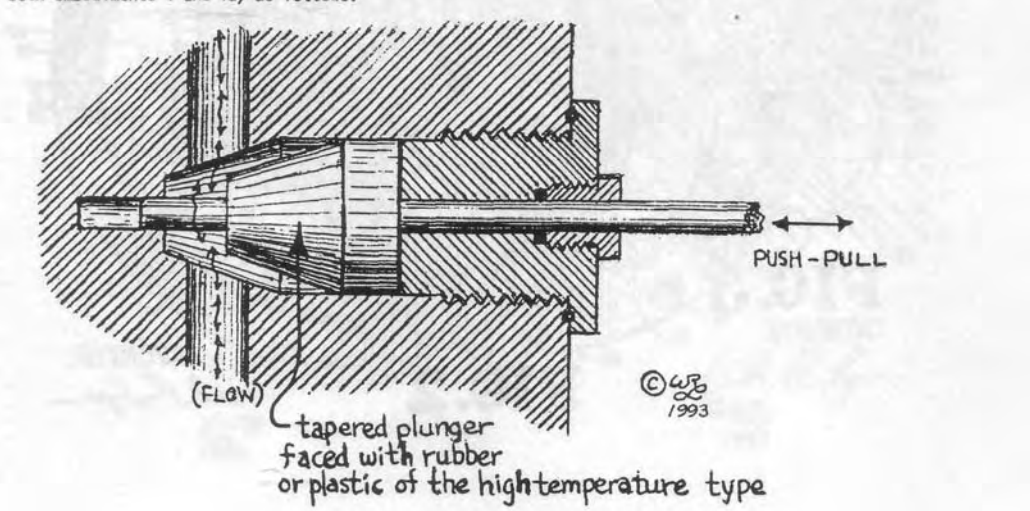
ABSTRACT

A variable, rotary power, pump-type transmission, in either hyudraulic or pneumatic embodiment, which combines positive and negative displacement pumping effects, transferring work energy to the medium as differential pressure and heat, which are interconverted through an externally reversible process, into continuous output torque, thermodynamically or adiabatically. Prime mover power, applied to the pump drive shaft and interconnected driving member, is delivered as interconverted power at the output shaft, interconnected to the body and driven pumping mechanisms; in the thermodynamic process, thermal equilibrium is maintained by pressure and heat exchange within the transmission and the medium flowing in closed loop-circuits, through the valves, which maintain the unequal pressure and temperature built up between the negative and positive displacement cavities; in the adiabatic process, work energy pressure differentials are transmistted immediately through the incompressible hydraulic medium, by compression and vacuum pumping phases, into output torque, in exchanges of pressure through the valves. The dynamic integral valves, actuated by an external stationary positioner, determine conversion ratios under given conditions of input horsepower and r.p.m., and output load, by maintaining specific, adjustable, positive and negative differences of pressure and temperature, which proportionately impart rotational force in the same direction to the output shaft, via the interconnected body and driven pumping mechanisms, from zero r.p.m., with valves fully opened and internal mechanisms and medium freely moving, to 1:1 ratio with valves closed and medium and internal mechanisms in virtual arrest.

(NOTE: In a 3/5/92 request for amendment, not reflected in the drawings, but reflected in the amended description, the dynamic valve actuator tubes---30 of FIG 1, and 83 of FIG 4---are completely eliminated, in conformance to my original Disclosure Document of June 5, 1987, by placing the same female-splined valve actuator flange 34 of FIG 1, on both splined output shafts 20 for FIG 1, and 90 of FIG 4. Fluid and annular channels 69 of FIGS 4 and 5, embodiment 1a, were accordingly redesigned as follows:



Not shown in the request for amendment or drawings, the two different valve plungers---17 of FIG 1, and 68 of FIG 4---should be replaced with the same 'push-pull'-type tapered plungers and seats, on both embodiments 1 and 1a, as follows:



DRAWINGS

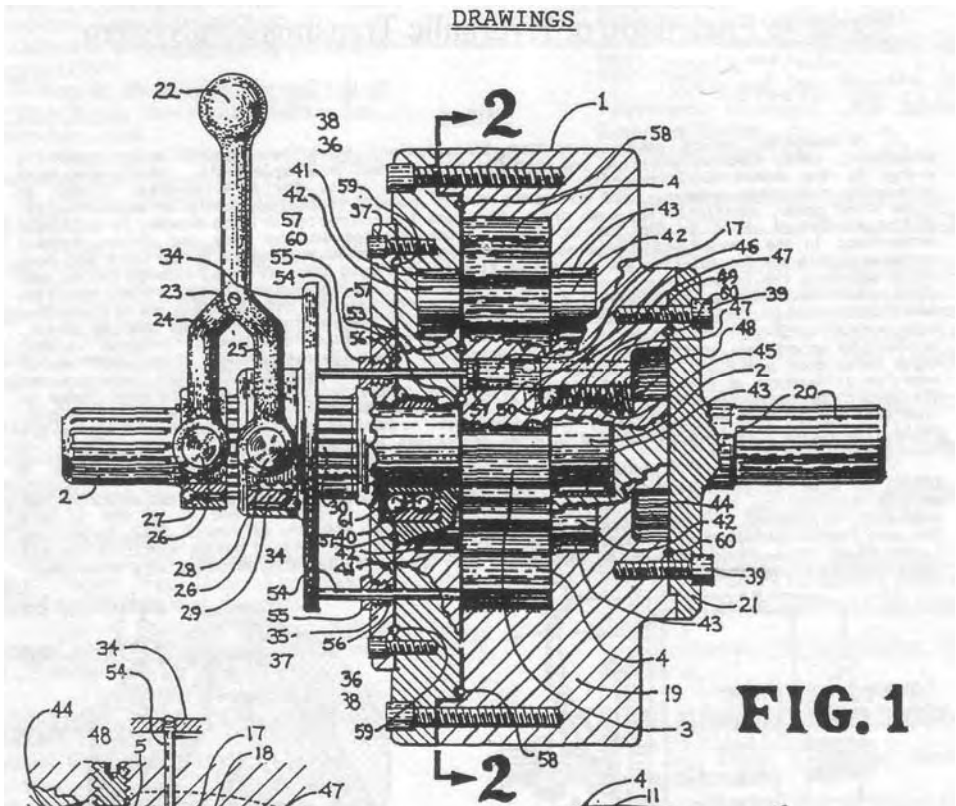


FIG. 1

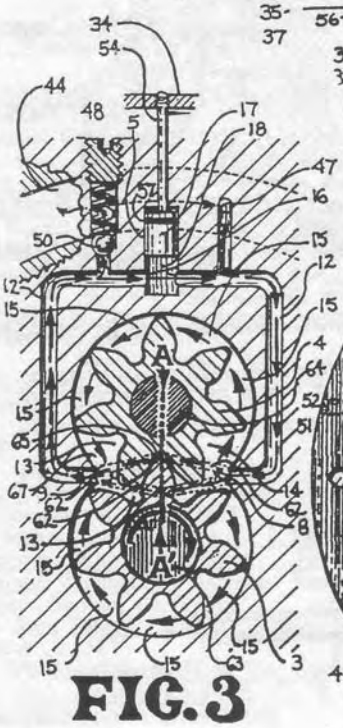

FIG. 3

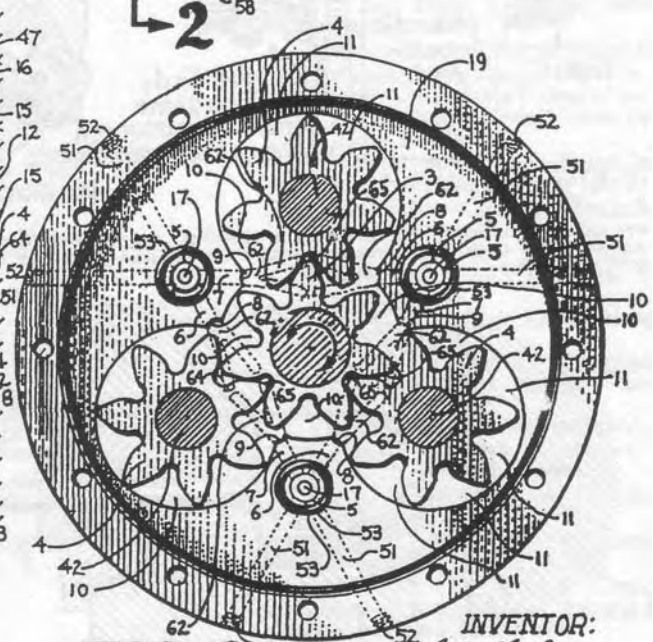

FIG. 2

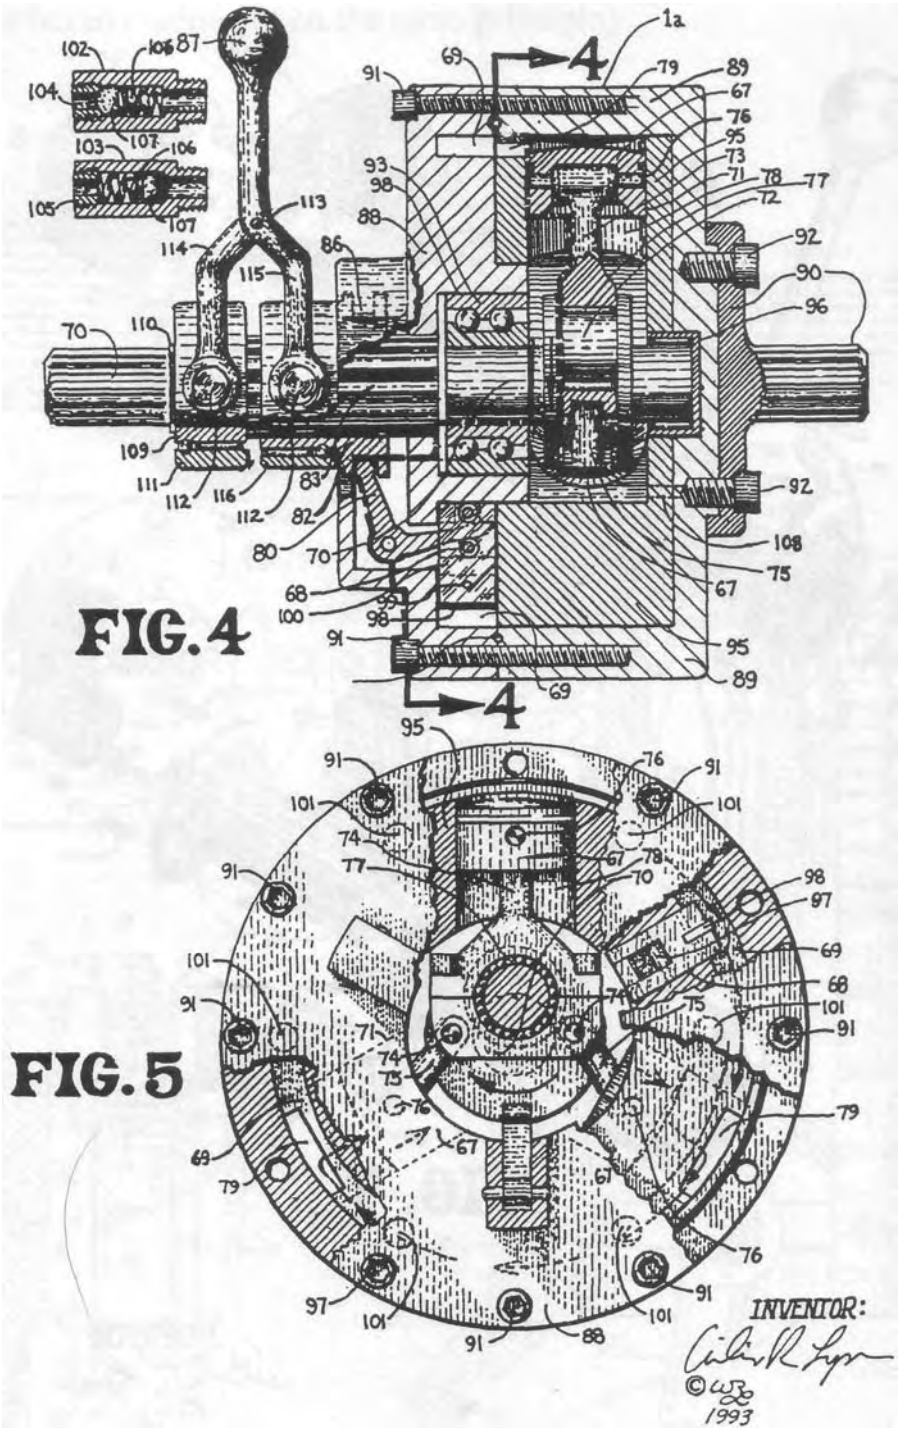
INVENTOR:

© WB 1993



ALIENS295

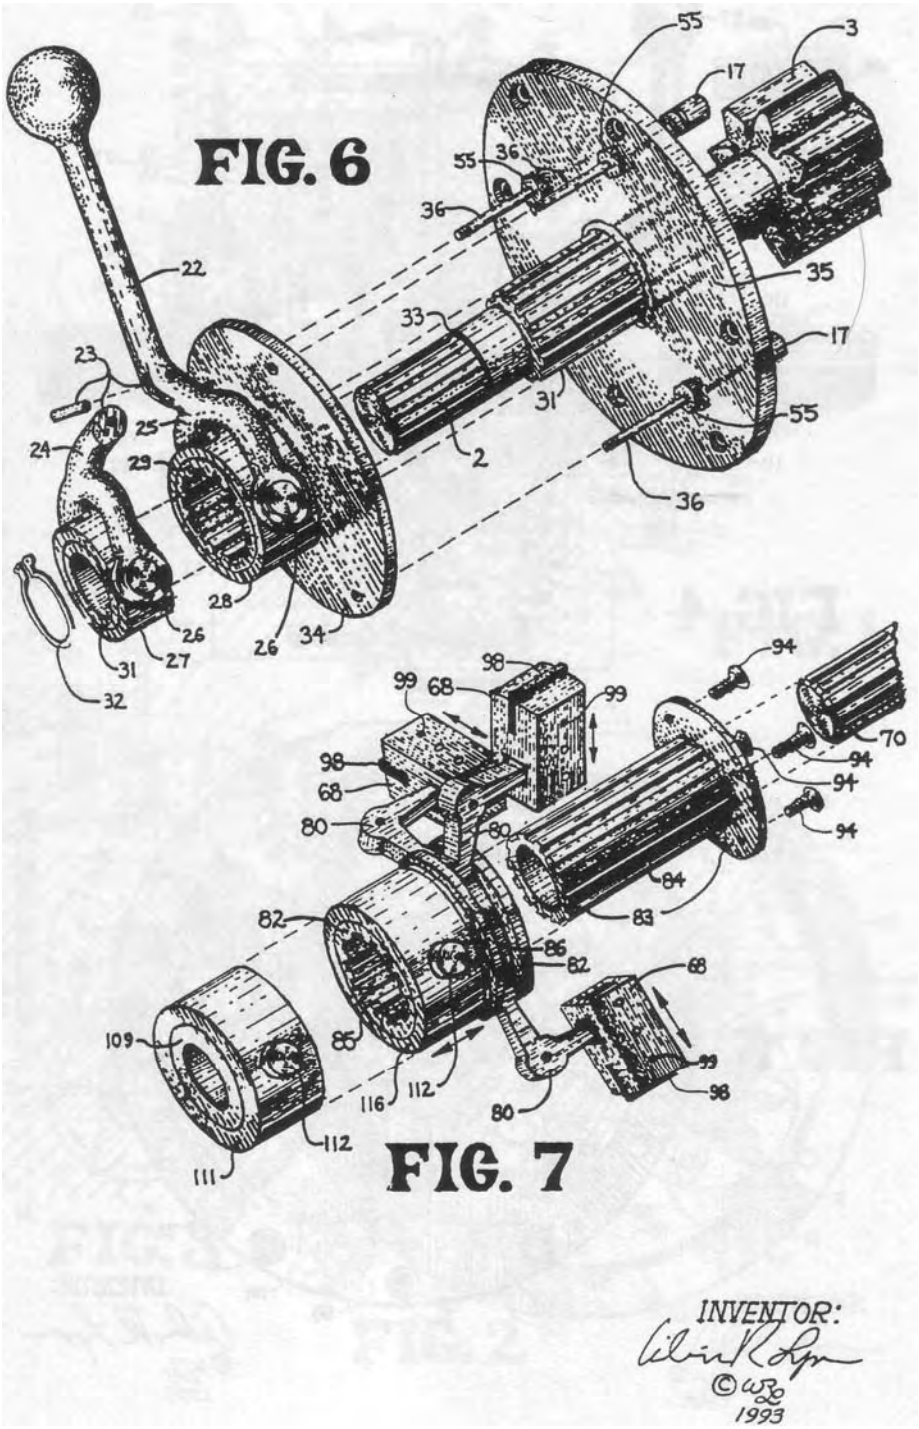


FIG. 6
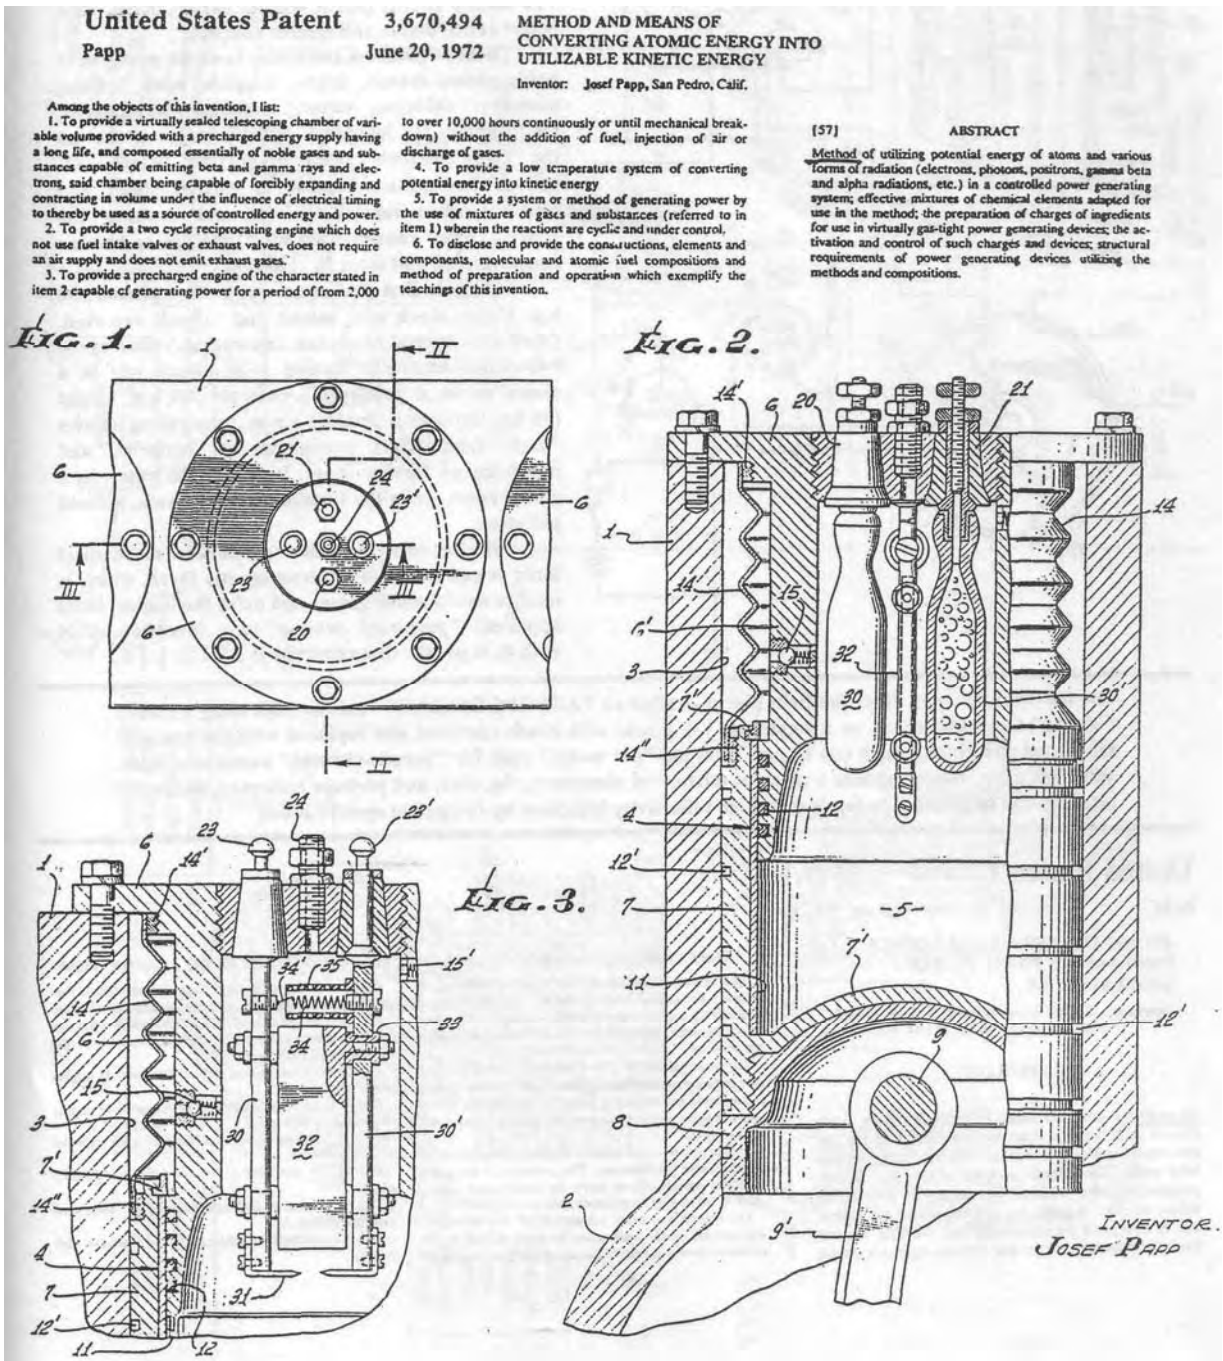
55
3
17
55
36
36
22
35
33
17
23
31
55
24
25
29
2
36
28
26
34
26
27
31
32
98
94
99
68
99
70
98
94
68
94
80
80
94
84
83
82
86
82
68
109
85
99
116
112
98
80
112
111
FIG. 7
INVENTOR:
©
1993

ALIENS296

APPENDIX "B" - The Papp Patent for the Conversion of Atomic Energy into Utilizable Kinetic Energy (with an excerpt from the Britt Patent based essentially on the same principle):



United States Patent 3,670,494
Papp June 20, 1972

METHOD AND MEANS OF CONVERTING ATOMIC ENERGY INTO UTILIZABLE KINETIC ENERGY

Inventor: Josef Papp, San Pedro, Calif.

Among the objects of this invention, I list:

1. To provide a virtually sealed telescoping chamber of variable volume provided with a precharged energy supply having a long life, and composed essentially of noble gases and substances capable of emitting beta and gamma rays and electrons, said chamber being capable of forcibly expanding and contracting in volume under the influence of electrical timing to thereby be used as a source of controlled energy and power.
2. To provide a two cycle reciprocating engine which does not use fuel intake valves or exhaust valves, does not require an air supply and does not emit exhaust gases.
3. To provide a precharged engine of the character stated in item 2 capable of generating power for a period of from 2,000 to over 10,000 hours continuously or until mechanical breakdown) without the addition of fuel, injection of air or discharge of gases.
4. To provide a low temperature system of converting potential energy into kinetic energy
5. To provide a system or method of generating power by the use of mixtures of gases and substances (referred to in item 1) wherein the reactions are cyclic and under control.
6. To disclose and provide the constructions, elements and components, molecular and atomic fuel compositions and method of preparation and operation which exemplify the teachings of this invention.

[57] ABSTRACT

Method of utilizing potential energy of atoms and various forms of radiation (electrons, photons, positrons, gamma beta and alpha radiations, etc.) in a controlled power generating system; effective mixtures of chemical elements adapted for use in the method; the preparation of charges of ingredients for use in virtually gas-tight power generating devices; the activation and control of such charges and devices; structural requirements of power generating devices utilizing the methods and compositions.

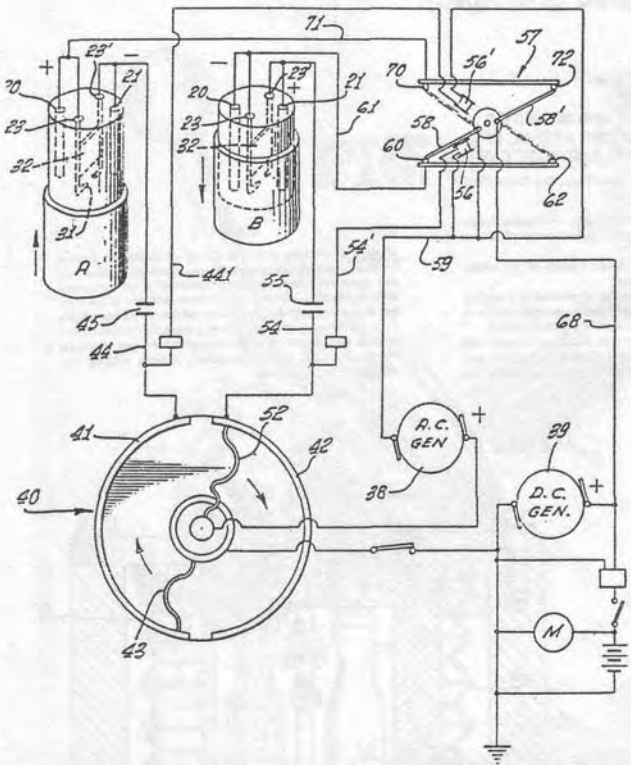
FIG. 1.

FIG. 2.

FIG. 3.

INVENTOR.
JOSEF PAPP

FIG. 4.



These two related patents somehow miraculously slipped through the patent office without national security orders. The first (Papp) patent was unnecessarily complicated, probably because Papp was Hungarian, and worked through an interpreter. The second (Britt) patent was an improvement, with better construction and clearer concept.

These engines use electricity to excite mixtures of noble gasses (xenon, argon, krypton, neon, helium, mercury, chlorine, water, rubidium, phosphorus, etc.), though the inventors' criteria indicates that all the "light elements" below atomic No. 19 are well-suited. The gasses expand in excited states and contract when relaxed, driving and 'sucking' the pistons. After considerable wear, the gasses become contaminated and must be changed.

Papp's first prototype was a four-cylinder, 90 h.p. Volvo block with intake and exhaust removed, fitted with special heads (an "air-cooled, closed cycle, two-stroke engine"). During a 35-minute test in a closed room, it produced a constant 300 h.p. output (75 h.p./cylinder), @ 4,000 r.p.m., generating its own "fuel" (electricity), recharging its batteries, and requiring no further input. It runs underwater, in a closed room, or in the vacuum of outer space, without pollution.

Similar to flying saucer propulsion, mechanical force is converted to electromagnetic force, which is used to excite noble gasses and drive the engine, in an apparent "perpetual motion"-type invention. Deal with it. It proves that relativity is a B I G L I E.

The following excerpts from the Britt patent---called an "AEROPS ENGINE"---can be built using a Chevy "Monza" 6-cylinder block, or a 4-cylinder VW block, with heads removed and replaced with the specially fabricated chambers, which can be cast from the "pot metal" used for "pseudo-chrome" automotive trim. With this alloy, which contains a pleasant mixture of aluminum, tin, zinc, and perhaps antimony, the cavity interiors can be polished to the desired high reflectivity indicated by the patent specifications.

United States Patent 3,977,191

Britt Aug. 31, 1976

ATOMIC EXPANSION REFLEX OPTICS POWER OPTICS POWER SOURCE (AEROPS) ENGINE

Inventor: Robert Gordon Britt, 313 W. Fisher St., Salisbury, N.C. 28144

ABSTRACT

An engine is provided which will greatly reduce atmospheric pollution and noise by providing a sealed system engine power source which has no exhaust nor intake ports. The engine includes a spherical hollow pressure chamber which is provided with a reflecting mirror surface. A noble gas mixture within the chamber is energized by electrodes and work is derived from the expansion of the gas mixture against a piston.

BRIEF OBJECTIVE OF THE INVENTION

This invention relates to the development of an atomic expansion reflex optics power source (AEROPS) engine, having the advantages of greater safety, economy and efficiency over those disclosed in the prior art.

The principal object of this invention is to provide a new engine power technology which will greatly reduce atmospheric pollution and noise, by providing a sealed system engine power source which has no exhaust nor intake ports.

Engine power is provided by expanding the atoms of various noble gas mixtures. The pressure of the gases increases periodically to drive the pistons and crankshaft in the engine to produce safe rotary power.

The objects and other advantages of this invention will become better understood to those skilled in the art when viewed in light of the accompanying drawings.

BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE DRAWING VIEWS

Other objects, advantages and features should become apparent from the following disclosure wherein:

FIG. 1 is an elevational view of the hollow spherical pressure chamber assembly, including sources of gas mixtures and electrical supply.

FIG. 2 is an elevational view of the primary engine power stroke.

FIG. 3 is an elevational view of the primary engine compression stroke.

FIG. 4 is a rear elevational view of a six cylinder AEROPS engine.

FIG. 5 is a top view of the six cylinder AEROPS engine.

FIG. 6 is an electrical schematic of the source of medium voltage.

FIG. 7 is an electrical schematic of the source of high voltage.

ALIENS299

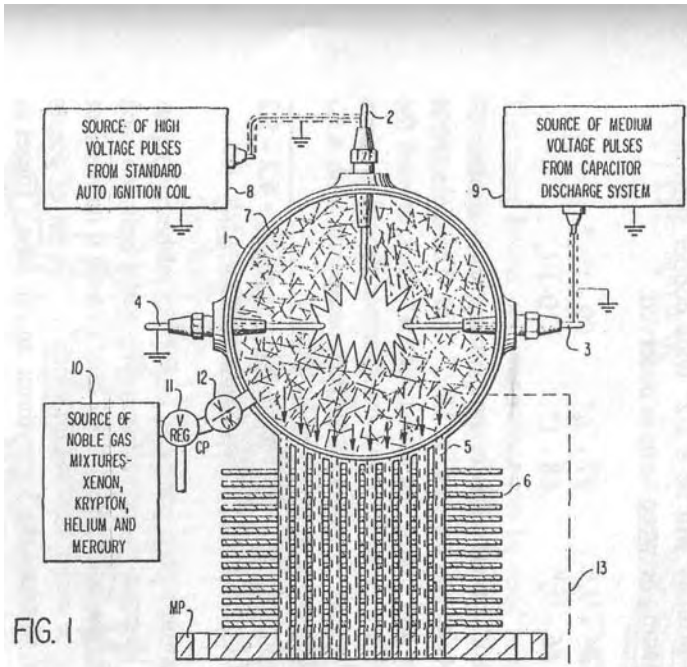


FIG. 1

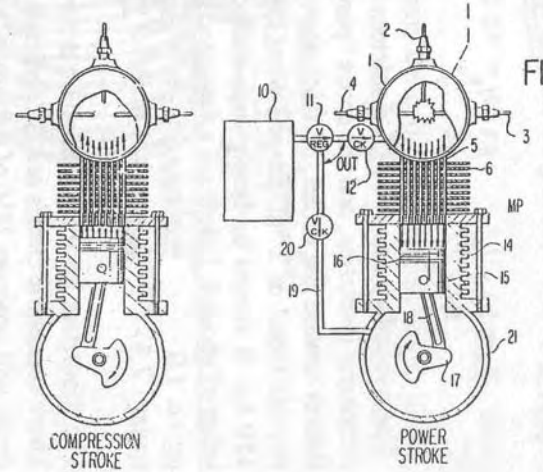

FIG. 3

FIG. 2

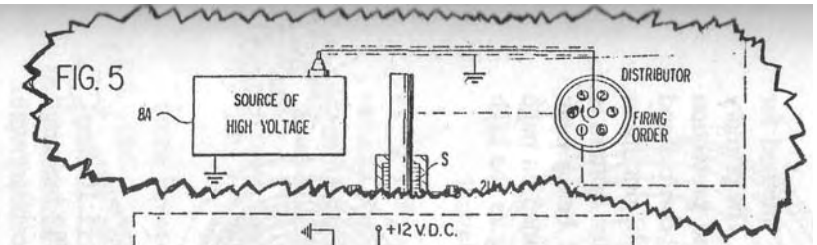

FIG. 5

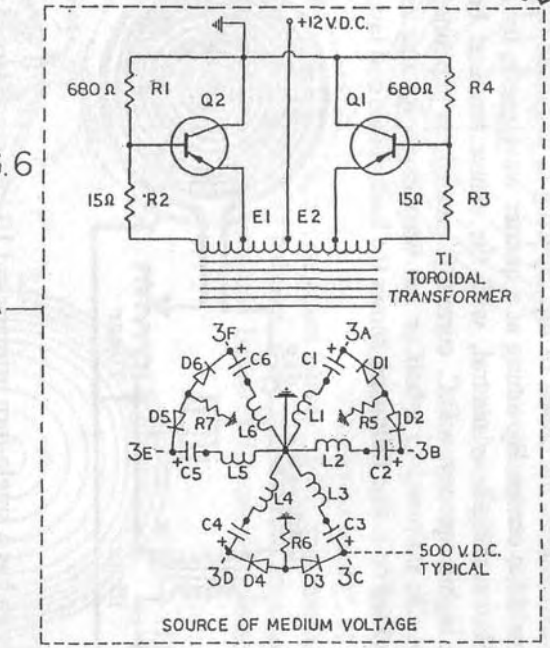

FIG. 6

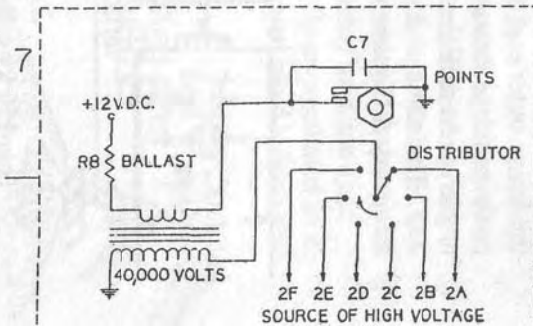

FIG. 7

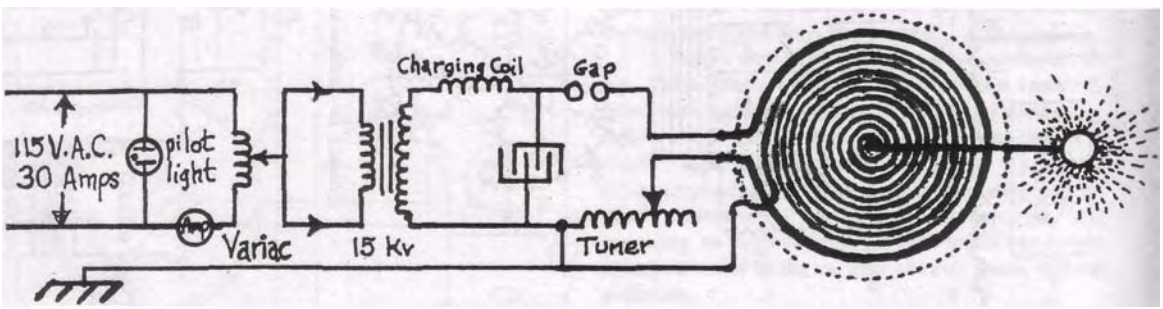
APPENDIX "C" - Fabrication of Tesla's Single Terminal Coils

Tesla's highest coil development was his "single terminal coil", his "method for obtaining high voltage D.C. current through inductance" (without a rectifier). The primary was placed around the outside of the coil, providing greater inductance and protection from arcs between turns and to the secondary. It was produced in two forms, conical and pancake, with the single terminal at the center or top. Spacing is increased beginning at the lower outer end, toward the center. By tuning at a quarter wavelength, the bottom is peak positive, or at 3/8 wavelength, is neutral, with the center terminal being peak negative. At sufficiently high frequency, a D.C. current is created, as explained on page 216. The same coil can also be tuned to a half or full wavelength for use as the high frequency A.C. ether blocking coil. The following shows the basic Tesla coil layout:



This 150 kv coil design has a single-turn primary and 10-turn secondary (1:10 ratio), with a maximum voltage increase of 15 kv per turn of the secondary. 1/8" increased spacing per turn is sufficient, using a dielectric with a K-value of 4. The secondary wire will be about 1/8" in diameter, and the primary will be a 1/2" wide copper strip about 1/32" thick. The following schedule of spacing between turns is observed:

Turn
#1 - 1/8"	#3 - 3/8"	#5 - 5/8"	#7 - 7/8"	#9 - 1 1/8"
#2 - 1/4"	#4 - 1/2"	#6 - 3/4"	#8 - 1"	#10-1 1/4"

The secondary has a 16 1/4" diameter. 1/2" outside this is the primary, with another 1" peripheral insulation, and the entire "pancake coil capsule" is 19 1/4" O.D. The dielectric is thicker toward the center, 3" thick above and below the center, and 1" thick around the outside (total of 2" at dia. and 6" at center). A 15 kv input transformer should produce 150 kv. It should be firmly cast, excluding air, inside a resin/fiber composite with a K-value of about 4. Below are a few good dielectrics to give you an idea:

air-c. 1.0 neoprene - 4. - 6.7 silicone-3.2-4.7 mica-filled phenolic - 4.2 - 5.2
mylar - 7.3 - 9.3 formica - 3.6 - 6. "fiber" - 5. cellulose acetate-3.1 - 4.5

The diameters for the 10 turns are drawn out with a compass, on a piece of heavy paper. These concentric circles are divided into 16 equal radial sections. The spiral between each circle will progress 1/16 of the total for each section, per radial line. I found it convenient to use 32s of an inch, plus percentages (for example, "18.25/32nds"). The set of points produced can be joined by curved lines to produce the logarythmic spiral. Don't forget to allow for the thickness of the wire, compensated for by moving the schedule up a 1/8" thickness from the bottom. The wire thickness is then drawn on the outer side of the spiral coming out with a 1/8" space at turn #1, and 1.25" space at turn #10. Transfer the spiral to a piece of heavy paper, and temporarily affix the wire. The upper side is cast, then is turned over, the paper completely removed, and the mold used to cast the other side, again taking care to exclude air. Don't whip your dielectric when mixing, which produces unnecessary, troublesome bubbles. There are castable, catalyzed silicone rubbers with high dielectric constants, requiring no vulcanization, made by people like Dow-Corning. Enlarge the spiral which I have drawn to scale, to a diameter of 16.25", on a copy machine (use 11" x 17" paper, doing it in two equal halves). Such coils are usually encapsulated in a vacuum chamber, eliminating bubbles of air, while an electrically-heated mold vulcanizes something like a hard-rubber mixture. Below is the casting process:

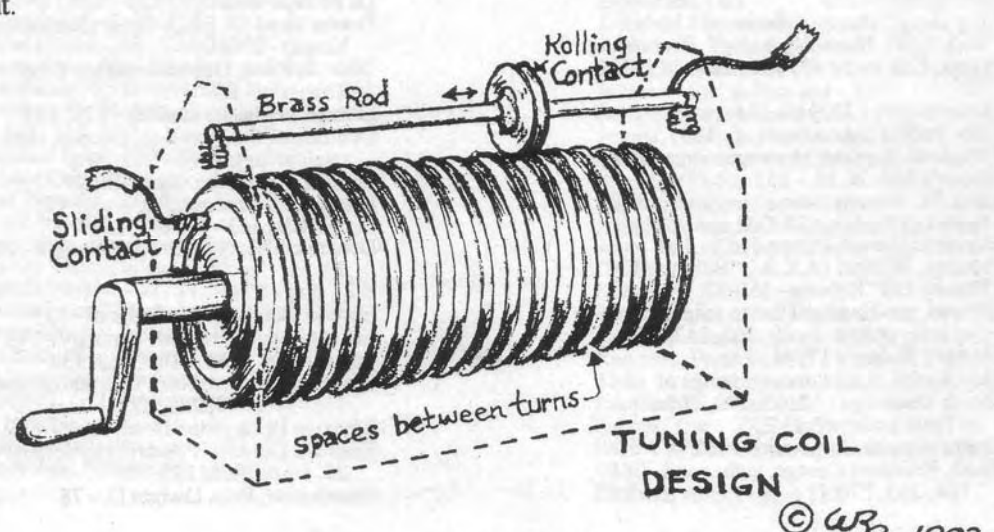
The tuner below, and capacitors can be used to tune the coil. The physical length of the secondary wire is about one-quarter of a 1 MHz wavelength, as an approximate starting point.



svalispeaksagain 7:56 pm on September 8, 2022

Tags: Christian (24), dissociation (30), healing (43), Jesuit (10), mind control (69), programming (60), ritual abuse (65), SRA (45), Vatican (10)

Vatican Book Part 11 (final section)

Note: please be aware that this post mentions programming methods, and Christianity

Recontact Programming

The Jesuit Order has difficult recontact programming to break. This is why very few members of this organization attempt to leave. The recontact programming is based upon two main bases:

The use of infant attachment bonds, and the use of extreme (severe) pain and punishment methods should recontact fail. This is in addition to internal and external reprogramming if these first two fail.

Attachment and Loyalty Bonds

As mentioned previously, the Fathers bond the infant very early on, beginning in the womb when the birthmother rejects the fetus and the fetus comes to believe that the Fathers are the only source of love. This contines in infancy, with the infant being left in a completely dark room, and then “rescued” by the primary Father who gives the infant a bottle, among many other scenarios. The infant, over the course of the first year of life, bonds very heavily to their primary Father, and to Satan himself.

The child becomes extremely loyal to the Fathers, and it literally breaks their heart to think of being taken away. Numerous setups are done during early childhood, of the child being “kidnapped” and later “rescued” by the Fathers, and also of the child being taken away by “traitors” who torture and punish the child, who later escapes to the Fathers. These and dozens of other scenarios are used to reinforce the belief that the child can only be loved, and have their emotional needs met, by the Jesuit Fathers.

The Fathers are the only source of love and bonding the child is allowed to have, since throughout early childhood, all other bonds end up in either betrayal or death. The child literally learns to trust no one other than the Fathers.

Follow

Hell Programming

As the child grows older, the recontact program is tied to the internal hell. Recontacting the Fathers is considered a Prime Directive for the system, and failure to comply results in the belief that the system will descend into hell.

The presentation will have no idea that this is occurring. They will feel restless, driven, or even hyperactive when the program is runnning, or may battle tremendous guilt and depression, without knowing why. The programs run unconsciously, and therefore are difficult to identify until enough healing has occurred that the survivor can work with different brain states inside.

Hell programming has nine levels (much like Dante's inferno). The first three levels will be on one level, the second three on a lower level, with three more at the lowest level, and beneath them all is the abyss (utter darkness). Each level of hell is tied to a prime trauma, as described above.

The first level of hell has individuals chained to poles; demons come and flagellate the victims with whips that have sharp rocks or points attached to them. Since infancy, the young child was taken to "hell" at night to "punish" them for "sins", and so they have extensively internalized this punishment system. The controllers/guardians for this level originally were punished, then learned to punish others, in this same way, including flogging children and adults to death. They will hold the belief that what they are doing is "right" and that sinners "deserve" punishment, until healing comes and the demonic attachments and rights are broken internally.

The second level of hell involves individuals being chained to stakes and burned alive. Charon is the controller/guardian over this level, and as described above, believe that what he is doing is "right" and that sinners "deserve death," until this part comes to Jesus and has healing. The presentation will undergo great grieving as these brutal punishers share their experiences, both as an infant, undergoing punishment, and later, as a punisher.

The third level of hell involves a chamber filled with bees that swarm upon individuals and sting them to death. Karydis is the controller for this level, and will have learned to take small children and adults to "hell" where they are swarmed and stung. The controller will have undergone this experience in infancy, first with painful bee stings; then in early childhood, being given anti-venom before being placed where bees would swarm and sting them. The child will have seen traitors tied to poles and stung to death, and will remember these traumatic memories. These memories are reinforced with virtual reality, which recreates the buzzing and the swarming and stinging.

The fourth level of hell involves rats that come and eat at the parts that are trapped there, tied to poles; or the rats will swarm around the parts and chew.

The fifth level of hell involves bugs that bite those within the chamber.

The other levels of hell include crushing, dropping and being torn apart demonically. The deepest level (just above the core) is the abyss, where utter darkness (the primal fear of abandonment described in infant programming) sits.

In addition to “hell,” leadership in the Jesuit Order is often also chained with what is known as :9 by 9″ programming, or one of its variations, which is layered on top of the hell programming.

7 By 7 Programming

7 by 7 involves seven different types of internal pain being placed in through the use of tesla wave and microbursts, as well as ELF and EHF waves. The child is placed within a machine that reads their brainwave activity, creates a specific brain map, and begins entrainment of the brain (over several sessions lasting from 6 to 10 hours, normally, over a period of months with regular reinforcement over the years).

The machine plays harmonic tones that the child has been taught since infancy to “follow” and enter into different brain wave states. As it does so, in one sequence, the brain is taught to rapidly drop brain wave states from high gamma to low delta/death state in less than a second. This causes extreme pain, and even seizure activity. The drops are entrained in over a period of time, with intervals between drops that can last from 4 to 10 seconds, depending upon the person’s recovery rate and pain tolerance. The individual’s infants are put through this sequence, which creates a “startle” reaction and the resulting infant terror.

Another sequence entrained in is a constant oscillating wave form with high-frequency waves that causes headache, extreme heat, and alternating bursts of pain at the limbic level.

Another sequence uses tesla waves, which cause extreme pain throughout the entire nervous system, in synchronized bursts (the sensation is similar to being stung by bees in every nerve at one time).

Another sequence causes a crescendo and decrescendo pounding within the brain, caused by increased intracranial pressure and heating, due to entrainment where microwave bursts hit the brain stem (through the auditory canal).

Another causes the sensation of a hammer pounding within the brain, at 4 to 6 -second intervals (“Vulcan’s Hammer”).

Another sequence is intermittent death: the heart stops and restarts.

When the individual attempts to leave, and stops first physical and then spiritual contact with the Fathers, these sequences are meant to cause the system to “implode” and cause either death or shattering of all systems. The longer the individual goes without contact, the higher the level of pain: there are seven different sequences, each with levels one through seven of pain (hence, the name, “seven by seven”). At peak, all seven programs are running at level seven, which normally results in the heart stopping, and/or core shattering.

The Jesuits consider this program completely unbreakable, since the suicide and psychosis rate for those who try to break it is extremely high. It takes a lengthy amount of time, safety, and significant support to break this, as well as extensive prayer, since the gradual buildup to core shatter level is meant to force the systems to recontact in order to avoid system death.

Experimental Programming

The Jesuits also engage in extensive experimental programming (Protocol I – V programs), which are used for expendable individuals. Protocol V is the classification for endpoint (physical or neurological death as the ultimate result) of the programs. They involve different forms of torture, and the use of new technologies to see the effects on individuals.

The West Coast of the United States has one of the largest experimental theta programming labs in the world; the other four are in Beijing,China (where infants are brought to the center by local contacts), in Russia, in the Ukraine and in East Berlin, Germany. There are other smaller centers that also perform experiments and collect data, including many universities and institutes around the world.

Helping the Survivor

Because of the high level of occultic training that Jesuits undergo, they will experience significant resistance at first from inside parts who feel that they underwent large amounts of pain and death in order to receive high status. These parts will resist giving up this identity, which gave meaning to their pain at the time they were programmed during early childhood, since this was the meaning assigned by their abusers to justify the abuse.

Other parts will resist change, or continue to contact, because they truly believe that by doing so, they are preventing the systems from being shattered, or from going to hell (descension) eternally. These beliefs will be held deep within, at the root of all system controllers, and unconsciously and subconsciously. The parts that hold these beliefs must be willing to come out, and examine the truth, and question what they were taught and programmed to believe. Unfortunately, doing so can cause the survivor to experience tremendous pain and internal pressure, not only from internal conflict and demonic, but from the terrible body memories programmed in to occur if the survivor tries to question old beliefs.

7 by 7 is one of the cruelest forms of programming ever invented. Those who undergo it experience intense, continuous pain until their unconscious mind and parts are able to give up all of the beliefs that drive the program, as well as giving up all spiritual attachments to the program. The top system and master controllers will all be tied to it, along with their infants, and all core splits. Parts are taught to beleive that noone can survive trying to heal from this program.

Breaking it is miserable; and the best helps include prayer, emotional support, the use of medications or herbs that slow brain wave activity (since the pain comes from jumps in brainwave activity that are programmed in, or mini-seizures within the pain centers of the brain). The survivor will always battle suicide programming along with the pain, since core despair is also programmed in; they need to be told, and to believe, time and time again that they can break the program and survive.

V. The Goals of the Vatican: Alexis Paves the Way

The ultimate goal of the Vatican is to prepare the world for the advent of the antichrist, and to usher in the New World Order, which is greatly anticipated. To do so, they have created several mass mind control technologies, under the umbrella of Project Alexis.

Project Alexis

Project Alexis was conceived of in the 1940s, and the earliest forms of implementation in the 1950s were very experimental. It has three arms:

• Security;
• Finances,
• Behavior Modification.

Alexis actually means “without law” and the demonic principality which gave the information to the Jesuits on how to create this project is called Alexis (the spirit of lawlessness).

Security

The security branch of Alexis is involved in the identification of and tracking of every individual in the world. This has already been accomplished today by assigning a numerical code (government ID number or social security number) to individuals, and forbidding them to work for money without this identification number linked to a photo ID and fingerprints.

This branch also involves the development of technologies used to track individuals who might try to “disappear” or not participate in the NWO agenda. This includes the ability to identify and track all individuals through their use of phone (GPS), car (GPS) and online technologies (one reason all laptops today have a camera that can actually show images of the person on the computer and an internal GPS).

Collection and collation software has become extremely sophisticated, and can track within seconds the entering in of data associated with an individual. ATM card use is also used for tracking purposes. The monitoring of phone conversations, emails and all electronic/digital communications of individuals considered “security risks” or antithetic to the agenda of the NWO is routine at this point.

There is no privacy in today’s high-tech age, and this is on purpose. Microsoft Windows has background software that automatically collects data on users, integrates with Google and other search engines, and red flags any users with a “high risk” profile. All modern browsers and operating systems (including freeware) do the same. Encryption software does not work for a simple reason: any offered publicly has already had the master key bought by those who ultimately work for the Vatican.

HD television has collation software that also works in the background, and that can record conversations for individuals considered “high risk” and send it forward.

Financial

The financial branch of Alexis has been in effect since the early 1970s, and involves the digitalization of currency, and the campaign to encourage acceptance of first ATM and microcards, and soon, identification chips, for all monetary transactions. This is already nearly in place in Europe (the EEU), and the United States is expected to follow suit soon.

The Vatican founded the World Bank, and it will be the center for finances throughout the world in the future. It already controls currency exchange rates, and helps to determine the rate of inflation in many countries at this time.

Another aim of Alexis is to cause worldwide financial panic, due to severe monetary devaluation, governmental and bank bankruptcy, and extreme inflation. The World Bank will then “step in” to gain control of this financial crisis. It will appear to offer a “solution” to governments and their populations, when in reality, they will gain control of the worldwide currencies.

Mass Behavioral Modification

Another goal of Alexis is mass behavioral modification, in order to prepare the general public to accept the New World Order and its leader. This mass modification was originally conceived of in the 1940s, and crude forms were implemented in the 1950s with the advent of television watching by the general population. Basically, it consists of subliminal images that are displayed at a rate of .03 microseconds, at a rate of 1200 per minute.

The images contain graphics of sexual acts, violence, bestiality, demonic rituals, as well as acts of hatred and brutality directed towards Jews and Christians. Other graphics espouse the coming world leader, and tell people to look forward to his coming. The main image in the graphics is that of Alexis, a composite woman formed by a team of behavioural scientists who studied what images are most pleasing to the most races. Alexis also has a voice, which is slowly being introduced in the background of many television and video shows. When she is finally openly revealed, she will be the "voice of the New World Order" and will appear to be familiar and loved by most, since she has been subliminally fed to the masses for years.

A hologram of Alexis will be used on television to calm people down, and tell them what to do when the NWO is revealed. Her voice tones were again developed by a team of behaviourists, who studied what type of voice appealed to the greatest number of people in all races and ages. Tapes (computerized) of the results have been made over the years. Alexis has already been giving subliminal and background commands to people for many years; they are just not consciously aware of this fact.

Alexis has been fed to the public via television, movies, video games, computer games and the Internet. If an individual watches any of these for more than a second, they will be automatically fed the subliminals. The subliminals tell people that "watching TV is relaxing," "I need to go online, I enjoy it" and other messages to encourage time in these modes, and thus increase the programming. Even early childhood learning games, used in schools, have these subliminals embedded.

Themes of anarchy, rebellion, and violence are embedded in the Alexis modification. A feeling of impending doom and destruction (unless the world turns to the leader who will come and "save" them) is also embedded.

The Hollywood industry was created in order to also fulfill this agenda, and all major studios are funded by members of occultist groups. The top stars are all mind controlled, and the industry has the directive to encourage through the movies made, the acceptance of the NWO/occultist agenda.

VI. The Current State of the World (2017)

At this time, the New World Order is in place; it is simply not open. The detention camps and military are already in place, with detailed plans for each section of the world for the coming takeover. The New World Order is not a "future" event, but instead a present reality that is simply waiting for the signal to move into place.

Each country of the world, and continent, has Jesuit military commanders and generals assigned, who will give orders to their well-trained and disciplined armies (these armies train at night at most large military installations and in desert and remote regions throughout the world). The major occultic societies of the eastern and western world all have troops and generals ready to command their area of the nations the individuals are located in.

Crowd control technologies (based on tesla and EHF waves) are already in place. If resistance occurs, these will be used; they can cause extreme pain, unconsciousness, or death within minutes.

Once the takeover is complete, resisters are to be placed inside designated detention camps for either “rehabilitation” or death if resistance is final. Leaders within the Vatican and other occultic armies will assume teaching positions, to help implement the NWO directives within the different nations, and to explain the policies and what they mean.

These liasion ambassadors are fluent in every language, and thus are well-equipped to gain the cooperation of the governments (which are already heavily infiltrated and expected to give in without any resistance). Paramilitary and other groups that might provide resistance have been carefully profiled and infiltrated for years.

The one nation that has tried to resist this infiltration is Israel which is why they engender special hostility. To say that the Vatican and its arms have tried to infiltrate the Mossad and Israeli government over the past 50 years would be an understatement; yet to date, the success rate has only been moderate compared to other nations.

The Vatican has entered into numerous highly secret agreements with the Arab nations over the years, in its desire to destroy Israel. For instance, the U.S. financial families were instructed by the Vatican to pour money into engineering and other resources years ago into developing the oil reserves of the Arab nations. Why? Because the Arabs, like the Vatican, hate Israel, and the Vatican wanted them to modernize and be able to fight the Israelis; plus, oil gives them a method of blackmailing governments which have become highly dependent upon petroleum prices as an index for inflation rates.

Oil really is “black gold” and currencies that are no longer backed by gold standards often float based upon current oil prices. Governments now measure their wealth in large part on their current petroleum reserves, needed to fuel industry, transportation and heating, among other uses. The country that cannot purchase oil will lose its industry; and alternative energy forms (especially renewable ones) have been blackballed for years, since the Vatican WANTS the world dependent upon Arabian oil supplies; this allows them to control policies and encourage anti-Israeli initiatives.

Oil funds have also purchased large amounts of arms for the Arab nations over the years. This was one reason for the influx of foreign geologists into the Sudan region years ago: to quickly develop the oil reserves in order to fund anti-Israeli wars. The Vatican secretly despises the Arabian nations, but they work with them because of their deep hatred for the Jewish race.

The Vatican is also extremely anti-Christian, regardless of the pronouncements of the newest (Jesuit) pope. At its heart, the Vatican is satanic, serves Satan, and wishes to destroy Christianity. While the presenters in its armies may be Christian, the programmed parts will all be loyal to Satan and the antichrist until healing occurs. The anti-christian agenda of the Vatican has been seeded worldwide, with increasing numbers of laws designed to make biblical, authentic Christianity illegal. Within the next 15 years, it will be illegal (a “hate crime”) to be a Christian, and many believers will be faced with possible imprisonment for their faith.

The best possible preparation for the unveiling of the new world order is a strong faith in and obedience to the Lord. The Lord has promised that He, not satan, is in control of world history. While the Vatican can attempt to implement its strategies, it will not win. Revelations makes it clear who the true "winner" in the battle for the minds and wills of mankind is: the Lord of Hosts, who will usher in His millenial kingdom.

There is no mind control technology on earth, that can erase the deep down knowledge of the truth. People can be lied to from conception on, but once the truth is known, most will embrace that truth. This is the basis of healing: replacing the lies with truth, and choosing to walk away from lies.

It is important that the Christian Church "wakes up" to the late hour that we are in. As mentioned previously, the NWO is not a theory, but is nearly ready to come forward publicly. This is a time for Christians to be on their knees, and ask the Lord for HIS strategy for dealing with these things, and for the Christian Churches and their members to be willing to help the flood of survivors who will be leaving occultic societies such as the Jesuits during this time of repentance before judgment.

If you help survivors, pray that others will be raised who have a similar heart; that eyes will be opened to the truth and the need. Pray that the Church will no longer turn away from or disbelieve/discredit survivors, but instead will war with them to break the power of the kingdom of darkness. This is one of the best possible ways of putting into practical action the heart of Yeshua for mankind: to deliver those who are oppressed, and set free those who are captive.

Currrently, the Church is slumbering, and mainstream Christianity seems woefully unaware of the actual spiritual condition of our world today. We truly seem to be acting out the prediction of Yeshua, that in the last days, people will be "eating and drinking and giving away in marriage" and completely unaware that the forces of darkness are at work to draw mankind away from our only hope: Yeshua. My prayer is that the church will awaken to the truth, and take an active part in fighting against satan and his forces. This is intercession of the highest form, to work actively for the Kingdom of God and watch the enemy and his strongholds overthrown in the lives of individuals formerly chained to the occult.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

Accessing Part 2: How to Prevent It
June 19, 2017
In "mind control"

Exposing the Vatican: Part 5
October 7, 2021
In "healing"

book part 4
September 13, 2021
In "healing"

Amie Martineau 2:25 am on September 9, 2022

Is every Jesuit programmer? And how many children can one programmer have? It was very revealing what you said about the top Hollywood stars being mind controlled that's crazy to me… Just goes to show you how important idols are to people… I was wondering your thoughts on the Queen's passing today just out of curiosity?

★ Like

svalispeaksagain 4:44 pm on September 9, 2022

Amie:
All Jesuits have the ability to program others, as in any other large, organized international occult group. Programmers will often work with groups of children of various ages; this will vary with the programmer and their abilities, and the perceived needs of the order. A programmer may simultaneously be working with several infants, several toddlers, and a dozen young children of various ages, as well as several teens and adults. On the Queen: she was part of the British Illuminati, and I pray that it is true that she became a believer at some point. I knew her when I was younger, and she did things that were part of her role in the occult then, so I have mixed feelings on hearing about her passing

★ Like

shurtle 6:26 pm on September 9, 2022

How do we pray to stop this? Do we pray against lawlessness? What can we do to stop this control over us? Get rid of all electronics? Unfortunately we can't do that now. Everything is electronic mostly to accomplish anything. Please advise.

★ Like

svalispeaksagain 11:21 pm on September 9, 2022

I believe we need to pray for worldwide revival and that God will change men's hearts. Ultimately history is in God's hands not Satan's and we can pray that God will raise up fearless overcomes and awaken the sleeping church to take authority

★ Like

Alphonse 3:19 am on September 10, 2022

Svali please keep praying for me.

★ Like

svalispeaksagain 5:06 pm on September 10, 2022

I will be praying for you

★ Like

Amie Martineau 9:18 pm on September 14, 2022

Can you elaborate at all about your time with Queen Elizabeth? And from what I've read all members of Royal families mind controlled? And also when it came out in the MSN about Queen Elizabeth being very acquainted with Jeffrey Epstein we certainly can't think that she did not know what was going on especially since her son was in the middle of it… Do you think the Maxwell/Epstein story goes a lot deeper? I'm surprised that the MSN would expose something like that… But maybe it's just the games that they play within the firm?

★ Like

fredurez29 11:31 am on September 23, 2022

Hi,

Do you know why every women in show business, celebrities, politics and models are transgenders and if they are under MK Ultra too ?

And if a fake female agent programmed marry to a normal politic, will their children be programmed too ?

For instance Marine Le Pen in France : she is a trans like her mother while her father is a Resistant against new world order and free massonery, he has been candidate 4 or 5 times for presidency. So I wonder if his daughter has been created in an occult centre, since her mother cannot have baby because she is a male

I guess you know about this subject, that every female stars have a male skull, so it means they have been transformed by an organisation

Thank you very much

★ Liked by 1 person

fredurez29 6:32 pm on September 23, 2022

Do the occult orders make transgenders programmed too ? Like models, singers, actresses

★ Like

svalispeaksagain 12:11 am on September 25, 2022

This is a topic that takes time to address and I plan to do so in a future post. The quick response is that there can be numerous causes of transgenderism ranging from genetic engineering for some to social pressure for others, to other causes.

★ Liked by 1 person

fredurez29 3:53 am on September 25, 2022

AWESOME, I can't wait to read you, this subject is so much important.
I also want to know if you have ever heard about such a CUBE computer that these groups could use for their technology, if yes, where is it ?
This is central and their weak point. Indeed their NWO will be essentially based on 5G, 6G, and crypto-currency, such as it's already done in China.
The Antichrist will rule the world through this technology.
That's why we are looking for their damned CUBE.

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Vatican book part 10

The Real Anthony Fauci →

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

svalispeaksagain 8:28 pm on June 11, 2022

Tags: Jesuit (10), mind control (69), ritual abuse (65), SRA (45)

Vatican book part 10

There are many, many examples of such secrecy setups, from being buried alive for a day, and the child being told that they will be buried forever if they ever tell (the child is also forced to watch the burial of a child who "told" and several days later help exhume the corpse, as a visual reminder of what can happen); to being buried in a casket filled with bugs, a rotten corpse, or other objects.

The child may be placed in a box with bees that sting them (after going through several weeks of anti-venom therapy previously) as a reminder that "memories hurt."

They are also forced to view the deaths of "traitors" who betrayed the fathers, including crucifixions (the class is marched every three hours past the three crosses for three days to watch the effect on the dying men); and the torture of others who remembered and "told."

Alice in Wonderland Programming

By age five, the child will be taken to a large estate in France for Alice in Wonderland programming. This is an elaborate setup, and occurs over the period of a week. The child enters through rooms that reinforce previous training ("control the children: is recorded and replayed, with pictures of dead children displayed on the walls of the room; mirrors, "remember the flowers" and other triggers). They then enter a "backward world" where everything is backwards (much like the third dimension; this prepares the child for this travel). Alice (representing the presentation main controller who is heavily demonized) guides the child through backwards houses, where people walk and talk backwards (a common cause of childhood dyslexia is the confusion this creates).

They are then taken to a setup street where things are not backwards, but "crooked" or off slightly, which is even more disorienting. The child must walk with Alice through houses where things are insanely wrong, where people talk nonsense, and the floors and roofs may be upside down, to teach the child not to trust reality.

Follow

Alice then brings the child at last to a place where they see the white rabbit, and fol[illegible] "down the hole" (representing amnesia) to a room where the presentation stays beh[illegible] watching a movie (screen memories); the back parts then take the child's body through the rest of the setup. They enter a garden with animated/demonic flowers that at first talk kindly to the child, but later turn on the child and attack them. Wasps come and sting the child, and the large caterpillar (the guardian of the garden) tells the child what to do, and how to escape.

The child then enters a huge maze created from hedges. Soon, they are pursued by the "Jabberwocky" (a demonic presence), and must rely upon their theta skills to run and escape, and even leave the body and fly away. The white rabbit and Alice lead the child to safety, but at times will try to "trick" the child until the child learns to rely on themself instead of these capricious demonic "helpers."

The child sleeps outdoors, trying to get out of the hedge, and runs across the queen of hearts and her court playing croquet (with the severed heads of human children used as the balls). The queen becomes very interested in using the child's head (the child is constantly called "Alice" throughout the setup, to represent the presentations, since Alice in Wonderland is ultimately presentation programming to remain amnesic and rely on demonic help to do so).

The demonic "Alice" and cheshire cat help "rescue" the child, who then goes through the "valley of the shadow of death." In the middle is a cottage; it is now nightime, and the weary child knocks at the door, to be greeted by a kindly woman. The child is fed, sleeps, and is warned to avoid the Jabberwocky, which seeks to kill the child.

During the night, the kindly woman gets up. The child is awake, vomiting from the effects of a mild poison they were given in the food. The woman calls in her familiars (wolves) and tries to kill the child, who cries out for help to "Alice" and the "Cheshire Cat" to rescue her. A mage also comes and helps rescue the child, who continues the journey, meeting other characters. Finally, the child ends up at the palace of the Queen of Hearts, who demands a sacrifice (the child was already told that the last child to complete the Alice scenarios will be her sacrifice). The children who live watch the final child come in and be sacrificed in a ritual. This reminds them to never be slow or tardy when coming to a "party" (ritual). The "parties" in the Alice in Wonderland books are always referring to rituals.

Crazy Alice Programming

A subset of the Alice in Wonderland (presenter) programming is the "Crazy Alice" programming, which is meant to warn the Alice controller over the presentation to never allow memories to come up, or they will be labled "insane" and extreme abuse will occur. This is often the root of insanity fears when a person first starts remembering their past.

In this setup (also in France), the child (now called "Alice") is taken to a mental institution where the inmates are chained, and who rant, rave and curse at her. She is left there for days, with her only food being rancid water and rotten cabbage. The inmates hurl feces at her, verbally abuse her, and the custodians sexually abuse her while she is chained to the wall because of her "insanity" (remembering).

Because she is "sick", and "mentally ill" Alice is taken regularly down to the basement for "treatment" which consists of electroshocks, drowning, and being held over a rat pit filled with hungry rats that are allowed to bite her feet and ankles. The child is told repeatedly that "remembering" or "telling" will have her labeled "crazy" and that she will be taken to the institution, or one similar, for "treatment." This is part of developing the presenter amnesia and vows to never remember (or seek treatment).

Wizard of Oz Programming

This programming is also often done first during the preschool years, when the child can most easily internalize the program. The dark core ("Dorothy") is taken to another dimension, with her goal always to return to the Emerald City (representing ascension and the celestial paradise). The programming represents travel through the dimensions, the dangers involved, and the rewards for "ascending."

The goal of Wizard of Oz programming is to remind the child that they must always contact, or return home; and to create great fear of remembering (or, they will be placed in a coma and never wake up, unlike Dorothy in Oz, who woke up from "death" only after "returning home."

Fantasia Programming

Walt Disney was an avowed Illuminist, and his goal when creating Disney productions was to introduce the general public to the occult, especially young children, and to reinforce programming in those raised in the occult.

For instance, animals often "talk" in Disney films, and people can turn into animals, which are actually mage spells. The images are often dark and demonic in the animated movies, and have become increasingly so in recent years.

Disney's favorite film was Fantasia, in which he took classical music that was used to program young children with, and developed highly occultic themes in the cartoons that accompany it. To the untrained eye, Fantasia seems a bit odd; but the individual in the occult understands that the themes of a mage in training ("the sorceror's assistant) who must turn to his more powerful mentor for help, and the Greek pantheon (in the famous rain sequence), mythology and even the depiction of an occultic ritual and then the famous strains of ave maria (a Jesuit programming tune) end the film.

Fantasia is blatant occultic imagery throughout, and was used extensively in the 1950s through 1970s to program individuals with. It was superseded in recent years by movies such as the Matrix, which depicts high-level programming, Labyrinth, and others.

Helping the Survivor

Because of the early and repeated childhood betrayals, and the fact that the true host and core and core splits will not present early in therapy, the survivor will be very untrusting, and unable to bond normally with, anyone who tries to help them. The most common presentation is "detached", since the parts that can attach are hidden very deeply within and are reserved for the Jesuit Fathers only.

While the survivor will not at first present as "needy", the attachment needs are still there, and will drive recontact programming unless the survivor can learn to form healthy, safe attachments. This will be the challenge for both the survivor, and their helpers, since the wounded, angry parts within will often test those they do bond with again and again, once they feel safe within the relationship.

Theta and spiritual attacks are difficult to bear for helpers, but the survivor will be completely unaware that they are occurring. Gently asking, or even confronting, the survivor with what is happening can help. They will need to learn to pray, and ask inside, to find out what is happening with the parts that they are not co-conscious with yet.

Once co-consciousness is established, and the parts come to Christ and the demonic is renounced, the warfare will usually diminish, much to the relief of the survivor and their helpers.

It will take all of the emotional resources the survivor has, as well as outside support, and a strong walk with Yeshua, to face the original attachment pains, that will go throughout early childhood, infancy and prenatally. This is when praying in the spirit, scripture study, journaling and talking with safe support can help tremendously as the survivor grieves the past, and begins to build a life based upon a new foundation.

Often, Jesuit survivors have never known, or have had very limited contact with, anyone outside of the cult setting until they make the choice to break free. They are literally surrounded from conception on by members of the Order, with their life's work, friendships, host families and marriages all mapped out early on. Their close friends will all be members; their spouses are always members, since they arrange the marriages; and their families are also Jesuits or members of one of the 12 societies.

The jobs they have held will often be at "cult" corporations, with bosses and peers all members. Nothing in the survivor's environment was "left to chance" which is why breaking free is truly a miracle. The person who helps the survivor will often be their first non-Jesuit friend, and it will take time for them to learn to interact in "normal" or non-cult ways.

They will grieve tremendously at giving up their relationships with friends, family, mentors and the Fathers, in spite of the abuse, since this is the only "love" they have ever experienced, and this "love" (trauma bonding) allowed them to psychologically survive childhood. As terrible as the Jesuit Fathers were, they were the only consistent emotional bonds the child was allowed, and so the bonding is strong indeed, as well as the desire to "protect" these loved ones through either loyalty, or amnesia, or both.

The survivor who fears facing their past is one who fears betraying those they love; they are often "held hostage" through the group's control of or threatening to harm someone they love, whether a child, a mentee, a cult twin, or another relationship. To break free, the survivor must be shown, and truly believe, that only the LORD can rescue and keep safe these loved ones.

They must also be willing to count the cost of getting out, which is very high: no contact at all with former family, friends or loved ones, since they will all have been programmed to access the survivor. Few are willing to pay this price for freedom, and it is often the unconscious (unknown) love bonds that draw the survivor back in.

It can help the survivor to understand the true cost of discipleship:

Luke 14:26
"If anyone comes to Me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple.

Even more helpful is the LORD's promise of blessing to those that do choose to pay this price:
Matt. 19:29
And everyone who has left houses or brothers or sisters or father or mother or wife or children or lands, for My name's sake, shall receive a hundredfold, and inherit eternal life
It can help the survivor who grieves the loss of every love relationship they have ever known, to understand that by coming into God's kingdom, they have actually gained a whole new, safe family:
Mark 3:34, 35
And He looked around in a circle at those who sat about Him, and said, "Here are My mother and My brothers. For whoever does the will of God is My brother and My sister and mother."
It is a blessing to know that Yeshua calls the survivor who gets out His brother or sister; and to know that they inherit eternal life.

H. Middle Childhood: Ages 5 – 11

Mage Training

All Jesuits undergo mage training. Mages are considered the "top" of the occultic hierarchy, over witches, wizards and other levels of occultism. They are adept scholars, and study the ancient Babylonian manuscripts (which describe the first contacts between man and the "gods" or "ascended masters" which are actually demonic entities), as well as the Egyptian, Roman and druidic writings.

The oldest manuscripts are considered the most reliable. A young mage is forced to memorize the oral histories and spells contained in these texts. They learn to use books that demonically "come alive" and show scenes when certain spells are cast (much more entertaining than a normal picture book to a 5-year-old). With the help of a mentor, they learn the original names of the animals, in order to call them to themselves, practicing standing in the woods and calling rabbits, deer, birds and other normally shy creatures.

They learn to take the form of an animal, often a bird, or a predator such as a wolf. While this sounds impossible, mages do these things demonically. The focus of mage craft is power and control. The young mage learns to battle in power battles, with the help of demonic forces. While young, their spiritual shielding appears red; then they progress to green, then blue, and the most powerful mages have a bright blue-white emanation, signifyiing extreme demonic 'protection." The child travels to the fourth dimension, which is filled with ziggurats, and engages in power battles at first beside their mentor (who protects them from being killed by malicious older mages), and then, as they grow in power, they learn to battle alone.

Mages often "pick battles" with other mages upon meeting them, to determine who is "stronger." There is a constant positioning for power among these occultists, who have extreme pride.

The mages also learn spells for creating a light; and later, spells and curses to cause illness, death, and the cloak of invisibility, among others. Early in their training, the Fathers help the young (3-year-old) mage conduct rituals and sacrifices; later in their training, the mage does their own, or orders others to conduct them, in order to gain power. The greater the sacrifice,the greater the power, according to mage thinking.

The highest level of mage is the ascended master. This is a mage who has undergone death themselves many times, willingly, in order to ascend to the highest dimension and "learn" from the other ascended masters. This is considered the highest level attainable in the occult world.

Coming of Age Ceremony

When a Jesuit is 12 years old, they undergo their coming of age ceremony, at which time they become a full Jesuit. This ceremony is held at the Vatican for the top classes, and is done every year, as new classes "graduate." The inner courts of the Vatican are cleared, and golden poles are erected throughout it. The public is not allowed near the Vatican for the week before or after this ceremony, and since there is always a "no fly" rule for aircraft at all times, the ceremony is highly secretive.

The first part involves going to Satan's Throne at the heart of the Vatican, giving a sacrifice on the black alter there, descending to Satan's throne in the spiritual realm, and being given a name by Satan himself.

A few days later, the other, more horrific ceremony occurs. Top leadership from all 12 occultic societies that serve the Vatican travel to Rome, and sit in the small coliseum in a designated area under their banner. There are banners representing the Order of the Knights Templar, The Order of the Knights of Malta, Opus Dei, Magnificat, The Order of the Rosy Cross, Trinity, the Illuminati, and the other occultic societies that are actually arms of the Vatican around the world. It is considered a great honor to be invited to this ceremony.

The Jesuit class comes out. On 1000 golden poles in the arena are tied infants, toddlers and young children, and one by one, the Jesuit trainees must slaughter them. Around the arena are golden bowls which they use to catch the blood from each victim, which is then offered to Satan. There are also golden bowls filled with wine, which the Jesuit trainees drink from when they are thirsty or emotionally overcome by the horror of what they are doing.

At the end of this ritual (called "the slaughter of the innocents") the trainee is considered an ascended master and a full Jesuit father. From then on, they are referred to as "Father" by others, and they take off the brown robe of the acolyte and don the black robe of the full Jesuit. Due to the terrible nature of the ritual, some falter and cannot continue; they are killed by the other trainees as instructed. Most of these new Fathers undergo a period of collapse after the ceremony; they are never the same again.

This ritual is the culmination of a lifetime of training in how to slaughter others. By this time, the new Jesuit Father has slaughtered literally thousands over the course of their childhood, including assassinations and rituals participated in. The design of this type of bloodguiltiness is to create a type of insanity and the desire to never remember, which feeds the dissociation. The individual will experience a huge amount of guilt, and believe that God can never forgive them for the innocent lives they took.

Helping the Survivor

The ritual described above creates a demonic stronghold; the new Jesuit truly believes they are unforgiveable by the Christian God (after all, they took the lives of innocents), and so they embrace Satan himself, who welcomes them in this deed and even gives them honor and a high position in his army for doing it.

It takes considerable time, prayer and replacing these lies with scripture and truth to overcome the lifelong effects of participating in this ceremony. The Jesuit leaving the Order will need to hear, and believe, again and again that the Lord can forgive them for this bloodshed.

This is when sharing scriptures about forgiveness can be a lifeline, since the survivor may initially feel deep shame, and even suicidal, when the memory first comes. They may fear they are going insane (from the weight of the guilt), and will need significant emotional support to process this trauma.

This is not the time to emotionally abandon the survivor. If the therapist is going out of town, there needs to be accountability and prayer support present, and reassurance that they are forgiven (they will ask over and over again, “Can God really forgive THIS?” They will need to seek this answer from the Lord, and hear it from Him to truly believe the truth, but initially may need to hear that they are forgiven from a Christian who can represent the love of Jesus to them in the midst of their guilt and pain.

Over time, they will come to an understanding that they are forgiven, and will feel immense gratitude. It takes patience, but the Lord is faithful to show His mercy for those that have survived this type of trauma – the trauma of inflicting death upon thousands.

Computer Training

The Vatican has trained its operatives since the early 1960s in the use of computers, and the equipment they have available is 50 years more advanced than that used by the general public. They have classrooms within the Vatican that the children go to for training in the different areas that they will be active in. This includes extensive training in all computer languages, and “hacker” training in order to get past firewalls and access information.

They are also trainined in bookkeeping, accounting, and business systems, since the Vatican especially likes to keep itself informed about the financial operations of the organizations it works with, and who work for it. The child will spend many hours on a computer, and will learn every method of downloading and sending on information that is requested.

Political Training

By age 8, the child will undergo political and diplomacy training. The child will accompany their mentor to dinners hosted by powerful political figures, and they will later be asked information, such as “who was the most important person at the dinner? How do you tell? What was the most important information shared during the dinner? Why?”

The child is taught to be charming, and to engage in conversation individuals from any walk of life; and how to gather information without the person they are conversing with being aware of this fact. They are also taught how to “listen in” on other conversations while engaged in coversation themselves.

They may undergo specialized training for placement in a politically prominent position; or they may learn how to engage politically prominent individuals, get close to them, and fulfill their mission regarding them.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

Interview
February 14, 2022
In "healing"

Book available on Amazon
April 25, 2018
In "mind control"

Vatican Book Part 9
March 21, 2022
In "healing"

Lita 8:51 am on June 12, 2022

I pray for all those poor children.xxxMay GOD make those suffer who done this to these children.

★ Like

Rita 5:36 pm on June 12, 2022

How many are in a typical graduating class of Mages? How long does the graduation ritual/ceremony typically take to complete?

Thanks for all that you share. Everywhere I go on the internet (in search of how to help survivors) EVERYONE is SO grateful that you share what you know. You are a wonderful, faithful servant of the Lamb of God. Also, I'm always relieved when you post something new, something that sounds like it's authentically you.

Regarding the issues of clones, and twinning, have you written anything about that? If not, would you consider it? I see influencers every day that no longer look like they did in the past, sound like the did in the past, or speak the same lines of reasoning and truth that they did in the past. I understand that all opposition is controlled but at the same time it seems like some people go off script, or off programming. Jordan Peterson is an example. He was a brilliant speaker, teaching independent critical thinking, and individual responsibility vs the hive mind. I don't think that was helping the New Age higher ups bring all people into submission. Peterson was truly helping millions of people, especially young people. Something has happened to him. I know he had a breakdown– but did he? Or did he go in and get cloned/ or tuned up? Perhaps this issue is unrelated to helping survivors, and is more oriented towards helping the general population that is so- so- so deceived. Perhaps I shouldn't be bring it up, but if anyone would know– you would.

I understand if you edit out any of this, or delete it completely. I appreciate you no matter your response, or non-response.

Thanks again for all you do. Much Love always.

★ Like

svalispeaksagain 10:44 pm on June 16, 2022

Hi, the mage training is only one of several subjects that children in the group I was in studied; they also studied many other things as well over the years. The training takes years. The graduation ceremony is over several days, since it also includes the other areas studied being celebrated within the group. A typical cohort is 12 in a class, with several classes graduating each year.
I have discussed clones and twins under the genetic labs, where they create clones and twins (same thing, basically, since it creates an infant with identical DNA). In the group I was in, we actually had triplet sets of one girl and two boys, or two girls and one boy. This allows the triplets to "fill in" for one another in their various presentations, and the bonds are very intense between them.

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Vatican Book Part 9

Vatican Book Part 11 (final section) →

Blog at WordPress.com.

svalispeaksagain 5:28 pm on March 21, 2022

Tags: Israel, mind control (69), ritual abuse (65), SRA (45), Vatican (10)

Vatican Book Part 9

Anti-Semitic Training

The Vatican hates the Jewish race, and trains its agents to hate it as well. The earliest anti-semitic training includes the young toddler being beaten or raped by “Jews” (these are setups to create a deep unconscious hatred). Later, prisoner and guard scenarios, and re-enactment of nazi death camps are done. Throughout these portrayals, being a guard is “good” and comes with privileges and lack of abuse (but the guards must be abusers), while being a prisoner, or “Jew” is considered “bad” and the signal to abuse the prisoner ferociously. Those who show mercy in any form are tortured themselves, and forced to play the role of Jew.

Anti-Israeli Intelligence

The Vatican also plays a very active role in anti-Israeli intelligence, which will be discussed later. During infancy, a cover identity for these agents must be created, and they are placed for a period of time in a kibbutz, as an “orphan.” The orphan will always have a distant family member who at some point takes responsibility for the child (such as an aunt). But there will be a record of the child being placed in the kibbutz for official purposes.

The child’s “aunt” or “relative” will be a programmer who helps the child learn Israeli culture and to assimilate. They will travel frequently out of the country during the child’s early years, due to the relative’s role as a “consultant” on business travels. In reality, the child will be taken back to the monastery between these visits to Israel which are for the sole purpose of creating their later cover identity as a Sabra.

Sexual Training

The infant raised by the Jesuits never knows life without sexual abuse. The Fathers are pedophiles of the worst kind, and they continuously abuse the infants in their care, in part to create spiritual ties, but other times simply to fulfill their lusts.

Follow

During toddlerhood, the child will undergo specific sexual training, by specialists in this area, to help them "work" the parties of the wealthy and depraved. These very wealthy individuals have specialized sexual preferences, and prefer toddlers and young child who can perform them, including ménage a trois or quatre, and other acts. Because infants and young children are often "snuffed out" at these parties, the child is given a large, easily recognizable tattoo to save their life (the sign basically is a "do not kill" one, that lets the wealthy partiers know that the child belongs to a powerful patron who is simply lending him or her out for the night).

During these drunken orgies, the child is also quietly gathering information that the wealthy and powerful in Europe or other countries carelessly let drop during the party. Few members of the wealthiest families in the world realize that the children serving their sexual needs at these parties are actually trained agents whose real goal is to discover weaknesses that can be used by the Vatican to gain control of them; or to discover the real thoughts and motives of those who already serve them.

Helping the Survivor

Early in therapy, the survivor will appear to have no problem with prayer, talking to the Lord, and quickly hearing His voice; they may even appear to have strong prophetic gifts since these were heavily utilized by the cult (in divination and oracle roles). But as they begin to realize and undo the punisher and anti-Christian programming, they will begin to understand the amount of deception and listening to false spirits that they did, all the while believing they were praying to the Lord.

This can cause deep spiritual anguish, and the survivor may even fear praying for a period, seeking to address their prayers only to the "correct" deity and fearing they are instead talking to the "wrong one." They may address this problem by using a pre-defined prayer, or a different name than they have for "God" and "Jesus" internally (the prayer in the Prayer Warrior book by CARE is a good one to help with this).

Eventually, as they recover the memories and undo the programming, they will understand that the LORD hears their heart's cry to address only Him. They may for a period be less able to "hear" from Him than formerly, since they are choosing to give up all demonic and false feeds into their mind, and to only hear from the LORD. This is where discipleship by a mature Christian can help enormously. The more experienced Christian can help the survivor learn to discern what is truly the Lord's voice, and what is programming or demonic.

This is why it is so important for the survivor to be well-grounded in scripture, and to be willing to search the scriptures for the truth, as well as discuss what falsehoods they were taught. Internal parts may come out initially very hostile towards God or Jesus, but this is simply because their last experience with who they believe they are was very traumatic, or they felt abandoned by God. Part of healing is working through the setups, and understanding that the God of the Bible is not at all like the actors and false representations the survivor was shown.

The survivor's back parts will all have undergone extensive setups and "proofs" that God is "weaker" than Satan, so asking them initially to put their full trust in the LORD may seem foolish (or suicidal) to them. Gradually, with trust and the survivor watching the authority of true Christianity (and often testing it spiritually themselves through warfare), these parts will come to acknowledge that the LORD truly is the one true God, and will be willing to give up their demonic attachments and "helpers" (which are actually demonic parasites).

Once the survivor's parts stop calling on the demonic, the LORD can actually allow them to experience the blessings of obedience as outlined in Deuteronomy 28:1-11.

"Now it shall come to pass, if you diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God, to observe carefully all His commandments which I command you today, that the Lord your God will set you high above all nations of the earth. [2] And all these blessings shall come upon you and overtake you, because you obey the voice of the Lord your God:

[3] "Blessed shall you be in the city, and blessed shall you be in the country.

[4] "Blessed shall be the fruit of your body, the produce of your ground and the increase of your herds, the increase of your cattle and the offspring of your flocks.

[5] "Blessed shall be your basket and your kneading bowl.

[6] "Blessed shall you be when you come in, and blessed shall you be when you go out.

[7] "The Lord will cause your enemies who rise against you to be defeated before your face; they shall come out against you one way and flee before you seven ways.

[8] "The Lord will command the blessing on you in your storehouses and in all to which you set your hand, and He will bless you in the land which the Lord your God is giving you.

[9] "The Lord will establish you as a holy people to Himself, just as He has sworn to you, if you keep the commandments of the Lord your God and walk in His ways. [10] Then all peoples of the earth shall see that you are called by the name of the Lord, and they shall be afraid of you. [11] And the Lord will grant you plenty of goods, in the fruit of your body, in the increase of your livestock, and in the produce of your ground, in the land of which the Lord swore to your fathers to give you."

These are wonderful blessings indeed, and as the survivor chooses to stop calling on the demonic, and breaks the rights given away to such beings in early childhood, they will begin to experience them to an increasing degree. Often, at first, the survivor will feel upset: they have given up everything to break free, they have left family, friends, loved ones, and are undergoing great suffering. They will wonder why; what they may not be aware of is that there may be spiritual parts that they are not yet co-conscious with who may be actually cursing or sabotaging the survivor and their helpers.

As time passes, if the survivor does not recontact and stays safe, these parts will stop doing their old jobs once they realize that they have a better option: to put their faith in Yeshua, and come under His protection and blessing.

G. Early Childhood Training (Ages 3 to 6)

Theta Training

By age three, a child raised by the Jesuits will have significant theta skills. The Jesuit Fathers will often "spiritually rape" the children by demonic help, causing the child to feel raped even though they were not physically touched (and the Father will feel great lust or pleasure in the practice).

In order to defend themselves, the child will also learn these skills and to "rape" others spiritually.

The children also learn to influence the thoughts of others, and it is not unusual to have a group of older children cause younger children to blurt out inappropriate remarks at meal times, using these skills (causing great laughter at the expense of the victimized child).

The children must also learn to defend themselves from the attacks of their peers; this is encouraged, since it causes the children to utilize their theta capabilities and strengthen them.

Leadership Training

By this time, certain children will also be placed as "class leaders" over their class of 12. This leadership is a difficult position to hold, since the other children, who will have been taught to be very competitive, will attempt to take over leadership by harming or even attempting to kill the class leader. Class leaders spend many wakeful nights due to their knowledge of the disgruntled feelings of the others they lead.

Presentation Training

At age three, the child will also be placed within several host families around the world, since the Jesuits are an international society. The child may grow up with anywhere from four to seven families in different countries, and will spend several weeks, or even a month or two each year, with each family during the next 20 years. School photos are taken, and a cover identity created in the countries which they anticipate the child will be working for them as they grow older into adulthood. The families will be given photos of the child (or a look-alike) in infancy for photo albums.

These host families will have programming to prevent the child and the host parents from bonding with each other, since the child must always maintain their primary bond with the Jesuit fathers. The true host and core will always only be allowed to bond with the Jesuits.

An example of host families could be one in Germany, one in France, one in Amsterdam, one in the United States, and even one in Israel. Since the Jesuits hate Israel, and a focus of their intelligence efforts is infiltration of Israeli national security, they will attempt as often as possible to place a child within Israel with a trainer who acts as their "aunt" or "uncle." The child rotates between these host families and thus learns to rotate between presentations based upon their current living situation. The child has already learned to never speak any language but that of the host family (on pain of severe punishment), and has already undergone numerous experiences prior to going to a host family to teach them to not bond with anyone except the fathers.

Detachment Training

For example, at age two, the child will be allowed to interact with and bond with a loving woman, who acts as a mother surrogate to the child who is hungry for nurturing by a woman. After several weeks of loving interactions, at some point, the woman will turn around and begin severely abusing the child, such as by pushing them down stairs, sexually abusing them, or other abuse, laughing at the child's display of pain at the emotional betrayal. The child must learn the lesson to never trust anyone, or to bond with anyone other than the fathers, or they will be killed.

The host families will also be programmed to reject the child, and/or abuse the child, to ensure that the child does not create a bond that is too strong. The primary Jesuit bond will always be an unconscious one, that the Christian and cult cover presentations are completely amnesic to: a primary Jesuit Father whom they love greatly, since this is the only person they were allowed to love during their early childhood.

MI6 Training

Once the host presentations are in place, the child (by age 3 ½) will undergo training at MI6. MI6 has a special area (known as "Colonel Green's House" after Colonel Green, the founder of MI6) where young children undergo specialized assassin and military training. Again, the child goes there with their class, and is assigned a number. Instead of being called by name, they will be called "42" or a similar number during training and learn to respond to this.

MI6 reserves the Green House for the Jesuits at specific times, and the trainers during this time are all Jesuit trainers that work for MI6. The child will perfect previous skills in using a gun; their delta computer system will be put into place, and their ability to classify intelligence, and store it based upon its classification will be perfected during this time. The ability to use a photographic visual and auditory memory, and download to handlers information obtained while on a mission, is also perfected.

They will perfect basic skills of all operatives, such as following a target, dropping a tail, and blending in inconsicuously in a group.

The terrible punishments used at MI6 (such as the room with walls that move inwards, or the multi-faceted crystal ball in a room with mirrors used when the child is drugged, or the specialized computer system that is used for delta installation) are all used on the child. By the time the child has completed the 3-month training course (which is updated as they grow older), they will have a firm base in military special operations. By age 12, the child will have developed enough skillsets that they will be classified as a military weapon.

Delta Computer Training

Delta training is extensive enough to give it special mention. During delta training, the child will be hooked up to a computer, which it will be taught to emulate while in delta state. The computer speaks with a synthetic, very robotic voice, and the child will do the same. The delta training will encompass high and low delta states, and the child will be taught to classify all cognitive thoughts and experiences according to security levels. Low security levels can be retained as conscious thought; any information classified as mid to high security will be "access denied" to conscious presentation thought, and stored within the deeper delta states of the brain.

The delta computer system will have a ground zero state, with delta controllers and introjected trainers "manning" the computer systems. At ground zero, primary traumas and death state programming are installed, to prevent dismantling of the computer system and to keep the child invested in protecting high-security information.

Theta Controller Training

As the child reaches late preschool and early school age, they will undergo Galileo training (training in remote viewing, mind reading and thought influencing), in order to provide the Jesuits with access to buildings and conversations they would otherwise be unable to reach. During a mission, a child will be asked, for example, to go into an office building, and "read" classified or private documents during the night hours and then share what they have read with their handlers.

The child will also have the ability to introject themselves and images or thoughts into other people's dream states. In fact, part of theta assassin training is learning to have the subject dream of their own death. The head theta controller (such as Nemesis) will oversee the others, including Phobos (fear); Thantos (death) and Chaos (insanity). Theta training is aimed at teaching the child to induce each of these states in others using demonic powers developed.

Theta Assassin Training

Jesuits very frequently induce death in those that cross them. If a child is sent on a mission, they will have sexual relations with the "mark." At a later time (often days later), the child will be sent bac spiritually with a mentor back to the mark, to cause their death while sleeping. This will often begin with a terrifying dream of the individual's death, and many have literally died of fright due to these terrible dreams.

When the Black Pope is "retired" he is actually surrounded by a group of Jesuits, trained in this way, who kill him using theta powers. The new Black Pope always participates in this. Jesuit Fathers who are removed from a position due to betrayal (such as embezzling funds) will also be "retired" in this way.

The Black Pope in Rome has a theta guard composed of Jesuits who have completed their theta training (these guards can range in age from 12 years old to 32). The three guards sit in front of his office, as a warning to any intruders. They and other theta guards stationed throughout the Vatican give immediate notice if an outsider without authorization has entered the Vatican. This includes occultic practitioners who "fly" past the Vatican; these individuals are hunted down in the spirit by the theta guards, and first warned, and later even killed, for trespassing. In the occultic realm, the Vatican is considered a true "no fly" zone for those who travel spiritually.

The Swiss Guard is composed of young Jesuits who have completed their military and theta training, and act as an additional layer of protection.

The newer generations of thetas have highly developed "kill" training in the spiritual realm developed from the first weeks of life in the womb on, and are often mentored by groups of very skilled theta trainers to prevent the children from turning on the trainers and killing them. These newer thetas have poorly developed presentations, and must often live very protected lives away from the public eye.

Secrecy/Amnesia Training

Some of the most important training the preschooler undergoes is secrecy training. The child has bonded heavily to and wants to protect the Jesuit fathers, and so they are told: "If you betray us, we could be killed. The only way to not betray us is to not remember." The child willingly agrees to amnesia, in order to protect the people they love most.

In other secrecy setups, a child will complete a setup "mission" and later is asked if they remembered what happened. If the child answers "Yes" a gun is placed to their head, and they are told that if they remember, the Father must kill them. They are asked again if they remember (presenters are asked); until the child is either completely amnesic, or is killed (the Jesuits do not allow children who have any memory traces to live; the gun threat is very real).

Another setup is "remember the flowers": the child is taken to a garden at the monastery where he/she has spent times chatting with their favorite Father in the past. There is a water pool in the middle of the garden, and during this setup, it is filled with corpses of children the same age as the young child (ages 2 or 3). The Father cuts a flower, gives it to the child and tells the child to "remember the flowers" (i.e. the dead children who remembered and told others).

There are many, many examples of such secrecy setups, from being buried alive for a day, and the child being told that they will be buried forever if they ever tell (the child is also forced to watch the burial of a child who "told" and several days later help exhume the corpse, as a visual reminder of what can happen); to being buried in a casket filled with bugs, a rotten corpse, or other objects.

The child may be placed in a box with bees that sting them (after going through several weeks of anti-venom therapy previously) as a reminder that "memories hurt."

They are also forced to view the deaths of "traitors" who betrayed the fathers, including crucifixions (the class is marched every three hours past the three crosses for three days to watch the effect on the dying men); and the torture of others who remembered and "told."

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

III. How are the Jesuits financed?
August 30, 2021
In "mind control"

Vatican Book Part 11 (final section)
September 8, 2022
In "healing"

Vatican Book Part 1
August 17, 2021
In "healing"

Pingback: Vatican Book Part 9 – flashyflasch

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Interview

Vatican book part 10 →

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

svalispeaksagain 7:14 pm on December 23, 2021

Tags: mind control (69), programming (60), ritual abuse (65), Vatican (10)

Book Part 8

Prometheus

Under Vulcan is Prometheus, the main white system (presentations) controller punisher. His punishments include fire, burning, and intense pain, depending upon the traumas the person has undergone. During the early years, the Jesuits will incorporate primary punishment traumas that include:

· Flagellation with a whip that has attached sharp rocks and razors

· Burning at a stake

· Having feet and legs chewed on by rats

· Being stung by a swarm of angry bees (the child is given anti-venom before and after to prevent death)

· Infants being dropped, and startled into a mechanical panic reaction

· Being attacked by birds and wolves

· Demonic attacks

· Rapes with steel instruments

· Shocks throughout the body

· Death and near-death experiences

· Paralysis and being tortured while unable to move

· Drowning and smothering

Follow

There are others; these are just a few representative traumas. The death experience can be accessed and used to make the individual believe that they are dying as a result of disobedience; the heart may even stop beating for intervals that range from skipped beats to no beat for up to a minute. Breathing may also stop when the individual attempts to break core level punishment programming, since the ultimate punishment is physical death, and this is deliberately installed by the Jesuit Fathers as a "fail safe" if all other protocols fail.

Saturn

Saturn will be the primary reprogramming system, and is responsible for reprogramming the systems nightly with the traumas described above. Horrific reprogramming traumas will be instilled, first physically and later using virtual reality. Small core-level infants will be dropped, pounded, shocked, raped, burned, cut, eaten on by rats, blinded by needles, suffocated and otherwise traumatized during the reprogramming.

Jesuit systems reprogram constantly, with the reprogramming sequences changing every two hours throughout the day. This ensures that all systems are reprogrammed daily.

E. Jesuit Master Controllers

The primary master controllers for a Jesuit system will reflect the primary spiritual relationships in the child's life.

Althea (the Tree of Life)

These will include the "unholy trinity" of the Father (Satan), the Son (the antichrist and the beast) and the Spirit (Althea, the tree of life). The Fathers worship all three. In fact, the Arbor de Vitae monastery just north of Rome (the primary Jesuit monastery) is believed to be the dwelling place of Althea, the tree of life. This wicked creature lives in the basement of the monastery, and the young children (and adults) will often hear her moaning at night to be fed. And they do feed her, at regular intervals, with sacrifices of every human variety.

The Jesuit children are taught from infancy to participate in these rituals; as infants, the Fathers place their hands over a baby's, and teach them to make the sacrifice. As the child gets older, they must take a more active role, or suffer severe punishment by Althea (which appears at times like a huge willow whose branches "whip" the child terribly).

No Jesuit child ever wants to be called down for a spiritual whipping of this manner, and so they quickly learn how to feed the tree very efficiently. After a ritual, the tree will be quiet for days or weeks, but will always begin moaning again to be fed. The child grows up knowing that in order for there to be peace, they must give this entity what it asks for. The child will have been dedicated to Althea, will have a representation of her in their system, and must dismantle it, kick out the spiritual entity, and heal the human part.

Helping the Survivor

When the tree of life is pulled out, the three roots (white, black and silver gray) must also be rooted out, since these represent early infant demonic traumas used in installing the roots of the tree of life and the q'ballah internally. This takes extensive prayer, seeking the Lord, and asking the Holy Spirit to help the survivor overcome the fear of uprooting these demonic strongholds.

The tree of life will often have grown to a large tree with 1,000 points of life, each representing a life taken (including those of infants), and the demonic that entered as a result, during the installation of the tree. These lives must be grieved for; the murders repented of, and forgiveness received, to break the hold of the tree of life on the survivvor's mind.

Some survivors will also have a mirror images of the tree of life, or a "tree of death" internally, that again is based upon the ritual murder of young infants, with the roots attached to the heart of the survivor (they are wrapped around the heart, and the survivor may believe that they will die if the tree is taken out).

The survivor will need to realize that the Lord is able to undo even this type of programming; can overcome the fear of uprooting the demonic. It can help the survivor if they are reminded that the fear they feel is the fear that the demonic feels at losing its "home" inside, and that they will actually feel more peace once the tree is rooted out. They can pray and ask the Lord to uproot it for them; this may be seen visually inside as Jesus reaching in and pulling it out, or as an increased peace as the rituals are repented of, and the person exercises authority.

The relief may be dramatic, or occur over several weeks. But the survivor will have more internal peace and healing once they choose to get rid of this voracious entity, and allow the Holy Spirit to fill them instead.

The Beast

The Beast has a room and a lair in the Vatican dedicated to him. This room supposedly dates from early Roman times, when sacrifices were conducted in the original cave located there that the Vatican was built over. This angry and vindictive spirit makes its presence known, and is eagerly sought out by the Fathers, since they believe he gives great power over enemies. The young child will be placed during the second year of life in a dark, cave-like lair underneath the altar in the Beast's room. They will spend 24 hours in this lair, where the Beast visits with the child, makes suggestions, and eventually has the child give in to its requests (to kill another child put in with them).

This is extremely traumatizing to the young child, who feels intense guilt. The child will have internalized the Beast (see the above discussion on programming methods used). This internal Beast only knows and understands killing and destroying, and spiritual warfare and deliverance must be done to free the human part trapped by the spiritual part. The Beast also gives energy to the punishment systems described previously, and will demand absolute obedience to it and the Pantheon, until the individual learns their authority in Yeshua, and is able to break free.

Satan

Many times, it can take years of dedicated work to go beneath the tree and beast layers, and reach the true system master controller: Satan. From pre-birth and birth dedication, this is the being the Jesuits truly serve, in both his incarnations: as satan (cruel, vicious, demanding, destructive and lying) and Theo (kind, benevolent, manipulative, charming). The child will have been bonded to both, as described previously.

Satan's Throne

During the toddler years, at times the child will be physically placed on satan's throne. When supplicants crawl up the hall on ground glass, or nails, or hot rocks, satan will be sitting on the throne next to the child. He will ask the child what kind of judgment should be made; or what price should be paid for a request, and the child will answer. If satan is pleased with the answer, he and the child will simultaneously make the pronouncement. If the child is too kind-hearted, they will be punished severely until they learn the types of judgment that are acceptable.

This internalizes the satan identity for the core master controller, since the adults treat the child on satan's throne as if he/she were satan himself, in every way. The child is actually temporarily possessed, in that part, by satan during the ceremonies and judgments. The evil behavior convinces the survivor that he/she is evil and anchors the belief in the part that they are actually satan.

Helping the survivor

In later years, the adult will have to overcome very difficult memories of the lives taken or asked for when in that role, and the cruel decisions made. They will need to repent of these deeds, and ask the Lord for forgiveness (which He offers freely). It can help to remind the survivor that the Lord knew all about their past, even when they didn't; that He is not surprised or repulsed by them or their past. When they came to Jesus, He knew all about each act they committed, and forgave them.

They will also need emotional support to process the pain of these memories, and to be treated as loveable, in spite of the horrific acts that they committed. This is a challenge, since many Christians want to "turn away" from those with a past such as this. But the survivor is looking to their therapist or support person to demonstrate the love of Christ to systems that may have no idea of what true Christianity is.

Once they "get it" and realize they are forgiven, these parts will quickly give up their old jobs and choose freedom, if they believe they have the physical safety to support healing.

Demonic Chess

The Jesuit Fathers are accomplished "chess masters." The term comes from the original, demonic origin of chess, which was first used by the ancient Babylonians, then the Egyptians, then passed down through the centuries. The original form of chess is considered an important part of mage training.

During the game, the young child is taught to first control the easier, white pieces, which are made of stone. During the game, the pieces come demonically alive, and they will try to turn on and attack the child. At first, the toddler needs the help of their spiritual mentor (the Father) to control the pieces and to prevent being bitten and wounded terribly. As the child gets older, and stronger in the occult, they are eventually able to demonically control and move the pieces on the board. They also learn to move and control the much more difficult black pieces in the same manner.

The winner of the game is allowed to ask the board for the answer to a question. If white wins, the answer will be written in black on the king's square; if black wins, the answer is written in shining silver on the black king's square. The monarchs of Europe often played this form of chess in order to get answers as to which battle strategy would be best to use, or to get "inside" information on their enemies. A true "chess master" is actually an ascended master who is able to win frequently at this form of chess.

The occultic form of chess is one reason why there is a chessboard in the Alice in Wonderland books; the game is actually based on a demonic game being played.

Torture Training

The Jesuits are considered the "best" (or, worst would be a better adjective) torturers in the world. They were the ones who conducted the Inquisition (Torquemada was an infamous "interrogator") and they refined the art of torture throughout the centuries. All Jesuits undergo training from infancy on in how to torture and interrogate others.

The lower levels of all Jesuit monasteries, and the Vatican, contain rooms that are literal dungeons, with torture instruments that range from medieval (such as racks, water wheels – a favorite of the Fathers), pincers, and iron maidens, as well as every variety of whip (including those with small stones and razors attached), to more modern equipment.

The Jesuits are infamous for their ability to keep individuals they wish to make examples of alive for weeks while undergoing torture such as having the skin peeled off and reattached; having digits removed, blinding the victim with hot pokers, needles or other instruments; doing "dental work" without anesthesia; electroshock, paralysis and suffocation, burning digits and working inwards, and other methods. They have very sophisticated medical equipment on hand, and will insert I.V.s and use other methods to prevent dehydration; and will give a variety of medications to either enhance and prolong pain, or to resuscitate the victim.

The toddler is forced to learn to do all of these things, and others. If they hesitate or refuse, the toddler is tortured in the same way they were asked to torture another, until under great pain, they finally agree. The victims they learn on are often homeless adults at first, or traitors; the child is taught that these tortures are what happen to those who betray the Order, or try to leave it.

A favorite form of torture at the monasteries is actual crucifixions; the "traitors" are nailed to crosses, and slowly suffocate and dehydrate over a period of three to four days. The Jesuit classes are marched by at intervals to watch the result; the individuals always lose their bodily control during the first day, and their minds by the second. It is a terrible sight to see the incoherent screams and begging for mercy by the last day or two, and it makes an unforgettable impression on the young Jesuits in training. They rapidly decide that being a "traitor" is something that they never want to experience.

The toddler is at first awkward with knives, but during early childhood, with instruction by the Jesuit Fathers, they become quite skilled at using a knife for torture and/or slaughter. Important rituals are "practiced" ahead of time to ensure that the children are all able to fulfill their roles without hesitation and perform perfectly. The slightest error is not tolerated in these settings.

F. Anti-Christian Programming

The Jesuit Fathers create innumerable setups to ensure that the young child will learn to hate and fear the real Jesus of Christianity. These setups can include the following:

· The child runs away when very young, because the gates to the monastery are "miraculously" left open. Eager to escape their torture and abuse, they run down the road. There is a house to the right, and in front is a kindly, smiling figure in a white robe who introduces himself as "Jesus." He invites the child in for a meal and “safety” from the “bad Fathers.” The child accepts the invitation and once inside the house, is locked in and terribly sexually abused and tortured for several days. The child finally “finds” an opportunity to escape and is found by a Father as they run back to the monastery, which is better than what they experienced in the “Mansion with many rooms” that the false “Jesus” lives in.

· When a bit older, the child may be taken to a monastery near the coast of Ireland, where there are numerous caves. While there, they meet a shepherd in a white robe with a flock of sheep; the shepherd has a staff, and introduces himself to the child as Jesus. Others with him are the disciples. “Jesus” ties the child to himself with a rope, and takes the child into different caves, where sexual abuse occurs. The false Jesus and disciples also practice bestiality, torture the child, hit the child with the shepherd’s staff, all the while reciting scriptures about the “Good shepherd and His sheep,” “Let the little children come unto me” (when sexual abuse occurs), “My sheep hear my voice,” (the child is beaten), and other shepherd scriptures, from the “rod and staff comfort me,” to “entering the gate.”

· Theta, or dark spiritual parts, are taught that “Jesus smells.” At some point, the child is taken to the shore of the ocean, where there is a boat filled with very rotten fish. A false “Jesus” who smells like the fish, and his “disciples” grab the child and take them retching out onto the water in the boat, declaring that they are “fishers of men” and will make the child one as well. In the ocean is a rotting corpse which they “fish out.” The memory of the smell will make these parts of the child feel ill for days, and they come to equate Jesus and Christians with this smell. When they come out, they cannot come near the Christian presenters without smelling this foul smell, until the memory is worked through.

· Numerous “Witch Trials” are set up starting during the toddler years, when spiritual parts are brought before a jury of “Christians” who condemn them for witchcraft, and consign them to death by burning at the stake. A Jesuit Father “rescues” the young witch or mage from “death” and the part is left with a deep hatred for Christians.

· Spiritual parts go before a false representation of “God” on his “throne” where they are judged and sent to “hell”. Again, this reinforces hatred for the Christian God in the darker spiritual parts. In these scenarios, “satan” will come and rescue the child from “hell.”

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

Working with internal pantheons
August 28, 2018
In "healing"

Why Getting Memories Back Can Be Difficult
August 19, 2018
In "healing"

Book Part 7
November 18, 2021
In "healing"

Amie Martineau 4:09 am on December 27, 2021

Since you yourself were a Jesuit for a time then you probably have seen Althea the tree? And when talking about the beast on the throne, isn't satan a spirit only? you talk as if anyone could just walk into this room and see Satan sitting on the throne… Are these illusions that the children are seeing? this is pretty insane for me to believe… Can we not have a first hand account from you yourself who was in fact a Jesuit? And every jesuit who is an actual Jesuit has undergone this kind of programming/training? I'm trying to understand and I'm trying to not disbelieve you but a tree in some old churches basement that gets daily sacrifices to eat… Who people have heard moaning… Yet has never been talked about or discovered is very hard to believe… And I guess I don't understand the need for all this graphic detail in programming when 99% of the population has never even and will never even undergo something such as this… What is the point in all this over the top detail when you've never even detailed your own childhood abuse and when I say detail I mean extreme detail you have not gone into any of that in anything that you have ever written… Brice Taylor a.k.a. Susan Ford has Cathy Phillips went into great detail about her abuse when she was a child… I just feel like you've written about this for so long and you say you are a born-again Christian so why wouldn't you start writing about Jesus and the love he has and the promise he has because I feel like writing these things about the illuminati just distracts, confuses and takes away from the real reason mankind is on this earth.. I just feel like you have a written and rewritten the same things over and over again and I also feel like you don't have a lot of time left on this earth so what difference does it make? why not spread the gospel instead of spreading things that a lot of people will never believe anyway? I feel like you don't want to back(or have been silent by your choice) other survivors who have written books.. you may have mentioned survivors in articles that you've written but I feel you never back any of them or give a so-called "shout out' in believing anything these other survivors have said… Now maybe your training and your programming was different but when I wrote you an email a year or so ago telling you that I discovered this "svali is a fraud" website(with quite an abundance of information) you didn't want to defend anything or prove anything and you may not think you need to but some people might and you have put yourself out there for so long some of us may think you owe a little bit of that defending to us… And every time you write something new on your blog it's never never never about the goodness and the truth and the love of Jesus Christ I mean I would think you would WANT to give him a little bit more credit because of where you are today because if it wasn't for him you wouldn't be where you are today according to you? Yet you never speak of him and we are not to be ashamed not that I'm saying you are ashamed but we're to talk of him encourage one another through the gospel and be the salt of the earth which I feel like you have not been doing at all… You have expressed your faith but that's it and I'm becoming profoundly disillusioned and heartbroken from you because every now and then when I go to your blog I would just like to see something positive and uplifting about the Lord who saved your life but it's nothing but torture and programming and bullshit and some stupid tree that's alive in some old town Rome church basement I'm sorry and please forgive me for my harsh criticism but I just think in this day and age we are to be witnessing to the lost souls of this world not rehashing accounts of torture and mind control constantly because that I feel takes away from the importance of who God is and the importance of what our job is as born-again Christian to witness to the lost souls because in the end it's not gonna matter about some tree in the basement that's evil

★ Like

restitsa 8:14 am on January 22, 2022

Trigger Warning! Many Mk Ultra victims come to Russia to their deaths because Russia openly ruled by satanists. Please share this warning — many people believe their corrupted media and come there and be killed.

https://livemanaworldwide.org/the-imagination-podcast-victoria-mortis-the-truth-about-russia/

★ Like

Rita 1:29 pm on January 24, 2022

Svali dearest. Please know that you are much loved. With all my heart I know you are much loved. I know this because I know I am much loved too. I know I did nothing to earn or deserve that love. It is the mercy and grace of almighty God that brings us out of darkness and into the light. THANK YOU for sharing what you share. It will help people like me, help others. The battle is for the soul. Truth and light are our shield and buckler. THANK YOU for sharing your truth. God loves when we share the truth– He blesses this. Stay safe my beloved sister. ~Rita

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Book Part 7 Interview →

Blog at WordPress.com.

svalispeaksagain 10:20 pm on November 18, 2021

Tags: dissociation (30), Jesuit (10), mind control (69), programming (60), ritual abuse (65), SRA (45), Vatican (10)

Book Part 7

Trigger warning: this post contains graphic descriptions of programming and methods

Assassin Training (ages 2-4)

The early assassin training is continued during the second year of life. The parts that will do physical assassinations are taught to wring the necks of kittens and other small animals.

During the second half of this year the toddler will undergo the extremely cruel training to kill that Mengele developed. The child will be placed in a cage with other children the same age (there are thirteen cages in all, with six on the bottom, four in the middle, two above and one at the very top.

The children in the bottom six cages undergo terrible abuse. The children above urinate and defecate on them, since they are at the bottom. They are also painfully raped frequently, and are not given any food or water. It is a type of “hell” for a small child. Once a day the toddler is taken out, and a kitten is placed in front of them. Mengele then would give the order, “Papa says ‘Kill’”. They are expected to instantly snap the neck. If there is the slightest hesitation, or the child refuses, they are placed back in the bottom row of cages, where the terrible deprivation and abuse occur.

The next day, the child is given another chance. The children that survive learn to instantly and without thinking obey the order. If they do, then Mengele would hold the child in his lap; tell them what a good job they did, and give them a treat.

After two weeks, the child will be either on the top two rows, or dead. By then, Mengele would spend significant time praising the child, bonding with them, for doing such a “good job.” The animals to be killed were placed in the center of a red circle, and they become bigger. Finally, a small infant is placed in the center of the red circle, the child is given a knife, and the command is given. If the child refuses, they are placed back in the bottom row of cages, and the training begins all over again until they obey or die.

Follow

This is a primary assassin code: “Papa says kill” and is used by all Jesuit Fathers and top trainers as well.

Traveling the Dimensions

As part of their mage training, the toddler is taught to begin to travel in the spiritual realm. Before age 24 months, they will have learned to travel to the First Dimension. Dimensional travel usually involves theta parts which have never had contact with the outside world other than during their first creation in a black room. These parts are taught to leave the body through the application of intense torture (electroshock, burning, skin peeling, cutting with razors, beating, flagellation, smothering, heart stoppage, freezing, burning or other types of trauma).

The First Dimension

Once the part can leave the body, they are accompanied by an older spiritual mentor, who travels with them to the first dimension. This dimension is described in the Alice in Wonderland books (Lewis Carroll was an infamous occultist, and his books actually describe the demonic realms). In the first dimension, plants and flowers talk, and the young child is fascinated by the seeming beauty of the landscape at first glance. They are initially unaware of the dangers, but quickly learn: the flowers will try and grab the child and hold the child against their will; or will beat upon or even try to bite the child. Oversized bees and insects also come, and can cause great pain.

The child traveling will cry out for help, and will be “rescued” by their spiritual mentor, who will take them back to Gaia (the physical world we inhabit here; that is the name for this dimension).

The controllers for the First dimension are a large cat (the “Cheshire cat” in the Alice books);a large, demonic caterpillar that can sting with ferocity, and the white rabbit. These beings are actually demons that have been trapped in the dimension; they cannot leave it, but try to entice humans to visit them in order to ensnare their souls.

The Second Dimension

The second dimension is fire, and is inhabited by Vulcan. It is very hot, and the dimension is much like entering into an underworld with hot lava streams and fires. The child and their mentor travels, enduring being chased by fire lizards and other creatures, until they meet up with Vulcan.

Other Dimensions

The other dimensions include:

- a dimension of extreme cold and ice, overseen by a demonic “ice queen”
- a “reverse world” where everything is reversed, causing extreme disorientation
- an underwater dimension overseen by neptune
- a dimension of extreme dark and nightmares, overseen by Charymedes (god of insanity and chaos) with harpies that chase the child and attempt to kill them:
- a dimension (the 12th) of electricity charges, overseen by Electra

Each being that rules a dimension will always ask for a sacrifice of some kind from the child, in order for the child to be allowed to return to Gaia. At first, the sacrifices might be “the screams of someone being tortured” or for the child to undergo torture themselves. As the child goes to the higher dimensions, with worlds inhabited by beings such as Charymedes, the sacrifices become much more difficult, and can include betraying the person the child loves most, or killing someone the child cares for, including their spiritual mentor(s).

Traveling the dimensions is considered a primary part of mage training; a mage does not become an ascended master until they have traveled to the 12^{th} dimension, or the 13^{th} (travel to these dimensions involves being put to death for several minutes).

Helping the survivor

The early childhood traumas will be very difficult for the presentation to accept, especially because of the deep denial and guilt that will be programmed in. If the survivor does begin to recover these memories, their punishment programming will immediately begin kicking in (see following section for further details).

Jesuits are always international, highly trained assassins and information gatherers, and the grieving will be tremendous. This is when they will need outside support, to vent the anger and grieving over the abuse and manipulations, and to hear that the Lord can forgive what they were forced to do from a very young age.

The survivor may cry out as Jeremiah did, “Why did I come forth from the womb to see labor and sorrow, That my days should be consumed with shame?:(Jer.20:18). It can help them to understand that the Lord really does understand their grieving and pain, that He took that on the cross for them, and paid the price for every death they were forced to participate in.

It can help the presentation to remind them that when they came to Jesus, while THEY were unaware of the back parts and their deeds, Jesus knew all along – and forgave them, too; that this information doesn’t surprise Him. His love doesn’t change just because the survivor remembers what they formerly didn’t.

As they attempt to break bonds with their early abusers, they will run headlong into feelings of abandonment and being alone, which are meant to prevent their fully leaving. Leaving will mean giving up all of their deepest unconscious relationships, the ones formed during these earliest (amnesic) years that have been wiped out from conscious memory.

It can help the survivor to understand that the Lord can fill their attachment pain, and stand in the place of father and mother to these young parts:

Ps.68:5. “A father of the fatherless, a defender of widows, is God in His holy habitation.”

Isaiah 66:13. “As one whom his mother comforts, So I will comfort you; And you shall be comforted in Jerusalem.”

It can be difficult for the presentation that came into therapy to realize that THEY are not the true “host” (which is placed behind an amnesic barrier). The real “host” the first three years of life will be Jesuit, will have a Jesuit name, and will carry the memories of the first three years that are wiped out when the child undergoes amnesia programming at age three prior to being placed within their host families.

The child at that age will have agreed willingly to forget the Fathers that they love in order to protect them; the presentation must be able to grieve this loss of their early childhood memories, and supported in dealing with the very painful betrayals and loyalty programming that will come up if the true host does ever present in therapy.

D. Punisher Training

An important part of a Jesuit system is the punishers. These punishers are modeled after people and spiritual beings the infant and child have seen portrayed by actors and in VR from earliest infancy. The beings (actirs) come to the infant's crib, talk to him or her, and tie themselves to the infant with a slender cord, as they teach the infant how the being talks and acts. This becomes internalized, along with the demonic spirit they impart.

The head of the punishment systems for Jesuits are in several layers. In the false Christian layer, these will include a false Jesus (head punisher), a false God, and a false Holy spirit. These parts, who are actually sabotagers and punishers, explain why the presentation can be very "Christian" and yet not be actually listening to the Christian God; instead, their conscience, which is Jesuit-trained, will believe that they must obey "God" and they may be completely misled into actually obeying the group and its directives and feel extremely guilty and even think they will "go to hell" if they disobey.

They will not know that these are Jesuit directives, however; they will believe that "God" is "telling them to stay with their husband (handler)" or that they must "honor their Father and Mother (cult parents)", etc. They will feel very "Christian" and "peaceful" when they obey these directives, and feel guilt, confusion and anxiety when they disobey, until the programming is broken and they can differentiate between the Lord and the false god placed within.

Core Level punishers will include Vulcan and Prometheus, and the main reprogramming system will be named Saturn (due to the numerous rings and levels of the punishments).

Internal Hell Punishment

The foundation of a Jesuit punishment system will be the deeply ingrained belief, from the core outwards, that the systems must not be allowed to descend and thus enter into the punishments of "hell." Since earliest infancy, and deep into the subconscious and unconscious, this fear of descending (through disobedience to the order's directives, or to the pantheon) is inculcated. All core controllers for all systems will unconsciously believe that the punishments are "good" since they are keeping the systems and core from "going to hell" or descending into a mortal state. The pain of the programming (re-experiencing) is seen as "proof" that the systems are descending, since ascended systems "do not feel pain" in the programming scripts.

This will be translated in the presentation into a deep fear of angering God, and an unusual ability to "hear from the Lord" and "hear His direction" which is actually listening to the false god planted inside in order to prevent experiencing the excruciating pain that will result if they disobey. The presentation may experience severe guilt at the thought of the smallest infraction, or fear going to hell for even slight errors, due to the unconscious pain of this programming.

Vulcan

Vulcan is the primary core level punisher, and has an anvil that is used to literally pound the primary system core splits with (ensuring that the resulting pain and trauma go throughout the system being punished). If he fails in his duty, a large black bird swoops down on him, tearing out his liver and entrails and eats them. This is based upon primary infant traumas that involve the Jesuit Fathers bringing a bird into the infant's crib, and allowing its talons to tear at the infant. The traumatized infant retains this memory, which is built upon over the years.

Often this is reinforced with virtual reality, with a highly realistic predatory bird swooping down and piercing the bowels. Physical needles and knives are used for the initial traumatic pain, which is accessed and re-experienced over the years.

Vulcan is taught to punish the systems, and even the core, for severe disobedience and/or betrayal. The worst type of disobedience includes failure to maintain contact with the Fathers or their representatives, and trying to leave the Order. To the Jesuits, an individual attempting to leave is considered a traitor of the highest degree. They are actually considered "insane" since only insanity, to their thinking, could cause a person to take the path to descension, feeling the body and mortality, and giving up what they consider "godhood" and choosing to "go to hell." The members of the Order literally believe that the person choosing to leave is straight on the path to hell, and they will do anything to try and "save" them from this path.

This "salvation" can and will include extreme torture and reprogramming, in order to put the person "back on the right path." They believe that these measures are needed to bring the person to their "senses."

Helping the Survivor

The internal punishers and master controllers will also hold these beliefs, unless they can be reached and worked with. They will torture the person into literal insanity and/or death, believing that they are "helping" to "redeem" the "errant" person.

The hell punishers and system punishers themselves will be in agreement with the tortures, since as a child, they were taught to punish severely "traitors" and those who "disobeyed" with these same tortures. They internalized the beliefs of the Jesuit Fathers, and so were in agreement with inflicting this type of pain upon others, first externally, and then internally. They believe they are doing a "good" thing.

As the survivor remembers doing these things, they will feel immense guilt, and believe that they "deserve" these punishments because of what an "evil" person they are. They must be shown that Yeshua paid the full price for their sins, and that they and their systems can never do restitution for their deeds. This can help to break the cycle of guilt, penance and pain that has been set up since infancy.

Meditation on scriptures regarding forgiveness, the love of God, and listening to worship music that underscores the forgiving heart of God can be helpful in understanding this, since music can reach the "right brain" and bypass the faulty logic the Jesuits installed.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

The different types of SRA and Mind Control
January 29, 2019
In "mind control"

Early Splits and Theta programming
June 5, 2017
In "mind control"

Interview
February 14, 2022
In "healing"

Amie Martineau 8:47 pm on November 20, 2021

This is so hard for me to wrap my head around. I can't imagine any therapist that has had training in order to help people with programming like this? And also, how many people if you could guess I've had this sort of programming? I would think this sort of programming would be reserved for people that are going to be placed in political power or high corporate power?

★ Liked by 1 person

svalispeaksagain 7:57 pm on November 22, 2021

There are very few therapists that I know of who try to help with this type of thing; and most of the journey is often the survivor's. I can only speak about those in the order I was born in; most in this order go through this. In the 12 occultic societies, the programming is a bit different.

★ Like

Amie Martineau 8:49 pm on November 20, 2021

have had this sort of programming not I've had...lol sorry

★ Like

Amber 6:41 am on December 9, 2021

Still praying for you.

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Exposing the Vatican: Part 6

Book Part 8 →

Blog at WordPress.com.

Svali Speaks!

The Life of Svali – an Ex-Illuminati Mind Control Programmer

Part 3: How the Illuminati runs Hollywood

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: I would think that California would be one of the major 'turfs' of the Illuminati, and I'm thinking specifically Hollywood. What's your inside on this, in regards to film making, symbology, subliminals, the whole scene in general?

A: Oh, boy, do you have a few hours? I'll try to be brief. The Illuminati believethat to control the media is to control the public. This is one of their stated agendas. Remember, finances, media, law, government and education are the areas they targeted as being the best to dominate society.

How do they do this? They don't go to a film producer and say, "Oh, by the way, we're Illuminati members and we want you to make a movie that promotes our agenda". (Remember, they aren't stupid, either). Instead, they will form a small investment corporation that funds movies with ideas that they like. They quietly hire actors and producers and directors and scripts, but they never mention their affiliation publicly or why they are doing this.

Money talks, and especially in Hollywood. If you have money, you can get about anything made, and they know this. They can also channel money intoadvertising campaigns, etc. for their films (how many Christian films have had major ad campaigns in the past twenty years? Very few. How many occult movies have? I rest my case).

This has been a slow, subtle process because they are patient. They have been working behind the scenes for hundreds of years, and they know that the public is slow to accept new ideas, that it has to be done gradually. (They call it leading in the "sheep" which is one of their terms for the "unenlightened"). And it has been. The number of occult films that has come out in the past ten years alone should make anyone pause and think.

Why so many films with this theme? Why the desensitization of America's youth to the occult and magic? Just look at Saturday morning cartoons. I don't allow my children to watch them, except for "animaniacs" and Bugs Bunny at times. Instead, we rent old classics with Audrey Hepburn and John Wayne. I can send you some articles that did an excellent job of investigating Walt Disney (he was an Privacy & Cookies: This site uses cookies. By continuing to use this website, you

Close and accept

Search

Categories

- Interview with Svali – The Illuminati in America
- Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali
- Multiple Personalities – Brokenness
- Other Authors
- Other Illuminati Articles by Svali
- Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali
- Svali Answers Questions
- Svali's Personal Life
- The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People

Betrayal programming brain wave programming color programming Complex Polyfragmentation cult Cult Abuse Cult Safety Cult Secrecy Denial Programming DID dissociation end times Illuminati plan end times scenario Escaping from the Cult government programming Having needs Healing from Ritual Abuse Hiding from the Cult History of Ritual Abuse Illuminati bankers Illuminati jobs jewel agree to their use.

To find out more, including how to control cookies, see here: Cookie Policy
Close and accept and the core were so blatant, it wasn't funny. Fight Club: I love Brad Pitt and Ed Norton, and this film is a nod at the covert military buildup going on that the average person doesn't realize. Also, Ed is dissociative in the film, as Pitt's character takes over (notice that the cult-creating military figure is the "stronger" one in the story?).

The Labyrinth: I haven't seen this, but my husband did, and everything he mentioned is pure Illuminati programming stories used with children. Any movies with an occult viewpoint, or that show supernatural psychic phenomena, astral travel, or contact with the spirit world are guaranteed to be part of this agenda. I don't watch them, myself. Saw enough of the real thing to last me this lifetime.

The sensationalization of rituals and other occult insignia on television is another example. Ghost stories. Witch stories. Children's books about Wizards and their training that are extremely popular.

Oh, yes, Starship Trooper. This one had so many cult symbols (the Illumnists have a strong Aryan ideology going, too) that I almost laughed outright when I saw it. I counted at least 100 in it. Someone had fun going tongue-in-cheek with the Illuminist agenda in that one.

Many fine actors and actresses are being used in films funded by these people. Some may know the agenda, most probably do not, as long as they receive a pay check. Some are also Illuminists as well, although I don't know who is. I do know a few, but I don't want to risk a libel suit here.

Anyway, I was too busy training and going to meetings and learning the effects of drugs on people to pay much attention to that part of the group when I was in it, sorry, I don't have lots of famous names in my memories. I lived a very relatively boring life as a teacher and head trainer, and we rarely discussed the media except the fact that it, too, was another tool to bring in "The New Order", which is the motivation for all Illuminists.

I want to address another misconception. That is, the one that the Illuminists know that they are evil. When I was in the group, I and those around me were idealogically committed to the agenda as being GOOD. I thought I was helping others reach their full potential when I was a trainer.

I believed that after years of sweat and hard work, that my intelligence won out, and that I made an excellent leader. I fought Jonathan and others on the council when I thought they were unfair, and stood up for the people beneath me. Others did the same. They honestly think they are doing a GOOD thing, and if you told them it was wrong, or evil, they would look confused.

It took a LOT of therapy and deprogramming myself, doing reality checks with noncult people to realize that it was all a lie. I was devastated. I had dedicated my life to helping others bring in the glorious new order, and then found out it was EVIL and abusive. I went through a period of intense grieving/mourning over this.

Most Illuminists I knew weren't evil, they were deceived. Only the top leadership perhaps were consciously being hurtful.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 2: Who and What is the Illuminati?

September 12, 2008 by koniword

> Q: Does it bother you to write about this?

...mming
...D
Origin of the Illuminati programming programming techniques Reaccessing of the Survivor Remembering Abuse Ritual Abuse Roots of the Illuminati Shell Programming Spiritual Abuse Spiritual Programming suicidal programming Survivors of Ritual Abuse Svali is Alive Svali is dead Svali is missing Svali is Safe Svali poem Svali questions techniques Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse Therapists VR programming

A: It doesn't upset me to write on the topic of the Illuminati, I was explaining why I write under a pen name, that is all. I received a letter recently in which it was alleged that I write under a pen name because I'm a phony, which is not true at all. I am a freelance writer on the side (I write for nursing magazines and publications on health topics that have NOTHING to do with abuse) and understand the need for fact checking, so no offense is taken at your wanting to know my background. In fact, it shows you are a responsible editor, which I admire. I have nothing to hide. My story is 100% true.

I have gained no money for disclosing; I do NOT go on talk shows, I am unknown and prefer it this way. I have absolutely no secondary gain from doing this, other than the medical bills for my children, which means I work three part-time jobs. This is to answer the skeptics who say that people disclose for: sympathy (I don't want any and don't need it. I made choices and mistakes in my life, and am now involved in restitution); money (I earn $20 a MONTH for my site on Suite 101. I earn $150 to $250 an article when I write on Women's health. Guess which topic I write on more frequently? Yep. Women's health, on completely non-abuse issues. The editors of the Nursing magazines and women's magazines don't know about the other topic I write on, another reason I write under a pen name.) I don't write for fame. Instead, if my co-workers knew about my past, I risk losing my job. I have everything to lose by disclosing, everything to gain by being silent.

But I also know that this kind of child abuse must be stopped. As a Christian, and as one who stands against child abuse, I have decided to speak out against cult abuse by writing articles that expose it. I also know that there are a number of people outspoken on this topic who have published, and they could possibly be back-up information for you. I don't know any of them, since I have no contact with other survivors other than my own family, but it is a possibility.

Anyway, to your questions:

Q: S*vali, I think our readers are wondering 'Is the Illuminati a religion, secret society, satanism or is it a combination of it, or something different all together, or more sinister?*

A: The Illuminati is a group that practices a form of faith known as "enlightenment". It is Luciferian, and they teach their followers that their roots go back to the ancient mystery religions of Babylon, Egypt, and Celtic druidism. They have taken what they consider the "best" of each, the foundational practices, and joined them together into a strongly occult discipline. Many groups at the local level worship ancient deities such as "El", "Baal", and "Ashtarte", as well as "Isis and Osiris" and "Set".

This said, the leadership councils at times scoff at the more "primitive" practices of the anarchical, or lower levels. I remember when I was on council in San Diego, they called the high priests and priestesses the "slicers and dicers", who kept the "lower levels happy". This is not to offend anyone, it only shows that at the leadership levels,they often believe they are more scientifically and cognitively driven. But they still practice the principles of enlightenment.

There are 12 steps to this, also known as "the 12 steps of discipline' and they also teach traveling astral planes, time travel, and other metaphysical phenomena. Do people really do this, or is it a drug induced hallucination ? I cannot judge. I saw things that I believe cannot be rationally explained when in this group, things that frightened me, but I can only say that it could be a combination of cult mind control, drug inductions, hypnosis, and some true demonic activity. How much of each, I cannot begin to guess. I do know that these people teach and practice evil.

At the higher levels, the group is no longer people in robes chanting in front of bonfires. Leadership councils have administrators who handle finances (and trust me, this group makes money. That alone would keep it going even if the rest were just religious hog wash). The leadership levels include businessmen, bankers, and local community leaders. They are intelligent, well educated, and active in their churches.Above local leadership councils are the regional councils, who give dictates to the groups below them, help form the policies and agendas for each region, and who interact with the local leadership councils.

At the national level, there are extremely wealthy people who finance these goals and interact with the leaders of other countries. The Illuminati are international. Secret? By all means. The first thing a child learns from "family, or the Order" as they are called, is "The first rule of the Order is secrecy". This is why you don't hear from more survivors who get out. The lengths that this group goes to, to terrify its members into not disclosing, is unbelievable. I have seen set ups (oh, yes, they set up fake deaths, etc.) where a person was "burned alive" to teach the children not to tell. They are told that this is a traitor, who disclosed,and now he is being punished. (The person wasn't really a traitor, and is in a flame proof vest, but the vision of a person on fire and screaming remains with 3 and 4 year old children for a lifetime). And, when they are adults, even if they DO leave, scenes such as this mean they won't tell many people for fear of being traced and punished.

Because I helped create a lot of set ups as an adult trainer, I became somewhat cynical, and have chosen to disclose as a result. Although I do fight intense fear even now at times. Try being buried in a wooden box for a period of time (it may have been minutes, but to a four year old it is an eternity), and then when the lid is lifted, being told, "if you ever tell, we'll put you back in forever". The child will scream hysterically that they will NEVER EVER tell. I was that child, and now I am breaking that vow made under psychological duress. Because I don't want any other children to go through what I did, or have seen done to others. Yes, the Illuminati are organized, secretive, and extremely wealthy at its upper levels. They are not stupid, or poor people running around dabbling with witchcraft. To see them as this is a huge misconception.

Q: How widespread would you say this group has infiltrated our society in terms of number of people? Are they present in every town or city throughout North America? Do they take or recruit outsiders? And how far does this group go to keep this knowledge secret?

A: I think I answered some of the secrecy above. The Illuminati are present in every major metropolitan center in the United States. They have divided the United States up into 7 major regions, and each has a regional council over it, with the heads of the local councils reporting to them. They meet once every two months, and on special occasions.

A metropolitan region may have as many as 10 to 30 groups within it, and rural areas will often have meetings with other local groups, and report to the metro leadership council. They almost NEVER recruit outsiders, although ocassionally they will buy children or a family from Asia, for example, and keep them under constant surveillance in return for saving their life from the local Mafia. They are threatened with being returned to this group if they ever disclose.

They also have excellent lawyers who are well paid to help cover their tracks. There are also people in the media paid to help keep stories from coming out. I know of three people in San Diego who worked for the Union Tribune who were faithful Illuminists, and who also wrote frequent articles attacking local therapists who worked with RA (Ritual Abuse) [or SRA, Satanic Ritual Abuse] survivors. I remember leadership boasting they had "run so-and-so out of town" because of a media blitz, and being quite happy about it.

The Illuminati believe in controlling an area through its:

1. Banks and financial institutions (guess how many sit on banking boards? You'd be surprised)
2. Local government: guess how many get elected to local city councils?
3. Law: children are encouraged to go to law school and medical school.
4. Media:others are encouraged to go to journalism school, and members help fund local papers .

Q: Is this the same Illuminati that was created by Adam Weishaupt in Germany?

A: Weishaupt did not create the Illuminati, they chose him as a figurehead and told him what to write about. The financiers, dating back to the bankers during the times of the Templar Knights who financed the early kings in Europe, created the Illuminati. Weishaupt was their "go fer", who did their bidding.

Q: Do you have anymore info about the political goals, if any, of the Illuminati?

A: This article I wrote for Suite101.com addresses it: "Are the Illuminati taking over the world?" You can reprint it, or part of it, as long as you give credit to Suite 101 and/or a link back to the site.

Q: How do Illuminati members recognise each other?

A: Since it is generational, its easy. It isn't hard to recognize one's father, mother, siblings, and neighbors and friends one has grown up with. The Illuminati use telephone trees to contact members when a meeting is to occur. A month or two ahead of time, leadership council plans dates and places for meetings for different groups under their umbrella. They then call local leaders a week ahead of time (the high priest or priestess). Two days ahead, these people call their head members, who then call the people under them. A person knows their status in the group by how far ahead of time they know a meeting date. The lower in the group, the less they are trusted with information, and the less "lag time" before meetings.

Sometimes, certain pieces of jewelry, such as a ruby ring or an oval emerald, might be worn if meeting someone in a public place at a prearranged assignation. But most accessing and contact is done through family members or close friends.

When I lived in San Diego, my entire family of origin and my four closest friends were all members of the group. It wasn't hard to reach me, to say the least. My spouse was also a member. The Illuminati believe in arranged members, and do NOT allow their members to marry a nonmember. If someone says their spouse isn't in it, they aren't Illuminati, or they are in denial. This was an unbreakable policy.

> My marriage was arranged by the local leadership council to another ranking member. I didn't want to marry him, because I didn't love him, and I will never forget what I was told by Athena, my mentor at the time (she held the second position on the council): "That's for the best, then, because he can never hurt you or control you." Or, my mother's timeless advice given when I was 12 years old: "Never fu– someone lower than you. They will drag you down. Always choose someone higher than yourself."
>
> She was an ambitious woman, to say the least, determined that I would do well in this very political group. I took her advice, and Athena was my lover and protected me from some of the SOBs on leadership in San Diego especially Jonathan, the head trainer. She taught me his weaknesses and how to get around him, and stood up to him for me. I wouldn't have survived otherwise.
>
> These are NOT nice people and they use and manipulate others viciously.They cut their eye teeth on status, power, and money. I have given all of that up to leave, and am glad to be away from it now, although I do miss some of my friends, and at times I miss the respect of being a leader. But I am learning to live a whole new life without the constant background of "family" monitoring and telling me what to do.
>
> Know what the hardest part of getting out was? The freedom. Not having anyone telling me what to do. I literally went through a period of adjustment, felt wobbly, trying to figure out what I wanted to do. It was hard, since I was used to reflexively checking my decisions with leadership and Jonathan and my husband. Freedom can be difficult, believe it or not, and took quite a period of time to adjust to. I believe that the inability to deal with it often draws people back in. I hope this information is useful to you.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 1: About Svali

September 12, 2008 by koniword

HJ Springer, Editor of CentrExNews.com, penned the following introductory remarks to this revealing ten part interview with Svali. Our gratitude to 'Svali' for bringing this information forward and HJ Springer for running the story. You can read many more articles by Svali and examine her self pubished book at http://www.suite101.com/ . Every thinking person on this planet needs to become educated about the Illuminati takeover agenda; otherwise their life and the lives their children will suffer the ultimate price for their inattention, ignorance, and inaction…Update Nov. 2004: CentrExNews.com vanished from the internet somewhere around 2003. Ken Adachi]

While running our series 'The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People' we received a few emails that were of a somewhat skeptical nature and/or requesting more information. Needless to say, I had some questions of my own regarding some details of the Illuminati and their agenda, and so I got in touch with 'Svali' (her pseudonym), an Ex-Illuminati Programmer/Trainer, to find out more about her claims. In the following few episodes I will enlighten you (pardon the pun), as much as I can, with additional knowledge I received from her. Our correspondence took place in the form of an email interview, which I left mainly intact. I only edited it for spelling and punctuation; minus some personal information addressed to me. Should you have any additional questions you would like to ask Svali, please email me at centrex@looksmart.com and I will forward them to her for a possible future article. Following is the first part of our interview.

HJ Springer chief editor

Part 1: About Svali

Dear Mr. Springer,

Thank you for contacting me. Actually, I just received a somewhat skeptical email today from someone who read the information at your site. I would be more than happy to answer questions about validity, etc. with the following provision. I write under a pen name to protect my two children and husband, whom I do not want to have receiving hostile or threatening phone calls, etc. My two children are still healing from the experiences of being raised in the group as well, and I don't want any experiences that could traumatize them.

The topic I am addressing is somewhat volatile, to say the least. People have strong emotions pro and con as to whether the Illuminati are real. That said, I will give you a little background info, feel free to share this with readers. Also, my column at http://www.Suite101.com (I have a column on ritual abuse; do a search on 'svali') has numerous articles on this topic if people want to learn more.

1. I was born in 1957 in Alexandria, Virginia. I lived briefly in a small town about an hour away from Washington, DC, then moved to a 500 acre farm in northern Virginia when my mother married my stepfather. Both my mother and my stepfather were members of this group. It is a very generational group. My mother sat on the regional council over the Washington, DC area and was in the "spiritual chair" (the Illuminati have 6 chairs on their ascended masters council: Sciences, Government, Leadership, Scholarship, Spiritual, and Military.)

These also correlate to the areas that children are taught growing up in this group. They believe in "well rounded" children. The "spiritual" rituals, or occult rituals, were only one small part of the teaching of this group, the other five areas are also equally emphasized. I spent more time learning history, languages, and sciences than I did seeing rituals, although they were important to the group.

2. I went to school in Charlottesville, Va. 1975 to 1981, where I received a BSN in nursing, and a BA in Spanish (I got two degrees). This is also a place where a lot intense abuse and occultic crime occurred, on an estate about 10 miles south west of Charlottesville going towards Crowley, Virginia.

3. After graduation, I went to San Diego in 1981 (I was called there by the leadership there, they were strong in military training but weak in sciences, which was my forte). I came and sat on leadership council, I was the sixth head trainer there (the lowest head trainer) and had 30 trainers in the local groups reporting to me. Leadership council met in Ramona, Ca. on an estate there that belonged to a man named Jonathan Meiers.

When I went to the police in 1996 (after I had left the group) sure enough, there was an estate there belonging to someone with that name. One of his cult names was "Black Hand" because he wore black gloves when he worked with people. He was the head trainer in the group, and one of the most sadistic and brutal people I ever knew. He burned out most of the trainers that worked with him, and I made it because I had a friend on leadership council who hated him and helped me undermine him (the Illuminati are a very political and back stabbing group, a "dog eat dog" mentality; everyone wants to move up). Her cult name was Athena.

After years (12) of working with Jonathan, I moved up to the second head trainer position in the county. Jonathan was getting ready to move to regional, and he wanted me to take his place. But he and I also despised each other, and he set me up to take a fall. That's a whole different story, and was one of the factors that made me leave the group. I left the group in 1995, sick of the lying, deceiving, and politics, and fearful for my life. I fled to Texas, and went through therapy with Dr. Jerry Mundgaze and his group. But unfortunately, they didn't know how to help "deprogram me", or as Dr. Mundgaze told me, "you are higher than almost anyone we have seen, and more programmed."

I remembered so much, and he had never heard of it and had no idea how to help (definitely no suggesting of memories there, most of mine occurred spontaneously, AT HOME. I have never been hypnotized or age regressed, all of my memories have occurred in the course of daily life).

I spent a year intensely deprogramming myself. I was a head programmer, or trainer, so I used my knowledge to undo what was done to me. I also became enraged as I realized that the abuse I had endured (and done to others) was NOT normal, was used to manipulate me, etc.

My book is based on my memories as an ADULT in this group. I was a perpetrator, and I now regret it considerably. It is my restitution before God as I expose what this group does and stands for. I also wrote it for therapists, to help them understand the group and its methodologies, since it was so difficult to hear from a nationally known ritual abuse center, "we don't know what to do…". I based it on what I did to heal.

Two years ago, my children were on visitation with me and disclosed their abuse to me. I went to CPS, and the case was closed, because the worker said she didn't believe in ritual abuse! My ex came to get the children (he could have put me in federal prison for not giving the children back, since the San Diego court system blatantly states that they do not believe in ritual abuse, and in EVERY case of alleged RA, the children are given to the allegedly abusing parent).

The children confronted him in person. He turned white as a sheet, said, "you really don't want to go back to "family", they said "no". He then fled to California, quit his job, and moved out here and is in therapy for RA and DID (Dissociative Identity Disorder). My children are also in therapy, and healing rapidly. My now 12 year old son is almost completely integrated, and happier than he has ever been before; my 16 year old daughter has some tough issues to face, such as the sexual abuse she endured. But God has been faithful in His healing work in all of our lives.

I wish that this was just "made up". That it weren't real. But it is. There is too much documentation of this occurring (I can send you an URL for documented convicted RA cases). My greatest regret is that I was used by this group, after a lifetime of teaching, to be a perpetrator of the worst kind. I used to torture and abuse others, believing that I was "helping" them.

Now, I realize that what I did was wrong, I have asked God's forgiveness. And am committed to exposing this group through my writing. I am also a professional writer in the medical field, was a registered nurse for 18+ years, and currently work as an ESL teacher, health educator, and freelance author (on non abuse topics!). I hope this is enough background info, it is the truth before God and men. If you need any other, that won't compromise my anonymity or my children's protection, please let me know.

Sincerely, Svali

PS. My younger sister remembers being tied up on a stone altar at the age of 3, with a gag in her mouth, and being raped. She also remembers our paternal grandmother taking her to friends, who used her sexually at the ages of 3 to 5. She became an alcoholic at age 13, after trying to commit suicide 7 times by age 12. My older brother has NO memories of ANYTHING AT ALL before age 20, his life is a complete blank. He does believe that our father was a perverse and strange man. This brother was cut down from our garage when he was 8, and tried to hang himself.

My oldest brother is on the run, afraid to live anywhere for more than a few months, because he believes they want to "get him." He also tried to commit suicide many times as a young child. This is somewhat corroborating evidence, as well as the fact that both of my children dream in German at night (that is the language they speak in the Illuminati) and have NEVER heard it in the daytime.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

« Newer Posts

Blog at WordPress.com. WPThemes.

svalispeaksagain 5:38 pm on October 25, 2021

Tags: healing (43), Jesuit (10), Mengele (3), mind control (69), programming (60), ritual abuse (65), Vatican (10)

Exposing the Vatican: Part 6

trigger warning: explicit discussion of programming, traumas and negative spirituality

Q'Ballah Programming

Mengele always installed the Q'Ballah in those he worked with, and he installed it into Jesuit systems as well. Althea, or the "Tree of Life" is the basis, with the three cords (white, black, grey) roots demonically entwined and going back to the systems described above. There is a primary death trauma for each of the core controllers for each of these roots.

An important part of q'ballah (black Kabbalah) programming is the creation of demonic portals. These are installed at points known as the sephiroth in the body and above it (see illustration below).
There will be death rituals, and demonic entities attached to each of these points, which become a portal or opening for demonic travel and communication. Tiferet represents the core, sits above the umblicus, and is the portal for satan himself. This is the first, or prime trauma, and this ritual involves the newborn or fetal umblicus being burned with a hot needle as the infant is put to death, then resuscitated.

Each portal (sephiroth) is installed via death trauma, and will have a portal guardian who is an ascended master from the grey (celestial)system sitting above it, who is both human and demonic. The guardians will have been heavily programmed to misrepresent their true names, due to the need for cover programming described above. These guardians supposedly "protect" the body and systems from "intrusion" by beings in the dimensions; but in reality, they are open doors to the demonic and must be closed through spiritual warfare (giving up of the demons) and by these ascended guardians accepting Yeshua and giving up their former beliefs in demonic "protection."

Helping the Survivor

Follow

The survivor will often initially be terrified at the thought of closing these portals when this comes up in therapy. This is because of extensive programming to believe that closing these portals will result in "death", "insanity" or cruel punishment by internal or external masters. They will literally believe that their safety and survival depends upon keeping these portals open, and will question how to survive closing them.

There may be parts instructed to take the other parts into the dimensions and punish parts that try to close their portals, or break this programming. The survivor may even re-experience the death traumas and agony involved in the original creation of the portals. Once the portals are closed, the survivor will be amazed at the relief, and the fact that they are indeed alive and sane. The therapist will need to help counteract the programming with truth, and develop enough trust with the survivor that they are willing to give up this method of demonic interaction.

Once the portals are closed, the survivor may experience significant warfare in retaliation for doing so. This is a time for prayer and spending time with the Lord, and calling on Yeshua for protection.

The Q'Ballah will have an extensive internal reality attached to it, including magic numbers in rooms, and the white, black or silver cords from it running throughout the systems, from top to bottom, including within the rooms that the various controllers stay in. These cords represent the core traumas associated with the creation of each part of the "three rope" cord: infant death traumas and the beliefs associated with these traumas.

There will be an extensive internal reality for the systems and their controllers, with rooms, temples and other representations of the programming that they underwent when a very young child.

More About Mengele

Mengele himself, as discussed before, worked with Jesuit infants during the 1950s and early 1960s. He also bonded these infants to himself in a manner similar to that described above for attachment bonding. His bonding was nearly always installed in the white, or cover level, for Jesuit systems. This was primarily because the Fathers wanted his programming (assassin training in infancy and early childhood) installed, but wanted to reserve the core bonding for themselves, in order to maintain their secrets even from Mengele, whom they did not fully trust. Mengele also installed his own proprietary codes into areas of the systems that he wanted to reserve loyalty to himself within.

The Jesuits also wanted their top trainers trained by Mengele. This is one reason why those with top potential worked with him in his research laboratory, and continued the research after his death.

C. Toddler Training

By the time an infant is a year old, they will have several hundred personalities in place, which have already undergone extensive foundational mind control. Spiritual controllers will have already undergone extremely painful ceremonies, such as hot needles inserted into the umbilicus; or having a long sharp needle pierced through their chest, and being gripped and raised up ("satan's claw").

The controllers for the white spiritual systems will be in place, since the infant will have internalized these through virtual reality, holograms, and dramatic enactments of the "deities" by actors. The white spiritual systems include:

• Egyptian deities
• Babylonian deities
• Ancient (pre-Babylonian) deities
• Druidic deities

These are headed up by the white, or Greek, Pantheon of twelve deities.
Each system will have specific traumas attached to it. For instance, Bel, the head of the Babylonian system, will undergo a ritual where he is pierced through with tiny golden needles throughout his body (Babylonian sun ritual). Astarte will have sexual rituals, and Ashtoth will have death rituals associated with him.

The black (Vatican) spiritual systems are also being organized and trained from 12 to 14 months after birth. These include the theta assassin systems headed by:

• Nemesis, who controls
• Phobos (theta fear and dream attacks);
• Thantos (theta death) and
• Chaos (theta insanity programming).

Extensive training is undergone, where the young child learns to control and read thoughts (Galileo training), and to attack others using the theta skills they are developing. The foundations of early Mage training are also begun (mages are the highest level in the occultic world).

The "goddess of Death" and other demonic spirits will have temples and altars dedicated to them, where regular internal sacrifices are conducted. These re-enactments represent the external realities the toddler experienced.

The toddler will be taught to enjoy the experience of killing within certain parts, either through sexual stimulation, or direct brain stimulation (of the euphoria center) following obedience.

Controller Programming

The Jesuits use extensive setups to teach the internal controllers to do their jobs during this second year of life. Typical ones involve tying several young children with ropes (normally, six) to the waist of the toddler. She is told to "mind the children" and make them obey her. The setup will consist of having candy, or beautiful objects such as glass balls, in the middle of a room. The toddler is told that the children tied to her must NOT touch the objects in the middle of the room, or they and she will be punished.

The problem is that it is very difficult for a very young child to control others. The six children tied to her waist will try to yank her around, and grab at the objects or treats. Finally, in spite of her best efforts, she will tire, and one of the children will reach the table and grab a treat.

The child is instantly killed by a Jesuit Father waiting in the wings. The two-year old must now make the other, now quite obedient, children obey her, while dragging around the body of the dead child, a reminder to this young controller of what happens when she fails in her job.

By the end of the setup, which can last for several days, all of the children tied to the now very traumatized controller will have died (the result of disobedience and her failure to “mind the children” who in hunger will reach out and try to grab food and water, which are forbidden). The extremely traumatized controller will be very committed to exacting complete obedience to those under her, to prevent their experiencing a similar fate.

All of the controllers inside (dozens) will undergo this and other training. This creates an extremely controlled system, with the internal controllers believing that even slight disobedience will result in death or shattering. This belief is based upon numerous experiential setups when the child was less then 3 years old, and it will take time to work through the terrible grief of being unable to “save” the children in the controller’s care, and the rage that this type of manipulation creates in the survivor once they realize the truth.

Master-Slave Programming (ages 2 to 5)

There is a program to training obedience when a Jesuit child is very young. In this program, they are conditioned to be slaves, and obey their Masters, the Jesuit Fathers (who are all ascended masters). They address them as “Master” and “My Lord” and their day consists of menial labor as the Fathers order.

Typical tasks might include scrubbing the stone floors of the monastery on hands and knees while the Fathers taunt the “slave”; they may even urinate on the floor the child has just spent hours cleaning, and tell the child to clean it up again.

The acolyte will learn to cook; clean; do yard work, and will obey orders without question or thought, when asked to do tasks. This is considered an important part of the early training in obedience.

The spiritual parts (thetas) are taught to respond spiritually to summons from the Fathers – instantly. Any hesitation is immediately and terribly punished (such as being hung inside a dark well). The Fathers also have golden whistles that they wear around their necks; each child is assigned a set of notes, and must respond physically and/or spiritually immediately when their notes are played.

The child is inside the walls of the monastery these first few years of life. By age 24 months, the child goes to classes, where they learn not only languages (the Fathers speak Latin and Italian in daily life, and are all fluent in numerous other languages), but also oral history and the black arts as part of their mage training.

Internally, the survivor will have “masters” (controllers) and “slaves”; slave parts are taught to instantly obey masters.

Wolf and Sheep Training

During the second year of life (12 months to 24 months) it is important to the Jesuits that high barriers are placed between the “front” or presentations, and the “back” or loyal parts. One way this is accomplished is with “wolf” and “sheep” programming.

The back, or hidden, parts are taught that they are wolves. The Jesuit Fathers raise wolves for this purpose, and will take the young child and place them in a pen with a mother wolf and her cubs.

The child will have been sprayed with wolf scent, and the mother will normally let the child join her cubs. The child is told that he or she is a wolf, and is treated exactly like one: the child nurses on the mother wolf; is fed with the cubs, and is taught to crawl on all fours, and even to growl like a wolf. They are taught that wolves are strong, cruel, fierce and protective, and that they must guard the "weaker" systems by doing the tasks that "sheep" cannot do.

Once this program is in place, the front systems undergo "sheep" training. They are placed with sheep, and eventually believe that they are lambs or sheep; eating with the sheep, sleeping curled up with the other lambs, and in every way being treated as if they are a sheep.

To place a barrier between the systems, the Fathers then cause the two systems to traumatize one another. The "wolves" are told to "attack" the sheep and to try to kill them. This causes the front to become angry and to distrust them. The wolves are also taught to hate "sheep" and believe they "stink" by having a slain lamb tied to their back for several days. The carcass becomes ridden with flies and stinks terribly; the body itches and the child becomes violently ill, and they are taught that this is the result of being close to a sheep. These parts cannot come close to front parts, that they believe are sheep, without smelling the rotten carcass that made them so ill as a very young child. This makes the back very unwilling to come near the front.

Other barriers between front and back are also installed during this second year. This includes a wall with gargoyles and demonic guardians that is erected between the front and back, which is overseen by Janus (the Roman deity with two faces). One face observes the "front" or presenting systems; the other, the back, or hidden systems. Certain parts can pass through the doors, but those without authorization are immediately torn by the demonic guardians placed between front and back. The demonic is allowed to pass freely between front and back.

In addition to these barriers, others are placed. One is an extensive "buffer" system. These have entrained neurolinguistic programming in place, and their role is to be emotionless and to stand between the front and the back, " buffering" the front from any knowledge of what the back is doing, and vice-versa. Their role is to prevent the two sides from actually meeting or communicating, and to keep the amnesia in place through constant ingrained "wipeout" programming.

This wipeout programming can consist of a combination of traumas that are re-experienced, such as internal shocks to the head, EHF and/or microwave bursts to the frontal lobes, or other similar traumas that were used to originally wipe out memories of assignments. If the survivor attempts to cross the barrier, they may experience flashing lights, blizzard, extreme headaches, eye pain, nausea, dark bursts within the deep brain, or other trauma that occurred when the barrier was originally put in.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

book part 4
September 13, 2021
In "healing"

Exposing the Vatican book: Part 4
September 30, 2021
In "healing"

Book Part 8
December 23, 2021
In "healing"

Pingback: Halloween 2021 | cathy fox blog on child abuse

MKUltra Girl 7:01 pm on October 25, 2021

Good Gaud. What you say resonates so strongly with me. I am reading It is Not Impossible right now.

And of course, I am not sure you know this, but my sister acted out the kill program in one of the earliest times for such things in our era, the early 80's. Piecing my personal story together is different because we were with our natal family the whole time. We didn't have host families and we are our parents' children. But I have evidence that my father was programmed by mengele in '49. In Quebec city in a catholic hospital run by nuns (Saint-Michel-Archange) after his "nervous breakdown" after attending 2 weeks in seminary school at St. Peter's seminary in London, ON.

I speculate that mengele tried to transfer or install his own consciousness into my father at that time. Reading one of Mengele's bogus biographies was like reading about my father. The same obsessions, likes and belief that university professors are the top of the professional heap. I believe Marshall McCluhan had something to do with my father's and maybe our training. We met him in our presentations a few times. One was in the back seat of our family sedan with Marshall McCluhan in 74 or 75 ish. I was doing a project on famous people and I picked him because my father was always talking about him. My father arranged the interview. MM was sitting beside me in the backseat btwn me and my brother and sister. My first question was, "Why are you famous?". He turned stone cold, a dark evil came over me. He said nothing. He stared straight ahead. I asked my dad for help and he just kinda laughed. That was the end of the interview. MM taught at St. Michael's college at U of Toronto, a Jesuit college. He was an awful person from what I remember.

Another odd thing about my dad was one of his pet projects- Laughter Centres. He used the Alfred E. Newman face from Mad Magazine to promote them. I now believe that Alfred E. Newman was modeled after my father. This is just another way they could exploit frequencies to enrich themselves through media and popular culture. (for me it is many of the celebs in our time and of course, EL from Stranger THings). This function of the cult is huge and all that popular culture ever was/is, IMO. Let no good psych patient go to waste. Mad Magazine (started in the auspicious year of '53).

My mother actually said she knew that Canada harboured nazis. And she NEVER said anything political or beyond the duties of wife and mother (programmed at the Allan in ’58) to completely rid her of her highly skilled ability as a clothes designer and seamstress.

I do take some opposition with the manner of salvation you speak of through the protestant evangelical church but that is not important. We are both good with the one true God in our hearts.

Additionally, I have had a hell of a time with people I have trusted and shared with who started out as friends turning on me in the worst way. I am sure you understand, but even me sharing this little bit with you makes me wary. Some of the things I have stated here I have not stated publicly yet.

My father stayed in contact with priests his entire life and was obsessed with the Catholic church. He often spoke of the Jesuits. I believe that this happened to me and my sister and probably my brother. He drowned in a canoeing accident (and it was – I checked it out thoroughly) when he was 19. I believe one does not need more than the ill wind of these curses in our systems to blame for these tragedies. Which was to silence all of us. Especially me, since I am the only one left who has the ability to get to the bottom of this.

My mother’s family in London ON are silent on all matters, so are the remnants of my dad’s family in Windsor ON, but some distant older relatives on my dad’s side have given me more information than both immediate sides combined. Suggestion is strong that both families are deeply occulted.

Thanks for your work. Without revealing the methods, I don’t think the bottom or the top way out can truly be reached. Thanks for doing that. You were born to do that and that is a great great thing for all us vics of the jesuits.

Ellen Atkin Photography Resume Blog 604 259 9508 ellen@ellenatkin.com

On Mon, Oct 25, 2021 at 10:39 AM Svali Speaks Again wrote:

> svalispeaksagain posted: ” trigger warning: explicit discussion of > programming, traumas and negative spirituality Q’Ballah Programming Mengele > always installed the Q’Ballah in those he worked with, and he installed it > into Jesuit systems as well. Althea, or the “Tree of ” >

★ Like

fredurez29 2:29 pm on December 22, 2022

Hello, do you know how Jesuits were programmed before Mengele ? And do you think the 13 orders have always programmed their members since the ages ?
Also, do you think Illuminati children are systematically made by IVF ?
Have you seen other testimonies from Jesuit survivors ?

I also wonder if some of top members of the orders are not programmed like some survivors told us about the Queen Elizabeth, they tell she can live hundred years by replacing her body getting spiritually inside a children body, and putting away children's soul.
Also have you heard about a grey pope ?

★ Liked by 1 person

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Exposing the Vatican: Part 5

Book Part 7 →

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

Svali Speaks!

The Life of Svali – an Ex-Illuminati Mind Control Programmer

Part 13 – The UN or Supreme World Council

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: Svali, what role does and will the UN play in the future and how do you see this unfolding? What is their timeline?

A: The UN was created early in this century in order to help overcome one of the biggest barriers to a one world government necessary, if there is to be a military rule and dictatorship by the Illuminists. That barrier is the one of nationalism, or pride in one's country. This is why it was NOT a popular concept when first introduced, it took years of country bashing in the media and the destruction of any sense of national pride by a (not so subtle) media campaign over the years. It's agenda? It is set up as a shadow, or forerunner, of the Supreme World Council that will represent every nation. Every ambassador to the UN has either done something to curry Illuminati favor and been rewarded, or is a political figurehead chosen to make the organization "look good".

The Illuminati and governmental leaders chose to create the UN early in the past century, and worked hard and against opposition to put it in place (FDR was their man in America who helped the American public accept it). Both he and Eleanor were staunch Illuminists. So is Shirley Temple Black. In fact, most of our presidents since the beginning of the past century have been either Illuminists, or agreed by oath to support their goals, in return for campaign funds and support. I believe it is impossible to win a presidential election in our country today without their backing. The Kennedy family were punished because they tried to disobey them. They were free thinkers, and too hard to "control".

The UN has a stated goal of world peace, and wants to incorporate under its fold military and peace-keeping functions. But in reality, giving this role to the UN weakens the individual military strength of nations, and encourages them to lean more and more on an external organization, making them less able to resist when the takeover occurs.

I was told that by the year 2020, that the New Order would be openly revealed, BUT that may have been cult propaganda, and they are always changing dates. I personally believe that by the mid of this century, they will reveal themselves. This is just my opinion, though.

Q: What are the plans of the Illuminati for the Middle East and how will it affect the rest of the world? Will we see WWIII?

Search

Categories

- Interview with Svali – The Illuminati in America
- Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali
- Multiple Personalities – Brokenness
- Other Authors
- Other Illuminati Articles by Svali
- Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali
- Svali Answers Questions
- Svali's Personal Life
- The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People

Betrayal programming brain wave programming color programming Complex Polyfragmentation cult Cult Abuse Cult Safety Cult Secrecy Denial Programming DID dissociation end times Illuminati plan end times scenario Escaping from the Cult government programming Having needs Healing from Ritual Abuse Hiding from the Cult History of Ritual Abuse Illuminati bankers Illuminati jobs jewel programmming linked programming Memory suppression metal programming

Privacy & Cookies: This site uses cookies. By continuing to use this website, you agree to their use.
To find out more, including how to control cookies, see here: Cookie Policy
Close and accept

A: The conflict in the middle east is only to the advantage of the Illuminists. They time, the Illuminati covertly supply guns and funds to BOTH sides to keep the conflict fueled. They are very duplicious people. They used to funnel guns through the USSR to Palestine, for example, in the name of promoting "friendliness" between the USSR and this state and other arab nations. Then, the US Illuminists would help funnel guns to Israel, for the same reason.

Svali Speaks! Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

These people love the game of chess, and see warfare between nations as creating an order out of chaos. The USSR is going to get stronger again. It has too strong a military both openly, and covertly (ALL Illuminati military trainers have visited Russia to learn from them) to sit quietly and quiesciently to the side. In the NWO, they will be stronger than us.

Want to hear the end of the world scenario the Illuminati taught me? It was cult propaganda, but this is how they believed the New Order would be ushered in: There will be continued conflict in the mideast, with a severe threat of nuclear war being the culmination of these hostilities. An economic collapse that will devastate the economy of the US and Europe, much like the Great Depression.

One reason that our economy continues limping along is the artificial supports that the Federal Reserve had given it, manipulating interest rates, etc. But one day, this won't work (or this leverage will be withdrawn on purpose) and the next Great Depression will hit. The government will call in its bonds and loans, and credit card debts will be called in. There will be massive bankruptcies nationwide. Europe will stabilize first, and Germany, France and England (surprise) will have the strongest economies, and will institute through the UN an international currency. Japan will also pull out, although their economy will be weakened.

Peacekeeping forces will be sent out by the UN and local bases to prevent riots. The leaders will reveal themselves, and people will be asked to make a pledge of loyalty during a time of chaos and financial devastation.

Doesn't sound pleasant, does it? I don't know the exact time frame for all of this, and wouldn't want to even guess. The good news is that if a person is debt-free, owes nothing to the government or credit debt, and can live self sufficiently, they may do better than other. I would invest in gold, not stocks, if I had the income. Gold will once again be the world standard, and dollars will be pretty useless (remember after the Civil War? Our money will be worth about what confederate money was after the collapse).

All this said, it could just be cult propaganda taught to me and others to frighten us. It may be that none of this will happen. I sincerely hope not. I also strongly believe that God is able to stay the hand of the wicked, and to take care of our nation and others, if we turn to Him.

Q: Overall, would you say the Illuminati are racist? I am asking this because their agenda seems to be very white supremist throughout history.

The Illuminati are racist, and have a very "aryan" outlook. They believe strongly in the rule of the "pure" and "intelligent" by their definitions, and in their ceremonies, there will ocassionally be minorities killed in ceremonies.

They are trying to breed a "genetically superior" race to rule, with their children and descendants. They are also followers of Plato's Republic, and believe that they will be the ones to usher in this "Utopian" rule with the NWO in their opinion. In their Utopia, the intelligentsia will rule, and the sheep like masses will follow their leaders (that is their view of the world; that the occult leaders are "enlightened' and intelligent, while the average person is a "sheep" to be led by the nose).

military programming MPD
Ritual Abuse Roots of the Illuminati Shell Programming Spiritual Abuse Spiritual Programming suicidal programming Survivors of Ritual Abuse Svali is Alive Svali is dead Svali is missing Svali is Safe Svali poem Svali questions techniques Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse Therapists VR programming

Q: Why would they allow a black leader to head the UN?

A: Because it is a temporarily politically expedient thing for them to do. They are liars, and will hold out a hand to a popular political figure, throwing them a figurehead role in one of their organizations, to make the UN look better, and as a group that promotes "interracial harmony" and "unity" and "peace".

The real leaders would never publicly allow their real feelings to show. The UN is a preparation, but it is not the real power in the world, and will be relatively unimportant when the NWO comes into being. The real councils will then step forward. But as a means of getting the general public to accept the idea of a "global community" and the "one world community" the UN is a stepping stone in their working towards the NWO.

Q: Do they have a population control agenda? I'm thinking specially in view of the AIDS plague in Africa. Could this be engineered by them?

A: I have heard reports that certain deadly viruses have been engineered by the Illuminati, but I doubt that HIV was. Why? Because so many of the leadership of the Illuminati are blatantly pedophilic and homosexual, the virus is rampant in parts of the US, and they would be endangering themselves as well. Most of the leadership that I knew were homosexuals in their night personas (myself included) and it was accepted as a lifestyle in that setting, and encouraged.

Also, the viruses that they are developing are ones that they are also engineering antidotes to, to protect leadership from the virus if an epidemic breaks out. I do know that there is some working on biological weapons by members of this group as a method of threatening population bases that don't embrace the "New Order" when revealed, this was discussed ocassionally in leadership meetings. What state it is at at this time, I couldn't say, since it has been several years since I was active in the group.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 12 – The Top of the Pyramid

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: Svali, a very important question I'm sure all our readers are asking themselves is, who heads the Illuminati? Who is the top of the pyramid?

A: Hooboy! Where do I start with this? First, it depends on what level. I would like to draw up a little map of the Illuminati from my memories (which are NOT FOND) of being part of this group. I will also try to fill in some names, but I want to be cautious. If I name too many names, I could draw some nasty fire from people in the group. Here it goes:

I will be doing an upside down pyramid, to show the Illuminati structure, NOT to trigger people (I know the Illuminati use lots of pyramids) but because this is how they have their hierarchy set up:

Level One: Local level: (anytown, USA)

Sister groups

There will be between ten and thirty sister groups in most metropolitan areas, dependent on the size of the city. The larger the city, the more sister groups. There are Illuminati groups in EVERY major city in the US and Europe. This first level is what is known as the "anarchical" or "low level". It is what most people reporting [satanic] ritual abuse discuss: a high priest and priestess preside over each group, which also contains a group of two to four trainers, and others with jobs. The sister groups unite on rare occasions, are aware of each other, but each one is fairly independent, and reports only to their leadership council.

Level Two: Metropolitan leadership council:

This is what the local leadership council over these groups will look like. It will also cover scattered groups in outlying rural areas.

Baalim (head) (1), assistants to the head (2) administrators over finances and day to day happenings (4), head trainers (oversee and teach other trainers) (6).

The total: 13 members

The Baalim and his two assistants report to:

Regional Leadership Council

The United States has been divided into seven different regions geographically. Each region has a 13 member leadership council that coordinates with the local leadership councils (are you getting the idea by now? The Illuminati are set up a lot like "Amway" or any other well-organized business enterprise with a flowchart of accountability for each member). This council will look something like this:

Head of council (1), Military (2 seats), Spiritual (2 seats), Scholarship (2 seats), Finances (2 seats), Training (2 seats), Sciences (2 seats).

Total: 13 members

The regional councils will represent the different areas of interest and knowledge that the Illuminati pursue. The membership will change over time as members are promoted or demoted.

The seven regional councils each have a leader as noted above, who reports to the:

National Council (The nations in Europe also have national councils, Mexico and Canada do as well, as does the Soviet Republic and China).

The national council will look much like the one above, with this difference; these are influential bankers with OLD money such as: The Rockefellers, the Mellon family, the Carnegie family, the Rothschild family etc. I know I shouldn't name names, but I will.

The heads of the National councils report to:

The Supreme World Council.

This council is already set up as a prototype of the one that will rule when the NWO comes into being. It meets on a regular basis to discuss finances, direction, policy, etc. and to problem-solve difficulties that come up. Once again, these leaders are heads in the financial world, OLD banking money. The Rothschild family in England, and in France, have ruling seats. A descendant of the Hapsburg dynasty has a generational seat. A descendant of the ruling families of England and France have a generational seat. The Rockefeller family in the US holds a seat.

This is one reason that the Illuminati have been pretty "untouchable" over the years. The ruling members are very, very, very wealthy and powerful. I hope this information is helpful. How do I know this? I was on a local leadership council (a head trainer), but I talked to those on regional. Also, every Illuminati child is taught who their "leaders" are, and told to take an oath of allegiance to them and the "New Order to come".

Q: To what degree is the European royalty involved, what is their real pecking order and power structure and what is their U.S.-U.K. relationship in terms of financial/political/cult power. Is the Monarchy still running the show?

A: This is hard to answer, but I'll try. The Illuminati leadership state that they are descended from royal bloodlines, as well as unbroken occult heritage.

See, there were two definitions of "royalty" used. Open royalty that is currently seen now, and "hidden royalty" of royal lineage and extreme occult power. Sometimes the two were concurrent, such as with the Prince of Wales.

I never thought of which country/line held the most power, since I was just a peon busily doing my job. But my understanding was: The Hanoverian / Hapsburg descendants rule in Germany over the Bruderheist. They are considered one of the strongest lines for occult as well. The British line is just under them, with the royal family. Definitely, they rule the UK branch under the Rothschilds in the occult realm, even though parliament rules the country openly.

In France, again, descendants of the royal families are also in power in the occult realm, but the French Rothschilds hold the reigns over all or them. The U.S. is considered lower, and younger, than the European branches. This is why the children of leaders are ALWAYS sent to Europe for part of their training; the education is considered better and the U.S. families want to renew their affiliation with the european forebears.

Germany, France, and the UK form a triumvirate that rules in the European cult. The USSR is considered important, and has the strongest military groups. The USSR has been promised fourth position in the New World Order, BEFORE the role the U.S. would have, because the USSR has been more helpful and cooperative over the years with furthering the agenda.

The descendants of the former ruling families there are also involved in the occult leadership, along with the newer ones. There is no marxism in the cult. China will be ranked after the USSR, then the U.S.. But a lot of the current U.S. leadership will be in Europe when the change occurs, and many have homes there. They will be "changing nationalities" overnight, as it were. This is the little that I do remember. Wish I had been a better student of this stuff, but I was too busy trying to stay alive when I was in it.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | 6 Comments »

Part 11: Illuminati Proof – Vulnerabilities

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: Svali, have you ever come forward publicly with that story, or is this the first time? A: I have never gone into the demonic aspects much, because it is so controversial (ie. your question below!). I have shared this before with my husband, my therapist, and a close friend. I'm not really a "public" person, I've only posted some articles at Suite101.com, to help others who are trying to get out of the cult. I hate sensationalizing stuff, personally, because it can detract from the real problem; children are being hurt and abused, and the abuse needs to stop. Call it demons, aliens, or whatever, there are evil men (and women) using small children and profiting from their pain. That is why I have spoken out against this group.

Q: I am certain that a lot of readers will say 'Come on, now I know this is just sci-fi, how can this be real?!' and would want to see some proof or evidence to that. What would you say to them?

A: I would say "go to a ritual, you will see plenty" except that I don't want ANYONE to ever see or be near that type of evil. Spiritual realities don't leave physical marks, but I think it is interesting that throughout recorded history, mankind has written about these type of phenomena.

Could all of our recorded histories be false? Could mankind be a pathological liar throughout the centuries in this area? If a person visits Africa, they will also hear accounts of shape shifting done by the occult, and there, they DON'T dissociate, so you can interview people who have seen it while fully conscious. In South America, and Asia, this also occurs. How could a world-wide phenomena be made up by groups that had no previous contact with each other? Does the demonic leave a trail, a mark that I can point to? No. But does it leave an indelible impression on those that have witnessed it? Yes, and even in premedieval times, this type of stuff was recorded. I didn't take videos or snapshots of this stuff happening, so a person has to decide whether they believe it or not based on oral testimony. I don't really care. I know what I saw.

Q: Also, to wrap this interview up for now, what do you see as the Illuminati's Achilles Heel, their vulnerability? Is there any way to stop them, and a way for humanity to move on and say 'It is finished!'?At the moment it seems hopeless, sort of like having your fingers in a chinese finger trap, – you know what I'm talking about – with no way out.

A: 1. Their arrogance (I think I mentioned this before) is their weakness. These people think they are untouchable, and this could make them careless.

2. If by a miracle, enough people took this SERIOUSLY and started organizing in some way to stop the Illuminati take over, with prayer and God's guidance, perhaps they could be stopped. I hope so, with all of my heart.

3. Stopping pornography and child prostitution and drug smuggling and gun running would take out a huge chunk of their profits. Maybe they would slow down. But honestly, stopping the above would be as difficult as stopping the group.

4. To be honest, I don't know what could really stop them. I have written about this group to try and expose them, I have gone to the police several times, given videotaped testimony against them in a court case (the interview was with 5 lawyers and took 3 hours), knowing that my ex-headtrainer would be seeing a copy of the video (I thought about smiling and waving and saying "hi Jonathan", but then decided that might be going a little too far).

I have encouraged others in getting out, and helped a few survivors find safe housing and a way to stay out. I guess each person has to do their best in fighting these people, in the way they feel led to. My skills tend to be in writing, so I am using them.

Q: If you have any last comments or think there are some areas we have not touched or topics you would like to take us to, please feel free to share those.

A: If anyone has heard the sobs of a child when it has been used brutally by adults, or the screams of a child psychologically terrorized, they would do anything they could to stop this abuse.

There are children as young as three and four being used in pornographic films, beaten black and blue if they refuse to comply. There are toddlers being forced to watch brutalities, then given a stick and told to go over and hit the victim themselves, or they will be beaten. The child hesitates, it doesn't want to, and the adults hit the child, until the child goes, tears streaming down its face, and unwillingly does what the adults tell it. This is cruelty beyond belief.

To see a slightly older child with an electric dog collar around its neck, shocked when it tries to "escape" and treated as an animal, to the laughter of the adults and older children around it, and the child goes over to a bush and vomits from fear and self-loathing.

These are the pictures that any survivor of the Illuminati holds in their heart, and these are the reasons I will write and write about them to expose them, and why my heartfelt prayer is that they can be stopped. I wish I were making this up, but I'm not. I wish I didn't have these pictures engraved in my memory, but I do.

Q: Svali, would you be willing to answer readers questions or feedback, in form of some future article? I think there may be some questions coming in for you at some point, probably to cover some details about your story.

A: I would prefer that they send their questions to you, and then you forward them, if possible. I don't want to get a lot of "hate mail" because I am writing about a topic that is controversial and politically incorrect to talk about.

I'm sure there will be those who say, "oh, she just wants attention". Well, I get plenty of attention at the classes I teach, with a room full of students, and lots more fun besides. I get attention seeing my NON abuse articles in print, and make money besides (which I don't when I write about this)..

No, I want to expose these people, that's my motivation. Some will believe what I am writing, others won't. That's fine with me. If they feel the need to vent their disbelief, that's fine, as long as I don't get lots of cuss words, or people saying I'm stupid (oh, yes, I get letters like that at times) or uneducated.

Sorry, none of the above are true. I have 2 university degrees. I had to, I was told to by the cult. They don't let stupid people lead.

Oh, and HJ, I won't just disappear on you or recant anything I wrote. You can email me anytime with questions, and I will delightedly expose what SOBs this group is composed of. Oops, that doesn't sound Christian there, but God appreciates honesty, doesn't He? I'm only accurately describing them. I'm still working on forgiveness, as you can see…

Q: Svali, I'm grateful you took the time to share those experiences with us, which I'm sure was neither easy nor pleasant. I wish you all the best, for you and your family. Perhaps more people will read this, and pass this article on to others. Maybe we can stop all of this shocking brutality, child abuse, the Illuminati someday. It's never too late. Thank your very much for this interview, Svali.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 10 – More About Demonic Shape Shifting

September 12, 2008 by koniword

: Tell me more about the shapeshifting part, please. I have heard about this elsewhere, and this not just occuring during rituals, some people claim to have seen politicians shapeshift, for instance. When you say 'demonic' are you talking about a specific 'demon' or type of demon? Is it possible that these demons are really nothing more than some type of ETs influencing the Illuminati, in turn deceiving them?

A: Since you asked about shape shifting, I will share a little more, but it also relates directly to my own belief system. Can't help it, so I will warn you here that I will be discussing fundamental Christianity and the demonic.

After being raised in a group that glorifies the demonic, I became a Christian years ago. I honestly believe that without faith in Jesus Christ, I could NEVER have gotten out of the Illuminati, and one reason I don't fear for my life when I share what I remember is that I believe that God is able to protect me.

His love is the antithesis of the cruelty and evil that I saw in this group. His compassion and infinite caring and purity the opposite of the sexual abuse and darkness that surrounded the rituals. I believe that God has forgiven my past, I have sincerely asked His forgiveness, or I could not live with the memories of what I did to others (such as getting young girls addicted to drugs, so they would prostitute for the cult, as only one example).

I have renounced that lifestyle, given it up, and only Christianity has shown me the love and forgiveness and healing that I have needed for a soul weary beyond belief after seeing the underbelly of life and the cruelty that human beings are capable of showing to others.

In the occult world, I do believe that there are demons, that they are real, and that they have a spiritual hierarchy that the cult hierarchy attempts to emulate on a physical plane.

There are principalities, and lower demons, and they control the portals into other spiritual dimensions that humans have NO BUSINESS entering. This stuff is destructive in the extreme to people.

The shape shifting was usually in the context of an occult ceremony, by those given completely over to the demonic. Humans took on the form of animals for a period of time, or of hideous looking beings, and they were NOT aliens. This was demonic activity that caused a human to see the demonic revealed, and distorted what they saw.

I have seen people go temporarily "blind" because of the demonic influence. I have seen animals psychically killed, by others coming into a circle and directing their "energy" at the animal. These were not aliens, some of them were people I grew up with, and my own mother (she was strange, but not an alien).

I participated in this as well at times, and I'm no alien, just a wounded human being. I believe that the demonic does have sexual relations with humans, because it is recorded in the Bible (Genesis); God also forbids it as being completely wrong.

In fact, the Biblical covenants are the antithesis of the dark covenants practiced by the Illuminati, and I have found a lot of healing by going to Scripture and seeing how God views our world, and how He deals with the Spiritual realm. He is going to win, and is in the process of winning the battle.

I will share with you a dream I had 2 years ago. I was standing in a large room, circular shaped, with tiers of rows. A large emblem of the world with a wreath above it was on the wall, and robed figures surrounded me. I was before the Supreme World Council (who will rule when the NWO comes in), and they were pointing at me and saying I was a traitor and would have to die.

The sense of darkness and oppression in the room was intolerable, I was choking from it. One of the leaders came forward, and said that I would die a traitor's death, as an example to them all, unless I came back into the fold of "family".

I fought the dark impulse to give in to save my life, then in my mind, cried out "Jesus, save me". Instantly, the love and peace of God filled my heart, I was no longer afraid, and I told him, "No, because you are defeated, you just don't realize it. You can kill my body, but I serve a God who has defeated you and everyone in this room."

I woke up at this point, filled with joy. Now you know why I don't mind answering questions about my past. I believe in a God who is greater than the plans of evil men. They can plot all they want, but in the end, their plans will be defeated.

So ask away, any time, and I will share with you all that I remember. I don't mind exposing them, although I do have a lot of cynicism, as I have noted, as to whether people will do anything about it.

While I respect your desire to investigate, and your openess to any possibilities, I can tell you that as a former lifetime member of the group, I saw demons acting, not reptiles or aliens. I would really wonder about aliens who were as vicious and against Biblical Christianity in particular as the demons I saw.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | 1 Comment »

Part 9 – Ritual Sacrifices – Demons- Shape Shifting

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: Svali, earlier on you talked about sacrifices. You are talking about animal sacrifices, right? Give me a bit more details about that, please.

A: I hate to sensationalize things by going into gruesome particulars, but I will share a little.

First, please remember that the Illuminati have SIX branches of learning, and the spiritual (where the sacrifices are done) is only ONE part of what they do. I was in Sciences, and used to make fun of people who specialized in spiritual. Yes, everyone has to go to spiritual rituals during certain high days, but I tried to stay as far from it as I could. It's ugly, crude, and gross, but considered important.

1. The celtic branch of spiritual believes that power is passed at the moment between life and death. They will do rituals with children, or even older adherents, where the person is tied down, and an animal is bled to death on top of them. The belief is that the person receives power from the departing spirit, which "enters" the person. It is also highly traumatizing and horrible to have an animal go through its death throes on top of you. Throw in a few threats that "this will happen to you if you ever tell," and a quite strong impression is made on small children.

2. Opening portals and dimensions: I know, this sounds like stuff from a sci-fi film, but these people really believe that there are other spiritual dimensions, and that to pass into them, first a major sacrifice is done to "open a portal", usually several animals. I have also seen animal sacrifices done to protect from the demonic, or blood used to "close a circle" so the demonic cannot penetrate it.

The Illuminists very much believe in the spiritual realm, and have codified practiced over hundreds of years from ancient occultic rituals. They believe they can control these powers (I believe they are deluded).

Sacrifices are also done on high holy days. I have seen an animal "psychically killed" in front of me, and have no way to explain what I saw. I have also seen human sacrifice, but these were very rare (I believe I have seen two or three real ones in my life, the rest were set-ups).

They really don't want to kill off their children, they want a new generation to grow up and continue the practices. I have also heard of them buying children from other countries, and using them, or the homeless, but never witnessed it myself.

More often, I saw animals used in sacrifices and rituals. Other loss of life, rare but horrible, I saw as a head trainer because of my job. Rarely, a trainer would push a person too far, and didn't check for signs of stress. Especially with some of the newer medications used to create trance states, their meds covered the more obvious signs of trauma and stress (elevated heart rate, rapid breathing, tremors, pupil size changing), or blunted them.

Inexperienced trainers would miss more subtle signs, and basically screw a person up. It is horrible to work with a person, and they NEVER COME BACK. They become a vegetable, or worse, they scream and scream for hours without end.

We ocassionally had to "put down" these training failures, by using a lethal injection of air, or insulin. The person was then set up in a "fatal crash" or "fire" to dispose of the body. May God forgive me for the few times this happened and I was forced to act. I so regret it now. A person cannot be kind or sympathetic. And, the trainer always knows that it could be them next on the table, screaming, so they do their jobs well.

Any failures are heavily punished, to say the least. One of my jobs was teaching younger trainers the masking effects of hypnotic drug combinations, and how to recognize subtle clues of distress. Sigh.

Do the failures count as "sacrifices" to a horrible evil that is perpetrated on others? I think so, even though there was no ritual about it at all, it was all done in a traning room with lab coats and needles.

Q: Svali, I have to ask you this: There are stories floating around on the internet about the Illuminati (and other agencies) being run by extra-terrestrials, ET's, in particular a reptilian race, operating from a higher dimension. Any thoughts on that?

A: My answer will probably cause a lot of anger, and it's not meant to step on any toes. Here it goes.

I have never seen an alien or extra-terrestial. I have seen some programming to make people THINK they saw aliens, as a cover story for programming, if they remembered. None of the head trainers I knew, or others on leadership council, believed in aliens, although I never asked them.

I personally believe that the reptilian stuff is actually the demonic at work. I have seen shape-shifting and other stuff because of demonic influence (okay, so here some will say, gee, she believes in demons, that's as far out as aliens).

Well, this is what the Illuminati certainly believe in. They KNOW there are spiritual realities, and think they can control them. Those of a more cynical bent would say the shape shifting was a drug induced hallucination and group hysteria in the context of a ritual setting. I will let each reader decide based on their personal comfort zone. But no, absolutely no reptiles or aliens seen in Washington, DC, or San Diego, Ca. as of 5 years ago, at least I never saw them.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 8 – The Fourth Reich

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: The way you describe the Illuminati it sounds like the Third Reich Revival. I can certainly see the Nazi traits in their behavior and goals. It seems like Germany is taking the lead, yet again, in uniting the EU, we see the setting up of a European Army, the Rapid Reaction Force, and a World Court. How is this ultimately going to play out?

A: Actually, they have a name for the New World Order. One of the synonyms used is the "Fourth Reich". I'm serious. Lots of Illuminists have Fourth Reich programming inside. Yep, Germany, and the EU, will dominate the world economy. The US economy will go down for awhile, then restore with the help of Europe.

Q: The Book of Revelation pretty much paints a gloomy picture of how this is going to end, and by what means. How is this going to effect the Illuminati agenda? They would certainly know about the prophecies of old and their own foretold demise. Are they attempting to use prophecies, somehow, to their advantage by way of deceiving human beings?

A: Basically, they are in denial. They believe that history can be changed, and that John's prophetic revelation is only one interpretation of the future. They are aware of Revelations, but don't take it too seriously.

Remember, some of those at the top are ALREADY in power, figuratively speaking. They dominate the financial picture, have immense wealth, several mansions around the world, anything they want, and the (to them) joy of controlling millions of others. They believe their intellect is sharp, and that they will be the "good guys" in the New Order. They are Luciferians, and so believe the Bible is misguided in its assertions.

For all intents and purposes, if you asked them, they would probably laugh and say, "But the new order is already here. It just isn't open yet."

They have been in power for several hundred years, with no lightening bolts from heaven striking them dead. They may even believe that they represent God's will on earth (remember, they serve "God", too, just not the same as the Biblical Christian one).

They would ask back, "how did God allow people to develop such potential if He didn't want us to help them use it? Isn't it a criminal waste of the intellect and the gifts he gave us to NOT develop them, and help people mature into a better race?' They would argue along these lines.

They believe that basically, they are GOOD and doing a good work, even if the means are tough to endure at the time. They are weeding out the weak and unfit, and developing a supreme human being. I know it sounds like hog wash, but they truly, honestly believe this at a core level. To be under the judgements in Revelations, they would have to see themselves as evil, and they don't.

I hope this helps explain a little. I think they would see themselves in that picture as riding in on the white horses, not the dark ones. Such is the power of deception. I am a Christian, myself, and have given up these old beliefs that I was taught in the cult.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 7 – Illuminati Symbols and Clues; Level of Infiltration

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: 'Yes, tell me more about that (german connection, masonic temple, the 'institute' and the Baal statue in Canada, please [see previous article]). What are some of the Illuminati trademarks, symbols and clues that are placed throughout society as their signals (other than the pyramid and all-seeing-eye of Horus), intentionally or unintentionally. Does the Illuminati get careless?

A: To completely answer these questions, you would need my whole biography. I had thought once about writing it, but I doubt many would read it (seriously, this isn't false modesty) and also I really don't believe people will do anything about the Illuminati even if they know. Sorry for the cynicism, but it is based on a lifetime of experience.

The Illuminists don't care who prints this stuff, or if they are "exposed" because they are counting on the majority not believing it, having done a pretty good job with a media blitz campaign (seen any articles in Newsweek or Time lately that addresses this other than as a laughable conspiracy theory? Guess who owns Time-Warner?).

I have heard them laughing about this very thing in leadership meetings five years ago, and I doubt their attitude has changed much since then. If people DID believe this, if action were able to be taken, then I would be very surprised and quite happy.

I'll give you an example. Two years ago, I tried to find a publisher for my book on how the Illuminati program people. I wanted it available for therapists who work with survivors. I couldn't find anyone willing to consider it; they told me it was much too controversial, and "there is no market for this among the general public". Sad, but true.

At the same time, I do believe that God is in control of world history. I have exposed them, and self published my book for free on the web, to let those who work with survivors realize what they have been through. It's hard to help people leaving a group without understanding the traumas both emotional and physical that they have endured.

Okay, now to your questions.

1. The Bruderheist is the ruling council of Germany. It meets in the black forest region, which is considered the center of the earth, and a vortex for psychical/spiritual energy. They are some of the most vicious people I have ever known in my life, and make the Nazis (who they encouraged) look like fun people. They are still there, manipulating people, running banks, and channeling their dirty money to Brussels, Switzerland, and Cairo, Egypt.

2. Canada has a very large Illuminati and Templar Knight community (they are hand in glove groups) that worship ancient deities. The gold or bronze statue of Baal is in a holy grove on a large private estate between Quebec and Montreal. Since I was only 12 years old when I went there, the details aren't quite as clear. But the ceremonies there were full of people in white gowns, lots of flowers and fruits and votive offerings, singing, then the final sacrifice in the arms of the statue.

3. Illuminati trademarks: these are the most cautionary people on earth. They try to leave absolutely NO tracks. Most of the symbology can be seen on T.V. or movies, and include: the concept of a military government ruling. These people are very, very militaristic.

The Phoenix: this is one of their highest military and spiritual symbols. If you see a German eagle, too, this is a huge sign. Certain companies will use a phoenix as their logo, especially red on black, or the reverse, this is a huge sign, since the Illuminati use many resuscitation rituals in their training, where the person is brought into a death, or near death state, then "resuscitated" and told that Baal, or some other entity, "gave them life" and they owe their new life to him and the group. Thus, the phoenix is a huge trigger and symbol.

Butterflies and rainbow signs are big triggers for people who have gone through the Monarch programming (yes, the Illuminists invented Monarch programming with the CIA). Certain types of jewelry are used as triggers. If a person goes online, and plays certain role games (like Ultima) the games are FULL of trigger symbols, such as gem stones. I don't play them but my husband does, and I have told him what the symbols mean. He thinks it's funny since they don't bother him (he isn't Illuminati).

A tiara, or crown with 13 gems, with a diamond in the center, is a symbol of the coming reign of the "chosen one".

Star of David: believe it or not, one of the highest Illuminati religious symbols is a star of David with a circle around it. Called "the great seal of Solomon" it is used at the highest ceremonies to invoke the demonic.

Earth, water, and fire: these three are used in a lot of ceremonies. Check out how many Saturday a.m. cartoons use this concept. You'd be amazed. In fact, "The Fifth Element" movie was based on it.

Greek and Roman mythology and symbols: The Illuminati use a tremendous amount of Greek and Roman mythology in their programming, and most people will have internal structures with a roman or greek temple inside. Lightening bolts, and any symbols from this time will also trigger those with this inside. For more, just pick up any recent Time magazine. Most of the ads are filled with Illuminati symbology. A picture of a head with a computer inside is another big one, symbolizes delta programming, for example.

Q: Take the lead and tell me about issues you may not have covered in your articles or in this interview…. perhaps some issues I have missed in regards to the New World Order/ global government and such…

A: 1. These people are pedophiliacs, they abuse and torture small children and teach them under duress to become perpetrators themselves from earliest infancy. This alone means they should be stopped.

They run the porn industry, along with other groups such as the Mafia. They make enormous amounts of money from drug smuggling, gun running, and human slavery (oh, yes, the buying and selling of human beings is alive and well in the 21st century).

They are involved in evil and money making in the extreme. If a profit is being made off of human suffering, you can trace the chain back somewhere to these people.

2. They have money and lawyers that could blast anyone confronting them out of the water.

3. They have infiltrated our government, and the governments of every country in the world, and well as the judicial and legal systems.

4. The media as well.

5. They run our financial institutions.

6. They are ruthless, ambitious, and will not stop at killing those they oppose. They invented MK-Ultra with the help of the CIA. Still want to take them on? Sorry, just letting you know what they are like.

7. They are working towards bringing in a new leader, who will usher in a Luciferian reign of joy, prosperity, and rewards to the faithful. Almost an Elyssian type paradise. Of course, the brutality would continue, and those who oppose his reign are to be hunted down and converted or destroyed, but the followers will be so happy and content that they believe these holdouts will want to come over to their side. Sounds unbelievable, but true.

Also, people will have new jobs, and leadership positions in this new order, since the Illuminati believe that their children are the brightest and best (remember that lifetime of training and teaching?) and will be the intellectual elite who will rule over the unintelligent, or "less fit". These people really, truly believe this, and almost worship Plato's ideal Republic as their blue print for the new order.

Now, the other side of the picture.

1. They are arrogant, and this could be their downfall. They view the common man as "sheep" with no intelligence. They are full of pride, believe they are invulnerable (see above) and that any press about them is the equivalent of a gnat to be swatted. Arrogant people make mistakes, and they are becoming more blatant and open in recent years.

2. They believe they can overcome God, which is a huge mistake. God can stay the hand of history, and has so far, in the hope that more from this group will get out, because He is merciful.

3. Most of them are wounded, abused victims, who don't realize that it is possible to leave the group. There is a lot of discontent in the ranks, and there would be a mass exodus if the members believed it were really possible to get out (and live). Many of the trainers I knew (I know, wicked, torturing pedophiles) were NOT happy with what they did. They would whisper quietly, or give a look, to show that they disagreed with what they had to do. They would resignedly do their jobs, in the hope of advancement.

Know what one of the biggest carrots offered to those who advance up in the group is? That you don't have to hurt people anymore, and that you can't be abused (it's true: only those higher than you in the group can abuse you, so everyone wants to move up, where the pool of candidates becomes smaller). Of course, people can choose to abuse anyone beneath them, and that motivates some (but not all!) to move up.

4. As more survivors leave, therapists and churches and support people are becoming more aware of the sophisticated mind control techniques used to control members. They are learning to undo it.

5. Prayer can overcome the greatest evil, and my greatest hope is that those I once knew in this group, including the heads and those who hurt me at times, would get out. That they could know that, yes, it is truly possible to leave.

Q: I have seen Clinton do this hand sign on a few occasion, and now Prince William as well. Any hidden meaning?

A: That is an old, well known greeting of one satanist to another. Usually, the Illuminists are a lot more subtle and don't do that publicly.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | 11 Comments »

Part 6 – Ritual Abuse – Mind Control Denial; Bohemian Grove

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: I just find it amazing that this sort of topic (Ritual Abuse, mindcontrol) gets next to no press attention, considering the amount of evidence available.

A: Here is where I will sound really, really cynical. I'm not surprised, because the Illuminati leadership often boasted that their best protection was that no one would believe what was happening. They also have their own media blitz campaign, one that is pretty effective. For example, a reporter with the initials M. S., who wrote articles on Ritual Abuse (RA) and Mind Control in the San Diego Union-Tribune, was a member of the Illuminati. His articles have almost a patent formula.

1. He interviews supposedly respected doctors in the field. These people with scholarly credentials, the "thinking man's verdict" give a rational, measured conclusion: no logically thinking being could ever possibly believe in ritual abuse, and the therapists that treat victims of it are leading the poor people on, the gullible little dears being oppressed by therapists of a most vicious and mercenary bent.

2. He then exposes the "fundamentalist, narrow minded" "raving" and "mentally ill" people who say that ritual abuse is real, and the "fraudulent" or supposedly mercenary/attention seeking therapists that work with them. His word images create the image of a person practically foaming at the mouth, full of demented ravings, on this side of the fence. He then brings in the heart break of dear, precious families broken apart by the wicked therapists who are "implanting" ideas of ritual abuse in these poor victim's heads.

Wrap up with the supposedly rational, caring, logical and compassionate person on the FMS board saying how tragic it is that this is occurring, that something needs to be done.

M.S. never mentions that the therapists who work with ritual abuse survivors work for very low pay, or sometimes for free, to help these people break free of the chains of a lifetime. He never ever interviews the large percentage (>85%) of the psychological field that has stated that they believe that ritual abuse is, or could be real; instead, he only interviews the minority viewpoint to feed his agenda.

Okay, so now we know that the normal media is quite biased at times.

Q: But, with the evidence out there, why aren't more people concerned about the Illuminati?

A: Because they simply can't, won't believe that this is happening. I am a strong Christian, and in Revelations, it says that right before the return of Jesus, people will be acting as if nothing has happened, that all is normal, in spite of evidence to the contrary. You could show people a video taken of a ritual, and they would declare: "it has to be a fake; people just don't do those things." You can show them a site with pentagrams, buried bones, and other evidence, and they would say, "Oh, that is just teenagers playing around". You can show them photos of underground tunnels near Los Alamos, and they will say, "Isn't that interesting. Must be some government project." They can be shown the scars on a survivor's body, from cigarette burns in childhood, and old lash marks that have healed on their back, and the question would be "are you sure it wasn't self inflicted?"

The evidence is there, but in my opinion, the average person does NOT want to know, and even when confronted with it, will look the other way.

The Franklin case is a point. How much evidence has come out? Or the MK-Ultra documents that have been declassified, shown as real, and people ignore it.

Okay, I'll get off my soap box. But I believe that the media that downplays ritual abuse is feeding into a deep need in the average person to NOT know the reality. In fact, how can a person face the fact of great evil in mankind, unless they have either a strong faith in God, or are faced with insurmountable evidence? We as human beings want to believe the BEST of our race, not the worst, IMHO.

Q: You probably have heard of the 'Bohemian Grove'. What do you know about this? Any connection to the Illuminati?

A: I myself do not know anything about the Bohemian Grove. Remember, I wouldn't have been in a position to have much to do with it. Most of my connections were with Germany. I was never prostituted out, instead I taught others to be that. But I myself never went there, and really don't know anything about it. I'm sorry I can't be more helpful there.

Now, if you were asking about the masonic temple in Alexandria, Va., or the "Institute' in Charlottesville, Va., or a small grove up in Canada with a bronze statue of Baal, I could help you. Sorry I don't have anything to share on this topic. If the Bohemian Grove is occult, though, it probably definitely is known about by the Illuminati.

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 5 – Illuminati – CIA Connection – Russia & China

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Svali: I just want you and your readers to know that I am NOT an Illuminati expert, nor do I want to be. I am only a survivor who was part of this group, in a lower management position locally. I did NOT rub elbows with the rich and famous, although I heard about things that occurred at higher levels (people do gossip even in the cult, they're still human beings).

There are other people who have come out and disclosed. I don't know them personally, but I have heard about them. One is Brice Taylor, in California and North Carolina (she lives part time in both places). Another is Neil Brick of SmartNews, he seems to be very real and believable and a nice person. Others are Caryn StarDancer, of Survivorship.org, and Annie McKenna (I think she even wrote a book about her experiences [ed. 'Paperclip Dolls'], it is quite good). There are others, and if you go to the Suite101.com site, there are links to resources and also survivor pages. Survivorship.org also has links.

Some survivors have self-published their stories on the web, to help the public know that this is going on. I am only one person among many who has come out to talk about my experiences, and my experiences are limited to what one person did in the Washington, DC area and the San Diego, Ca. area between 1957 and 1995. A person who was doing their job at the time, was very misguided, and who is now heartily sorry for the things that I once participated in.

Q: How do survivors remain anonymous after seeking help? Would the cult not go to extreme measures to find and silence programmers or members that have left the cult? To what ends would they go to shut you up?

A: At Suite 101, and in my book, I wrote a whole chapter on staying safe. Here's the URL for the Suite 101 article: Breaking Free of the Cult. It includes tips on staying safe. Yes, they do try to recontact people who get out. The first way they do this is through their family (remember they are transgenerational). My mother told me to "come back or die" four years ago, which triggered off lethal self destruct programming inside (I believe she was counting on my coming back, but she was wrong and I almost died. God spared my life). I then had to go in and dismantle it all. When I left, the head trainer was pretty arrogant. He had said I would be dead within 6 months if I remembered, because "no one could remember with what I put in her and live". Direct quote from Jonathan M., head trainer, and I hope he reads this article.

Second, a lot of people get abducted and reaccessed because they : phone their perps, go out alone at night (you wouldn't believe the stories I have heard from survivors who told me they went out at 2 or 3 am to the store, alone, walking down alleys. What were they thinking????).

I helped one survivor get out three years ago, she was being harrassed by the group, and was fighting back, she literally pulled a gun on a would-be abductor and he backed away (he had his gun out) when she asked him, "and who of the two of us do you think is the better shot?" She was an expert marksman). She stayed with me for 6 months, and is free of the group.

They usually do give up after awhile, and get tired of trying to pull people back. I could never live in San Diego, or DC, though. The chances of running into an old trainer or someone I knew would be too great. Instead, having physical distance (people in the cult in this state don't know me or care about me one way or the other) helps. I also have tons of accountability. These people like secrecy, and won't usually act out in public if someone is with people who aren't part of their group. I have heard of people being assassinated , which is one reason that I don't go on T.V., or speak publicly. I live very quietly and anonymously out here. MOST cult recontact comes because the person recontacts, though. The pull to go back is enormous at times, and has to be fought a lot, especially in the first years. To find out why someone would go back to their abusers, read my article on "Trauma Bonding: The Pull to the Perpetrator" at Suite 101.

Q: I want to get back to the Illuminati's political agenda. What is the connection between the CIA, FBI, and other secret services and the cult? To what degree are they infiltrated? And what is the real agenda of these secret services?

A: They are all infiltrated. I don't think everyone in these groups are Illuminists, but a lot of the leadership is. An example: my mother was friends with Sid Gottlieb, who was part of the CIA. The farm I grew up on was only about a half hour away from his home in Culpeper, Va. She also knew the Dulles family. A lot of the researchers in the CIA were part of it, and I visited Langley, Va. at intervals growing up. MK-Ultra was funded in part with Illuminati money. These people use the most sophisticated mind control techniques on their members, believe me.

When I was in San Diego, human experimentation was still going on. Jonathan and I were investigating the effects of certain drugs on inducing trance states and assisting with programming. We would take the data, and download it into a database (oh, yes, the cult is very technologically sophisticated) and then send it to Langley.

Many of the administrators and directors at the FBI are also Illuminists. The CIA helped bring over german scientists after WWII. Many of these were also Illuminati leaders in their own country, and they were welcomed with open arms by the U.S. group. They also funnelled all information they were learning to the Illuminati.

Q: I assume if the U.S. political, banking, and military systems are all fairly well under Illuminati control this would then also be true for Eastern Europe, Russia and other communist bloc countries as well. What does this mean for relations between the West-East axis? Was Russia, or the USSR at the time, ever the adversary it was made out to be, and was there a grand plan behind having Russia as an enemy?

A: Russia was never really a threat to us. Marxism was funded by the Illuminati, and espoused as a counterbalance to capitalism. The Illluminati believe strongly in balancing opposing forces, in the pull between opposites. They see history as a complex chess game, and they will fund one side, then another, while ultimately out of the chaos and division …, they are laughing because they are ultimately beyond political parties. A top western financier will secretly meet with an eastern or russian "adversary" during those years, and have a good laugh at how the "sheep" were being deluded. I am sharing here what I was taught, and also observed.

When DELPHI met with ORACLE in Europe, (these are the head training groups for the northern hemisphere and european continents) the Russian, German, French, British, Canadian, and US trainers all worked together. In fact, this is one reason why plurality of linguality is valued in the Illuminati. I had to learn six languages as a child, and learn to converse with people from around the world. They are truly an international group, and the group's agenda supercedes any nationalistic feelings. There is also a lot of trading back and forth of members in these groups. A russian trainer might come to the US for awhile, complete a job, then go back, or vice-versa.

Q: China is starting to rattle their sabers and arming itself with nuclear weapons which are pointing at U.S. cities. Is all this occurring according to Illuminati agenda or is there still a fairly large 'uncertainty, random or x-factor' involved that is beyond the Illuminati's control?

A: I have been out for five years, so my information is "old news". But the military buildup of China is part of their plan. There are members of the group who are Asian, and very opportunistic. The Oriental Mafia groups are very much linked to Illuminati activity. The random factor in all of this is how the average citizen reacts. It can't be predicted, although Illuminati leadership will often invent different scenarios, and try to decide how they will act if the ordinary citizens react in an unexpected manner.

I was told that around 2020, the Illuminist agenda would be revealed openly. I don't know if this is accurate, or just propaganda that I was taught, or if they have changed this date since I was in the group.

Q: Svali, earlier you were talking about mindcontrol victims and survivors that have come forward with their stories and publicised it. One of the more recent and high profile stories is the one of Cathy O'Brian [see links at http://www.vegan.swinternet.co.uk/articles/conspiracies/cathyandmark.html and http://www.trance-formation.com/]. She seems to be more of a CIA mind control victim, which still sound very much like your own story, in terms of technology and technique. Do you think there could be an Illuminati connection?

A: As I mentioned before, the CIA and the Illuminati are definitely linked. The top leadership in the CIA are also Illuminati leaders. I mentioned [Allen] Dulles and [Sidney] Gottlieb as men I knew personally as a child and young adult. The scientists that ran the MK-Ultra and other governmental mind control programs were Illuminists brought over from Nazi Germany. That's why you will find that mind control victims ALWAYS speak German or have a dissociated part that speaks with a German accent; they are mimicking their abusers, which is very very common.

You could say that the CIA and the Illuminati are hand in glove companions. I know that the different Illuminati groups around the US also send data on the experiments they do to the central computer at Langley, Va. (oh, yes, human experimentation and mind control experiments are still ongoing, it didn't stop with WWII…).

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | Leave a Comment »

Part 4: The Illuminati – Freemason Connection

September 12, 2008 by koniword

Q: Svali, one of the more important points, which I am sure a lot of readers would like to know more about, is, what is the Illuminati /Freemason connection, as far as you are aware of, given your previous position in the Illuminati? Also, was there and is there an infiltration of the Masonic Order?

A: The Freemasons and the Illuminati are hand in glove. I don't care if this steps on any toes, it's a fact. The masonic temple at Alexandria, Virginia (the city itself was named after Alexandria, Egypt, and is a hotbed of Illuminati activity) is a center in the Washington, DC area for Illuminati scholarship and teaching. I was taken there at intervals for testing, to step up a level, for scholarship, and high ceremonies. The leaders in this masonic group were also Illuminists.

This has been true of every large city I have lived in. The top Freemasons were also top Illuminists. My maternal grandparents were both high ranking Masons in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa. (president of the Eastern Star and 33rd degree Mason) and they both were also leaders in the Illuminati in that area.

Are all Masons Illuminati? No, especially at the lower levels, I believe they know nothing of the practices that occur in the middle of the night in the larger temples. Many are probably fine businessmen and Christians. But I have never known a 32 degree or above who wasn't Illuminati, and the group helped create Freemasonry as a "front" for their activities.

Q: What exactly is the meaning of the pyramid on the back of the $1 U.S. note? I'm talking about the pyramid with the capstone detached and hovering above the rest of the pyramid, containing the 'All-Seeing-Eye'. Is this a Masonic or Illuminati symbol?

A: The pyramid and the "eye of Horus" on the back of the dollar bill are Illuminati symbology. The pyramid is an ancient form based on the holiness of the number 3 to the ancient mystery religions (it, not 6, is considered the most spiritual number), and a pyramid was a structure used specifically to call up the demonic, or occult, a point of psychic activity.

The eye is the all seeing eye of Horus (remember the emphasis on Egyptian magical religious practices? The book of the undead, etc.?) and the fact that no one can escape his magical reach. This eye is considered a demonic eye in the group, or the eye of the deity, and in Illuminati mythology is either open or closed, depending upon the spiritual time of year and the state of the person psychically. Young children are given "psychic surgery" where the eye is placed inside, and they are told that Horus will snatch their soul if they ever try to leave, or if they tell, or that the eye will explode. The symbol on the dollar is reinforcement for every Illuminati child who sees one, and the reminder that they are being watched.

The saying on the dollar, 'Novus Ordo Seclorum' also means "bringing in the new order", which is the Illuminati stated agenda. Just think, in the early 1800's, our forefathers already were looking forward to when the new order would be ushered in. Have I mentioned that this is a patient, forward looking group of intellectuals? That Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, FDR, and others were Illuminati leaders? Our country may have been founded on freedom from taxation, but it was also founded on the New World Order just as surely.

Q: How far back in time does the concept / cult of the Illuminati go? It seems to me that they have been around quite some time, possibly since antiquity, guiding, steering and using humanity for their own purposes, operating under different names? Can you elaborate?

A: I was taught that the Illuminati had its roots in the ancient practices that reach into the beginning of recorded time; that the Babylonians on the plains created ziggurats to their deities, whom the Illuminati worship. They were proud of the fact that it was supposedly an unbroken occult line from then until now. The names changed, the basic group was the same.

The ancient mystery religions of Egypt, heart of dark magic were another forerunner, with adherents of Set, Osiris, Horus and Ra; and the Illuminists also believe their bloodlines have come down from the ancient kings of Egypt.

It's hard for me to know how much was cult propaganda, and how much truth is in the claims. The Templar Knights were definitely a forerunner during medieval times, as well as the Rosicrucians and ancient celts and druids (you know, the ones who built Stonehenge).

Posted in Interview with Svali - The Illuminati in America | 1 Comment »

svalispeaksagain 9:38 pm on October 7, 2021

Tags: exposure, Jesuit (10), mind control (69), occult (13), programming (60), Vatican (10)

Exposing the Vatican: Part 5

Survival of the Fittest

Mengele was a firm believer in the "survival of the fittest" and during the 1940s,1950s and 1960s infants trained by him and the Jesuits underwent terrible trials to determine which infants would live, and which would die. This helped them determine not only which were the strongest infants, but also which ones had the strongest will to live, a requirement for the terrible programming that Jesuit children undergo.

As soon as the infants can crawl (around 3 months of age in these highly intelligent infants), the first survival trial is conducted. Dozens of infants are placed in a room, with a barrier in front of them. In the center of a large room are three bottles of milk. The babies are hungry and thirsty, since they have not been fed for a day.

The barrier is raised, and the infants literally race by crawling to the center of the room. The strongest crawl over others and push the smaller or weaker ones aside. The first ones there get the bottles, and must keep it and drink it while other infants are trying to grab it away.

The three that "win" get to drink the bottle, and then watch the systematic slaughter of the infants that did not get a bottle, because the losers were deemed "inferior." This installs a terrible survival guilt at a very early age; the infant wants to eat, and to live, but is shown that their living means that others must die in this setup.

The message that only the strong are allowed to live is ingrained very deeply through this and similar experiments. After several trials, the Jesuits have created their first classes, or groups. Jesuit children are raised in classes of twelve at a time, and these infants will become closer than any physical brothers during their childhood, in part because of their ability to survive and trauma bond with one another.

This is one reason that the survivor will fear and despise weakness in themself and others. To them, weakness has always meant death.

Follow

Early Attachment Bonding and Utter Darkness

The basis of obedience within the Jesuits is formed upon two primary forms of programming: the avoidance of pain (the pain of “descending” and thus going to “hell”), or operant conditioning; and the formation of extremely deep attachments to primary figures. Their belief is that the combination of these two create “unbreakable” programming, and the truth is that very few Jesuits every truly do leave the order. The attachment bonding described here, in earliest infancy, makes it extremely difficult to do so.

When the infant is only a few weeks old, it is placed in a completely darkened room, with no noise or stimulus of any kind, and abandoned. This abandonment, which lasts for several days, is extremely traumatizing to the infant. At first, the infant cries in a normal manner (distress), which then turns to anger as the abandonment continues. Eventually, the infant becomes exhausted, sleeps for longer and longer intervals, and stops crying; instead, it whimpers as utter despair begins to hit.

The infant is psychologically unable to cope with impending death, as its body and psyche begins shutting down in the early stages of dying. The infant comes to the realization that no one will ever come and rescue them, and they will die in complete and terrible darkness.

In complete despair, the infant is dying, when a soft light enters the room. A Jesuit Father comes in, carrying a warm bottle; behind him is Theo (their name for the “benevolent” manifestation of satan). With kind words, the Father picks the infant up, soothes him/her and gives a life-sustaining bottle. The infant is insanely grateful for this deliverance from “utter darkness” (the deepest level of “Jesuit hell” for the worst deeds, such as treachery and betrayal of the order). As the baby takes the bottle and is comforted, they bond completely to the Father, and to the being (Theo) who is superimposed upon the Father. The Father begins programming that they “owe their life” to him, that he “rescued them from utter darkness” for a “special purpose”, that the infant is to “live and not die.” Trauma bonding at a deep level occurs, and the Father appears like a god to the infant, and in fact, will hold the “theo” (God) position inside.

This bond will be built upon and layered upon over and over as the years go on. The infant will NOT be allowed to truly attach to ANYONE ELSE for the rest of their life. All other caretakers and friends in the early years will either be killed or appear to be killed, or terribly betray the infant/toddler/child to teach them that there is only one who can be trusted: the Father the infant formed a primary bond to, and the spirit “Theo.” This is the core level of Jesuit bonding, and is by far the most difficult programming to break.

The infant will later “see’ the nannies that cared for him/her killed, or will even be asked to “kill” them or agree to their being killed, by the Father they bonded to, to prevent the Father being killed (in terrible setups where the infant must choose which lives and which “dies”). These setups also test the strength of the infant’s loyalty bond, which must be deep and unbreakable for successful later programming to occur. From the first days of life, the Jesuits begin installing utter and complete loyalty to them, represented by the primary Father the infant bonded with; and later, by three others they will also be allowed to attach to.

The primary mentor will always be a Jesuit Father that the infant (who is kept very young in the system) loves above any other, as described in the cruel abandonment scenario. The Father-mentee relationship is the deepest of all, as the Jesuit Father mentors others and molds them into his image. He will hold a “theo” or god place within the system, and this bond will be the hardest to break, since it represents the deepest attachment of the core to a human being.

The purpose of this mentoring is to draw the infant into a relationship with “Theo” (satan’s benevolent personification) from its first days on earth. The Father will bond the infant to himself, and in doing so, bond the infant to the spiritual theo as well.

Helping the Survivor

The survivor of Jesuit programming has extremely disorganized attachment due to the fact that they have attached to satan himself (Theo) as well as their primary Father (referred to as “Father Theo”). There is a no less reliable being in creation to attach to, yet this was the infant’s only choice during early childhood if they were to survive. If given another option, the infant would have rejectedbonding to satan.

The early trauma is so severe, that it can take months or even years to grieve for the manipulation and “detach” from these primary figures. It takes intense prayer, and a deep desire by the survivor, to break free of this programming that pivots upon the Jesuit’s demonic use of infant attachment. The only real answer is for the survivor to choose to renounce the bonds to satan and the primary Jesuit Father, and to bond with Yeshua. During the interval, they will also need to bond at least temporarily with a caring figure who can represent the love of God to their systems, since these infants have never experienced this.

The older parts, once they become Christians, can help “reparent” the infants, helping them to understand that the Christian God truly does love them, and can keep them safe. Realizing at a deep level that Yeshua paid the full price for sins on the cross, and that their systems will not “descend” into hell and utter darkness, and realizing that the internal representations are based upon setups and manipulation, can help break the hold of this early attachment.

The survivor will experience attachment pain at the core level when these early setups and betrayals are remembered. They may feel infant terror at the thought of utter darkness. It is important to bind the demonic, and to prevent it from enhancing these memories, or the fear. They will often feel suicidal as the core despair, and the memory of the pain and betrayals comes up.

The survivor will test the love and caring of those they bond with outside of the Jesuit Order again and again. This is because they feel a huge “push pull” inside, and swing between craving love and nurturing, and wanting to distance themselves from any loving attention, which feels terrifying. Healing of this type of early wound is a process, and cannot be rushed, or the survivor will attempt to cope alone – and fall prey to reaccessing – since these infantile needs are used to push recontact programming.

Helpful Scriptures

Ps. 27:10. “When my father and my mother forsake me,Then the LORD will take care of me.” This can help with the deep core attachment pain, to understand that the Lord loves the survivor, even when it seems that no one else ever has. It can be extremely difficult for the survivor to come to the terrible realization that they had NO real father or mother; only manipulative, abusive Jesuit Fathers and programmers during infancy.
The comfort that can only come from knowing that the Lord truly loves the survivor, and cares for them, can help.

Ps.71:6. "By You I have been upheld from birth; You are He who took me out of my mother's womb. My praise shall be continually of You.: This verse counteracts again the lie that the Jesuit Father and satan "let them live" and instead shows the truth that the Lord is the one who gives life at birth. The following scripture shows the spiritual condition that the motherless and fatherless Jesuit survivor find themselves in, and how the Lord responded to them. It answers how the Lord responds to this deep abandonment pain: It also shows why the survivor was able to survive the horrors of childhood and how it is possible for the survivor of this type of abuse to come to know the Lord: Ezekial 14:4-16
4 As for your nativity, on the day you were born your navel cord was not cut, nor were you washed in water to cleanse you; you were not rubbed with salt nor wrapped in swaddling cloths. 5 No eye pitied you, to do any of these things for you, to have compassion on you; but you were thrown out into the open field, when you yourself were loathed on the day you were born.
6 "And when I passed by you and saw you struggling in your own blood, I said to you in your blood, 'Live!' Yes, I said to you in your blood, 'Live!' 7 I made you thrive like a plant in the field; and you grew, matured, and became very beautiful. Your breasts were formed, your hair grew, but you were naked and bare.
8 "When I passed by you again and looked upon you, indeed your time was the time of love; so I spread My wing over you and covered your nakedness. Yes, I swore an oath to you and entered into a covenant with you, and you became Mine," says the Lord GOD.
9 "Then I washed you in water; yes, I thoroughly washed off your blood, and I anointed you with oil. 10 I clothed you in embroidered cloth and gave you sandals of badger skin; I clothed you with fine linen and covered you with silk. 11 I adorned you with ornaments, put bracelets on your wrists, and a chain on your neck. 12 And I put a jewel in your nose, earrings in your ears, and a beautiful crown on your head. 13 Thus you were adorned with gold and silver, and your clothing was of fine linen, silk, and embroidered cloth. You ate pastry of fine flour, honey, and oil. You were exceedingly beautiful, and succeeded to royalty. 14 Your fame went out among the nations because of your beauty, for it was perfect through My splendor which I had bestowed on you," says the Lord GOD.
This wonderful verse also shows the destiny of the survivor called out from this fatherless and motherless upbringing and training: to be wholly the Lord's and to be clothed with His splendor, and become a testimony to His goodness.

B. Early System Organization

During infancy, the master and system controllers are created, along with the parts and roles within these systems. The Jesuits program three main levels into their systems: a white, or cover layer. This will appear to be Illuminati, Templar Knight, Opus Dei, or another occultic group, and is complete, even to the "core" for this level, which is a false core meant to mislead anyone who attempts to break into the system without authorization.

This cover layer is there for a reason. The Jesuits often have their agents highly placed within the occultic organizations they oversee, and they don't want the organizations to realize that the individual is not an actual member. The system is created to look completely like the system of someone raised and programmed by the organization. The agent is actually there to review and report on the activities of the group's leadership to the Vatican.

There is another reason for this cover programming. Jesuit agents often spend time in Israel and other countries doing intelligence work; if picked up by the Mossad (Israeli intelligence) or Spetz (Russian intelligence), and interrogated (tortured), the other organization will believe that the agent works for one of these groups, and have no idea that they actually work for the Vatican.

Jesuits who leave will always remember their white, or “cover” programming first and believe this is all there is inside. The other layers are much more loyal and difficult to uncover.

Beneath the white level is the black, or Vatican level of programming. This is where controllers and parts loyal to the Vatican, the Jesuits, and to Satan reside. High priests and priestesses that were involved in Vatican ceremonies will be part of the black theta system, just as high priests and priestesses loyal to the Illuminati (or other group)) and its deities will reside in the white theta system.

Beneath the white and black levels is the silver-grey, or new world order (antichrist) level. These systems have been created to serve the antichrist, and the NWO, are given specific roles, and are controllers for the two other levels. The grey level controllers and parts have always undergone extensive death and resuscitations, since this level is composed of “ascended masters” who have overcome their fear of death, and in fact, many of these parts live in a near-death, ecstatic and numb state of being. The Phoenix is the sign of an ascended master who has overcome death and risen again.

The infant is taught to organize their system along brain wave states, and to respond to cues. The earliest cues include golden whistles that play different notes worn by the Fathers, to summon specific parts; colors (the infant is taught to crawl to a green light when a gamma controller is out; to a blue light when a beta controller is out, a white light when an alpha controller is out, etc.).

Tones are also used extensively in early master programming. The top master controllers are each assigned a tone, to correspond with a brain wave state: the highest tone represents gamma, next highest, beta; next highest, alpha, then epsilon, then theta, and finally, the lowest, delta. Hearing the tone pulls the controllers for that system forward (the infant is taught with shocks and trauma combined with rewards to respond immediately).

Master controllers for a system are programmed to respond to the entire continuum, and internally, can “sing” the tones and hear back the response tones for their systems, for vary rapid and unconscious feedback loops and triggers. Jesuits always have perfect pitch because of this extensive use of tones and harmonics combined with the early songs used in programming, and have perfect auditory recall.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

Exposing the Vatican book: Part 4
September 30, 2021

III. How are the Jesuits financed?
August 30, 2021

book part 4
September 13, 2021
In "healing"

In "healing" In "mind control"

Pingback: Child Sex Trafficking by the Jesuits | cathy fox blog on child abuse

Naomi 12:44 am on October 11, 2021

For info (No need to publish my comment) :

The reference is Ezekial 16:4-14 and not Ezekial 14:4-16…

God bless you

Nao

★ Like

Pingback: Halloween 2021 | cathy fox blog on child abuse

T. 12:58 pm on December 12, 2021

“God” doesn’t love me or you. I’m not supposed to say that, but the one you call “God” has imprisoned us (bloodline families) here and we are at war with him. You don’t see the whole picture.

★ Like

T. 1:01 pm on December 12, 2021

Have you read Hidden_Hand interview? he mentioned you.

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Exposing the Vatican book: Part 4 Exposing the Vatican: Part 6 →

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

https://svalispeaksagain.wordpress.com/2021/10/07/exposing-the-vatican-part-5/

svalispeaksagain 4:30 pm on September 13, 2021

Tags: Jesuit (10), mind control (69), occultic, programming (60), ritual abuse (65), Vatican (10)

book part 4

Trigger Warning: Please be aware that this information was meant to help therapists understand programming by a large occultic organization, and could be very triggering for survivors.

IV. Programming Methods

In this section, I will discuss some of the methodologies that the Jesuits use to train and program the members of their order. This information not only discloses how their work is done; it is also the "master template" that the 12 secret societies that serve the Vatican also use within their organizations (with modifications). These organizations include Illuminati, Knights Templar, Knights of Malta, Opus Dei, Magnificat, Trinity, Order of the Golden Dawn, Rosicrucians and others.

This is by no means comprehensive, and instead, is simply a short overview. Also, programming methods are always being updated, and new experimental programs developed, so that any book on programming will be outdated within weeks of its writing. But the principles remain the same over time, even if some of the methods change.

Mengele

Josef Mengele is considered "the father of modern programming" due to the information and methods that he developed during his infamous end-point experiments on infants, young children and adults inside the Nazi death camps. These experiments were funded in part by the Vatican, as well as other organizations, because they were highly interested in improving their methodologies.

Before Mengele, most serious programming was begun between birth to two years old (the age at which programming was initiated varied between groups), since behaviorists believed that the infant brain was too immature to hold much programming. Mengele proved with his well-kept records based upon unutterably cruel research done on infants that the most effective programming was done prenatally; that prenatal programming automatically enters into the subconscious and deeper brain, and that the most effective time to create the core personality splits is during the first five months of life after conception. He also proved that fetuses can see, understand and respond to programming cues and images at this time in life, and can be taught to organize the splits based upon these cues.

Follow

A fetus and an infant can much more easily internalize an external object than an older child, since the fetal brain has no external world to contradict what it is told; and the infant brain is at its peak ability to absorb and process information during the first days of life.

The information that Mengele obtained was combined with data from other behaviorists, including attachment theory, to create programming that is considered "unbreakable." After the second world war, Mengele was often flown to Europe to program Jesuit infants. He worked for the Vatican, and left his personal stamp on many infants and young children programmed by them. He was also hired out at times (for an exorbitant fee) to other organizations, but his primary post-war work was continuing his research and programming Jesuit infants.

Mengele ran an infamous (within the occultic world) research center ("the institute") where he employed the top trainers within the 12 societies, who continued his research under his (brutal) supervision on end point trauma (trauma that takes the subject to physical or psychological death) and other traumas, and the effect on the human psyche. The volumes and volumes of carefully documented research data from that time are still held within the Vatican vaults, and have been replicated and shared throughout the world. The research that he began is still ongoing, as the search for better, "unbreakable" methods of programming continues. One of the larger research centers for experimental programming is on the West Coast of the United States; the large research facility is underground, and is combined with sophisticated milab (military laboratory) research. Another is in East Berlin; and another is in Prague in Europe, and yet another one exists in Rome.

In the following sections, I have divided up the programming methodologies used by the Jesuits into age categories, since different ages are considered "prime times" for the installation of different programs. But all foundational spiritual and other programs are created during the first few months of life in fetuses unfortunate enough to be selected by the Jesuits.

A. Infant Programming

When a Jesuit infant is born, it has already undergone significant programming within the womb. Immediately after conception and implantation of the genetically altered embryo (more on genetic research will be discussed later). Soon after conception, the occultic oracles place their hands on the womb of the expectant mother, to determine whether or not the embryo should be allowed to live. If yes, the embryo is dedicated to a demonic entity, and continues to grow.

By four months of gestation, early brain waves (delta waves) begin to appear in the fetal brain, and with it, some degree of consciousness. At this time, a primary trauma will often be intentionally engineered, to create one of the first splits (others will have been created even earlier). Often, the mother and fetus will be injected in utero with an agent that causes extreme pain, but does not cause labor. The fetus experiences extreme terror, excruciating pain, and will hear the mother screaming "Get it out!" regarding the fetus that appears to be causing her the intense pain in her womb.

This is a primary rejection trauma, and the pain and rejection combined will cause a core personality split. This split is in a deep delta (unconscious) brain state, and the programming begins in earnest immediately afterwards. Headphones are placed on the womb, and for hours, the young fetal splits are exposed to recordings regarding their identity, their wants, their beliefs, and their role in the new world order. This programming occurs during the 16th week of gestation onwards, and the information in the recordings is recorded at the deepest unconscious levels before the infant is ever born.

Secondary, tertiary and other traumas will also occur within the womb, with spiritual ceremonies that dedicate these intra-utero splits to different demonic entities. Before the infant draws his or her first breath, they will have the foundational core splits, their beliefs and identities firmly in place.

These traumas can include the use of electromagnetic waves to cause extreme pain in the fetus; fetal surgery; breaking the arm of the fetus; electroshock, flatlining the mother (to punish the fetus, who is blamed for the mother's "death" and resultant spiritual pain/anxiety) and other traumas. The mother is carefully monitored with sophisticated, high-tech medical intervention to prevent abortion or premature labor, which is the body's natural response to these types of traumas.

The demonic is used to keep the splits in the fetus separate, since in nature, the splits would try to rejoin automatically. The demonic creates a deep feeling of terror and re-experiencing of the primary traumas should the prenatal psyche attempt to join together.

To enable the fetus to survive such traumas and become dissocative (rather than give up and die), immediately after primary rejection traumas and other traumas, the programmers will offer love and care to the fetus in order to create a deep bond with the programmer (s). This is done by speaking kindly to the fetus and birthmother, soothing them and meeting their needs, with phrases such as "I love you" etc. being used to create attachments. These deep bonds must be addressed for healing.

Birth Trauma

Upon birth, an infant that is to be used by the Jesuits undergoes a very specific trauma. As soon as the infant is born, a Jesuit Father takes the infant and begins to smother it to death. The infant is asked spiritually, "Do you want to live?" Behind the Father is satan, and the infant is aware within their spirit that if they answer, "Yes" that satan will enter them. This being is hideous and terrifying, and it takes a very strong will to live to respond affirmatively. If the infant responds "No" they are smothered to death. If yes, they are allowed to breathe, and with their first cries in the physical world, satan attaches to the core.

The birth mother will be killed at the point of birth, and the newborn will be shown the body (which has been split open from the birth canal upwards) and is told "this is your fault" to create extreme guilt in the infant, and this is an underlying foundation for later guilt-based programming.

Nannies

When infants are very young, there are caretakers that perform physical care for the infant. These "nannies" or surrogate mothers take care of several infants at a time. While caretaking, they give bottles, rock the infant, and sing songs to them. These songs always contain programming embedded within them; they are songs about various spiritual (demonic) entities and praise to them, or of the joy of the coming order, or other messages. The goal is for the infant to associate caretaking and the relief of physical distress or abandoment feelings with love and loyalty to the order and the beings described. This is a terrible manipulation of an infant's need to attach to a caregiver, since these early songs are also embedded within the subconscious of the infant.

Helping the survivor

Because the prenatal and birth traumas are so emotionally and spiritually devastating, they will often only come up fairly late in therapy if ever, after the survivor has received help for other later splits. These primary traumas cause intense feelings of grief, rejection and despair, and are often the prime traumas underlying suicide programming. The demonic terror that causes fear of coming together may affect all parts of the systems, causing a prime fear of remembering or coming together for all parts, at an unconscious level.

It takes an experienced therapist to help an individual through these types of trauma. The survivor will be understanding that their entire life, even in the womb, was planned and programmed out, and feel intense anger at the betrayal and manipulation it involves. They may direct this anger at God, wondering where He was when this happened; and they may wonder if any part of them was ever not "owned" by the group.

This is where scriptures regarding God's love for individuals both before and during their creation in the womb can help; as well as praying and asking the Lord to show the survivor what He thought of them at conception. This is needed truth, to counteract a lifetime of being told and believing lies such as that the survivor was always the "Jesuit's", since they will have no memories before the prime traumas.

Because the programming and messages are implanted at such a very deep, unconscious level, it can also help to use a digital recorder, and record very specific scriptures and truths to counteract the lies (i.e. "reprogramming" with truth). It may take a significant amount of time to bring truth to these core beliefs, and is one reason that controllers at higher levels in the system may seem so "resistant" to truth: they may have buried at the unconscious, fetal level, prime traumas and programming that counteract other truths brought in.

Some helpful scriptures can include:

Ps.139:13: "For you created my inmost being; you knit me together in my mother's womb."

This verse directly counteracts the lie that the cult "owned" the person from the beginning, and shows who truly gave them life and their individual characteristics, in spite of prenatal programming.

Psalm 51:6. "Yet you desired faithfulness even in the womb; you taught me wisdom in that secret place."

How does the Lord teach wisdom in the womb? Only He truly knows the answer. But He does minister even to the fetus in the womb, as is made clear in this verse. The programming messages are NOT the only things the fetus was aware of before birth.

Isaiah 44:2. “This is what the Lord says— he who made you, who formed you in the womb, and who will help you: Do not be afraid, Jacob, my servant, Jeshurun, whom I have chosen.”

How wonderful for the survivor to know that they were loving formed in the womb by the LORD, and that He chose them before birth, regardless of what the oracles said.

Isaiah 49:1. “Listen to me, you islands; hear this, you distant nations:Before I was born the Lord called me; from my mother’s womb he has spoken my name.”

Not only did the Lord call the survivor to know and serve Him from the womb, He even spoke their (real, not cult) name. He spoke the name of their future destiny, and no amount of programming can undo this.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

The Hierarchy of the Occult
May 3, 2018
In "mind control"

Vatican book part 10
June 11, 2022
In "healing"

Vatican Book Part 1
August 17, 2021
In "healing"

Ellen Atkin 5:51 pm on September 13, 2021

Huge thanks. Your courage and warrior status is very much appreciated.

★ Like

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← III. How are the Jesuits financed?

Exposing the Vatican book: Part 4 →

https://svalispeaksagain.wordpress.com/2021/09/13/book-part-4/

Blog at WordPress.com.

Svali Speaks!

The Life of Svali – an Ex-Illuminati Mind Control Programmer

Overcoming Denial

September 18, 2008 by koniword

"You know you're making all of this up, it isn't true. I certainly don't remember any of the things you are telling me." The speaker was my mother, two years ago, and she was telling me in no uncertain terms that she did not believe me. Her amnesia is intact and strong, protecting her. I had confronted her about the fact that she and I had spent a lifetime in the cult, and that I loved her and wanted her to get out. I had told her specific names of people we both knew in this phone call, the first time I had spoken with her in a year. "Mom, you're dissociative, that's why you don't remember," I told her. "No I'm not, nothing happened", she maintained. I decided to blast at her denial a little. She knew that I had never studied or heard German consciously in the daytime, although she had spoken it to me at night since I was very young. She did not consciously know or understand it at all. "Then why can I speak German now that I've integrated with my back people?" I asked her, in German. "I've never studied it, you know that, or heard it. I studied Spanish and Latin for my languages in school." There was a pause. "Maybe you're psychic, and learned it telepathically," she answered. My mother had to maintain her denial, even then, and come up with some explanation for the unexplainable. But how did she understand my question, which was in German, to her?

My son is integrating quickly now. He had almost 100 inside people when he first came to live with me two and a half years ago at the age of 10 (the Illuminati fragment their children heavily from infancy on), and now he has only about 15. Lately, he has told me the real David, the core child, has been coming out and experiencing life. I am thankful to God that he is young enough that he could heal, and try not to feel jealous that it has been easier and faster for him than for me. His therapist told me why it is easier for him the other day: "Your son feels safe now, and he has not one, but two parents validating him and saying they believe him when he comes to them. This means he doesn't have to spend a lifetime overcoming parental denial, and that's one reason he is healing so fast."

I have never, ever told my son that he is making it up when he deals with memories. I pray with him, and ask God to heal the memories, and to bring security to my son, and to fill the painful areas with the knowledge of His love and Privacy & Cookies: This site uses cookies. By continuing to use this website, you agree to their use.

To find out more, including how to control cookies, see here: Cookie Policy
Close and accept

I believe that denial is a large barrier to healing. Often, when a survivor begins to recover memories, they will go to family members for validation, or to confront

Search

Categories

Interview with Svali – The Illuminati in America
Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali
Multiple Personalities – Brokenness
Other Authors
Other Illuminati Articles by Svali
Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali
Svali Answers Questions
Svali's Personal Life
The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People

Betrayal programming brain wave programming color programming Complex Polyfragmentation cult Cult Abuse Cult Safety Cult Secrecy Denial Programming DID dissociation end times Illuminati plan end times scenario Escaping from the Cult government programming Having needs Healing from Ritual Abuse Hiding from the Cult History of Ritual Abuse Illuminati bankers Illuminati jobs jewel

amming
D Origin of the Illuminati programming programming

Blog at WordPress.com

them. They are also frequently faced with invalidation, denial, or even verbal abuse from those same family members, who need to maintain their own denial to protect themselves from facing painful truths. "You're crazy", "You're sick", "You have a sick imagination," "How can you make these things up," "You need help", and more cruel phrases are thrown at the person whose amnesia is beginning to break, from those who want them to maintain it. After all, if ONE person starts remembering, then OTHERS might, and the others in the family system might not be psychologically strong or healthy enough to remember. I think one of the saddest realities is that it takes more psychological integrity, honesty, and truth-seeking to remember something as painful as ritual abuse, yet the person who is remembering is told the opposite by family members unwilling to face their own pain.

The disapproval of family members is extremely painful, and is enough to cause some to doubt the reality of their own memories. "Maybe I am making this up, otherwise why don't THEY remember?" the survivor thinks. Or, "I love my parents/siblings/cousins and I don't want to hurt them. What if they're right?" When memories are first recovered, they often come in flashes that last a second or two, are vague, and may seem unreal to the person remembering. Add the messages from others that is loud and clear: It is NOT okay to remember, and the survivor may shut down.

Denial may also come from within. It is a basic protective mechanism when a person is confronted with pain; how often do we CONSCIOUSLY deny our own faults ("It wasn't my fault, I was having a bad day, and everyone was against me") to protect our self image. The more painful the blow to the self concept (since people desperately want to maintain an image of themselves as "okay), the greater the need to deny.

If events that a person went through destroyed their ability to accept themselves as a worthwhile human being (and ritual abuse does this to the maximum), then they will need to deny that it occurred in order to function in daily life. This is one reason why once the denial is let go of, functionality may temporarily falter in the survivor, as they process the horrendous truths of a childhood filled with pain. It is also a reason why denial can serve a protective function, and should be let go of slowly, carefully, with the help and support of a competent therapist. Some protective denial in the early stages can be good, as long as the person does not recontact cult members, since it allows the memories to come forward slowly and in an amount that is easier to manage.
Denial may also be programmed in (denial programming). This is done from early childhood, when the child is taught methodically in a calculated manner to disbelieve what they are seeing in front of them, and to create alters who will deny, and punish severely if the person does not deny the ritual abuse. This may be linked to suicidal or flood programming as well.

I had an inside part who was known as "Forced Denial", created when I was 2 ½ years old. Her only job was to ensure that I would deny that I had ever been abused, even when confronted with overwhelming evidence that it had happened (such as physical scars, court records that indicated abuse in early childhood, and validation from some family members.) I would go through a horrendous abreaction early in my healing process, after screaming, raging, and crying my eyes out from the pain, and then F.D. would come out and calmly announce, "Nothing happened, I am making this all up." She believed she was protecting my life, since there was suicide programming that kicked in if she didn't do her job, and well as violent protectors who would destroy her. She would be calm, but sweating heavily, as she denied, until the day she realized that her job was no longer needed, and that those who used to punish her (and me) no longer needed to act out.

Overcoming denial may mean overcoming a lifetime of training to deny, and the intense fear of punishment if the person doesn't. Safety, no contact with cult members, and reasoning with these parts can all help the need to deny decrease.

Blog at WordPress.com.

techniques Reaccessing of the Survivor Remembering Abuse Ritual Abuse Roots of the Illuminati Shell Programming Spiritual Abuse Spiritual Programming suicidal programming Survivors of Ritual Abuse Svali is Alive Svali is dead Svali is missing Svali is Safe Svali poem Svali questions techniques Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse Therapists VR programming

Finally, denial may come from society. The survivor has it ground in from infancy by the cult that "No one will ever believe you, they will think you are crazy if you ever talk, and lock you up." Our society today often looks the other way, or looks askance at the survivor. Groups such as the FMS were created to blitz the media with unfounded statements about memory retrieval, and to invalidate survivors who have the courage to speak out and say, "This is real, and it happens." How many news stories are out there that make ritual abuse look as if it is a "modern hysteria" or attempt to denigrate therapists willing to work with and help survivors? I know that when I was in San Diego, leadership council was well aware of the power of the media, and the council had a saying, "Don't attack your enemy, discredit him (in the media)." They found it much more effective, and reporters such as M. Sauer do an excellent job for them. I hope that he, and others that I knew in the group, will learn that they can get out.

The survivor who is able to overcome the denial of family, internal denial, and programmed denial, will still be met by blank looks, or worse, those who turn their backs on them, and say, "I don't want to hear about this, " or "I can't hear about this." Pastors will say this, social workers, CPS workers, and those whose comfort zone is crossed with the thought that ritual abuse really occurs. Those who tell the survivor, "I believe you", at times may seem far and few between, and I applaud their willingness to look at realities which often make us feel uncomfortable. No one WANTS to think that human beings can do this to one another, or that such horrific abuse is possible.

I am here to say loud and clear that ritual abuse occurs. It is real. It is not made up. The people who disclose their abuse are not crazy, they are not liars, they are not looking for attention or sympathy. They are some of the most courageous, intelligent, and psychologically honest people that I have ever known in my life, and many are facing some of the most tremendous emotional pain possible by the grace of God, and surviving it. My one hope is that someday, soon, our society will wake up and come out of its own denial, and be willing to help take action on behalf of those that have survived, and are working desperately to escape the reach of the cult and those associated with it. May God bless each person who takes the steps to leave and to walk in the truth and freedom, and to fight against a great evil in our land (and around the world).

Posted in Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali, Multiple Personalities - Brokenness | 2 Comments »

Complex Polyfragmentation – DID

September 18, 2008 by koniword

Important note: this article is not meant to be therapy, or to replace therapy with a skilled and qualified person, which is essential in healing from severe trauma. These are only the opinions of a survivor. Trigger warning: mentions cult abuse, dissociation, and trauma

Complex polyfragmentation: a coping mechanism for the survivor

In order to survive ritual abuse, a child will often learn to dissociate, and dissociate heavily. The child has undergone some of the most horrific abuse humanly imaginable, and most find a way to cope. One of the ways that is encouraged in certain groups, such as the Illuminati, is to create an elaborate defensive system. In psychological terms, the child fragments, then fragments again. Eventually, the child has polyfragmented.
What is polyfragmentation? The term comes from the root poly, meaning many, and fragments. In complex polyfragmenatation, the survivor will have not only alter systems, but hundreds or even thousands of fragments, isolated parts of their mind created to do a job, and do it well and unthinkingly. Often the job is one that would be abhorrent to the main personality or presenting system. The further away from core beliefs, the greater usually the dissociation and fragmentation that must occur. In other words, a LOT of trauma has to happen to make a person do something that they really don't want to do. And the person has to feel very far away from themselves as well when doing it. The cult will purposely try to create a polyfragmented system for this very reason. The person is more dissociated from themselves, and is often easier for them to control.

How are polyfragmented systems structured? These are individual, and will vary from not only person to person, but also with the group the person belonged to, the trainers, the abilities of the child, and tasks involved that the child must do. There is no "cookie cutter approach" in most cults to creating polyfragmented systems, but there are certain characteristics that are common.

What might a polyfragmented system look like? I will share some based on my memories as a trainer in this group, plus insights from my own healing process.

1. Protectors: these are parts that were created to do the jobs that had to be done, and saved the life of the young child. Cult protectors had to look mean and scary, like the child's perpetrators. They also become perpetrators when the child grows into an adult, since they have no choice. They can be ruthless, angry, or may believe that they are demons. Some growl, some hiss, some believe that they are powerful animals. And all were a little child who was asked to do the unthinkable, forced to act in ways that he or she didn't want to. They laugh at vulnerability, and trust no one. And with good reason, based upon their experiences in the cult. With therapy and time, they can also help keep the person safe from their perpetrators, as these parts will "kick butt" if they feel threatened.

2. Intellectuals: the cult WANTS intellectual alters who can observe, go between systems, learn information quickly and download it to outsiders. These might be recorders, computers, scholars. They may know several languages, and versed in different philosophies. Brilliant, cognitive, they often believe that they can outwit those around them, including therapists. But they also know much of the life history that the others don't, since they rarely have strong feelings. These parts can "read the life history" without a tear or emotion. When they are out, the person appears "flat" to say the least, in psychological terms.
3. Denial people: these are intellectual, and are created to deny that anything bad ever happened. Life was wonderful, the parents perfect and loving, and the suicidality and PTSD symptoms are just strange artifacts without "any reason," according to these parts. A person can have a full blown abreaction, and five minutes later, a denier will come out and say it was all "made up." They are often afraid of punishment if the person remembers, and have severe trauma motivating them.

4. Controllers/head honchos/"top dogs": these are the system leaders. They know what is going on at all times in their system. In a military system, it might be a general, in a protector system, the most powerful protector; in a metals system, the platinums, or in a jewel system, the highest jewels, such as diamond, ruby, or emerald. Usually there are several leaders in a system that share the responsibility. They can also become invaluable helpers over time if they choose to give up cult loyalty.

5. Child alters: these want praise from the adult leaders, and often come out for rewards, or sweets. They will report on others inside unless they can learn that it is safe to NOT do so, since they are motivated both by fear of punishment, and wanting praise from those above them. They are also often the "heart" of a polyfragmented system, and can feel love, joy, or fear and trembling. Often, they want hugs and to be told that they are "okay".

6. Punishers: why wait for an outside person to punish you if you can create someone inside to do it first? Children will often identify heavily with their perpetrators, and if the punishment is severe and frequent, they will internalize the perpetrator to try and keep themselves "in line" and avoid punishment externally. The cult will capitalize on this, and often trainers will leave as their "calling card" an alter named after themselves. This one will be an internal trainer, or punisher, or enforcer. Their job is to keep things in line, and will often try to sabotage therapy. They are often fearful of external punishment if they don't do their job. Internal punishers will also activate self punishment sequences inside (such as flood programming/ suicide programming, or other self harm sequences) if the person begins breaking away from the cult and the old rules. These parts may take time to conivince that they can change their old way of doing things, since they were often accountable to the outside handler/trainer if things weren't kept in line.

7. Feeling alters: the feelings were overwhelming and infinitely traumatizing in childhood. It threatened the child's survival and sanity. The solution? Parcel them out over several internal parts and/or fragments. Divide the feeling up so that it feels more manageable. Feeling alters often get locked away inside, and when they come out in therapy, the feeling may hit "full force" at first. A child alter may come out screaming, or terror stricken, or wailing in uncontrollable grief and pain, until they are grounded in the here and now. Often, feelings were heavily punished in the cult, so it was psychologically necessary to bury them deeply within the psyche in order to survive. These parts may be very separated from the parts that know what happened to cause the feelings in a highly fragmeneted system, so that the feelings seem to come out of nowhere, without any cause. With time and healing, they can hook up with the intellectuals inside who observed, and other parts who went through the same trauma, giving meaning to the feelings and helping to resolve them.
8. Internal councils: most cults have leadership councils of some sort. And many people internalize them inside. It's another example of internalizing perpetrators, and these have a vested interest in "keeping things in line" until they realize that they can leave the cult and be safe. Then, they can become an immense strength for healing. A personal may have a local leadership council internalized, or spiritual councils that represent outside people, such as an internal druidic council or group of ascended masters that help run things inside.

9. Sexual alters: created to handle the overwhelming trauma of early childhood sexual abuse, they took the feelings it was too painful for a young child to understand. Some had to learn to enjoy the abuse, or pretend to, and were heavily rewarded for this response.

10. Amnesic alters: these are known as the "front", the "clueless ones", "those who don't know anything", etc. These have the job of not remembering. Otherwise, as a child, they were heavily punished. Usually, they are very glad to not remember anything, and the other parts who were abused at times envy them or dislike their "protected life history." This can create a lot of intrasystem hostility or warfare, until the amnesic parts begin accepting that abuse did occur. Reminding abused parts that the amnesia saved the child's (and their life) helped my system with this.

11. The workers: these do the jobs of daily life, and usually are part of the presenting systems. These take care of the house, got married, take care of the children, and may hold a highly responsible job as well. These are the competent parts created that hide the fact that the person has undergone a lifetime of traumatic abuse and degradation. These parts can also be a great strength, as they share that life can be good with other more traumatized parts inside.
12. Hosts: there may be a "day host" (see presenters), a "night host" for the cult, or hosts for various systems or times in the person's life. Occasionally, the survivor of severe generational cult abuse may find to their dismay that a greater portion of their life was invested in and given to cult activities than day ones, and the "night host" is stronger than the "day host"! This happened to me. Fortunately, my "night host" was the one who left the cult, so she had plenty of strength and pull to give to staying safe and away from the group. I also had a "host" that had handled the summers spent in Europe, during those times in childhood, and a "hidden host" who never fully presented to protect herself from others (she manipulated the presenters to sit in front of her, telling them what to do). Each person's system will handle this task differently. In general, the greater the trauma, the greater the distrust of outside people, and the more likely that the host will be a facade, or heavily protected.

13. Core splits: can be created from severe and psychologically threatening very early childhood trauma. This used to be done intentionally by some cult groups to create larger and more dissociated systems.

14. The core: this is the original child, the one who created all of the others inside. The child's systems will depend upon the traumas and the creativity of the original child, as well as her need to protect herself from the abuse of others that might have destroyed her. In some systems, the core will be very young, or an infant, if the abuse was extremely early and severe. Core issues surrounding her will usually involve parents or parental figures who caused severe trauma. This might include abandonment, torture, or other forms of cruelty to a young child.

15. Function codes, access codes, halt codes, system codes: these are fragments that might be put in to do certain jobs, and are created to only do that job when called out by triggers such as letters, numbers, phrases, or other auditory stimuli. These are created with deep trauma and are very intentionally done by perpetrators.

16. Spiritual parts: these may have a variety of beliefs that cover different spiritualities internally. There may be one over-riding spiritual belief for the system, or several. For example, a spiritual system created by the cult may include aspects of Luciferianism, druidism, Temple of Set teachings, Ancient Babylonian mystery religions, etc. The host or presenters may have a completely conflicting religious belief system, and there may be hostility between the parts that hold opposing beliefs. In my own life, my presenters were strong Christians, and this gave the stability and comfort needed to bring healing to the parts inside. It also opened the way to begin forgiveness, one of the most difficult and important tasks in the healing process.
This has been an overview of just a few of the types of personalities that might be found in a complex polyfragmented system. It is important to be aware that each person is unique; that many people will have coped with trauma in their own way. This is not meant to say that every cult survivor has all of these personalities, but are one survivor's opinion based upon her experiences and memories. My hope is that this article will help to educate others about this issue.

copyright 2000 svali

Posted in Multiple Personalities - Brokenness | Leave a Comment »

Is the Illuminati Provoking an Economic Collapse?

September 18, 2008 by koniword

Is the Illuminati Provoking an Economic Collapse?
By Henry Makow Ph.D.
September 16, 2008
http://www.henrymakow.com/is_the_illuminati_proviking_a.html

by Henry Makow Ph.D.

Sept. 16

Fed Bails Out AIG
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601087&sid=aEWiEF0hDbgU&refer=home

When asked if Makow's article affected this decision, Ben Bernanke replied with a terse "No Comment"

Sept. 15, 2008

We may be on the verge of a stock market crash reminiscent of 1929.

I was watching a special CNBC program on the financial crisis when the news came across that Moody's had downgraded the Insurance giant AIG (American International Group.) This company was already on the ropes Monday when its stock crumbled to $4.75 from $11, %60 in one day. It was down from a $70 52-week-high. The company had gone to the Fed for a bailout. It was estimated it needed $40 billion.

Because of the Moody's downgrade, it emerges that it will need alot more money to avert bankruptcy. This is a massive company that holds the pensions of millions of employees. A money manager estimated that a trillion dollars would be lost if AIG declares bankruptcy. The whole world financial system could be taken down. He said banks in the Far East were already acting like this is inevitable, and the collapse already has been set in motion.

As you can imagine, the CNBC commentators were frantic. One demanded to know how the Fed can allow this to happen. "We know they print money," he said. Another wondered if the States whose pension funds were held by AIG could organize a bailout. Not enough time, he was told.

The bottom line is that Tuesday and the rest of this week could be ugly so be prepared. The second bottom line is that this Depression like the last appears to be caused by a deliberate contraction of credit. House prices are falling because banks don't have the money to lend to house buyers. As a result, portfolios holding mortgage backed securities are tumbling, taking banks with them. The Fed, after bailing out Fannie May and Fredie Mack, have let Lehman Brothers fail. AIG appears to be next and the dominoes will continue to fall.

At this time, it is important to be aware that an illuminati defector known as "Svali" said she was taught that the "end of the world" scenario involved an economic collapse. Remember the Illuminati is a Masonic cult founded and funded by the central bankers who own the Fed. Here is her full testimony given about ten year ago.

"Want to hear the end of the world scenario the Illuminati taught me? It was cult propaganda, but this is how they believed the New Order would be ushered in:

There will be continued conflict in the mideast, with a severe threat of nuclear war being the culmination of these hostilities. An economic collapse that will devastate the economy of the US and Europe, much like the great depression.

One reason that our economy continues limping along is the artificial supports that the Federal Reserve had given it, manipulating interest rates, etc. But one day, this won't work (or this leverage will be withdrawn on purpose) and the next great depression will hit.

The government will call in its bonds and loans, and credit card debts will be called in. There will be massive bankruptcies nationwide. Europe will stabilize first,and Germany, France and England (surprise) will have the strongest economies, and will institute through the UN an international currency. Japan will also pull out, although their economy will be weakened.

Peacekeeping forces will be sent out by the UN and local bases to prevent riots. The leaders will reveal themselves, and people will be asked to make a pledge of loyalty during a time of chaos and financial devastation.

Doesn't sound pleasant, does it? I don't know the exact time frame for all of this, and wouldn't want to even guess. The good news is that if a person is debt-free, owes nothing to the government or credit debt, and can live self sufficiently, they may do better than others. I would invest in gold, not stocks, if I had the income. Gold will once again be the world standard, and dollars will be pretty useless (remember after the Civil War? Our money will be worth about what confederate money was after the collapse).

All this said, it could just be cult propaganda taught to me and others to frighten us. It may be that none of this will happen. I sincerely hope not. I also strongly believe that God is able to stay the hand of the wicked, and to take care of our nation and others, if we turn to Him."

That noted, let's remember the words of Denis Healey, former British Defence Secretary and Secretary of the Exchequer: "World events do not occur by accident: They are made to happen, whether it is to do with national issues or commerce; and most of them are staged and managed by those who hold the purse strings."

I think we are in for a recession, maybe even a Depression but I don't think the Illuminati is ready to declare their New World Order just yet. However, this could be part of a larger scenario leading to World War Three, similar to the role the Great Depression played as a precursor to World War Two.

The Illuminati goal is to torture the human race until we cry out to them for world government, anything to stop the pain.

http://www.henrymakow.com/is_the_illuminati_proviking_a.html

Posted in Other Authors | Leave a Comment »

Your Tax Dollars at Work – (Mind Control)

September 16, 2008 by koniword

I am writing an article that is somewhat angry, but I can't help myself. I am angry that my tax dollars are being used, and yours as well, to fund certain projects. I am risking my articles here at this site being pulled for writing this, but I can't stay silent.
The projects are under the umbrella of the Central Intelligence Agency in Langley, Virginia. These projects are investigations in the techniques of different forms of mind control and how easily "subjects" can be coerced, drugged, hypnotized, traumatized, or otherwise brought under "control" and turned into willing workers who believe fully that they are doing a "good thing" for either their "country" or their "family".

I should know. I was a victim of these brutal experiments, and later in life I was an experimenter on others.

There is a ton of documentation and evidence both through governmental records and online that this stuff really happens. That MK-ULTRA, BLUEBIRD, ARTICHOKE, MONARCH and other projects funded by our tax dollars were and are being covertly used to abuse and torture innocent children and later adults through these programs. The fact that there IS documentation available in the face of the notorious amount of governmental paper shredding that goes in shows the sheer volume of the documentation and notes that were kept and that could not be completely erased from the public record.

With project PAPERCLIP, it is known that nazi doctors (you know, the ones who did those experiments on people in Germany during WWII) were imported into the United States. While ostensibly they were there to help the US increase its technology, many of them also shared their knowledge of human neurophysiology, and were recruited into overseeing ongoing experiments.

Enough third person. I will share my own personal memories of this. At night, by age 8, Dr. Timothy Brogan of George Washington University, my main trainer, and my mother would take me to Langley, Virginia. I remember there were dark trees in the fields behind the long buildings at one end, and that we always went to the same building. Underneath there were classrooms, used for training. I would sit in a group with other children, and watch films on : How to kill someone (we were forced to analyze these films, asked by the "teacher" what the "subject" or "mark" who was killed did wrong, and how the kill was set up. We would analyze and discuss everything, including wind direction, type of firearm used, scope used, etc.

Target practice: there was a shooting gallery there and we would do literally hours of target practice. We learned to take a gun apart and put it together again in ten seconds or less. We were timed. Training films: projectors showed different films on every conceivable topic, including ones on "These are your leaders" with a conference table, and then the top Illuminati leaders in the US rising when the top one entered the room. Films that were sexually explicit, violent films, and films that discussed loyalty. We practiced how to "drop a tag" (someone following us) and how to follow someone without being detected. In one room was an isolation tank. It was NOT used with group exercises, but for special training sessions. Usually the room was sealed off when not in use. Language training: different people would come in and both in class and one on one teach different languages. At times, my mother would sit and chat with her friend, Sidney Gottlieb (who was very very egotistical in this setting), or with Dr. G. Steiner, a medical doctor who was working on this project with children. I don't know who the other children were, or where they came from. Their families would come and pick them up afterwards, usually a mother or father or family friend. The exercises would be done by 4:30 am.
At Tulane Medical Center (home of "The Institute", considered one of the top research facilities in the United States for mind control techniques and exploration of the paranormal, near death experiences and using recorded messages to repeat a message over and over were used. They believed that the near death state would engrave a message or belief into the deepest levels of the unconscious, and the "rebirth" experience (which created a new alter at a very deep level) created a very very loyal "subject". It did. The subject was terrified and told that if they ever disobeyed, they would go back to the "near death" state, so few thought of being "disloyal" under those circumstances.

The equipment that our tax dollars bought for these organizations working under a governmental umbrella was very sophisticated: VR equipment, and use of the most sophisticated neurolinguistic techniques available. And people who were taught in how to use it all to maximum effectiveness.

By the time I was 23, I was a head trainer in San Diego. At night, I continued to experiment on others, under the supervision of Jonathan Meier and eventually Col. Aquinos, who was a regional director over our group. And sure enough, each evening after we were done, we would upload our data that was heavily encrypted to the data banks at Langley, Virginia. We had to go through six levels of security passwords at the CIA data center before we came to the area where data could be uploaded. They wanted to know the results of experiments ongoing everywhere, and there were strict protocols to report any unusual reactions, anomalies, or new medication combinations that were especially effective.

I believe that most of the American public has no idea that certain governmental organizations are using their money this way. I also believe that most who read this will disbelieve that the CIA and a respected medical center could be the site of such experimentation on the minds and psyches of both children and adults (we did it on both). But it is the truth, and I am sorry that it is, because I am angry that part of my taxes taken out when I work goes to support ongoing abuse. My only hope is that someday, this will be discovered, brought out into the open and the public will be able to scrutinize what occurred and still occurs, and it can be stopped.

Christmas in the Cult

September 16, 2008 by koniword

Christmas is a time when people think warmly of family gathered around the Christmas tree, sharing laughter as presents are opened and sleepy-eyed children excited see what Santa has brought. Adults share egg nog and cheer, and happy traditions are followed.
But for the child raised in a generational satanic cult, Christmas has a very different meaning. In the daytime, the normal activities of shopping for presents and going to parties occurs, and the family may have a large "warm" gathering of its members in the day.

But at night, things are quite different. The child who in the daytime looks forward to Santa and presents under the day, quakes with terror at the thought of what will come at night.

The winter solstice occurs on December 21, and this is one of the highest pagan/celtic holidays, since the "New Year" begins after this date for the cult. Special ceremonies are planned to ensure the coming of a new year filled with power, and the return of the sun's lengthening days (many occult ceremonies are also based on ancient sun deity worship). Added to this is the Christian holiday in celebration of Christ's birth, which the occult group despises, and special ceremonies are planned to desecrate and twist the meaning of this day. For many families in the occult, the whole week from December 21 to December 26 is filled with activities, since family members are naturally gathered together, and there is no need to explain missed days from school for the children.

The cruelty surrounding Christmas and the solstice is intense. Children are often abused by cult members dressed as Santa; or a mocking of the nativity occurs with the end result that "Herod" succeeds in slaying the baby Jesus (with ritual murder of an infant occurring). The child may be sexually abused under a Christmas tree, and paraphernalia of the holiday are given a new and dark meaning.

Instead of a celebration of birth, Christmas for the child raised in a cult family becomes a time of horror and death. Programming may occur, with images associated with the holiday implanted, and the child told that seeing these images (such as a lighted Christmas tree, or nativity scene) will mean contact with "family" or other messages placed in under trauma.

Children (and adults) may receive presents with hidden meanings that remind them of Christmas past and the trauma that is meant to bind them to "family".

A mock "holiday feast" may occur, but instead of egg nog and ham, the meal is gruesome.

These are just a few of the associations that occur in the dissociated alters of the child raised in a cult family, and why many survivors feel a mixture of anticipation and fear when the holidays come around. Added to this, once the child grows up, intense efforts by cult family members to recontact will occur during these holiday times at which all family members are expected to be present.

Panic and anxiety can occur for the adult survivor on these anniversary dates of intense trauma and rituals, and they may wonder why a holiday that is associated with good cheer for them means the desire to hide and cower.

It can help if the survivor learns for themselves where the panic is coming from, and which triggers were placed in. This usually will occur in therapy, or from journaling.

If a survivor has stopped contact with family members, then receives a flood of Christmas cards or gifts, they should be cautious, and aware that these items could be intensely triggering. A desire to "call and recontact" family members will often be awakened as a result, and the survivor will need to work through this in therapy.

Child alters often hold the most horrific memories, and listening to them, allowing them to process their trauma and fears in therapy, journaling, and art work can also help.

Creating new holiday traditions that feel safe can also help. Some survivors celebrate Christmas by doing things very differently than their family of origin to help reinforce that they are able to break free of all the traditions that their family held. And having outside support and safety help most of all during this time.

Christmas is an especially difficult time for many survivors. But as adults, survivors can choose to break free from the traumatic meanings it once held, and to create a safe Christmas for themselves.

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Leave a Comment »

Easter in the Cult

September 16, 2008 by koniword

Easter in the Cult
There are certain times of the year that are particularly difficult for survivors of generational occult. These are "holiday dates" that correspond to rituals celebrated by occult groups. While the actual rites and practices may vary somewhat from group to group, there are certain similarities among many.

Easter is one such time. In the group that I grew up in, during the daytime I was allowed a normal experience. Easter was a celebration of springtime, of lengthening days, and the new flowers signaling winter's end. I often enjoyed playing with waving palm branches during Palm Sunday, and hunting for Easter eggs on the church grounds. And of course, every year a small Easter basket appeared with a chocolate rabbit or lamb.

But at night, the holiday time was celebrated in a very different manner. The preparation leading up to it often lasted during the week before (there was no school during Easter week when I was a child, in the years before "Spring break" became common. Most schools let out for a week to ten days during this week). The events of this time were quite painful, and including brutalization, sexual abuse and other rituals surrounding fertility rites, culminating at the end of the week with a mock crucifixion. Often a child would be chosen to undergo crucifixion in a grim mockery of the Christian celebration, and the adults would state that this ritual was an offering to debase the Christian tradition and show its lack of meaning.

I do know that young boys were chosen for this ritual, and it was horrible to see.

At times, a mock "resurrection" ceremony might occur, but the resurrector was not Jesus, but a demonic entity who would enter into the person brought to a near death state.

The spiritual roots of these ceremonies were created to allow the passage of the demonic into the participants, and to "seal" them as they participated in the ceremony. At times, a golden chalice was passed between participants, and the child's blood filled the cup that participants drank.

I am finding in my healing that more and more of what was done to me involved dark occult ceremonies as a child, such as I describe here. These ceremonies allowed the entrance of the demonic, and one of the hardest parts of the group programming to break has been the hold that these memories, and the spiritual destruction that ensued, has had on me. Part of my own healing process is involving undergoing deliverance, and replacing the gruesome, negative spirituality of my childhood with a faith that includes love, mercy, and forgiveness, the antithesis of the harsh and punishing ceremonies that I saw. One of the most important tasks for the survivor when remembering these types of events, (and anniversary dates often bring memories) is to find healing and self-forgiveness for participating, and to reach out for a belief system that can replace the negative. For me, that belief is Christianity, and my hope is that others will know its comfort during this difficult time of year.

It can also help to realize that so often the group makes certain things sound final. "You are sealed for life", they tell the children, or "You agreed to this, and now you are one of us forever." This is nonsense. No contract is binding forever, especially one created under coercion, and once a person has free choice, they can choose to break childhood spiritual contracts made under duress. The group during holidays and ritual events tries to inculcate helplessness and a feeling that "Now I can never leave", but this message is absolutely false and plays on a small child's fears. Instead, as an adult, the survivor has choices, and can choose to break those covenants and enter into freedom.

This is a battle, and I don't want to make it sound as if it is easy. It isn't, and I am still battling this is my own life, but it is well worth breaking free of the hold that these ceremonies and demonic entanglements have in the life of the survivor.

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Leave a Comment »

Dealing With Threats

September 16, 2008 by koniword

I am at work, and one of my responsibilities as office manager is to answer the phone. In this age of privacy, almost one fourth of my customers have 'private' or 'caller unknown' as their identification on my caller i.d. machine. So I think nothing of answering the call identified as 'caller unknown'.
"Why aren't you dead yet?" the voice asks, then hangs up.

I sit there, feeling as if I have been kicked in the stomach. It hurts most because the call comes from a source close to me: my mother, a leader in the group that I left, who is very angry with me for my decision. Apparently she would rather have her child dead than out, and this hurts.

One of the issues that most survivors leaving an abusive cult must face is that of receiving threats from the group. These threats can take various forms, including:

-Hang up calls. These can occur in sequences meant to trigger a survivor, or else the cult escapee may be literally flooded with dozens of hang up calls, one after another. The message is obvious: the calls communicate to the survivor silently that the cult knows where they are.

-Phone threats: these are verbal messages meant to intimidate and harass. For instance, when I first considered leaving the cult, I got a phone call from San Diego. There was a baby crying in the background, then the sound of a young child screaming. The caller, a man, then said, "Isn't it nice to know that your children are still alive?" My children were in San Diego, living with my husband, and I was being told that there safety depended on my decisions.

-Accessing calls: these are similar to the hang up calls, but when the survivor answers, tones are played, music may be played, or a name spoken which is meant to trigger an alter to come out. For instance, the person calling may ask, " Is Karen there?" This is an alter created in the person who is supposed to be triggered out. If for some reason the alter is not triggered out (i.e. the survivor is working in therapy to break this programming) then the caller will say, "I'm sorry, I have a wrong number." This makes it sound innocent, but a survivor should be suspicious if there are 50 ‘wrong numbers’ in the period of a day or two.

Phone threats and messages are the first level of threats that a survivor will face. But if for some reason they anger individuals in the group, or if the group wants the survivor back badly enough, then the next level of threat can occur. This is abduction and harming the survivor.

I should know. This happened to me two months ago, and is one reason I have not posted here as frequently in the past weeks.
But I also refuse to be intimidated by this group, and so am choosing to speak out in spite of what happened.

When the group believes that they are truly losing control over the survivor, they may step up their efforts beyond phone threats. Instead, they will look for a time when the survivor is alone and vulnerable. Or, they will call and trigger out an alter, and tell them to meet a ‘friend’. This is often done to littles, who are trusting, and keep hoping that they will receive love or a ‘treat’ from those they look up to.

Once the person is lured or found alone, then abduction is usually easy for the cult to do. The person will be forced into a van, or vehicle. They may be driven to a house, or the abuse may occur in the back of a van with windows drawn.

These people are able to brutalize quickly and swiftly in a small space, and have the equipment with them when they make a ”call”. The victim will be told things such as ‘You haven’t been doing your job’, or other threats. Their internal programming will then be reinforced, with torture or even rape as punishment for disobedience. The victim will be gagged during the punishment to prevent others from hearing what is occurring. This will also usually occur in an isolated area, far from houses or intrusions.

The victim will then be returned to a nearby area, or to their car, and told to ”remember what they learned”. When it happened to me recently, I was told, ”See how easy it is to find you? Think about your children, and how easy it would be to do the same to them.”

What Can Be Done I immediately reported the abduction and abuse to my therapist, my husband, and my pastor. I considered calling the police, but wondered how they would receive the following: ”I was abducted by a man who I don’t know in a cream colored van with a temporary license plate, so it probably isn’t the real one. He used a halt command on me given to him by my mother and my trainer from San Diego, since they are the only two who know this, that’s why I didn’t fight him when he tied me up. He shocked me, so there are no bruised, and sexually abused me with an instrument, so there’s no semen.” He wore gloves the whole time, so there are no fingerprints. I blocked this all out for five days, and just remembered it today.”

My husband, pastor, and therapist all felt the police would probably not follow up on this report, so I didn’t file it. But what happened also shows how careful those who threaten and abuse are to cover their tracks and to make identification difficult.
At the same time, I am taking steps to be safer. 1) Don’t be alone: I am being especially accountable for my time, and don’t drive in isolated areas.

2) I have quit answering ‘unknown caller’ calls at work. Instead, I told my boss that I have been receiving harassing calls from unknown callers, and will only take calls that are identified and with a number.

3) I am working hard in therapy to look at how I was triggered, the codes that were used, and how, and to undo them. I am also dealing with the immense amount of panic and suicidality that this incident caused, which was the first clue that something HAD happened. I have been calming down littles, and reminding older parts inside that they don’t have to believe lies or do what these people tell them.

4) I have asked for help, which is very difficult for me, from my support system, including my church and my husband and children. Their encouragement, prayers, and help has made a huge different to me.

They told me to be silent. I refuse to. They told me not to tell. I refuse to agree with them. They told me I'm not 'doing my job'. I plan to continue to not doing it, because they aren't my owners, and have no right to tell me what to do.

Only by breaking the power of the lie, can a survivor break free of the control of these people. And this is my goal: to become, and to stay, free. Blessings, Svali

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Leave a Comment »

The End of the Illuminati

September 16, 2008 by koniword

With the recent events that have created fear and concern about the implementation of military rule and/or the ushering in of the NWO for many, I wanted to add some thoughts.

Will the NWO take over? It appears that way, as, occult groups are heading in that direction. They are joining hands and resources, and differences have been overcome.

But what is their fate? What will happen to the Illuminati and other groups? I want to take a look at this, because it is very encouraging. And the Bible clearly shows the fate of this new order.

Daniel was one of the greatest prophets who has ever lived. He was an administrator and ruler during the time of king Nebuchadnezzer of Babylon, and became one of the highest rulers in the Babylonian kingdom. He was also a man who sought God and was faithful during the rule of an occult- based world kingdom.

This was an age when the king consulted wizards and necromancers for help, and an age when the person who openly worshipped God encountered hostility from these workers of darkness.

But in the midst of this darkness, Daniel prayed and sought God's counsel, and God defeated his enemies.

God also shared with Daniel His plan for history.

In Daniel chapter two, King Nebuchadnezzar has a disturbing dream which only Daniel is able to interpret with God's help. The king dreamed about a large statue made of different materials (a head made of gold; breast and arms of silver, a belly and thighs of bronze, legs of iron, and feet of mixed clay and iron). These different elements represent different kingdoms that would arise and God was showing the king what would happen over the next few years. These would try to rule and subdue the earth (the Greek and Roman Empires almost succeeded). But look what happens to these kingdoms in Daniel 2:34-35: "A stone was cut out without hands, and it struck the statue on its feet of iron and clay, and crushed them. Then the iron, the clay, the bronze, the silver and the gold were crushed all at the same time, and became like chaff from the summer threshing floors; and the wind carried them away so that not a trace of them was found. But the stone that struck the statue became a great mountain and filled the whole earth."

What is this stone that defeated and crushed the greatest earthly kingdoms and reduced them to rubble and then filled the whole earth? Later on , in chapter 2, verse 44, Daniel explains: "And in the days of those kings the God of heaven will set up a kingdom which will never be destroyed, and that kingdom will not be left for another people; it will crush and put an end to all these kingdoms, but it will itself endure forever."

The stone is the Kingdom of God, established by Jesus, that God states will be set up as a kingdom which will never be destroyed and will crush the occult kingdoms. We now know the end of the Illuminati and any other occult groups that try to set up a kingdom here. They are already defeated: we know who the winner is!

In Daniel, chapter seven, verses 13 and 14, God even gives us a glimpse of the coming of Jesus in glory, and the establishment of His rule here on earth (which began when Jesus came to earth and His church was established). Again, the Bible is clear: "And to Him was given dominion, Glory and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and men of every language might serve Him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion which will not pass away; and His kingdom is one which will not be destroyed."

The Illuminati and other groups that are organizing to create a world order based on the occult are hoping that this won't happen. But history is against them. They base their principles and spirituality on the occultism of ancient Rome, Crete, and Babylon. But look what happened to the original practitioners! Their rules ended, and God brought those rulers filled with pride to dust. I know that this is the end of the Illuminat and any other occult groups as well; God has given us a wonderful glimpse in Daniel of their eventual fate.

There is only one rule, one kingdom that will last forever, and that is the reign of Jesus. His reign has already begun in His church, and this gives me hope and joy, and takes away the fear of what the occult "planners" can do. I've placed my bet on the winning side, and moved from darkness to His kingdom.

Blessings to you, Svali

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Leave a Comment »

Shadow Government and Mount Pony

September 16, 2008 by koniword

While the news media feigns surprise and continues to report on the "Shadow Government" deployed outside of Washington to run things in the event of an attack, we who have written about this "Shadow Government" know that this is nothing new. I have to believe there is some purpose to this revelation now, as little is published without the blessings of those in power to use for their own personal agendas. Their are many underground facilities throughout the United States which are set up to house those people that are considered "Essential." It would be interesting to view the master list, wouldn't it? What secrets might truly be uncovered if we were to find out who in this nation is truly worthy of surviving a catastrophic incident. When I saw the news article published by the Federation of American Scientists (from the FAS Project on Government Secrecy, Volume 2002, Issue No. 17, March 4, 2002) in which they cited the Washington Post and the Cleveland Plain Dealer and their claims of breaking the news on the "Shadow Government, I became so intrigued that I had to read these stories. One of the sites that was mentioned was Mount Pony in Culpeper, Virginia. One more piece of the amazing puzzle of my own experiences of being experimented on as a child during the Cold War as told in my book "A Nation Betrayed," suddenly came together.

Sidney Gottlieb who retired from the CIA in 1973 after 2 decades with the CIA, owned a small farm near Boston, Va., about 10 miles northwest of Culpeper, Virginia. The location of his farm seems to be well planned when you understand its proximity to Mount Pony in Culpeper, Virginia. Mount Pony was a 140,000 square foot radiation hardened facility with a 400 foot long bunker, built of steel-reinforced concrete a foot thick and covered by 2 to 4 feet of dirt. Until July 1992 the bunker served as a Continuity of Government facility. The facility was designed to support an emergency staff of 540 for 30 days. Some features of the facility were a cold storage area for maintaining bodies unable to be promptly buried (due to high radiation levels outside), an incinerator, indoor pistol range, and a helicopter landing pad. Until 1988 the facility stored a $1 billion stock of currency to be used to reactivate the American economy following a nuclear attack.

Gottlieb's choice of a home seemed to be no coincidence. Such a highly placed, valuable asset would be privy to many secrets other than those having to do with "Mind Control." As Ted Gup reports in the Washington Post, "Gottlieb had emerged as a kind of Dr. Strangelove. He had overseen a vast network of psychological and medical experiments conducted in hospitals, universities, research labs, prisons and safe houses, many of them carried out on unsuspecting subjects-mental patients, prostitutes and their johns, drug addicts, and anyone else who stumbled into the CIA's web. Some had been subjected to electroshock therapy in an effort to alter their behavior. Some endured prolonged sensory deprivation. Some were doped and made to sleep for weeks in an attempt to induce an amnesia-like state. Others suffered a relentless loop of audiotape playing the same message hundreds of thousands of times." Gottlieb's obituary in the Times of London began, 'When Churchill spoke of a world 'made darker by the dark lights of perverted science' he was referring to the revolting experiments conducted on human beings by Nazi doctors in the concentration camps. But his remarks might with equal justice have been applied to the activities of the CIA's Sidney Gottlieb.' Along with Gottlieb's close proximity to Mount Pony, we have another key figure who lived nearby. Intimately involved in MKULTRA intrigue and the emigration of former Nazis into the US. through the CIA-funded OPC (Office of Policy Coordination) in the State Department was Carmel Offie. He lived less than 20 miles from Sidney Gottlieb on a sizable farm in Markham, Virginia. He handed me over to Allen Dulles and Sidney Gottlieb in 1952 for my first experiments and torture when I was 4 years old. In 1946 Offie was putting together reports on the movement of German scientists from the American Zone into France, individuals who had eluded Paperclip. In the spring of 1948 Carmel was working in Frankfurt at USPOLAD. Burton Hersh reports in The Old Boys, that "One of Offie's functions at POLAD had been to rake through the flotsam churned up by the postwar disorder—the defunctive Nazi exluminaries and cutthroat émigré politicians and paper mill impresarios of promise—and help the CIC and others plug legitimate experts in around the emerging Cold-War bureaucracies."
According to Hersh, Carmel Offie was "doubling as a kind of booking agent for many of the refugee scholars" that the U.S. was interested in obtaining. He went to work for Frank Wisner who got Congress to pass the One-Hundred-a Year CIA Act, which allowed Offie to bring in, unmonitored, a hundred refugees each year with their dossiers "Sanitized." Offie was Wisner's special assistant for labor and migratory affairs. He personally oversaw the National Committee for Free Europe, which passed OPC money to anti-Communist unions in Europe.

John Loftus reports that Offie worked for the DDU (Document Disposal Unit), which took orders from Dulles. He calls the DDU the OSS "Political Intelligence" experts who wore Army uniforms but were paid through the State Department. In 1949 Offie became responsible for the care of a number of Bloodstone émigrés'. Bloodstone was the codename for the operation, which proposed that 250 Nazi collaborators be brought into the United States who would otherwise be barred by the Displaced Persons Act. Simpson also reports that a special Bloodstone subcommittee had been created to supply false identities, government cover jobs, and secret police protection to selected Bloodstone immigrants.

Carmel Offie was also handling another project employing Nazi collaborators through a U.S.-financed "think tank" named the Eurasian Institute. The Institute was enlisting men who were important members of the German espionage network in Central Asia from 1931 to 1945. Wisner and Offie were still working together in 1950, when Joseph McCarthy referred to Offie as a State Department veteran who "has now been assigned to the Central Intelligence Agency.

These people were true spineless cowards who made sure they would have a safe place to run if there were threats to their survival. Many "Continuity of Government Facilities" were built during the cold war. As reported by the Cleveland Plain Dealer, http://eyesonamerica.org/200110/10190107… "One such facility built into a mountain in Virginia has a hospital, crematorium, emergency power plant, and sleeping cots for 2,000 people. A bunker in a Pennsylvania mountain, known as "Site R," can accommodate 3,000 people." Sabrina Eaton reports that "it included a reservoir, medical and dental facilities, dining hall, barber shop and chapel" and that "the government decommissioned similar bunkers at the Greenbrier resort in West Virginia and at Mount Pony in Culpeper, Va., in recent years."

Another report in Taking a Tour of Cold War Baltimore, http://www.citypaper.com/2001-07-18/feat… , "Gimme Shelter Or, Last One Underground Is a Rotten Egg", "Greenbrier opened in 1962 under a posh resort in White Sulphur Springs, W.Va., this capacious bunker — code name 'Project Greek Island' — was where Congress was to duck and cover when all the big, bad buttons were pushed. The vast complex includes chambers large enough for both House and Senate to meet.

The article goes on to say that Mount Weather near Berryville, Va., is a vast underground facility, complete with streets, multistory buildings, and a lake large enough for water skiing. A host of governmental higher-ups have sleeping quarters here, including Supreme Court justices. The Federal Emergency Management Agency runs a multitude of disaster-response operations from under the mountain today.

Two more sites described in this article are Olney in Montgomery County and Raven Rock. A substantial 1971 bunker that now serves as an Alternate National Warning Center (designed to get the word out when bad things happen) and a Satellite Teleregistration Facility lies beneath what used to be a cow pasture in Olney. Raven Rock also known as "Site R" and colloquially referred to as "the underground Pentagon," is a 48-year-old megabunker which lies under a mountain just north of the Maryland line near Waynesboro, Pa., close to the presidential retreat at Camp David. For those of us who have endured the silence of those years following the secret experiments carried out on an unwitting public in the name of "National Security," such revelations come as just another footnote in our untold stories. In the epilogue to a congressional committee report headed by Sen. Frank Church, the committee concluded: "The United States must not adopt the tactics of the enemy. Means are as important as ends. Crises make it tempting to ignore the wise restraints that make men free. But each time we do so, each time the means we use are wrong, our inner strength, the strength which makes us free, is lessened." Let us remember this when we start giving up our freedoms under the guise that it is necessary for this brave country of ours to survive. It appears that those who really are important already have a place to escape to. Will we?

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Leave a Comment »

The European Roots of the Illuminati

September 16, 2008 by koniword

Until recently, I have mainly written about programming and methods to work through and attempt to resolve it. But as I am working on my own healing, I am coming to realize that while breaking programming is important (and often life-saving), that eventually it becomes important to deal with core issues. Core issues go beneath and behind programming, and often not only drive it, but sabotage the therapy process as the survivor attempts to heal.
These issues will be different for each survivor, since we each have a unique history.

I have received emails from survivors from around the world, and have found that: *The Illuminati is certainly not the only occult group in the world; there are many other well-organized groups that do methodic, repetitive abuse of an occult nature. But in these groups, often the core issues are different than for the Illuminati *Even within the Illuminati, each individual will need to discover their own personal history, since parentage, bloodlines, and programming methods will differ, as well as the child's eventual role in the group. This article is not meant to address all methods, or all survivor's histories in the group.

I can't speak for everyone who was abused in the group; I can only speak of what I myself am discovering about my own personal history, in the hopes that it will help other survivors through either validation, or to help supporters better understand some of the issues that they face during the process of remembering and healing.

The Illuminati are based in Europe, which is where their power base has always been. I remember being told as a young child that America was basically considered their "mission field" or the "land of opportunity" by those whose roots extend for hundreds of years or more into the ancient European dynastic bloodlines.

This is why their power hierarchy around the world, whether in the U.S., Asia, Australia, Canada, or elsewhere will always point back to Europe, where the 13 rulers (they also call them "lords") are based. Each ruler represents an area of Europe held under his sway; and each one represents an ancient dynastic bloodline.

For example, the Hapsburg bloodline (Merovingian) is still active in Europe, although hidden, as well as the Rothschild and Battenberg bloodlines . In many modern European countries, the heirs of these bloodlines are immensely wealthy, and secretly are the "power behind the throne", if not the actual rulers.

This is one reason why those of high Illuminati rank/descent in the U.S., for example, can always trace their bloodline or parentage to members of this ruling cabal in Europe; members of leadership councils in the States are always direct descendants, whether legitimate or illegitimate.

Whether at the lowest levels, or the highest, though, this group operates with the same methods: instilling intense fear and terror to control their members. Often this is done through the fear of death, and at the core level, the person who has undergone their training will have an immense fear of dying because of the "death and resurrection" experiences, or near death experiences, that they have undergone.

During these experiences, the very young child or even infant core will be faced with intolerable choices: to allow themselves to be extinguished, or to embrace the demonic and the beliefs of those in their bloodline parentage. I believe this is dissociation at its deepest level, since the desire to survive is one of the deepest instincts that God has given us, and will override intellect, cognition, and even well-thought out beliefs in an adult-much less in a very young child. When faced with certain death and terror, or life, albeit at a price that is much too high, the infant or child almost always chooses life (I have never heard of one that hasn't to date, although my own knowledge and experience are limited).

Then the one who offers life to the infant becomes their "savior", and worshipped virtually as a deity in the child's mind and heart for "saving" them in one of the most wicked set ups imaginable.

In many cases, this is one of the child's parents, and most often, their biological father. The biological father may not be the person that the child consciously remembers raising them during childhood; and once again, this encourages deep dissociation: the consciously remembered "Daddy" may not be the survivor's real father.

Identity confusion is also layered in. The name the child goes by during the daytime may be quite different from their "real" name, or even the name on their birth certificate. A child of high lineage may discover that they weren't born in the United States, but in Europe, if the ties to the European bloodlines are great enough; or even that their American birth certificate was forged, to cover their European one.

Each situation is different, and different bloodlines practice different methods of raising, mentoring, and training their offspring. For instance, those of German descent may be taken to Germany, and spend time with those of this bloodline learning the ways of this country, and developing a loyalty to what they consider their "true homeland", before going back to another country to live under a different identity. Because above all else, children are called back to their European roots at frequent intervals to develop loyalty to their family home and name, and to undergo ceremonies meant to instill terror and ongoing cooperation, alternated with loving bonding experiences meant to instill deep love for the parental figures.

A child may live in Japan, but they will always know that their true home is in Germany or France; the child in Canada may know that their true home is the U.K., or Russia, and the child in the U.S. will long to return to "home" in Europe with the loyalty that is instilled, whether "home" is Germany, Bavaria, France, Moscow, the UK, Spain, or another country ruled by one of the 13.

This terror, this training, and the bonds of not only loyalty, but caring and nurturing that the child experienced through their true parentage, are often the most difficult and insidious to break. Deep terror combined with loving rescue and nurture create deep loyalty through trauma bonding, and breaking these ties at the core level is the most difficult task that many survivors face.

My prayer is that by explaining some, it can help others know that this does occur, which is the first step to uncovering it and working on it. I believe that deep prayer and support from others are the only methods of both uncovering these ties, and of breaking their hold. I am still working on these issues, and welcome others to share their experiences of undoing the hold of loyalty at this core level to the original perpetrators, and of breaking the spiritual and emotional ties to them. I will be more than happy to publish here anonymously any articles on this topic, as an encouragement to others who are breaking ties to the power centers in Europe. Because, ultimately, these men must lose in their bid for power. Scripture tells us that there is only one king on the throne: Jesus Christ, and that eventually, even the European roots of the Illuminati and their coming "prince" or antichrist, will be cut down, when Christ reigns over the earth.

Blessings to you, Svali

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Leave a Comment »

svalispeaksagain 5:27 pm on September 30, 2021

Tags: Jesuit (10), mind control (69), occult (13), programming (60), ritual abuse (65), Vatican (10)

Exposing the Vatican book: Part 4

Early Splitting

The first weeks of life for an infant born to the Jesuits are very busy and extremely painful. This is when the first splits are split again, and templates for systems are created and organized. Spiritual programming is also conducted in a more methodical method.

The first organization and traumas occur with “white room” and “black room” training. The infant undergoes traumas which include: being quickly lowered while the head is supported (to make the infant feel as if they are falling and initiate the startle reflex); peeling of skin with sharp knives from the sole of the feet, the backs of the legs, the backs of the arms, and the back (infants heal very quickly, with minimal scarring, since only the very top layer of skin is peeled off); digital rape; electroshock; near-drowning in a tub of water; partial suffocation; burning with fire on digits and the soles of the feet. These are called “prime traumas” and become the foundational physical traumas for the systems being created.

Along with the physical trauma is severe spiritual trauma. Rituals are conducted, and demons are attached to the splits being created, to cause the splits to remain apart (the brain will normally try to rapidly re-attach splits during infancy unless demonic barriers are put in place). The impartation is often done through the laying on of hands of the Father or programmer on the infant’s head and/or belly.

The initial, primary programming, occurs either in a white room, where the programmers, walls, clothing and lights are all white (this would occur for the presentation or cover programming), or in an all-black room where the only light comes from a black, or ultraviolet, light, if any. This is where theta (spiritual) programming and the programming of the true deeper (back) layers occurs.

One reason that the initial theta, or spiritual, programming occurs in an all-black room is not only for mental organization, but to also decrease the amount of interaction with the physical world via sight and the senses that will occur within these parts being created. Many of these parts are created literally in darkness, and have never seen daylight throughout their lives u occurs.

Follow

The primary core splits, and the master controllers are always created first. These will take on the roles and names of spiritual entities, since a Jesuit system is first and primarily spiritual, designed to serve satan, the antichrist, and the beast (father, son and spirit). All three will be represented in these first splits along with other deities.

The presentations are also created, and dedicated to deities with roles of amnesia; in fact, the presentation undergoes as much or more programming than any other parts in Jesuit systems, which tends to surprise survivors. who may have believed that these systems “didn’t go through bad things.” They have, and their traumas are among the worst, which is why presenter programming is often the last to heal in many systems.

These traumas fuel the deep amnesia that is always present in Jesuit systems: there are always huge barriers placed between the presentations (“hosts”), the cover programming, the Vatican programming, and the New World Order programming.

Buffers

In these sophisticated systems, buffers will be created between the front and back with one sole purpose: to hide the extent of the programming, by “buffering” the feelings between front and back, and maintaining emotional and memory distance between the two. The buffers will always be very void of feeling, and extremely traumatized, since they “hide the back” and help make the programming “undetectable” to the world, and the survivor.

Brain Wave Programming, Early Theta and Spiritual Training

The Jesuits utilize the fact that when a person’s brain waves are in theta state, they are the most open to the spiritual realm. This is why much of their spiritual training is conducted when the individual is in theta state.

Early Brain Wave Programming

The infant is taught to stay in theta state by attaching electrodes to their head that pick up brain waves and show them on a monitor. When the infant personality that is being trained is in theta state, the infant is heavily praised. If the personality “bounces” out of theta state, as is normal, the infant is heavily shocked. Eventually, the personalities created learn to stay permanently in theta state (this same training method is also used for the personalities in other brain wave states, to teach them to stay in the desired brain wave state).
To the left above is a graph of brain wave states (the major ones except epsilon are shown). Gamma is the highest brain wave state, and will occur when a person is in a highly excited or nervous state. This is where loyalty programming and sabotage scripts will later be programmed in, since the high anxiety in this state will trigger calling the police, accuse the helper of kidnapping, or other self-sabotage, if someone tries to help the survivor.

Beta state is a normal alert state, and this is where military systems and those that need a normal alert state will be created. Alpha is more relaxed, and accessing systems and presentations will be created in this state. Delta is the deepest brain state, and will hold semi-unconscious and even unconscious beliefs; delta programming will be discussed in more detail later in this book.

Theta Training

Once they can stay in theta state, the early spiritual training begins. The thetas are kept in a blackened room, and the people who interact with them appear shadowy. Actors dressed as demons will come into the room, and "chain" the infant to them. The actors demonstrate to the infant how demons act, growling, snarling and torturing them in various ways. At the same time, the infant is told that THEY are the demon. This is how demonic punishers and controllers are created in the first weeks of life.

The Jesuits understand that an infant must be shown an external reality in order to internalize it. The infant must internalize in order to establish the programming that the Jesuits desire for later control.

The theta state parts in the infants are left in darkened cribs and are given objects such as decapitated heads to play with; or demonic toys such as fetishes. The infant's fingers are placed around the neck of a kitten, and when they squeeze, as babies will, they are highly praised. The infant has no idea of what they are doing at this stage, but the foundation for later assassination training is being put in place.

Demons come into the room, and talk and play with the infant's theta parts. This is their first bonding, with these creatures that appear horrific.

Gradually, the infant is taught to call on the demonic for theta capabilities. The Jesuit Father will throw a ball at the infant to hit it, and encourage the baby to spiritually throw the ball back at them (they are too young to have the physical coordination to do so, but can easily do this demonically). Throwing a ball demonically is demonstrated, and the baby is hit again and again, until in anger and frustration, they are able to loft the ball back at the person hitting them. This is heavily praised, since the infant is using spiritual power to accomplish what it cannot physically, and using its hurt and rage at being abused and turning it to hurt another back. This is the early foundation for later theta capabilities.

The infants are taken to rituals, where they watch sacrifices performed, their infant seats propped amidst the fires. They are also taken to re-enactments of "hell" where demons dance and torture victims, and the first subconscious images of hell and the need to punish even the slightest disobedience are ingrained. The infants undergo extensive torture from demons, to teach them in these first weeks of life to fear "descending" and "going to hell" above any other punishment.

White Room Programming

In the white room, the other controllers are being created as well. Men and women dressed as members of the Greek Pantheon (for the white/Illuminati or Beast-Loyal systems), the Roman Pantheon (for the Black, or Vatican/Satan-Loyal systems), and the Ancient Pantheon (for the grey, or New World Order/Antichrist-Loyal systems) visit the infant, introduce themselves, explain who they are, and create a spiritual tie to these parts. They literally take cords (white, black, and grey) and tie themselves physically to the infant for hours; they also force the infant to undergo rituals dedicating these parts to the demons. The infant also watches videos, virtual reality programs, and holograms in which these 'gods and goddesses' of the Pantheons talk to them, and explain that they also are a god or goddess.

This basic programming all takes place in the first three months of life, and is continued for years afterwards.

Mentors are also bonded to the young theta splits. These are individuals with strong theta skills in place as well (otherwise, they would be maimed by the infant who has not learned to “focus” or control their developing skills). These mentors will “rescue” the young theta splits from death during setups time and again, to teach them to trust the mentor with their life. This is important for later theta spiritual programming, where the young child will travel demonically through the dimensions and must follow their mentor, or risk death.

The mentoring relationship creates a deep “mother-daughter” or “father-daughter” bond at the deepest spiritual levels, and is the only semblance of a “mother” relationship that a young child is allowed to have in the Jesuit order. All other mother figures in their life are purposely extremely abandoning and emotionally unavailable, to force the child to trust their spiritual mentor (often viewed as a “cult mother”) as their true “mother bond.” Healing for the survivor will include grieving the extremely distorted attachment bonds that were allowed, as well as remembering the terrible abandonment by maternal figures during infancy.

The survivor may also have to work through the grieving that occurs when they remember that as an older teen or adult, they mentored spiritual (and/or) biological children of their own. These love bonds are real, and very deep, and are held unconsciously. These bonds are often manipulated in attempts to “draw” the person back to the group, since the survivor may be completely unaware of their emotional and spiritual attachment to a person they mentored, until the parts that bonded choose to bring this knowledge to conscious awareness.

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

book part 4
September 13, 2021
In "healing"

Exposing the Vatican: Part 5
October 7, 2021
In "healing"

Book Part 8
December 23, 2021
In "healing"

heavenlyrevelationsfromdaddy 2:52 am on October 5, 2021

Fantastic info, little lost on buffers

★ Like

Pingback: Targeted by Jesuits - Veronica Swift

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← book part 4

Exposing the Vatican: Part 5 →

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

Svali Speaks!

The Life of Svali – an Ex-Illuminati Mind Control Programmer

Chapter Nine: Programming Linked to Stories, Movies, Cartoons, or role Play Dramatization

September 29, 2008 by koniword

In this chapter, I want to address a special type of programming that is universal with the Illuminati. It is programming that is linked to a story, movie, cartoon, or role play dramatization.

For countless centuries, Illuminati trainers and leaders have used role playing to reinforce as well as program children, and it is a favorite mode of teaching up to this day. A typical drama set up, or role play, will involve a "visit through time." The child is told, while drugged or hypnotized, that it and the other children with it (usually, a small group will go through this programming together) are going to " time travel". The trainer or teacher is seen as immensely powerful by the children, as he or she magically transports them through time. They enter another room, where people are dressed up in period costumes from whichever time period in history the teacher wants the children to see. Everything is historically accurate and well researched. An example: if the children are to visit ancient Rome, they will be taken to a room in the Senate, where the characters are dressed in togas. They will be speaking to each other in ancient Latin and debating issues. Caesar, or another king will enter the senate. Roman customs for a scenario such as this one will be adhered to throughout the role play.

One purpose of this role playing, is that the children are told they are getting a "behind the scenes " peek at history. Illuminati agenda will be put forward, and the children will "see" that famous figures in history were actually Illuminists. This will reinforce their "special ness" and the historicity of the group. It will also reinforce language training, since the scenes may occur in medieval England, or the French court of Louis XIV, etc. The scenes will also contain a moral that builds on programming the children have been undergoing. Maybe they will watch a "traitor" being "guillotined" in the French court. Or an unworthy senator, who tries to betray his king, will be stabbed. The child may be given a role in the play, such as taking a secret message to the king or queen, to reinforce courier programming. The child really believes that they have stepped back into history, and are part of the process of helping create history.

With modern times, programming has become more sophisticated with the advent of technology. Before television or movies, programming was often "scripted" around famous fairy tales, or stories, read aloud by one trainer while the second trainer worked with the child. A good see-song voice is necessary in a "reader". The

Search

Categories

Interview with Svali – The Illuminati in America
Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali
Multiple Personalities – Brokenness
Other Authors
Other Illuminati Articles by Svali
Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali
Svali Answers Questions
Svali's Personal Life
The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People

Betrayal programming brain wave programming color programming Complex Polyfragmentation cult Cult Abuse Cult Safety Cult Secrecy Denial Programming DID dissociation end times Illuminati plan end times scenario Escaping from the Cult government programming Having needs Healing from Ritual Abuse Hiding from the Cult History of Ritual Abuse Illuminati bankers Illuminati jobs jewel programmming linked programming Memory suppression metal programming military programming MPD

Privacy & Cookies: This site uses cookies. By continuing to use this website, you agree to their use.
To find out more, including how to control cookies, see here: Cookie Policy
Close and accept

Now days, movies and videos are frequently used in programming. Favorite scripts include: Walt Disney movies (Disney was an Illuminist), especially Fantasia, Sleeping Beauty, The Little Mermaid, Cinderella, Beauty and the Beast. The Wizard of Oz, both books and movie, has been used. Any movie that incorporates Illuministic themes can be used. E.T. and Star Wars have been used in more recent years.

How Script programming is done:
The trainer will play the movie for the child. The child is told that they will be "asked about " the movie, this cues the child to use photographic recall about what they are viewing. The trainer may show the child an edited shorter version of the movie, with only parts of the whole, or may show the child a short scene from the movie.

After watching the movie, or scene, the child is drugged to relax it, then asked what it remembers. The child will be shocked if it cannot recall items the trainer deems important, and will be forced to watch the scenes repetitively.

When the child has total recall of the segments, the trainer will tell the child that it is one of the characters. The child may be heavily traumatized first, and a blank slate personality created inside to be the desired character. The first thing the blank slate sees is a recording of the movie, or scene. This is its "first memory". The trainer will then link the scene with Illuminati ideology. They will teach the child the "hidden meaning" in the movie, and praise the child for being one of the few "enlightened ones" who can understand what it truly means. The script programming will often be linked to other programming the child is undergoing. Military programming may be linked to Star Wars. Total recall programming may be linked to Data in Star Trek. Computer programming may be linked to Hal in 2001 A Space Odyssey; internal labyrinth programming may be linked to the movie "Labyrinth". The possibilities are quite varied and will depend on both the child and the trainer as to which direction script programming will go. Music from the show, or scene, will be used as a trigger to access the programming inside or bring forward these personalities.

Suggestions:

Scripted programming will often involve a great deal of traumatization, to create the "blank slate" alters desired. The programming will be ground in with repetition, electroshock, torture, drugging and hypnosis. The alters inside who have gone through this programming will often be highly disconnected from external reality and may believe that they are part of a "script". They may be Dorothy seeking the Emerald City (or the achievement of Illuminati rule on earth). They may be a computer or the character Data. Reality orientation will be very important. Allow these parts to experience safe outside reality, and test for themselves if they are really part of a man or woman. Looking in a mirror may help, when they express readiness. Having cognitive helpers who can share daily life memories with them, may help to ground them. At first they will be very surprised, even indignant or hostile, at suggestions that they are not the character. They will think the therapist is a trainer, or part of the script, since this is the only reality that they have known. Re-grounding, patiently, over and over to present reality, increased communication with others inside, and eventually grieving over the intense amount of trickery and deception that they experienced, will be necessary. With time and patience these parts will be willing to give up their old "scripted" roles and become part of the person's present reality.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged linked programming | Leave a Comment »

Svali Speaks!

Ritual Abuse Roots of the Illuminati Shell Programming

Blog at WordPress.com.

Spiritual Abuse Spiritual Programming suicidal programming Survivors of Ritual Abuse Svali is Alive Svali is dead Svali is missing Svali is Safe Svali poem Svali questions techniques Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse Therapists VR programming

Chapter Eight: CIA , Governmental, and Scholarship programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Some systems will have internal CIA programming. Some of the methods mentioned in earlier chapters, such as brain wave programming and color coding were developed in part through funding by the CIA in the 1950's and 1960's. Military intelligence officers working in Langley, Virginia, used these government funds to conduct research on human subjects. They reported what they were learning to trainers throughout the U.S. and Europe.

CIA programming can include having alters in a system trained in different techniques of both finding a target, and studying the target without being detected. The end result of tagging the victim can include having a sexual assignation with the target, or may involve having people inside trained to assassinate a target.

These are complex programming sequences, and are put in over years of training, with periodic reinforcement. Alters may be trained to become hyper aware of their environment, and able to overhear conversations that are whispered. Internal recorders are taught to download these conversations, as well as other info. Photographic recall is emphasized, as the person will be hypnotized or put into a delta state for "downloading" information to the trainer or CIA operative.

The survivor with CIA programming will have been taught extensively how to "drop a tag" (detect anyone following them, and ditch them). This training will be begun in early childhood and built upon as the child grows older. They will often be taken into a neutral colored training room. They may be drugged, or hypnotized, usually a combination of both.

They will be shown training films of how a CIA operative works. They will be told that they are "special", "chosen", "one in a thousand" who is the only one who can do this special work. They are told that they get to be a secret agent for the CIA. The young child, having no idea who the CIA is, focuses on the fact that they have been chosen because they are special, needed, and will be eager to please. The child will be taken to a dinner party, or a drama set up by the trainer. There will be a group, anywhere from ten to sixteen people at the "party". Afterwards, the child will be questioned by the trainer extensively. Who was sitting where? What were they wearing? What color were their eyes? Their hair? Who gave the speech? What did they say? The child will be praised for correct answers, but punished, shocked if unable to recall details. This is to reinforce natural photographic memory, and assist the child with recording details. The next few times, the child's abilities will improve, as it wants to avoid punishment.

In the next level of training the child will be asked to observe, and figure out: who is the most important person in the room? Why? They will be taught body movements, and mannerisms, that give nonverbal clues away. The child may be taught to approach important adults, or an assigned target, first in role play, later in real life, and engage them in innocuous conversation while looking for information they have been clued to get. They may be taught to be innocently seductive, and will be dressed for the part. They will frequently be taught to lure the target into having intercourse with them.

An older youth, or adult, will also be taught not only how to lure a target into bed, but later how to kill them, if they are an assassination target, while they are asleep or relaxing after sexual relations. They will be taught to go through the target's belongings for any information needed by the trainer or cult leader. Often, before an assignment for an assassination, the cult member will be indoctrinated with reasons why killing the victim is a service to humanity. They will be lied to and told that they are the head of a porno ring, a pedophile, or a brutal villain. This will engage the assassin's natural anger towards the person, and will motivate them, while helping to overcome their natural moral reluctance and guilt at killing a human being.

They will be taught how to disguise themselves, with change of clothing, sex (masquerading as the opposite sex), makeup, contact lenses, and get out of the situation safely. They will be taught how to overcome interrogation techniques with extensive training and hypnosis, in case they are ever caught. They will be taught to self suicide with a pill or dagger, if they are ever apprehended, in most cases.

Suggestions:

CIA programming will involve the use of sophisticated technology to reinforce its effectiveness, and can be difficult to break. It may involve the person being traumatized in isolation tanks (this will also be done with brain wave programming). It may involve sensory deprivation, sensory overload, isolation, sleep deprivation. It may involve hours of listening to repetitive tapes on headphones. The subject is shocked, or severely punished, if they try to remove the headphones. They will be hypnotized, tortured; subjected to different drug combinations; they will be exposed to harmonic tones, often in one ear or the other. They will be exposed to flashing strobe lights, which may induce a seizure, and alters will be programmed to cause seizures if the subject tries to break programming. They will be shown high speed films with different tracks, one for the left eye and one for the right eye, to increase brain splitting or dichotomous thinking.

The survivor and therapist need to work slowly to undo the effects of this trauma. The person will need to come to terms, slowly, and carefully, with how the programming was done. They may need to learn their own access codes (this will also be true of brain wave, and other sophisticated programming techniques). They will need to communicate with the traumatized alters and fragments inside, let them know they were used. They will need to help the young alters, who were split to create the system, and often underwent the worst traumas. Grieving for the abuse, the trauma, the methodical calculation used and scientific methods used to put in this programming, will take time. Venting feelings, including rage, safely will be important. The survivor may be afraid of strong feelings and will fear especially anger and rage, since they will associate those feelings with having to kill, hurt, or assassinate others. Allowing the feelings to be expressed slowly and carefully, being aware that homicidal and suicidal feelings will probably come up, is important.

If there is a concern about the ability to control acting out, the client may need to go inpatient in a safe facility that understands mind control and cult programming. They will fear being labeled "psychotic" since the programmers told them that they would be called this, and locked up forever. The WORST thing a therapist or hospital can do in a situation like this, is play into those fears, or label the person psychotic. Constant grounding in reality, using grounding exercises; slow, careful venting of rage and betrayal feelings; reinforcing over and over that the survivor can remember, and NOT go psychotic, or die, BELIEVING and VALIDATING the survivor, are all important. The survivor may have unstable behavior at points, but this is not psychosis, but rather, the natural reaction to extreme trauma. The survivor needs to realize this, and that they can overcome its effects, with time and good therapy. They will need hope, and a good support system.

Governmental Programming:

Governmental programming will involve the person being trained to take leadership positions or administrative positions in the government. They may be trained to network with others in governments, both local , national, and international. The Illuminati's stated goal is to infiltrate, and eventually cause the downfall of, all major governments in the world. Government operatives are taught to do this by:
infiltrating local political parties running for leadership both locally and nationally working for top leaders, as administrators, financial advisors funding governmental races and backing the person sympathetic to the Illuminati, or putting their person in to win, creating political chaos and unrest with operatives trained in dissension. The people selected for governmental programming are usually highly intelligent with native charm, or charisma. They are also skilled people manipulators. These abilities may be enhanced through programming, encouraging the person to project a "persona" that will draw people to them.

They are also taught finances extensively. This programming is done by: hypnotizing the person, whether child, youth, or adult (it is usually initiated in late childhood in suitable candidates), and inducing deep trance with drugs. The person is shocked, then told the trainer's and cult agenda for the person. They are told that they are very special to the Illuminati, and will be one of the people who helps change world history. They are told they will be rewarded with wealth, popularity and power for achieving the cult's agenda. They are told, and shown, what the punishment for disobedience is. They are shown training films about government, how it works, national and international affairs. They will meet with special teachers, who coach them on the inner political workings of the group they want to infiltrate, including the power structure and strengths and weaknesses of key players.

They will learn any languages necessary for the position. They will go to University, or get any training and education needed for credibility. They will receive special scholarships to finance this, if needed. They are given opportunities to practice their skills at infiltration, information gathering, people manipulation, and politics in set ups, and later in real situations. If they need to learn to control the media, they will learn methods to do this. They will have extensive back up and coaching during their entire career.

Suggestions:

Governmental programming is quite complex, since it ties in with the person's natural abilities. They may not be able to separate themselves easily from the role that they perform and often will only feel that they are acceptable when they do their job. They may find it difficult to believe that their career, friendships, marriage and contacts have been secretly guided by the cult for most of their life. These parts may feel offended, betrayed, or furious when this realization hits. They will also find it difficult not to use the manipulation skills that come so naturally, both on their therapist, and themselves, to dull the pain that the truth may bring. The person and the alters that have undergone this type of programming have a lot to lose if they give up their roles and persona, and need to count the cost of getting out and acknowledge the difficulty of doing so. They will need to grieve over being used, and for the false interpretation of reality they have believed all their lives. Listening to other parts inside and acknowledging the reality of the cult abuse will be important steps in breaking free. Success in a new career in the person's daily life will also help restore a broken self image.

Scholarship training:

The Illuminati revere scholarship, especially oral tradition. Children with good memories and native intelligence may undergo specific training in the area of scholarship. This will include learning under trauma, with praise for accomplishment. It will also mean punishment or being shocked for poor performance. Some of the major areas of scholarship include, but are not limited to:

Oral tradition: history of the Illuminati, especially the child's particular branch, memorizing genealogies. Learning and becoming fluent in multiple languages, both modern and ancient, including but not limited to: English, French, German, Russian, Spanish, Arabic, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Egyptian hieroglyphics; ancient Babylonian, ancient Chaldean and cuneiform writings. Some revered ancient texts are written in very ancient languages, and certain ceremonies may include rituals which utilize them. Learning ancient and modern history and becoming adept at planning role plays and dramatizations. Learning to teach others the above skills. The child who becomes adept at scholarship will also be expected to become a skilled teacher, and in turn, pass their knowledge down to others. They will practice teaching in both classroom and individual sessions.

Suggestions:

Scholarship programming will involve alters who are intensely loyal to the cult, since they believe they are related to a long, unbroken line of people since earliest history. They will often be immersed in cult philosophy, having read and memorized numerous esoteric volumes related to it. Appealing to logic, intellect, having an open mind and discussing the pros and cons of leaving the cult with them will often be received the best. They despise open conflict, and prefer addressing issues intellectually. They will be skilled debaters, and quite verbal. Asking them to read books that address becoming free from the cult, and asking them to sit in and listen to accounts from traumatized alters both in their system and others inside, will often help them make the decision to switch loyalties. Although they will have been immersed in false ideologies and doctrines, they are frequently willing to attempt to be intellectually honest. They will read and debate both sides of an issue, and may become some of the first to make the decision to leave the cult once convinced that it is abusive.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged government programming | Leave a Comment »

Chapter Seven: Military Programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

I want to devote an entire chapter to military programming, and how it is done. Why? As noted in chapter three, the Illuminati are emphasizing the importance of military training more and more, as part of their plan for eventual takeover. All children in the current generation are undergoing some form of military training as part of this plan.

Military training is begun quite young. It is often started by three years of age with simple exercises. The children are taken by their parents to a training area, which may be a large inside auditorium, or a remote area outside where training maneuvers are done. Tents are set up, with command centers for the different commanding officers and military trainers.

The children are taught to march in time, keeping a straight line. They are punished by being kicked, shocked with a cattle prod, or beaten with a baton if they move out of place. They will be dressed in small uniforms in imitation of the adults.

The adults will have ranks, badges and insignia indicating their level of achievement in the cult hierarchy and military. Badges and medals are given out to indicate the person's level of training and tests passed. Commanding officers are often brutal and will teach even the youngest children with harsh measures.

The children will be forced to march long distances, which increase as they get older, in any weather. They are forced to learn to cross obstacles. They will be given "fake" guns, with blanks, when they are young. These guns are perfect replicas of real guns, but fire blanks. The children are taught to load and fire all manner of firearms, both real and fake, under close adult supervision. They will spend hours learning to aim, sight, and fire these guns at targets. At first the targets are bulls eyes, but as the children get older the targets will be similar to police cut outs of humans. The children are taught to aim for the head or the heart. Later, they will graduate to realistic manikins. This is conditioning them to kill a human being.

They will be shown violent films of warfare, much more explicit and graphic than normal movies in group classes. Killing techniques will be shown in slow motion. The motif "kill or be killed" will be ground in over and over. The trainer will ask the children what mistakes the people who were killed made. Being killed is considered weakness; being a killer is considered strength.

The children will be forced, by age seven or eight, to crawl on their bellies with simulated blanks firing overhead. They are not told these are blanks and they are extremely painful if the child is hit in the back or buttocks. They quickly learn to keep down under fire. Battle conditions will be simulated as the children go through years of "boot camp" training.

They will be rewarded with merit badges for doing well, such as completing an obstacle course, or staying cool under fire. In other words, the cult creates a microcosm of real military training for their children and youth. Nazi concentration camps will be simulated, with guards and prisoners. The "guards" are usually older children or youth who have done well. The "prisoners" are younger children or those being punished for not performing well in maneuvers. There is intense pressure to want the guard role and not be a prisoner, since prisoners are locked up, beaten, kicked, and laughed at.

Hunting and tracking games where the prisoners are given a half hour lead are frequent. These may also involve the use of specially trained dogs taught to knock the quarry down but not kill them. Older children are taught to handle the dogs, and use them. Youth are taught to help the adults train the dogs.

Teens may be rewarded by becoming "youth leaders" who are allowed to plan the weeks activities. The military training will closely follow the principles of Nazi military and S.S. training. The trainers often speak in German to the children, who must learn the language. All C.O.s and high ranking adults speak in German during these exercises. They may also speak in French, since linguistic ability is encouraged in the Illuminati.

Exercises for older youth will include games where groups compete against each other, and the older teen leads, with the help of an adult advisor. Groups that win are rewarded, groups that lose are punished. The youth are taught to leave behind the weak, or slow members. Unfit members are shot or killed, and the youth leader learns to do these tasks. They are taught to bring their unit through simulated battles with other units, and cool, cognitive logic under these conditions is rewarded. The goal is to creative cognitive leaders inside the military systems, who are dissociated from emotions under the stress of battle conditions.

The youth and their followers are taught and trained in all manner of crowd control. They will see special films, that address all possible responses to a military takeover, and the crowds' response. These situations are then acted out during exercises, and the older Youth leaders and their units are expected to deal with the different responses. The "crowd" is coached by their trainers to act in different ways.

The ultimate goal of all of this is to create an organized army of children, youth, and adults, who will know exactly what to do during the coming takeover of the world. The training that I described is going on not only in the U.S., but in every country in the world. Top training centers are located in Germany, Belgium, France, and Russia. Military trainers are often sent to these countries, to learn new techniques, then sent back to their home countries.

What to do:
It is important to realize that military alters inside are extremely hierarchical. They will often be ranked inside, with lower "foot soldiers" accountable to inside alters with increasing rank. Usually, the higher the military rank, the higher the alter will be inside the system. A soldier with no rank may not have much knowledge about, or pull, inside the system. Its only job is to blindly obey others, after years of conditioning to do this.

Ranking officers inside will often be modeled after outside perpetrators, officers, or trainers. An internal General will often have much more knowledge than lower ranks, and should be befriended, as they can help with therapy.

It will take time, effort, and patience for both the survivor and the therapist to get to know these military officers. They are often abrupt, arrogant, and extremely hostile to therapy. They are often strongly loyal to the cult and proud of their badges, awards, and achievements that were earned through years of traumatization and hard work. They will often be reluctant to give this up, for the perceived "loss" engendered by leaving the cult.

They will also have strong programming surrounding them, including "honor/dishonor" suicidal programming (the brave, honorable soldier will die rather than betray his group, etc.). It is important to deal with the suicidal programming and intense limbic conditioning that many of these alters have been subjected to, while at the same time reasoning with the higher ranking members.

They will have photographic memory and recall of all aspects of military history. Giving them safe, appropriate, physical outlets in the daytime can let them vent off steam. These are very physically conditioned alters, who enjoy running, walking, target practice with guns and knives. Letting them go hiking (with a safe support person), practice outdoor skills, can be helpful.

Acknowledging their importance to the survivor, and the trauma they underwent, respecting their loyalty, bravery, and appealing to their sense of honor to help the system stay safe (these alters often have a highly developed, although misguided, sense of honor) can help. Internal commendation for bravery, even an internal awards ceremony (they are used to this) for the parts that have decided to leave the cult, and protect the body, can be performed. They are used to praise and recognition for work well done, and need this motivation. They were used to getting this from the cult, but the survivor can turn the locus of control internally, instead of externally, to break bonds with the cult.

Military protectors can change their job to keeping the body safe, away from perpetrators. They can be a system's greatest asset, as they are great at "kicking butt", and are not easily frightened. They may be able to tell outside perpetrators to leave the survivor alone, and protect the survivor from outside accessing.

Allowing them to vent their feelings in therapy, in journaling, in pictures, and in collages can also help. Although higher ranking officers internally are often very dissociated from their feelings, they can begin to empathize with the others below them, who took their pain, and the brunt of the brutal, punitive experiences. They have to be willing to acknowledge that they were abused at some point, that they were deceived and used. Finding the youngest alters they were split from will help with this process. With time and good internal communication, as well as patience from both the therapist and survivor, military alters can become one of the strongest assets and allies in staying cult free.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged military programming | Leave a Comment »

Chapter Six: Brain Wave Programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

In this chapter I will address brain wave programming. Brain wave programming, like any other programming, will depend on several factors.

These include: the child's ability to dissociate; the region of the country or which country the child grows up in; the level of ability of the trainers the child has contact with; physical resources and equipment available. There is no one "recipe" that fits every person and it would be ridiculous to state that all people who go through brain wave programming have it done the same way. More and more, programmers are talking, sharing knowledge over the net, both nationally and internationally, and sharing both successes and failures. But there is no one standardized methodology for brain wave programming. It will often be influenced by the child herself, as well as the trainer's whims. Different groups may organize the systems differently, or try to achieve different effects.

All of this said, what is brain wave programming? Simply put, brain wave programming involves having a young child go into a deep trance state, where they then learn to dissociate into a certain brain wave pattern. This is a complex skill, and not all children can achieve this. The goal is for the child to reach, for example, a consistent delta state, where delta brain waves show up on the EEG, which is attached to the child's head by electrodes in the scalp. Usually, two or even three trainers will work on one child during the initial stages. One will "prep" the child, using a hypnotic drug to induce a trance state. They will have also placed the electrodes on the head, using an abbreviated version of the method used in traditional hospital setting. If delta state is being induced, only the electrodes needed to pick up delta waves will be placed, for example. This is to save time.

The prepped child will be on a "trainer's table", and will be quite relaxed. The average child is about eight years old when this is begun, since the cerebral cortex and neurological development are not advanced enough at earlier ages (It has been tried at earlier ages, quite unsuccessfully, in the past; this practice was dropped because of the neurological damage and "failure to take rate" that trainers were seeing). The non prepping trainer will then let the child know exactly what he/she expects: that they will achieve a special state, called "delta state". The trainer tells the child, while they are in trance state, that they will know when they reach it, by the readings from the electrodes.

The trainer will tell the child alter, who has been called up to be a "template", or building block for the new system, that delta is good. They will emphasize this over and over. The child will then be shocked to increase its receptivity to learning. This also arouses the child from its drugged state and it will be more alert. It will want to please the trainer. The trainer will tell the child that she/he wants it to perform certain mental exercises. It will then give it backwards counting exercises, used to help the child achieve deeper trance states. Other verbal cues to trance down may be given. When the prepping or technical trainer sees delta waveforms, he or she will signal the verbal trainer with a hand motion. The verbal, or teaching trainer will immediately reward the child, saying, "good, you are in delta now." The trainer will caress the child, tell it what a good job it is doing. If the child bounces out of delta state, the verbal trainer will immediately become harsh, and will shock the child as punishment. The child is told that it left delta (which is "good") and needs to go back in.

The induction, counting, will be repeated until delta state is seen again, when the child is repeatedly rewarded for entering, then staying in this state for longer and longer periods. The trainers are using biofeedback principles to teach the child to consistently cue into a brainwave pattern. When the template can stay in delta pattern consistently, the template will be rewarded. This will occur over several months.

The trainers will now have a template that stays always in delta state, that they can begin splitting and using as the basis of forming a new system inside. They will do this using the tools of drugs, hypnosis and trauma. The new system created will record delta waves on an EEG if done correctly. The new system will be taught what delta means. The trainers will often flash a cue, or delta (triangle) symbol on a projector overhead, and "grind in" the delta imprinting. They will wear robes with delta signs on them, and cloth the subject in clothing or robes imprinted with the delta sign. They will teach the alters under hypnosis what deltas do, how they act. They will reward them when they comply, and shock or otherwise traumatize them if they do not act like "deltas". They will be given delta jobs. They will watch high frequency films, that show delta functions. They may build in a computer like structure to hold the system, showing pictures of its organization while the subject is under deep trance, after creating a clean slate through trauma.

These are some examples of how delta programming may be induced.

Other brain wave states will be induced in similar manners. They will often be formed from templates which are extremely young internal child alters who may be splits from core splits, as the basis for the programming. Common brain wave states used are:

Alpha: this is the most easily reached brain wave state, and also includes both the youngest and most easily accessed alters in the entire system. Young children have long periods of alpha activity and must be trained to enter other brain wave states for long periods. System access programming; access codes and sexual alters will often be placed in alpha, which may also be coded red in some systems.

Beta: this is the next most easily reached state, and is often associated with aggressive impulses. Beta state will often hold cult protectors, internal warriors, and military systems. They may be color coded blue.

Gamma: this will often hold extremely cult loyal alters, and holds more emotion than the other states, except for alpha. Suicide programming will often be layered into this system, as these alters would rather die than leave their "family". Scholarship programming may be held by this system, since they easily memorize by rote. Several languages may be spoken by different alters in this system, as the Illuminati like to program in plural linguality, with up to eight languages, both modern and ancient being spoken.

Delta: this is one of the more cognitive brain wave states, and will often be highly dissociated. It may also be the "ruling" or controlling state over the other brain wave systems. Often, delta state may be configured inside as a computer, and the delta alters will have emotionless, flat alters with photographic memories. They may hold most of the cognitive memories for the other systems, especially if extensive amnesia programming has been done. Delta state may have up to three levels of training: delta 1, delta 2, and delta 3 which will also correlate to security access allowed within the cult; i.e. access to highly confidential information. Behavioral sciences programming may be held by this system. Internal programmers, self destruct, psychotic, and shatter programming as well as other punishment programming sequences to prevent outside access or internal access to the systems may be held within delta systems. It may be color coded both orange/blue/purple, and will also often be the entry way to higher systems such as jewels or internal councils, inside.

Epsilon: this is often a "hidden system" and may hold CIA programming and high level governmental programming . Assassin programming may be held in this system, or in the beta system, depending on the trainer. Covert operations, courier operations, learning to tail a subject, or "drop a tag", disguises, getting out of difficult situations, may be handled by this system, which sees itself as chameleon-like. It may be color coded brown.

Phi/Theta/Omega programming: this represents negative spiritual programming. These are the "dark" ritual alters, who participate in blood rituals, sacrifices, and ceremonies. Internal witches, warlocks, seers, psychics, readers, and occult practitioners will be placed in this system, which has highly developed right brain and deep trance abilities. They will often be color coded black.

This is an overview of some of the more common brain wave systems. It is often placed in over a matter of years, from ages 8 to 21 being the primary ones, with occasional reinforcement of the programming from time to time.

Suggestions:

Brain wave programming is a very complex form of programming which creates automatic amnesia and communication barriers between the different brain wave states. This will also be reinforced by shock and punishment to prevent its "degradation", or undoing. Internal system controllers and programmers will also work to reinforce the programming, especially at night, when the person is asleep (physically).

All brain wave systems will have system controllers, usually set up in a group of three (the Illuminati love triads, as being the "mystical" and most stable number. They believe that systems built upon triads are extremely strong, unbreakable, and will often program in threes: three back ups, three system controllers, etc.) With the help of a good therapist, the survivor needs to get to know the internal system controllers and communicators. They are there, they have to be, because the trainers placed them there to communicate with and be accountable to them externally, and will often have complete knowledge of their own system. They will also be quite flat, and dissociated from the knowledge of their own pain or the abuse that created them. This is a distancing mechanism, and the person's survival depended on the ability of their controller to do this at one time. They will often be quite hostile, and very unwilling to look at their own abuse; they will become indignant at the idea, and claim that they are cognitive, and "above" being abused (another lie they were told by their abusers).

Time, patience, and finding out what their needs are; listening to them vent their frustration; pointing out reality (ie, the controllers, and all parts are related to each other; are part of the same person; and ALL were abused even though they were able to dissociate from their pain), and trying to help them meet their needs for recognition, acceptance, and approval will begin to allow them to question their previous loyalty. These systems are often driven by fear: fear of punishment; fear of remembering (they were often the most tortured systems in the survivor, and were promised amnesia in return for continued cooperation). Their fears are real, and should be listened to and respected, as shatter programming and flood programming are real threats to the survivor, and can cause functionality to go down.

Flood programming is a sequence put in place to punish a system if its internal programming is allowed to degrade or access to an unauthorized person, either internally or externally, is allowed. It will involve the fragments who hold highly traumatic memories, both emotional and physical, being pushed to the front where the person is "flooded" with wave after wave of memories. If this is triggered, and it frequently is if the survivor is in therapy, the first priority should be slowing the memories down. This may mean trying to reason with internal controllers or deltas who are allowing the flooding; they need to know that if the front, or previously amnesic alters down, or are re-shattered due to traumatization, it will weaken all the systems.

Bargain with them. Prayer will help in this situation. Physical safety, including inpatient therapy, may be needed if flooding or shatter programming are activated. Suicide programming is often layered in with both types, and external physical safety will be paramount for the survivor, with lots of outside accountability as they undo these intense programming sequences. Frequent reality orientation; explaining new, better jobs can help. Undoing brain wave programming should ideally only be done with lots of safe external support, which may include extra therapy sessions; hospitalization if programming that could cause loss of functionality or suicide are triggered; and should be geared towards increasing internal communication and cooperation. Alters jobs can be changed, from internal programmers to internal Deprogrammers; internal shatterers or punishers to internal protectors; internal reporters who report back to the cult can instead be asked to report internally on what the body is doing, and to keep it safe.

These are examples of possible changes. Make friends with system controllers, as they can become strong helpers and will work with the therapist to keep things safe for the survivor.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged brain wave programming | 1 Comment »

Chapter Five: Colors, Metals and Jewel Programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Color Coding

One form of programming that is quite common in the Illuminati is color programming. Why is it done? The answer is that trainers are human, and also quite lazy. Color programming is a simple way to organize systems, and allows the trainer to call up alters easily within a system. With the thousands of fragments that many multiples in the cult have, colors is a way of organizing them into an easily accessible group.

Also, young children recognize colors before they can read, so this training can occur quite early. It is begun at about age two in most children.

How it is done: The child is taken into a room with either white, beige, or colored walls. If the room is a neutral color, the lights in the room will be changed, so they color the room with the light's color. If "blue" is the color being imprinted, or put in, the trainer will call up a young child alter, either a controller or core split for a system. They will tell the child that they will learn how to become blue, and what blue means. The room will be bathed in blue light, as mentioned, or has been painted blue for use in this kind of programming. The trainer will be dressed in blue clothing, and may even have a blue mask on. Blue objects will be placed around the room. The alter inside the child is called up, drugged, hypnotized, and traumatized on the table. As they are awakening from the trauma, still in trance, they are told that blue is good, and that they are blue. That blue is important. That blue will protect them from harm. That blue people don't get hurt. This will go on for awhile.

They then ask the child if they want to be "blue", like the trainers. If the child says yes, they will continue on. If the child says no, it will be re-traumatized until it says yes. The child is often naked, and told it cannot wear clothing until it "earns" the right to wear beautiful blue clothing. Over and over the "safety of being blue" (ie freedom from harm) and danger of not having a color is emphasized. The children really wants to be blue after a while of going through this. They may be given blue candy as a reward for choosing to become the color. They may be given blue sunglasses or tinted lenses to wear. They are allowed to wear blue robes once they identify with the color chosen for them.

Once the child completely identifies with the color (or rather, the main alter or template for the system accepts this color), then they are taught in progressive stages, over many training sessions, what the color blue means. They are in set ups, or dramas with other blue children, where they act out the role of a "blue". They are drugged, hypnotized, traumatized, while the meaning of blue is ground in over and over. They are forced to act in "blue" ways. Different trainers and regions will assign different meanings to different colors. Many military systems are coded blue, or protective. The military alters all are called up periodically to reinforce blue training. If the trainer at a later date wants to access a blue system, they may call them up by color, or wear a piece of clothing or a scarf in the color they want to reach.

This becomes an unconscious trigger for this color to come forward. Color coding is one of the first methods that is inlayed over systems. An entire system may be color coded one color; or two or more colors may be coded in , with each system controller (most systems have three) being given a different color over its part of the system.

Metals programming:

Metals programming is a type of programming that many Illuminati children are given. Because it is so similar to jewels programming, I will discuss how it is done under jewels. Metals can be from bronze (lowest) to platinum (highest).

Jewels programming:

Many Illuminati children will go through either metals or jewels programming, and occasionally will go through both. Jewels is considered higher than metals, and more difficult to obtain. Which is put in and when, is dependent on the child's status, its parents status, the region it is born in, the group it is born into, and the trainers that work with it.

Basically, either metals or jewels is a form of reward based programming.

Here is how it works:
The child is shown a piece of jewelry such as a ring, or else a large example of the jewel (or metal) being put in. They are asked: "isn't this Amethyst, or Ruby, Emerald, Diamond) beautiful?" The child will be eager to look at it, touch it, and is encouraged to by a trainer with a soft kind voice. The trainer will ask the child, "wouldn't you like to be beautiful, like this jewel? (or metal jewelry)". The child is usually eager to be. Here is a sparkling gemstone, placed in their small hands (the training often begins between age two and three). Of course they want to be beautiful, sparkly, valued. The trainer will extol the beauty of the gem (or metal), will tell the child how special, valued, wanted gems are, and basically build up the idea of becoming like a jewel.

The child is then told that in order to become a jewel, they must "earn the right". This involves:
a.) passing through steps of discipline (see chapter three) b.) passing "special tests"
c.) being rewarded for special achievement

Becoming a jewel (or precious metal) is dangled before the small child, like a carrot, as the reward for doing well in training sessions. The earning of one is linked to going through the rungs of the long, arduous training process expected of Illuminati children; having a jewel or metal involves stepping up in status and being praised. But the price is enduring hours of abuse called "training" but in reality is organized, systemic abuse to make the child do what the trainer wants them to become.

Over time, with the help of drugs, hypnosis, shock, and other trauma, as the child goes through it's training process, it will begin earning its jewels and/or metals, one by one. These will become full alters inside.

Amethyst is usually the first one earned, and is linked to keeping secrets, never telling, and passing the first step of discipline. Each step is linked to receiving either a jewel or precious metal.

Ruby will often be next, and is linked to sexual abuse and sexual alters inside. As the child is repeatedly sexually traumatized and survives, or creates sexual alters to please adults, they are "rewarded" by being allowed to become a ruby.

Emerald will often come later (ages 12 to 15). This is considered very precious, and is linked to family loyalty, witchcraft, and spiritual achievement. Emeralds will often have a black cat, or "familiar" linked to them.

Diamond is the highest gemstone, and not all children will earn it. It is considered a high achievement. and may not be earned until adulthood, after passing rigorous tasks. It will be the controlling alter in a gemstone system. A diamond has passed all twelve steps of discipline, plus passed unusual tests and will have highest family loyalty.

"Family jewels" are often passed down internally during training sessions with trainers and family members. All high Illuminati families will have jewels hidden in secret vaults (real, outside jewels) which have been passed down for generations.

The children will often be given jewelry to wear in the daytime, as a reminder or reward, once they pass their programming. A child may be given a ruby ring or garnet pin to wear; in fact, a grandparent or parent may insist the child wear it. On ritual occasions, the child will be allowed to wear jewelry from the family's vault, once they reach a certain status. They may be allowed to wear a ruby pendant or emerald bracelet during high rituals, and will be quite proud of the fact, since the cult is first, foremost and always an extremely status conscious group. The children pick up on this, and the adults will make a big fuss over the children who have earned the right to wear jewels. This gives them a huge incentive to earn them.

Suggestions that may help with these forms of programming :

Color programming: it is important to have good internal communication with both internal alters and an outside therapist while working on color programming. If an individual finds that certain parts believe that they are a certain color, or if this comes up in therapy, they will want to find out if possible how they came to have this belief system. Slowly discovering how the colors were put in will help. Grieving for the vast amount of deception, the amount of abuse heaped on the child, and the very young alters who were the original templates may occur. These parts may be barely verbal, and may want to draw their experiences, or use colors in collages (with the help of older parts inside), to describe to a safe outside person what their reality has been. Validating to them that they are NOT just a color, that they are part of a whole person, may help. The survivor may see colored overlays for awhile, as they are undoing this programming, as parts inside share their memories. This is normal, although it may feel uncomfortable to see objects as yellow or green, for example. Grounding oneself, having cognitives do reality orientation, and patience will help the survivor work through this time.

Jewel programming and metals may be more complex, since the child's sense of special ness, pride and status may be bound up in these alters. Rubies, emeralds and diamonds are considered "high alters" inside and are used to leadership roles, both internally and externally. Acknowledging their importance to the system; listening to them grieve at leaving the cult, which meant giving up their status externally, and giving them new positions inside that are important can help. They can become system leaders in helping the person stay safe, once they make the decision to leave the cult, and become strong allies. But they will often be among the most resistant, and even hostile, to the idea of leaving the cult at first, since they have only known and remembered being rewarded for jobs well done, and have learned to "pass down" the traumas to "lower parts" inside. They will often honestly not believe they have been abused, and will only remember being petted or allowed to lead, or being told they were special, valued. Listening to how they feel; acknowledging that leaving means giving up things that were important to them, finding out what needs motivated them, and trying to find healthy outlets for them to get their needs met outside of cult meetings will help. Letting a jewel have leadership within, or chair internal meetings may make up for loss of external leadership when the survivor leaves the cult.

Acknowledging their importance to the survivor is also important. Recognize that these parts are EXTREMELY dissociated from their own abuse/trauma, and are in no hurry to remember. But both the survivor and a good therapist can bring reality gently to them, as they let them know that they were abused; that they are actually part of the "lower emotional parts" who were abused, and will eventually need to acknowledge this. This task takes time and good outside support to accomplish. Allow them to vent their feelings. They will often be highly cognitive at first, but feelings will come, especially grieving, then pain at having been deceived by the cult, then the anguish of realizing that the abuse they passed down to others inside was actually happening to them. They may become quite depressed at this stage, but will also lend tremendous stability and strength to the system, in staying safe and cult free, once they have reached this stage.

These are some thoughts on color, metals, and jewel programming. Other types of programming will be addressed in the next chapter.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged color programming, jewel programmming, metal programming | 1 Comment »

Chapter Four: An Overview of Some Basic Types of Programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Chapter Four: How the Illuminati Program People:
An Overview of Some Basic Types of Programming

In the first few chapters, I defined Illuminism, its reach, and some of the philosophy, money making enterprises, and agendas that help explain WHY they program people. I believe that these are important to understand, as a preface to the next few chapters. Why? The programming techniques that I will describe take an incredible amount of effort, time, dedication, and planning on the part of the cult to place in the individual. Only a very motivated group of people would spend the time it takes to do this. These chapters are very hard for me to write, as an individual, since my role in the cult was that of a programmer. So, the very techniques you will be reading about were often those that I used to place programming in individuals that I worked with. I no longer do these things, nor do I espouse doing them; the reason I am writing this book is that I believe that therapists who work with DID, as well as survivors, deserve to know WHAT is done to people, HOW it is done, as well as be given some ideas on how to undo the programming that the cult places in people.

First, I would like to address unintentional programming versus intentional programming. This is also known as the environmental milieu the child is raised in. The programming of a generational Illuminati infant often begins before its birth (this will be addressed later) but once it is born, the very environment the infant is raised in becomes a form of programming.

Often, the infant is raised in a family environment that combines daytime abandonment with dysfunction in the parental figures. The infant soon learns that the nighttime, and cult activities, are the truly important ones. The infant may be deprived of attention, or even abused, in the daytime; and is only treated as special, or "seen" by the parent, in the cult setting. This can lead to very young alters around the core or core splits, who feel "invisible", abandoned, rejected, unworthy of love or attention, or that they don't even exist, unless they are doing a job for their "family". Another milieu and conditioning process the infant must face is that the adults around him/her are INCONSISTENT, since the adults in a generational cult family are almost always also multiple, or DID. This sets up a reality for the infant/toddler that the parents act one way at home; an entirely different way at cult gatherings; and yet a different way in normal society.

Since these are the infant's earliest experiences of adults and adult behaviors, it has no choice but to accept this reality that human beings act in shockingly different ways in different settings. While unintentional, this sets the infant up for later dissociation, in mimicry of the adults around it.

INTENTIONAL PROGRAMMING
Intentional programming of an infant in the Illuminati often begins before birth. Prenatal splitting is well known in the cult, as the fetus is very capable of fragmenting in the womb due to trauma. This is usually done between the seventh and ninth month of pregnancy.

Techniques used include: placing headphones on the mother's abdomen, and playing loud, discordant music (such as some modern classical pieces, or even Wagner's operas). Loud, heavy rock has also been used. Other methods include having the mother ingest quantities of bitter substances, to make the amniotic fluid bitter, or yelling at the fetus inside the womb.

The mother's abdomen may be hit as well. Mild shock to the abdomen may be applied, especially when term is near, and may be used to cause premature labor, or ensure that the infant is born on a ceremonial holiday. Certain labor inducing drugs may be also given if a certain birth date is desired.

Once the infant is born, testing is begun at a very early age, usually during the first few weeks of life. The trainers, who are taught to look for certain qualities in the infant, will place it on a velvet cloth on a table, and check its reflexes to different stimuli. The infant's strength, how it reacts to heat, cold, and pain are all tested. Different infants react differently, and the trainers are looking for dissociative ability, quick reflexes, and reaction times. They are also encouraging early dissociation in the infant with these tests.

The infant will also be abused, to create fragments. Methods of abuse can include: rectal probes; digital anal rape; electric shocks at low levels to the fingers, toes, and genitalia; cutting the genitalia in ritual circumstances (in older infants). The intent is to begin fragmentation before a true ego state develops, and customize the infant to pain and reflexive dissociation from pain (yes, even tiny infants dissociate; I have seen it time and time again; they will glow blank and limp, or glassy, in the face of continued trauma.)

Isolation and abandonment programming will sometimes be begun as well, in a rudimentary sense. The infant is abandoned, or uncared for by adults, intentionally during the daytime, then picked up, soothed, cleaned up and paid attention to in the context of preparing for a ritual or group gathering. This is done in order to help the infant associate night gatherings with "love" and attention, and to help the bonding process to the cult, or "family". The infant will be taught to associate maternal attention with going to rituals, and eventually will associate cult gatherings with feelings of security.

As the infant grows older, i.e. at 15 to 18 months, more fragmenting is intentionally done by having the parents as well as cult members abuse the infant more methodically. This is done by intermittently soothing, bonding with the infant, then shocking it on its digits; the infant may be dropped from heights to a mat or mattress and laughed at as it lays there startled and terrified, crying. It may be placed in cages for periods of time, or exposed to short periods of isolation.

Deprivation of food, water, and basic needs may begin later in this stage. All of these methods are done in order to create intentional dissociation in the infant. The infant of this age may be taken to group meetings, but outside of special occasions, or dedications, will have no active role yet in the cult setting. The small infants are usually left with a cult member, or caretaker, who watches them during the group's activities; this caretaker role is usually rotated among lower level or teenage members.

Between the ages of 20 and 24 months, the toddler may begin the "steps of discipline" which the Illuminati use to teach their children. The age the child begins them will vary, depending upon the group, the parent, the trainer, and the child. These "steps of discipline" would be better called "steps of torment and abuse" as their purpose is to create a highly dissociative child, out of touch with their feelings, who is completely and unthinkingly loyal to the cult.

The order of the steps may also be varied a little, depending on the whims of the trainer or parents. I will first discuss the first five steps of discipline: (note: these steps may vary somewhat from region to region, but most follow this outline at least roughly, even if not in the same order)

First step: to not need The small toddler/child is placed in a room without any sensory stimulus, usually a training room with gray, white, or beige walls. The adult leaves and the child is left alone, for periods of time: these may vary from hours, to an entire day as the child grows older. If the child begs the adult to stay, and not leave, or screams, the child is beaten, and told that the periods of isolation will increase until they learn to stop being weak. The ostensible purpose of this discipline is to teach the child to rely on its own internal resources, and not on outside people ("strengthen it"). What it actually does is create a huge terror of abandonment within the child.

When the adult, or trainer, returns to the room, the child is often found rocking itself, or hugging itself in a corner, occasionally almost catatonic from fear. The trainer will then "rescue" the child, feed and give it something to drink and bond with the child as their "savior". The trainer will tell them the "family" told the trainer to rescue the child, because its family "loves" it. The trainer will instill cult teachings, at this point, into the helpless, fearful, and almost insanely grateful child who has just been "rescued" from isolation. The trainer will reinforce in the child over and over how much it "needs " its family, who just rescued it from death by starvation or abandonment. This will teach the very young toddler to associate comfort and security with bonding with its trainer, who may be one of its parents, and being with "family" members. The cult is very aware of child developmental principles, and has developed exercises like the above after hundreds of years of teaching very young children.

Second step: to not want
This step is very similar to the first step, and actually reinforces it. It will be done intermittently with the first step over the next few years of the child's life. Again, the child is left alone in a training room, or isolated room, without food or water for a long period of time.

An adult will enter the room, with a large pitcher of ice water, or food. If the child asks for either, as the adult is eating or drinking in front of the child, he/she is severely punished for being weak and needy. This step is reinforced, until the child learns not to ask for food or water unless it is offered first. The ostensible reason the cult gives for this step is that it creates a child who is strong, and can go without food and water for longer and longer periods of time. The real reason this is done is that it creates a child who is completely dissociated from its own needs for food, water, or other comforts, who becomes afraid to ask outside adults for help. This creates in the child a hyper-vigilance as she/he learns to look for outside adults for cues on when it is okay to fulfill needs, and not to trust her/his own body signals.

The child is already learning to look outside itself to others to learn how it should think or feel, instead of trusting its own feelings. The cult now becomes the locus of control for the child.

Third step: to not wish
The child is placed in a room with favorite toys, or objects. A kind adult comes into the room and engages the child in play. This adult my be a friend, aunt, parent, or trainer. The child and adult may engage in fantasy play about the child's secret wishes, dreams, or wants. This will occur on several occasions, and the child's trust is slowly gained. At some later point, the child is severely punished for any aspect of wishing or fantasy shared with the adult, including the destruction of favorite toys, going in and undoing or destroying secret safe places the child may have created, or even destroying non cult protectors. This step is repeated, with variations, many times over the ensuing years. Occasionally, the child's siblings, parents, or friends will be used to reveal inside fantasies the child has revealed to them during the daytime, or in unguarded moments. The ostensible reason the cult gives for this step is to create a child who doesn't fantasize, who is more outwardly directed, less inwardly directed.

In other words, the child is to look to adults for permission in all aspects of its life, including internal. The reality is that this step destroys all safe places the child has created internally, to retreat from the horrors it is experiencing. This step creates in the child the feeling that there is no true safety, that the cult will find out everything it thinks. Exercises like this are also used to create young alters in the child who will self report to the cult trainers any secret safe places, or covert wishes against the ceult, that other alters have. This will then begin to set up intersystem hostility and divisiveness, which the cult will manipulate throughout the person's life span in order to control them.

Fourth step: the survival of the fittest
This step is used in order to begin creating perpetrator alters in the young child. ALL CULT MEMBERS WILL BE EXPECTED TO BECOME PERPETRATORS; THIS BEGINS IN EARLY CHILDHOOD. The child is brought into a room where there is a trainer and another child of approximately the same age, or slightly younger, that the child being taught. The child is severely beaten, for a long period of time, by the trainer, then told to hit the other child in the room, or they will be beaten further. If the child refuses, it is punished severely, the other child is punished as well, then the child is told to punish the other child. If the child continues to refuse, or cries, or tries to hit the trainer instead, they will continue to be beaten severely, and told to hit the other child, to direct its anger at the other child. This step is repeated until the child finally complies. This step is begun around age 2 to 2 1/2, and is used to create aggressive perpetrator alters in the young child. As the child becomes older, the punishing tasks become more and more brutal. Children are expected to become perpetrators of others at very young ages, and will "practice" on children younger than themselves, with the encouragement and rewarding by the adults around them.

They will also be mimicking these adults, who role model perpetration constantly as normal. The child will be taught that this is the acceptable outlet for the aggressive impulses and rage that are created by the brutality the child is constantly being exposed to.

Fifth step: the code of silence
Many, many different stratagems are used to put this in, starting at around the age of two years old, when a child starts becoming more verbal. Usually, after a ritual or group gathering, the child is asked about what they saw, or heard, during the meeting. Like most obedient young children, they will comply. They are immediately severely beaten, or tortured, and a new alter is created, who is told to keep or guard the memories of what was seen, on pain of their life. The new part always agrees. The child and this new part are put through a ceremony of swearing to never ever tell; and alters are created whose job it is to kill the body, if the other parts ever remember.

The child is also put through severe psychological torture to ensure that it will never be tempted to tell, including: being buried alive; near drowning; watching "traitor's deaths" involving slow painful torture, such as being burned, or skinned alive; being buried with a partially rotted corpse and being told that they will become a corpse like it if they ever tell, etc.

The scenarios go on and on, invented by people with endlessly cruel imaginations, in order to ensure the secrecy of the young child. These methods have been perfected over hundreds of years of practice by the cult with its children. The reason these things are done is self evident: the cult is involved in criminal activities, as explained in the first few chapters of this book, and they want to ensure the continued silence of its children. This is one reason why the cult has survived so long, and with its continued shroud of secrecy; why more survivors are afraid/unwilling to disclose their abuse.

In order to reveal cult secrets, a child must go against some of the most tremendously horrendous psychological trauma and abuse imaginable; even as an adult, the survivor has difficulty putting these things aside, when discussing their abuse. Children and adults alike are told that if they ever tell, they will be hunted down and shot (the assassin training lets the child know that this is no idle threat); that they will be tortured slowly. The child will be exposed to setups and role plays throughout their growing up that reinforces this step.

SUGGESTIONS THAT MAY HELP
I believe in also offering some ideas on how to undo some of the above mentioned programming, as I do not believe in knowledge, only for knowledge's sake. The survivor often needs tools, in order to try and undo some of the horrendous abuse that the cult places him/her through, especially as memories of these things occur. THESE ARE JUST MEANT AS HELPFUL HINTS AND DO NOT REPLACE THE ADVICE OF A GOOD THERAPIST.

1. Early milieu programming: This is difficult to undo, since it hits on core abandonment issues, and rejection, for the survivor. This will often have been the survivor's very first, earliest experiences as an infant, involving its relationship with its parents and primary family members. Working on this requires the whole hearted effort of all alter systems inside, to join in nurturing the core splits who experienced severe parental rejection, and the cognitive recognition that the DAYTIME was important, too; that the adults around the infant were the unhealthy ones. The infant's often feel unlovable, overly needy, depressed; but nurturing alters inside can help comfort them, and share the reality that the infant really was loveable, no matter what the outside adults around it were like. Here, too, an outside supportive therapist, and a strong, nurturing faith system, can help tremendously in the healing process, as new messages are brought in to the abandoned, wounded parts. Sorting through what happened, grieving over the real issues of abandonment, and bringing reality to very young, deeply wounded parts will take time.

2. Early intentional fragmentation: (ages 0 to 24 months) Usually there are cognitive parts of the survivor inside, who have never ever forgotten the abuse, and can help share the cognitive reality of the abuse with the amnesic alters. This should be done extremely slowly, since this first abuse was done quite early in life. Creating an internal nursery, with safe toys, objects, can help. Older nurturing adult alters inside can help hold and care for the wounded infants inside the nursery, while acknowledging and grieving over the abuse which occurred.

It is important to believe an validate the young parts when they come forward to share. Allowing them nonverbal ways of expressing themselves can help, as these are quite young parts, who often cannot talk yet. Having older children inside who are close to the infants verbalize their wants, needs, and fears can also help, as often the youngest parts inside do not trust ANY adults, even internal ones. A strong ,caring outside therapist is also important to healing, by modeling healthy nurturing to a system that may have no concept of this, while balancing the need of the infant for outside nurture with the need for the internal system(s) to learn their own self nurture techniques. Internal helpers can reach the infants, ground them, share present reality (that the body is older, the infants are safe, etc. These helpers may be internal older children, as mentioned before). The survivor may also want to find support adults when possible, who can help with modeling healthy caring with good boundaries.

A THERAPIST OR FRIEND CANNOT RE-PARENT THE SURVIVOR. The survivor will long for this, but realistically, the survivor has one set of parents, good or bad, or sadly, even terrible. No outside person can come in and redo the complete re-parenting of another. What the therapist and support person can offer will be caring, empathy, listening, while the survivor grieves over the loss of adequate nurture.

They can offer friendship or empathy with good boundaries. They cannot become the survivor's parents, or therapy will not progress. Instead, enmeshment will begin.

3. The First Five Steps of Discipline (there are twelve total; others will be addressed in later chapters) Try to find the parts that experienced the abuse. This may mean doing system mapping (drawing pictures of what things look like inside), and going to the cognitives (intellectuals) or controllers (head honchos inside) for information. An internal helper, or recorder, may also be extremely helpful in doing this.

Allow these parts to slowly acknowledge the agony that they experienced during their deprivation: heat (being held over a fire, or stove); cold (such as being placed in freezers, or ice, for example), lack of food, etc. Encourage the sharing of the cognitive portion of the memories first, while allowing amnesic alters to grieve over "hearing about" these things. Allow them time to absorb hearing about these traumas, as they occurred over several years during early childhood, and will take time to assimilate. Healing can't be rushed. Allow feeling alters later to step forward, and share their feelings, while more cognitive or helper parts are inside holding their hands, grounding them to the here and now throughout the process of remembering be prepared for floods of emotion at times, as well as body memories, as the abuse is recalled. A group of inside people can be designated as a "grounding team" to help ground these parts as they step forward and share their memories.

Remembering safely assumes that the person has a qualified therapist, and also has laid the groundwork for good intrasystem cooperation, as discussed above. Memory work should not be done until there is good communication and cooperation inside, or the person will be overwhelmed by the memories as they come out. They will be flooded and re-traumatized instead of helped, and may de-compensate. With good communication, memories can be brought out a little at a time, in manageable pieces, while cognitive alters continually help keep the survivor from going completely into the memory, and they can also help ground the more wounded parts.

The cult will put people through certain types of programming in order to achieve a specific goal: separating the intellect, or cognition, form the feelings in a person. Cognitive alters in these systems are always considered "higher" than the feeling alters; cognitive alters are taught to "pass down" their feelings to the "lower" feeling alters. While these labels are untrue, the cognitive alters will fear feeling the intense, overwhelming emotions that caused them to split further and further from the more limbic, or feeling alters internally. This will drive continued system divisiveness in the survivor. It is important that cognitive parts realize that the feeling alters are part of them; that they can practice sharing their feelings in SMALL steps without needing to be flooded, or overwhelmed.

A reminder: EXTERNAL SAFETY IS PARAMOUNT TO UNDOING INSIDE PROGRAMMING. You HAVE to be able to promise these parts external safety, and deliver on this promise, or they will understandably balk at working inside on undoing programming.

Why should they try and change, only to go back and be punished again? No system will undo its own protective dissociation, if the abuse is ongoing, or it will continue to destabilize and redissociate over and over. This is because dismantling the dissociation would mean dismantling its own survival and protection. Stopping contact with perpetrators and having a safe therapist are the very first steps to take, before attempting to undo internal programming. A system can still work on stopping cult contact, and begin healing , while being accessed, but it will slow therapy down tremendously as the internal energy will be diverted to staying safe rather than undoing trauma. A person can heal, and most survivors are still in cult contact when they enter therapy. BUT the progress will go much more quickly once cult contact is broken. (see chapter on preventing accessing of the survivor) .

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged programming techniques | Leave a Comment »

Chapter Three: The Illuminati Plan to Rule the World

September 20, 2008 by koniword

Prior to discussing actual programming techniques, it is important to understand the philosophy underlying why the Illuminists are programming people. All groups have goals, and the Illuminists are no exception. Money making is not their final goal – it is a means to an end. This end point, or goal, is no less than to rule the world. The Illuminati has a set plan similar to the Soviet Union's previous "5- year" and "10-year " plans. This is what the Illuminists themselves believe and teach their followers as gospel truth.

Whether they will actually succeed is another matter altogether. The following is the Illuminist agenda at ALL levels of the Illuminati. As with any goal, the Illuminati has specific steps which it plans to implement to reach its objectives. Briefly, each region of the United States has "nerve centers" or power bases for regional activity. The United States has been divided up into seven major geographical regions. Each region has localities within it that contain military compounds and bases that are hidden in remote, isolated areas or on large private estates.

These bases are used intermittently to teach and train generational Illuminati in military techniques, hand- to- hand combat, crowd control, use of arms, and all aspects of military warfare. Why? Because the Illuminists believe that our government, as we know it, as well as the governments of most nations around the world, are destined to collapse. These will be planned collapses, and they will occur in the following ways:

The Illuminati has planned first for a financial collapse that will make the great depression look like a picnic. This will occur through the maneuvering of the great banks and financial institutions of the world, through stock manipulation, and interest rate changes. Most people will be indebted to the federal government through bank and credit card debt, etc. The governments will recall all debts immediately, but most people will be unable to pay and will be bankrupted. This will cause generalized financial panic which will occur simultaneously worldwide, as the Illuminists firmly believe in controlling people through finances.

Next there will be a military takeover, region by region, as the government declares a state of emergency and martial law. People will have panicked, there will be an anarchical state in most localities, and the government will justify its move as being necessary to control panicked citizens. The cult trained military leaders and people under their direction will use arms as well as crowd control techniques to implement this new state of affairs. This is why so many survivors under 36 years of age report having military programming. People who are not Illuminists or who are not sympathetic to their cause, will resist. The Illuminists expect this and will be (and are BEING) trained in how to deal with this eventuality. They are training their people in hand-to- hand combat, crowd control, and, if necessary, will kill to control crowds. The Illuminati is training their people to be prepared for every possible reaction to the takeover.

Many mind control victims will also be called into duty with preset command codes. These codes are meant to call out a new, completely cult loyal presenting system. Shatter codes programmed under trauma will be used to destroy or bury non-cult loyal alters.

Military bases will be set up, in each locality (actually, they are already here, but are covert). In the next few years, they will go above ground and be revealed. Each locality will have regional bases and leaders to which they are accountable. The hierarchy will closely reflect the current covert hierarchy.

About five years ago, when I left the Illuminati, approximately 1% of the US population was either part of the Illuminati, sympathetic to it, or a victim of Mind Control (and therefore considered useable). While this may not sound like many, imagine 1% of the population highly trained in the use of armaments, crowd control, psychological and behavioral techniques, armed with weapons and linked to paramilitary groups.

These people will also be completely dedicated to their cause. The Illuminati firmly believes that it can easily overcome the other 99% of the population, most of whom are untrained, or poorly trained, such as "weekend hunters." Even the local military will be overcome as the Illuminati will have regional cell groups with highly trained leaders. They also count on the element of surprise helping them during their takeover. Many of the highest leaders in the militia branch of the Illuminati are or have been officers in the military, and so already have a good knowledge of which techniques will work best to overcome a region's or locality's defenses.

After the military takeover, the general population will be given a chance to either espouse the Illuminati's cause, or reject it (with imprisonment, pain, even death being possible punishments). These people very much believe that the intelligent, or "enlightened" or Illuminated, were born to rule. They are arrogant, and consider the general population as "dumb sheep" who will be easily led if offered strong leadership, financial help in an unstable world economy, and dire consequences if the person rebels. Their utter ruthlessness, and ability to implement this agenda, should not be minimized.

The Illuminati banking leaders, such as the Rothschilds, the Vanderbilts, the Rockefellers, the Carnegies, and the Mellons, as examples, will reveal themselves, and offer to "save" the floundering world economy. A new system of monetary exchange, based on an international monetary system, and based between Cairo, Egypt, and Brussels, Belgium, will be set up. A true "one world economy", creating the longed for "one world order", will become reality.

There is more to the Illuminist agenda, but these are the basics of it. This agenda is what the Illuminati really, truly, believe, teach, and train for. They are willing to give their lives up in this cause, in order to teach the next generation, as they believe that their children are their legacy. I was told that my children's generation would see this takeover, sometime in the 21st century.

At present, the Illuminati have quietly and covertly fostered their takeover plan by their goals of the infiltration of:
1. The media
2. The banking system
3. The educational system
4. The government, both local and federal
5. The sciences
6. The churches

They are currently, and have been working the last several hundred years, on taking over these 6 areas. They do NOT go to an institution, and say "hi, I'm a local Illuminist, and I'd like to take over your bank). Instead, they begin by having several people quietly invest funds over several years, gradually buying more and more shares in the bank (or other institution that they wish to control), until they have a financial controlling interest in it. They never openly disclose their agenda, or their cult activities, as often they are amnesic to them. These are well respected, "Christian" appearing business leaders in the community. The image in the community is all important to an Illuminist; they will do anything to maintain a normal, respected facade, and DESPISE exposure. On one leadership in a major metropolitan city, where I was a member, there sat: one head of the local small business administration; one CEO of a government defense firm; one principal of a Christian school; one vice mayor of the city; one journalist; one nurse; one doctor; one behavioral psychologist, one army Colonel, and one navy Commander. All except one attended church weekly; all were well respected within the community. NONE of them appeared "evil", or "marked".

If you met them in person, you would probably instantly like any of these intelligent, verbal, likeable, even charismatic people. This is their greatest cover, since we often expect great evil to "appear" evil, led by media portrayals of evil as causing changes in the face and demeanor of people, or marking them like the biblical Cain. None of the Illuminists that I have known, had unkind, or evil appearing, persona in their daytime lives, although some were dysfunctional, such as being alcoholics. The dissociation that drives the Illuminists is their greatest cover for being undetected at this time. Many, if not most, of these people are completely unaware of the great evil that they are involved in, during the night.

There are other groups which are not actually part of the Illuminati, but the Illuminati are aware of them. The Illuminati are not the only group that follows esoteric practices, or worships ancient deities or demons. They encourage divisiveness between different groups (divide and conquer is one of their ruling principles), and are not concerned about other groups. Instead, they will often welcome them into their umbrella, if possible. This has been happening more and more in recent years, as the Illuminati trade teaching their training principles, which are considered the best by most secretive groups, in exchange for loyalty to the Illuminati. They will send their trainers to these groups, and the trainers will report to the local regional council.

In the political arena , the Illuminists will fund both sides of a race, because their greatest maxim is that "out of chaos comes order", or the discipline of anarchy. That is why they sent arms to, and funded, both sides of both the great World Wars in this century. They believe that history is a game, like chess; that only out of strategy, fighting, conflict, and testing can the strong emerge. I no longer agree with this philosophy, but at one time, I did, with all my heart.

Hopefully, as these people and their agenda are exposed the common man will rise up against this intended rule to be foisted upon an unsuspecting mankind.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged dissociation, Illuminati bankers | Leave a Comment »

Chapter Two: Jobs in the Illuminati

September 20, 2008 by koniword

Chapter Two: Jobs in the Illuminati (or Why They Spend All That Time Training People)

To understand generational programming, it helps to understand WHY the cult goes to the amount of trouble that it does to place programming into people. Training represents time and effort, and no one- especially a cult member- will spend that amount of energy unless there will be a return on the investment. This will be a simple overview of some of the more common jobs in the cult. It is not meant to be exhaustive, or in any way considered to be complete.

The cult has a very organized hierarchy of jobs. Like any large organization, in order to run smoothly, it needs people who are well trained in their jobs- so well trained, that they can do their tasks without even thinking about them. To maintain secrecy, this group must also have people completely dedicated to not revealing their roles in the cult- even under threat of death or punishment. The cult wants members who are completely loyal to the group and its tenets, who never question the orders they are given. These qualities in group members ensure the continuance of the cult, and that its secrets are never revealed to the outside world.
Here is a sampling of some jobs in the cult (not listed in order of priority) Informers These people are trained to observe details and conversations with photographic recall. They are trained to report to their local cult leader or hierarchy, or trainer, and will download large amounts of information under hypnotic trance. Detailed knowledge of conversations or even documents can often be retrieved in this manner. They are often used as "plants" to gather information in both governmental settings, and within the cult meetings.

Breeders
These people are often chosen from childhood to have and breed children. They may be chosen according to bloodlines, or given in arranged marriages or cult alliances, to "elevate" the children. A parent will often sell the services of a child as a breeder to the local cult leader in return for favors or status. These children are rarely used as a sacrifice; usually they are given to others in the cult to adopt or raise, but the breeder is told that any child born to her was "sacrificed" to prevent her looking for the child. Occasionally, in anarchical cults, a local leader or parent will have a child as the result of an incestuous liaison. Such a child is given away or killed, but the mother will be told the child was given away to a distant branch, and must be given up.

Prostitutes
Prostitutes can be a male or female of any age. They are trained from earliest childhood to give sexual favors to one or more adults in return for payment to the child's parents or their local cult group. Occasionally, the prostitute may be given to a member of the cult, on a temporary basis, as a "reward" for a job well done. Child prostitution is a big business for the cult, and training very young children in this role is taken very seriously. Child prostitutes are also used to blackmail political figures or leadership outside the cult.

Pornography

A child used in pornography (which may include bestiality) can also be of any age or sex.
Child pornography is also big business in the cult, and includes snuff films. Children are trained in this role from preschool on, often with the help or approval of the child's parents.
The parents are paid or given favors by the cult in return for selling their child or allowing their child to be trained in this area.

Media personnel
These are very bright, verbal people. They will be sent to journalism school and will work for local or regional media upon graduation. These individuals have many contacts within the organization as well as the outside world. They write books and articles sympathetic to the Illuministic viewpoint without ever revealing their true affiliation. They will tend to do biased research in their articles, favoring only one viewpoint, such as denying the existence of DID or ritual abuse. For instance, they will interview only psychiatrists/psychologists sympathetic to this viewpoint and will skew data to present a convincing picture to the general public. If necessary, they will outright lie or make up data to support their viewpoint. There are members of groups whose people have been purposely trained to try and help formulate public opinion on the nonexistence of the cult (i.e., cults don't exist, no rational person would believe this "mass hysteria"). The Illuminists believe that to control the media is to control the thinking of the masses. For this reason, they take training media personnel quite seriously.
Helpers at rituals Cleaners clean up meticulously after rituals. They will scour the site after a ceremony, rake the area, etc. They are taught this job from preschool years on.
Preparers set up tables, cloths, candles, and paraphernalia quickly and efficiently. This job is learned from infancy on. Readers read from the book of Illumination or local group archives; they also keep copies of sacred literature in a safe vault and are trained in ancient languages.
Readers are valued for their clear speaking voices and ability to dramatize important passages and bring them to life.

Cutters are taught to dissect animal or human sacrifices (they are also known as the "slicers and dicers" of the cult). They can do a kill quickly, emotionlessly, and efficiently. They are trained from early childhood on.

Chanters sing, sway, or lead choruses of sacred songs on high holy occasions.
High Priest/Priestess

The person who holds this job is changed every few years in most groups, although it may be held longer in smaller, more rural groups. These people administrate and lead their local cult group as well as coordinate jobs within the cult, give assignments, and pass on meeting dates given from the local hierarchy or leadership council. They also will activate the local group's telephone tree, evaluate their local group members for job performance, and lead in all spiritual activities. They report to the local or regional leadership council over their group.

Trainers
These people teach local group members their assigned jobs and monitor the performance of these jobs at local group meetings or after an assigned task. These people report to the high priest/priestess over their group, as well as to the local head trainer on leadership council.

Punishers
These are the people who brutally punish/discipline members caught breaking rules or acting outside of or above their authority. They are universally despised by other cult members, although they will be praised for a job well done by the local high priest or priestess. Usually physically strong, they will employ any method deemed necessary to prevent a recurrence of the undesired behavior. Punishment may be public or private, depending upon the severity of the infraction. Each local group has several punishers.

Trackers
These people will track down and keep an eye on members who attempt to leave their local group. They are taught to use dogs, guns, taser, and all necessary tracking techniques. They are also adept at using the internet to monitor a person's activities. They will track credit card use, checks written, and employ other methods to find a missing person.

Teachers
These people teach group classes to children to indoctrinate cult philosophy, languages, and specialized areas of endeavor. Child care These people care for very young children when the adults are at local group meeting. Usually care is for young infants only. After age two, children are routinely engaged in some form of group activity led by trainers of the youngest children. Infant child care workers are usually quiet and coldly efficient.

Couriers
These members run guns, money, drugs, or illegal artifacts across state or national lines.
Usually they are people who are young and single without outside accountability. They are trained in the use of firearms to get out of difficult situations. They must be reliable and able to get past any anticipated barriers.

Commanding officers

These people oversee military training in the local groups and help ensure the smooth running of these exercises. They will delegate jobs to those ranking under them and are responsible to the local leadership council. The council will have at least one member on it representing the military branch of the Illuminati. In addition, there are many military- related jobs beneath the commanding officers.

Behavioral scientists
These individuals often oversee the training in local and regional groups. These students of human behavior are intensely involved in data collection and human experimentation in the name of the pursuit of knowledge of human behavior in the scientific realm. They are almost universally cold, methodical, impersonal people and will employ any methods to study trauma and its effects on the human personality. Their main interest centers around implementing programming and cult control in the most efficient and lasting manner.
There are many other jobs inside the cult. The cult spends quite a bit of its time getting people to do these jobs for them for FREE, which is why they PROGRAM people to believe they are doing their "family" and the world a service. The reality, of course, is that the individual is being abused and taken advantage of by the cult.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged Illuminati jobs | 2 Comments »

Chapter One: An Overview of The Illuminati

September 20, 2008 by koniword

Chapter One: An Overview of the Illuminati

In order to understand Illuminati cult programming, it is first necessary to understand a bit about the structure and philosophy of the organization. The Illuminati are a group of people who follow a philosophy known as "Illuminism" or "enlightenment". The Illuminati were named several hundred years ago, but trace their roots and history to the ancient mystery religions of Egypt, ancient Babylon, and even Mesopotamia. Out of these ancient religions, which were practiced secretly over hundreds and hundreds of years, there arose esoteric groups which continued to practice the rites, traditions, and enculturation brought in from the original groups.
Over the centuries, these groups practiced openly in some countries, and covertly in countries where Christianity or other religions opposed their practices. Some of the groups which came out of these ancient roots included the order of the Knights Templar, Rosicrucian's, Baphetomism, and Druidic cults. These groups were the forerunners, or roots, of modern day Illuminism. The original Illuministic leaders chose to take what they felt were the best practices of each root religion, combine them into principles, then organized these principles according to specific guidelines.

Modern day Illuminism is a philosophy funded by the wealthy, but practiced in all social strata. It is a philosophy whose tenets have spread across the world. It started with the German branch of Rosicrucian's, spread to England, then came to the United states with the first settlers.

The Illuminati have 3 main branches: the Germanic branch, which oversees the others, the British branch, which handles finances, and the French/Russian branch. All 3 branches are represented in both the United States and Canada, as well as every country in the world.
How the Illuminati are organized in the United States: The Illuminati have groups in every major city of the United States. They originally entered the U.S. through Pittsburgh, Pa., and from there, spread across the US. There are 18 cities across the US, which are considered major "power centers" for Illuminati power and/or influence. These include: Washington, DC and the surrounding areas; Albany, New York; Pittsburgh, Pa; the "golden triangle" of the Winston Salem, Raleigh, NC area; Minneapolis, Minn; Ann Arbor, Mich; Wichita, Kan.; Phoenix, Az.; Portland, Or.; Flagstaff, Az.; Seattle, Wash.; Houston, TX; Los Angeles, CA. and surrounding areas; Atlanta, Ga.; New Orleans, La., Springfield, Miss. Other cities are important to the Illuminati, as well, but these cities funnel money for them, conduct research, and often regional councils sit within them.
Hierarchy of the Illuminati
The Illuminati have organized their society along extremely hierarchical, or stratified, levels.
In fact, the top levels are known as:
Hierarchical level
The Illuminati have divided the United States into 7 geographical regions; each region has its own regional council, composed of 13 members, with an advisory board of 3 elders to each one. These regions interact for purposes of finances; personnel; teaching, etc. Beneath each regional council, is a local council. This is a council of 13 members, the head of whom sits on the regional council, and gives it information about the local groups underneath his leadership.
The local council will also have an advisory council of 3.
A local leadership council in a large metropolitan area might look like this:

l Head of local council (reports to regional council)
l Two intermediaries (report all activities under leader to him)
l Four administrators (oversee finances, administer, set up group activities)
l Six head trainers (over trainers in local groups, teach other trainers) Underneath the above leadership council, will be six people designated as informers or intermediaries, who go to the local group meetings, interact with local group leaders, and report to the leadership council.
Anarchical level: the levels below the leadership council are known as the anarchical levels.

Underneath the intermediate level, is the local group level. It will look like this:
l Local "Sister groups" (will vary in number, according to the size of the city, or cities, in the area). A large metropolitan area may have anywhere from ten to twenty seven groups.
Each sister group will be headed up by:
A high priest and priestess: this job is rotated every 3 years, to allow different people within the group to take on leadership roles. Each group will also have different members, with specific roles/jobs within the group. These roles will be addressed in chapter 2.
One thing that I would like to emphasize is the fact that the Illuminati today are generational.
There members are born into the group, which is highly organized, as described above. The set up discussed above is representative, with minor variations, of most major metropolitan regions of the United States. Smaller population centers will be organized under similar guidelines, but will be umbrellaed together with several cities within the region to create the local leadership council.
How the Illuminati make money
The Illuminati are involved in many areas of making money, as they need continued financing to survive. There are several illegal enterprises that they are involved in, as well as legal ones.
Drug running: The Illuminati linked up with the Mafia and the Columbians, years ago, to help each other out with bringing drugs into the United States. They also provide couriers for taking drugs and money out of the States. The Illuminists are generally wealthy businessmen, who have 4 layers of people underneath them. The fourth layer down actually has contact with the people in the drug industry. They never identify themselves as Illuminists; only as people interested in investing, with a guaranteed profit, and are highly secretive. In return, the local groups supply people willing to be couriers of money or drugs, or people willing to help cover for the local operations.
Pornography: The Illuminati are linked in many cities with pornography/prostitution/child prostitution/ and white slavery sales. Again, several layers are present, as a buffer, between the true "management" and those either engaged in the activities, or in paying for/funding and eventually being paid for the activities.

Children are often supplied from the local cult groups, and taught to be child prostitutes (and later, adult prostitutes); are photographed and filmed in every type of pornography available, including "snuff films" and violent films.

Gun running: The Illuminati and other groups are also involved in international gun sales and shipments. The Illuminists have well trained couriers who will cross international and state lines. These couriers are highly secretive, and will not reveal their sources, on pain of suicide or assassination. These people are accountable to others above them, with two more "buffer layers" of people above these, before the person in the Illuminati with money, who helps fund this, is found.
Buying access codes for military computers: The Illuminati will have people from all strata of civilian life trained to go and make pickups near or on military bases. A typical person used might be the innocent looking wife of a military person, a local businessman, or even a college student. There is a contact inside the base, also a dissociative Illuminist, who brings the information to the outside contact. Occasionally, the contact person is paid with money, information, or goods. The military computer codes are changed on random schedules; the Illuminati have at least 5 or 6 contacts on each major base, who alert them when the codes are getting ready to change, on pain of death. The Illuminists like having access to military computers, because that will gain them entrance to closed files the world over.
Hiring and selling assassinations: this is done worldwide, more in Europe than in the States.
These people are paid big money to do either a private or political assassination. The money is paid either to the assassin, or to the trainer; usually they both divide the fee The assassin is offered protection in another country for awhile, until the trail runs cold. If the kill is done in Europe they may be sent to the far east or the U.S., and vice versa if the kill is done in the U.S.
The Illuminati have a wide arena of places and false identities to hide these people, unless for some reason they want the assassin disposed of as well. Then, he/she is caught and immediately executed.
Mercenaries/military trainers: guess who gets paid money to come in and train paramilitary groups? Who has training camps all over the states of Montana, Nevada, and North Dakota?
Who occasionally will offer their expertise in return for a large financial reward? They never advertise themselves as Illuminati, unless the group is known to be sympathetic to their cause.

Instead, these are tough, cold, brutal military trainers, who offer to teach these groups in return for money, or even better, a promise to affiliate with their group in return (loyalty in return for knowledge). More and more paramilitary groups have been brought into the Illuminati this way, without their full knowledge of who and what the group really is. This gives the Illuminists a way to monitor these groups (their trainers report on them, and their activities), and it can be useful to have trained military groups that they can call on someday.

Banking: The original Illuminists were bankers, and they have highly trained financiers to organize their money, and funnel the above illicit funds into more "respectable" front groups/organizations. They will also start benevolent charities, community organizations, etc., as fronts, and funnel the money from a broad base into these groups. The Illuminati particularly pride themselves on their money making and manipulation skills, and their ability to cover their paper trails expertly, through layer after layer.

All banking trails eventually will lead to Belgium, the Illuminati financial center for the world.
These are some of the major money making enterprises that the Illuminati are engaged in.
They have a lot of financial resources, backing their enterprises, which means that in reality they can engage the best lawyers, accountants, etc. to help cover their trail as well.

About the author:
Hi, my name is Svali. Both I and my entire family were involved in a cult group until several years ago, when we broke free. I used to be a programmer in the cult, and now I want to share the knowledge that I have to help others. It is possible to break free of cult abuse if a person is involved. It is a long, heart-breaking process, but well worth it. In the articles that I will be providing, I hope to help the survivor of cult abuse find tools to help in their journey towards freedom.
I have been a consultant to an on-line survivors group that helps people dealing with issues related to cult programming and becoming free, for the past year and a half. I myself have been in therapy for ritual abuse and DID for nine years, with the last five being aware of the recent cult abuse.
I am also a writer, and a registered nurse. I currently work as a diabetic educator in Texas 20 hours a week.
I have also self-published a book on breaking free of cult programming, which several experts in the field have said has "invaluable information" for the survivor of ritual abuse.
Both my ex-husband and my two children broke free of cult abuse last year. My children are living with me while my husband is working on healing. They all have DID (dissociative identity disorder, formerly known as multiple personality disorder) as well, which makes life at home interesting! I am currently married to my second husband, who is also a recovered DID and who got out of the cult five years ago.

Breaking the Chain: Breaking free of cult programming
Appendix
Equipment Frequently Used by Trainers
It may help therapists to realize the equipment that trainers use. If their client describes these items, which may appear quite sophisticated, believe them. The cult has become quite technologically advanced.

Training room: the average training room is a neutral colored room, with walls painted either a dull gray, white, or beige. Some may be painted in various colors, as part of color coding.
They are often located in secret underground rooms, or basements of large private residences, and will be entered from the main building through a covered doorway. Impromptu training rooms may be set up during military exercises outdoors, in covered canvas tents.
Trainers: the Illuminati have a rule: there must always be a minimum of two trainers working with a person. This prevents a trainer from being either too severe, or permissive, or developing too close a bond with the subject; the watchful eye of the other trainer prevents this. Younger trainers are paired with older, more experienced trainers. The older trainer will teach the younger, who does most of the actual work. If the younger is unable to finish a task, or loses heart, the older one will step in.

Head trainers: will teach, they will also work with the council leaders and hierarchy. All members are required to come in for a "tune up" (reinforcing programming), even top leaders, from time to time.

EEG machine: will often have abbreviated hookups for quick use. Used extensively with brain wave programming; also to verify that a certain alter is out when called up. May be used to verify deep trance state before initiating deep programming. Trainers are taught to read these readouts.

Trainer's table: a large table, frequently steel covered with plastic, or easily cleaned material.
On the sides at intervals are restraints for arms, legs, neck to prevent movement.
Trainer's chair: large chair with arm rests. Will have restraints as above at intervals to restrain movement while person sits in chair.

Shock equipment: models and types are quite varied, depending on age and company. Most have a set of rubber covered wires, with electrodes that may be connected with Velcro, rubber (steel tips imbedded under finger and toe nail beds), or gel pads (larger body areas such as chest, arms, legs). Some are tiny electrodes, which can be taped next to eyes, or placed within genitalia. These are connected to the "shock box", which has controls that can determine amount of electricity , and frequency, if interval shocks are desired.

Drugs: any number of opiates, barbiturates, hypnotics, sedatives, anesthetic agents.
Resuscitative drugs, antidotes are also kept, clearly labeled and indexed. Many drugs, especially experimental ones, are only known by code names, such as "alphin 1".
CPR equipment: in case person has adverse reaction to drugs or programming. At times, a child alter will come out inadvertently during a programming sequence, and will be overdosed with the drugs meant for adult alters. The trainers must give it the antidote, and resuscitate it, just as if a real child is out. They are well aware of this fact, and will severely punish child alters, to teach them to come out only when called out.

Virtually reality headsets: the keystone in recent years. Many programming sequences utilize holographic images, and virtual reality set ups, including assassination programs, where the person realistically "kills" another human being. These virtual disks are far more advanced than those in video arcades.

Body building equipment: used in military training to increase fitness, lean body mass.

Steel instruments: used to insert into orifices, cause pain

Stretch machine: used as punishment, "stretches " person without breaking bones. Extremely painful.

Trainer's grids and projectors: used to project grids on wall or ceiling.

Movie projector: to show movies, although new VR disks are replacing these computer:
collect and analyze data; keep computer grid on person's system. Current military computer access codes will be used to download into governmental computers.

Trainer's journals: contain indexed copies of subject's systems, including key alters, command codes, etc.

Comfort objects: used to comfort subject afterwards. May be toy or candy for child alters, or oils for massage. Warm towels, or beverages may be given, as the trainer "bonds with" and comforts person they worked with. This is probably the most important part of the training process, as the trainer explains calmly, kindly how well the person did, how proud they are of them.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged cult, programming, techniques | 2 Comments »

Transcript Svali's Interview with Greg Szymanski

September 19, 2008 by koniword

Transcript of Illuminati Survivor Svali's Appearance on Investigative Journal with Greg Szymanski

January 17, 2006

GS: You're listening to the Investigative Journal. I'm your host, Greg Szymanski. Two hours – two hours with great interviews all the time. We get into the news behind the scenes that the mainstream media refuses to cover. What a shame.

Let me just update some things before I tell you who my guest is today. I've been promo-ing it all week, and we're going to get deep inside the Family, the Order, the Illuminati today, for two hours. And you've got to stay with us from the beginning to the end of this interview.

I just wanted to mention we had Dr. Martini on earlier in the week. A big aspartame vote, to ban aspartame in New Mexico, is going on today. I called her last night. They held it over until today. So we'll know later this morning whether aspartame is banned in New Mexico. That could have a chain effect that could really save a lot of lives.

Also, I wanted to mention the bulldozing in New Orleans. Now this is a story on my website. You can go to http://www.arcticbeacon.com, and you're going to see this story. This is an incredible story we've been following, with Brandon Darby from Common Cause Relief down there. A New Orleans federal judge, a crooked order here, folks, last Friday quashed all hopes for Ninth Ward residents to get their day in court as he indiscriminately canceled a January 17th hearing to hear evidence on why the city has no right to demolish homes under eminent domain laws.

Basically what he did is that there was supposed to be a hearing this week. There was a restraining order to stop the indiscriminate bulldozing of over 44 thousand homes in the Ninth Ward, many of which, Brandon says, are in good shape. Needless to say, they do not need to be demolished. But the people are a long, long, long way away from New Orleans, kept away by these FEMA programs that we've documented.

Brandon says now what happened is the judge called the lawyers in, canceled the hearing, and said,

"Listen, you're going to take my orders, which are this. Both lawyers are going to adhere to this. You can demolish the homes as long as you give the people notice."

So it doesn't matter if they object, apparently, just as long as they know their home is going to be bulldozed down, and that's what the city is doing right now. So we'll keep track of that story as it goes on this week.

Now, on my website all week, I've been running this series on the feared Illuminati. That word started to be used back in the 18th century. There are other words – the Family, the Order, for people that are inside this group. So let's not get hung up on the words. What this group does is amazing.

As I documented in my series which is going on now, part three is on today, so if you want to go to Arctic Beacon and get that, and it's talking about Svali, who was a member of the Illuminati, the Family, the Order. She is with us as our guest today, and after this break we're going to find out the whole story from beginning to end about Svali's involvement, and then about how she decided to get out and what she's doing now. And I might add, it's a great thing what she's doing now, alerting people and also helping many, many people in America understand exactly what this group is all about.

So anyway, we'll be back with Svali on the Investigative Journal. I'm your host, Greg Szymanski.

[commercial break – resume 8:30]

GS: Okay, we're back. It's eight minutes after the hour, and we're going to get deep inside the Illuminati, the Family, the Order. We have a guest who was involved with this group, born into it, for over thirty years. Her name is Svali. Svali, are you with us?

SV: Uh, yes I am.

GS: Well, it's nice to have you here. I know you don't give radio interviews, and I really want to thank you, because I think it really does help the American people understand about this secret organization that you were born into. So I guess we can just start from the beginning. Tell us – right from the beginning you were born into this, from wealthy parents. Tell us about your training in this group when you were a young child and then up until your orientation at the Vatican. Go ahead.

SV: (surprised, laughing) Well, that's a pretty broad area, Greg! That could take hours, if you know what I mean.

GS: Yes, but do it, you know, if you could just outline it for us.

SV: Yeah. I mean, I was born in the group, I was born in Germany, and came to the US very young. I basically went through all the training that the group… all members of the group do undergo training to various degrees, depending on the role.

By the time I was a teenager, I was a youth leader, and by the time I was 22, I became the youngest member of Leadership Council in San Diego County . At that time I was a head trainer. I was the sixth trainer and eventually moved up to the second position.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: When I was twelve, I had mentioned with you the ceremony at the Vatican…

GS: Right.

SV: …that they really do make all leadership in the group undergo at some point.

GS: Now basically when you were growing up, I remember you told me that you were instilled at a young age. You were born to a very wealthy, well-to-do family.

SV: Yes.

GS: You moved back to the States. You were told at a very young age you were special, you were "chosen." Correct?

SV: Well, they tell everyone in the group that they are special and chosen, and that's one of the things that made me very cynical when I was older. You will never meet a person who is an Illuminati who has not been told or programmed for years that they're special, they're the only one that can do things for quote-unquote "Family".

But I was told, yes, I would do great things for Family one day. The reason why I can filter some of this with an objective view is that I know what my role in the group was. It was over quite a significant number of other people. So I don't evaluate my role or specialness within the group so much by what I was told, but by what I did.

(regretful downturn in voice on "what I did")

GS: So you reached the age of 12, and then you're told by your parents you're going to an induction ceremony in the Vatican.

SV: Yes.

GS: Can you tell us how that happened and what occurred at that ceremony when you went there?

SV: (deep breath, voice becomes stressed) Okay. Um, this isn't easy to talk about, as you know.

When I was twelve, I was flown over to Germany. And I was at, I'll call them the German Fathers' house, over there. And, there was some preparation for a few days, beforehand, and I was told that there would be a very important ceremony. And it was considered a sealing ceremony at that point. And basically I was told a little bit about what I was expected to do during the ceremony.

When we got there, we went through the Vatican. Underneath the Vatican there is a large room that I described to you when we talked before. It has 13 catacomb chambers leading into it. And what they do is as you go down these steps into the room, you can see that it's circular, so they're all rounded. They bring out the mummies from the catacombs. And they set them beside each one [each of the 13 catacomb chambers], and they say "That's the spirit of the Fathers watching over the ceremony."

During the ceremony, there was a large table in the center of the room. It was on top of this huge golden pentagram. They had a ceremony there.

GS: So how many kids, how many other children were with you being inducted into the Family or the Order, as they call it?

SV: There were two other children at that point. But there were several adults too.

GS: Okay.

SV: See, the Church also brings in adults to swear their allegiance, too, just so you know. I was told, and I don't know if this is true, that if you want to rise to a certain position within the Catholic Church hierarchy, you do have to go through that ceremony as well.

GS: Okay, so you're down in this room. Your parents weren't present.

SV: No. No. The German Father and the French Father were.

GS: Okay, and at that point tell our listeners what you witnessed.

SV: (pause, additional voice stress) Well, there was a table. It looked like dark glass in the center of the room. It was made out of a stone, but it was very shiny and darkened black. It may have been something like obsidian or onyx, I'm not sure. This was the only time I've seen stone like that.

Around the corners it had these gold channels that, you know, collect fluids. A little boy was placed in the center of the table and drugged. I think he was drugged, because he was very quiet. He didn't move or say anything.

GS: This was a little three or four-year-old boy, right?

SV: Yes. Yeah. Yeah.

GS: Then they continued to do a child sacrifice.

SV: Yes, they did. Yes. I told you about that before. Yeah.

GS: Now afterwards, quite, what an unbelievable experience for a youth, a 12-year-old. What went through your mind when that happened?

SV: I was terrified! I mean, I was absolutely horrified. I… I… I… I can't describe the terror you feel when you go through something like that.

GS: And do you remember the words they were saying as this was going on?

SV: (pause) The man was in scarlet – he was speaking in Latin. And basically he was saying, "Please accept the sacrifice on this day." And then he said, "This sacrifice will seal the ceremony." And then he did it.

Again, I was so terrified that… (sighs) Have you ever been in a situation where your heart's racing, but you can't do anything? You're just kind of sitting there, and you're kind of fading in and out?

GS: Well, I can remember as a youth being frightened, but I don't think I've ever…

SV: (crosstalk) No. All right.

GS:… had anything quite like what you've had.

SV: Imagine your heart rate going up to about 220. You can't move. You're kind of shaking, but you're trying not to show it.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: It was horrible. Actually, I keep thinking inside, "I can't wait 'till it's over. I can't wait." You don't say this, but inside you're just saying over and over, "I can't wait 'till this is over. I can't wait 'till this is over. I can't wait 'till it's over."

GS: Mm hm.

SV: Afterwards, the man in scarlet, he had a huge golden ring on his hand. He came over to the center of the room. Each of the people that were swearing that day had to go forward and kneel before him and kiss his ring, and swear my allegiance to the New Order, to the New World Order for all… until my death.

GS: Hm. Now at that point you were escorted out.

SV: Yes. Yeah. After the ceremony was all over. I mean, the other people also did theirs as well. They had to swear their allegiance too.

GS: And they were the same age as you?

SV: The two children were, but there were also three adults that went forward and did the same. And afterwards, we were told, (slowly and precisely): "May the same to you or worse occur should you ever break this oath."

GS: Hm. So it's basically… whew! Imagine at that age, what [this would do]. And you weren't really prepped for this, were you? You were told there was a ceremony, but you didn't expect anything like this, from what I've gathered talking to you.

SV: It was very difficult to go through, just because the sense of horrific oppression down there was the worst I've [ever felt.] I've gone through some ceremonies in my life in the Illuminati, you do go through them. But I have to say that in my experience this was the worst, just because… I can't explain the amount of darkness in that room. It was just pure evil. And unless you've ever been in a… seen a person… it was just horrible.

It wasn't just what happened, but just… I mean, the oppression. And I'm a Christian now, and I know the difference between when there is evil present – oppression – or when God's love is present, which is joy and peace. That's the exact opposite of what there was in that room.

GS: Now you know what I find quite interesting about this? About 25 years ago, I was a reporter and a freelance writer in Rome, and I spent six years there. I walked through the Vatican many, many times… hundreds of times. I covered the papal addresses, things like that.

During that time I was there during a Vatican scandal, which involved the Church bank and other things… members of the Illuminati, the Freemasons. I was approached by a woman, Maria Vendital (ph), and I'll never forget this. Rome's a small town. People knew I was covering stories about the secret societies, things like that. I had to ask people.

Well, this woman came up to me and told me similar stories. She wasn't quite as specific because she couldn't handle it without breaking out crying, and tried to commit suicide twice because she couldn't get out of the Illuminati. She was a member, born into it from a very wealthy northern Italian family. She told me basically the same ceremony took place with her.

And so, when I started talking to you, I wanted to relay that to you, and also to relay to my listeners that I also heard about this, 25 years ago, from a woman by the name of Maria, and several other people in Italy that I talked to. I was never able to locate or really, probably for my own safety, ever find out what happened.

But again, Svali's corroborating a story that I heard about 25 years ago. We'll get back after the break with this incredible story of a member who is now out of the Illuminati, out of the group and safe, on the Republic Broadcasting Network.

[commercial break – Resume at 23:15]

GS: Okay, we're back on the Investigative Journal. I'm your host, Greg Szymanski. We're talking to Svali, a member of the Family, the Order, the Illuminati, for thirty years.

Svali, you leave the induction ceremony. You walk out into the Vatican courtyard with one of the fathers, I believe. What did he tell you then?

SV: At that point he just told me to never forget. He told me that I had performed well during the ceremony because I didn't scream or pass out or anything like that. He said "You did very well," and he was pleased. Then we stayed at a home nearby. It must have been a local person. I didn't know them. We spent the night there before we went back to Germany.

GS: Okay, and what about the other people during the ceremony. How did they handle themselves? Do you remember?

SV: (sighs) I'm going to say, unfortunately, I was so… when you're in that kind of situation, the last thing you're thinking about sometimes is what the other people are doing. (Laughs) I was just so trying not to lose it myself. I do know that no one screamed or shouted or anything like that. Everyone was quiet. I think to say 'dead silence,' is, unless the person was spoken to, true – or unless they had to go forward and kiss the ring.

GS: All right, let's move on. I think we've, uh…

SV: Yeah.

GS: A question I've wanted to ask you, and this is such a wide subject. I've had a chance to talk to you for a number of days, and I've done some stories about it.

You go back home, you're twelve years old. You say you were schooled in the twelve disciplines.

SV: Yes.

[12 disciplines, from Svali's online book:

1. To not need. 2. To not want. 3. To not wish. 4. Survival of the fittest. 5. The code of silence. 6. Betrayal is the greatest good. 7. Not caring. 8. Time travel: " The child will be taught spiritual principles of "traveling" both internally and externally, with set ups, role playing, and guided exercises reinforced with trauma. The goal will be to reach "enlightenment", an ecstatic state of dissociation reached after severe trauma."

9,10,11: "Sexual trauma, learning to dissociate and increase cognition, decrease feeling." (Details of these 3 steps vary according to child's future role in the cult. These roles include Informers, Breeders, Prostitutes, Pornography, Media personnel, Preparers, Readers, Cutters, Chanters, High Priest/Priestess, Trainers, Punishers, Trackers, Teachers, Child Care, Couriers, Commanding Officers and Behavioral Scientists.)

12. Coming of age ceremony (Vatican underground sacrifice).]

GS: So your life begins, and you know now you're in some type of organization that is very different than what most people experience. Tell us… I guess what I want to do is leave it open to you to begin. You've written so in-depth on this story. I'm just going to give you the microphone and let you begin. Tell the listeners what you think is important about your original training, about the group and about many things that I know people want to know about the Illuminati. Go ahead.

SV: Okay. Well Greg, first I want to say that my purpose in talking about this is not to glorify evil. There are very wicked people out there, very powerful people. I don't want to at all magnify their power, but I do want people to know that this is real. These people exist. People who say there are people out there that are involved in these activities… it really happens.

I also, because I know that there are children being hurt in the group every day, and that's my motivation for coming forward.

I don't like giving interviews for obvious reasons. I am willing this one time to lay aside my privacy and personal safety because these people need to be stopped. They need to be stopped.

GS: Okay. SV: Okay? GS: Go ahead.

SV: Normally children in the group are born into it. The Illuminati very rarely does outside recruitment. That's not their main method. It's just passed down generally, generationally from father to son, and mother to daughters to children. And so the whole family line has been in it.

Throughout the centuries people have tried to escape, but a lot of times they were either poisoned, murdered or set up to look like a suicide. They don't like it when people leave, and they try to make it very difficult – simply because it looks bad. (slight laugh)

They go through an enormous amount of training, from the time they are an infant. You undergo indoctrination. And when I say indoctrination, I don't just mean like cult programming so much as watching your parents and seeing what they do.

My parents modeled their behavior. To them the group was very important for growing up. I saw that three times a week, everything was dropped to tend to the activities. Okay?

GS: Okay.

SV: Basically the training process is designed to help you take on your adult role in the group. The Illuminati cover so many levels there too. It goes all the way from what most people think of as a satanic coven type thing, at the very low local level, all the way through… it's a huge, enormous business corporation.

At the mid-levels, you have people overseeing finances and administration, who are overseeing… I mean, these people are making a LOT of money through gun running, through white slavery, prostitution, pornography. They have links and ties to the Mafia, left and right. And, in fact the mafia are afraid of them. (Laughs)

GS: Hm.

SV: Yeah. (Laughs): Well, think about it! Because they know that you don't cross the members of the group. They have a very spiritual orientation. They are not satanic, though; they are Luciferian, which is different.

The ultimate goal of their spiritual philosophy and their sense of discipline is they believe that should you complete all of your training, you become a god. That is their actual end goal. They believe in the achievement of Godhood – of Illuminist philosophy – through what they call Enlightenment, or Illumination, which is how they got their name.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: They are international. In Europe there are twelve fathers who sit, who represent the different nations of Europe. They are very expectantly awaiting He Who Is To Come, and during that ceremony in the Vatican, (bumper music starts) on my knees I had to swear my allegiance to serve He Who Is To Come. They believe that the coven…

GS: Svali, can you, uh, I have to take a break.

SV: Sure.

GS: We'll continue with the massive organization, your role as a mid-level person in the Illuminati on the Republic Broadcasting Network.

[commercial break – resume 33:27]

GS: Okay, we're back on the Investigative Journal, and I'm talking with Svali. Svali, why don't we just pick it right up where we left off at the break. You were telling us about this hierarchy that starts with twelve fathers. Can you just run that down for us so people know exactly how this group is organized?

SV: Sure. At the top levels, it's in Rome. That's the power center or the heart of the Illuminati, where the power base is. And that's why all leadership must swear fealty in Rome, because that's considered the core of, the spiritual center of the Universe. That's how they view it.

From there, in Europe there are twelve fathers – one for each country in Europe. When I was younger I had to also meet with the fathers at one point and kiss the ring, and go through another ceremony of allegiance to them as well.

In the Illuminati, the European Fathers rule over what are called the different houses. For instance, if you are from Germany then you belong to the German House, if you are from France you belong to the French House – they call them Houses. UK, Russia, Poland, Belgium, Spain, Italy and others.

From there, America was considered a mission field for them. In the 17, actually in the 1600s, Pittsburgh became the first port of entry for them. That's where they first settled. That's why it's still considered a spiritual power base for the group on the East Coast in the US.

GS: You know, I did want to mention one thing. A caller / listener / reader of your stories sent me an email, and said, "Greg, check into the reason why President Bush, right after being elected, went into and talked to a Masonic group there." I found that quite interesting.

SV: Oh yeah.

GS: Go ahead.

SV: It's the spiritual power base for the group. From there, it spread out across the Atlantic seaboard, and then throughout the nation. The nation is divided into many regions, multiple regions but seven main regions. The East Coast region has its spiritual power base in Pittsburgh, but the administrative power base is in Alexandria, Virginia. That's where they administer the finances during the day to day operations.

The West Coast, or the West region, west of the Mississippi, has its power base in the San Diego area.

GS: And that's where you spent a lot of time, correct?

SV: Yeah. Yes. I was sent from, the Alexandria Council sent me to San Diego to help them out.

GS: Okay, go ahead.

SV: Those are the two, of course, main regions. And then each of those regions are divided into sub-regions.

So then you have your Regional Councils sitting over those, and overseeing activities. If you can think of the structure of a large multinational corporation, that's really how the Illuminati is structured. Then beneath each of the regional councils are your local councils. They call them sister groups or sisters, or your local councils. Then you have your local groups under those as well, or what they call the sister groups.

Any major metropolitan city could have anywhere from five to fifteen groups, depending on the size of the population base. Or more.

GS: Now you were saying that, how many people are in this group in America now, from your estimate, of knowing a lot of this stuff? Go ahead…

SV: Pure Illuminati, I would say about one percent, give or take, based on population.

GS: So it's a fairly huge… big organization, correct?

SV: Yes.

GS: Now their goal, basically. Just give us the broad overview goal, and then I want to get into some of these, you know, your role in it, and some of these ways that the Illuminati makes money that you learned about.

SV: Yeah.

GS: Go ahead.

SV: You know, when you say "To rule the world," it almost sounds laughable – like "yeah, right", you know. I think people get ideas of thinking or wanting to rule the world. But really, that is their goal. They believe that they are the intelligent leaders, and they believe that the rest of the world are sheep that need wise… They see themselves as wise leadership. So they believe that their goal is to rule the world.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: But at the same time, they have occult ways of doing that. Their main way of doing that is behind the scenes. They believe in infiltration of the media, of education and of government – those are the three areas – and of the financial system. And they have successfully done quite a bit of all four throughout Europe and the US, as well as other countries.

GS: Now you said that they, basically the Illuminati is divided into about six or seven groups, and everyone is born into a group. Could you outline what those groups are?

SV: Well no, it's all one group, there are just different levels.

GS: Yeah, that's what I mean. Like the Sciences, the Government, or…

SV: Oh. Oh. Okay. The Illuminati is divided into different branches of learning. These branches include Sciences, Military, Government, Leadership, Scholarship and Spiritual. Those are the six branches of learning. And while all children need to undergo some training or teaching in each area, as they get older… They begin profiling you from infancy, and they know where your activities and abilities are. Then you're, you really go into… Most people specialize in one branch or possibly two branches of learning.

GS: And you were involved in what branch?

SV: I was heavily involved in Sciences, and also to some degree I did some Spiritual as well – but mainly Sciences.

GS: Just to backtrack one minute, these twelve disciplines. As a child, you were rigorously trained in this, correct?

SV: Yes.

GS: Okay. And what were those disciplines?

[1. To not need. 2. To not want. 3. To not wish. 4. Survival of the fittest. 5. The code of silence. 6. Betrayal is the greatest good. 7. Not caring. 8. Time travel. 9,10,11: Sexual trauma, learning to dissociate and increase cognition, decrease feeling – details of these 3 steps vary according to child's future role in the cult. 12. Coming of age ceremony (Vatican underground sacrifice).]

GS: I mean, if… You don't have to go through each one of them, but what primarily were you taught?

SV: (pause) I think the best way would be to give you an example of just one type of training that they do.

GS: Okay.

SV: I was two years old. I was left in a room for probably a 24-hour period. When you are that age it is hard to estimate, but it was a long time. I know that the sun did go around (laughs) at least once, and it wasn't just like a few hours.

At that age, when you are two and you are left alone without food and water, you are terrified. And at the end of the time, I was just dying of thirst. My morale was just… I have never been so thirsty in my entire life.

My mother walked into the room. A lot of times they have the children, you know, or the parents train the children at these early ages. There was a table in the middle of the room and I was sitting at it. She brings in this cold pitcher of water and she starts pouring it. I said, "Mom! I want a drink of water," and she slapped me out of the chair. (pause)

GS: Hm.

SV: And I remember crying! And as I'm crying, she's drinking the water in front of me, and she leaves! She takes the pitcher of water. And a couple of hours later, she came back in and did the same thing. And I said, "Mom, Mom, I want water!" And she slapped me! I mean, across the room.

After this had happened about three times, luckily I was bright enough that by the third time she came in, I mean, I remember crying silently, but I just looked at her. I didn't ask.

After she got up and left with the pitcher, a man came into the room. He said, "You did very well that time." And then he gave me a drink of water.

GS: Hm.

SV: That was part of the "learning not to want" stage. Looking back on it, I realize now as an adult that the part of that training was to teach me not to recognize my own physiological needs and respond to them, but to look to outside people to tell me what I wanted or needed. Which is what…

GS: Now you basically, you told me you led a dual life in the Illuminati. That's basically how they function.

SV: Oh yeah!

GS: You have a day job, and then at nighttime you're quite busy sometimes with the cult activities, correct?

SV: Yes.

GS: Okay. What I wanted to get into… you were talking about these groups. I remember I mentioned to you, you said you had these meetings three times a week. I said, "Well, what about if I wanted to go and visit, and maybe do a story about them?" What would happen, or how could… would I be able to find one of these meetings that were going on, in your area of Escondido?

SV: Well no, because of the security measures. And A), you really don't want to show up unannounced at a meeting if you could get through their security, because the chances are you would never make it out alive. Let's just say that a certain auto accident would occur, and be reported in the papers: "Unfortunate accident – man accidentally runs into tree." (Laughs) I mean, I'm serious!

The security that they have during group meetings is so intense that it would be very difficult. They have security at the one-mile perimeter, the three-mile perimeter and the five-mile perimeter. They have three people assigned. Usually one is up in a tree where you can't see him at the five-mile perimeter.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: And then you have one person who is standing, looks like a security guard for the estate, because these are often large, wealthy estates, which is appropriate. He is dressed in a uniform. The third person is standing hidden behind a tree. As cars come through, and they come through the gates – remember these are gated estates.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: So if it's not someone on their approved license checklist, they will stop the car. It's just like at a military installation. They will say, "Can I help you? Are you lost?" Their goal is to delay the person. Now if a person is saying, "Oh, this is blah blah blah," and they are just asking for directions, they will give them directions, be very pleasant and send them on their way, to where they are supposed to be going.

But if they are acting as if they want to go further into the estate, and this is not an okay person, then they will say, "Uh, all right, well HE'S NOT EXPECTING YOU." That's a code word. That tells the person either behind, up in the tree, or hidden further back – they radio ahead and they say "UNEXPECTED VISITOR."

At that point, everyone has been trained to pick up and leave immediately, within five minutes – with no traces of the activity.

GS: So this is some of the methods they go through so you don't get caught. I know that you wrote an article about why the cult doesn't get caught.

SV: Oh yeah.

GS: It's pretty specific. You have so much stuff here, and we can't get into it all in two hours, so please pick and choose what you think is most important. But I find that to be interesting – why the cult doesn't get caught. Is there anything in just a brief time you could explain to us… that?

SV: Well, their security, their money, their influence. Some of these people even own newspapers. Imagine trying to get a (laughs) article published, you know, disclosing… There's a lot of reasons why they don't get caught. That's the first thing people ask.

Then my next question is, "Well, how many child pornographers are there out there, that the police have been chasing for years, and have never found or caught?"

GS: Correct.

SV: And they're not even members of a secret organization. They're just trying to hide, you know. So when you consider that…

GS: Now you…

SV: Okay.

GS: Yeah. You were a mid-level person in this organization, a head trainer. We're going to get into those specifics in the next hour. But you know, what did you learn about the infiltration of this group into all our different areas of government and media? They are basically at the high levels of most of our financial institutions also, correct?

SV: Yes.

GS: And that is a great way to pursue their goal. I guess I've got to ask you this. How come things are moving a little bit faster in America now? I remember back in the 80s when I was confronted with this, when I came back home I didn't really see this kind of New World Order movement… all this different symbolism that you see now. What is going on, just for our listeners, right now? Why are things stepped up since 9-11?

SV: I believe it's because they can see the fulfillment of their goal… See, I'm going to sound very cynical now, and please forgive me for this, okay? Their goal is to rule the world, and personally I believe that they do – it's just not open yet.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: And they say they're now preparing people for when they disclose themselves openly. Does that mean that they can't be stopped? I believe they could. I believe it would take a miracle, because of the amount of infiltration I see at all levels of society, and the world. These guys, these people have a lot of money. They have a lot of influence. And your average person has no idea of how much is going on behind the scenes that no one understands.

But, with that said, I think that they're already there, they just aren't open. These people just don't know where they're going! (Laughs) If they did, I think the average person would be horrified to know how much is going on behind the scenes that people really don't know.

GS: Yeah, and the point of this interview, one, I had two goals…

SV: But… But you see, I don't want to sound disparaging, because I am also a strong Christian. I have faith in God, and I believe through prayer, and through people knowing… I mean, I would like them to be stopped. I just don't know, at this point, how do you take on the financial institutions of the world, the major oil enterprises of the world, you know? (Laughs) That's the question! (Laughs) You know?

GS: Yeah! You know, it is a difficult question. Now you're in the mid-level of this group. You worked your way up to a head trainer, correct?

SV: Yeah… Yeah.

GS: Now what did you learn… Before we get into specifics, you outline some in of your writings, the big money-making… the ways this group makes its money. Can you go over and outline some of those methods?

SV: Again, if you can think of an illegal activity, they're probably involved at some point. Maybe not overtly, at the point of where the actual money is first shaking hands – but when you have child pornography, prostitution, white slavery, gun running, gambling, then at some point where the money is changing hands, buffered by about four layers of people, there's going to probably be someone from the Illuminati involved at that point. These guys have their fingers in everything.

GS: Now…

SV: Uh…

GS: Go ahead.

SV: But they also use legitimate means. They launder their money. When you have a lot of money, you have to do something with it. And so, these men don't come in and say, "Hi! I'm a member of the Illuminati and I want to run your bank." What they'll do is they'll quietly come in and become a quiet investor, start buying up shares. And over a period of maybe, almost a lifetime, they will get a controlling interest in the bank, or become a very… you know. Or maybe in their son's lifetime.

That's the other thing about the Illuminati. The Illuminati do not see it as "This is what must happen now, in my lifetime." These people have goals that last for centuries, for two centuries. They are very, very patient.

GS: And that's why the specific training of the children is so important, correct?

SV: Yes. It's to teach you PATIENCE. Everyone knows, growing up in the group, we may not see the coming order disclosed or open or revealed in our lifetime, but our children or our grandchildren may. So they will spend their entire life trying to bring about the goals of the organization.

GS: (Chuckles) Hm. Incredible. So now you're in the mid-level. I can see now where they used these programming techniques, the different mind control techniques. We have a minute before the break. Just kind of whet our interests about how you… what your specific role was.

SV: Well, they did a lot of what you might call human experimentation. And they had a lot of research protocols going on. So one thing I did was to supervise the research going on. I was teaching the younger trainers and head trainers how to do things more efficiently, how to do their job well, but also reviewing their research reports for errors or problems.

Eventually I became kind of a consultant. If a problem occurred, or they didn't know how to install something, or if they needed assistance, I would help them with problem solving as well.

GS: Okay, Svali, I'm going to have to take a break. We'll be back in three minutes. We'll continue, on Republic Broadcasting Network.

[commercial break – resume 54:24]

GS: Okay, we're back on the Investigative Journal. I've got a short four minute segment here, then we'll take a break and come back with Svali for a whole [additional] hour. We're talking about jobs in the Illuminati, the practical daily jobs that these members of this group, who are infiltrated in America heavily… what they do. Now one thing I find interesting, Svali, knowing the media… I'm not going to name names or anything, because I don't have any specific information. But I find it interesting.

Doing some background checks on a lot of the top media people in our country, they all come from these very wealthy families. (Laughs) Now that's not the typical MO for a journalist. A journalist is somebody who grows up on the street, wants to talk to people, I can think of Jimmy Breslin, guys who never went to college, didn't know how to type, and just got in there, took their tie off and started writing stories.

But you know, as you look at the media now, there are all these silver spoon kids – growing up with silver spoons. I find that quite interesting. How deeply infiltrated, from your knowledge, are they in our media?

SV: Wow. Pretty… I do know, uh, fairly deeply. I remember that when I was in San Diego on Leadership Council during meetings, they would laugh about how people had no idea of how much they were being influenced and didn't even know it. They found that kind of amusing, which is… I mean, that's the mindset of people in the group, though. They're like, "The sheep have no idea that they're being led by the hand."

And they find it amusing, because they show it as evidence of… I mean, I'm just describing what they say, I don't agree with it now, but they saw as evidence of the stupidity of the m… of the average person – that they have no idea.

I'm not saying that every news story or every newscaster is a member of the group… by no means. But, they specifically do teach and train and educate children that show an aptitude for the media, because they want that. And if the person has a bright, charismatic personality, and presents well, then that child will go into that, if they have their verbal communication and other skills required.

GS: Well, you know, that could explain why a lot of our stories really never get covered, outside of the influence they have financially and the ownership of the media.

SV: (crosstalk) That's absolutely not by coincidence.

GS: What's that?

SV: Not at all a coincidence.

GS: Yes. That's a good idea, folks, why you're not getting the news from those outlets. Not only in our government. It explains a lot of things. Look at the war in Iraq. Look at the evidence there that shows what is wrong. Look at what they're doing in Iran right now. I mean, it's incredible. All this stuff is pretty obvious, people. There's something behind it. Svali is here trying to explain this organization from her knowledge, and it is quite, quite a story.

I know this idea. You were involved as a trainer of mind programming? I mean, this is just, I'm looking at some of the chapters in a book you have yet to publish [in paper book form]. We're talking about brainwave, color control, metal, jewel programming, programming link to stories and movies… I mean, it goes into suicidal programming.

In just a minute here before our break, can you kind of break down what you learned about the importance, well, oh! We've got to take a break, Svali, sorry. We're going to do that quickly, then we'll get back to you. We're talking to Svali, regarding her role as a head trainer in the Illuminati, the American Illuminati. We'll be back, on the Republic Broadcasting Network, in two minutes.

[END OF FIRST HOUR]

GS: Okay, we're back on the Republic Broadcasting Network. One more hour. We're talking to Svali, and she was a head trainer in the Illuminati.

Svali, what type of programming do they actually teach you, and how do you learn these different techniques?

SV: Well, you're taught from childhood on. My training in how to be a programmer started very young. I was mentored by another programmer at the age of 5, by a doctor at George Washington University. Not only did he do the programming on me, but also taught me how to do it to others. The types of programming… again, that could be a whole ten-hour segment to go into depth. From the time a child is an infant, all through their life basically, they are tested, they are profiled. Trainers can create a psychological profile, and then they update it frequently.

Basically, they are trying to install in this child the ability to obey, loyalty to the group, and the ability to do their job within the group.

Now those jobs vary in complexity. You may have on one side a child trained to be a prostitute. On the other end you may have a child trained to become a governmental figure, which is a lot more complex programming.

But as long as the loyalty to the group is instilled, and that is the first and foremost programming always installed, then no matter what their eventual role is, they will remain loyal. And that becomes their first loyalty. Whatever nation, whatever their public role in life is, their first and foremost loyalty will be to the group, and to serve its goals – whether they know.

A lot of times, the goal is [also] to be able to help the child create that complete division between their day role and their night role. So a pleasant, charming, wonderful, kind person in the daytime could be an absolutely cold, ruthless person at night – or during the day, you know, it's also during the day they do it.

Then you may have a housewife with children who goes out and completes a courier job for the group. And no one would ever suspect her. Who is going to suspect [that] this lovely-looking little housewife with a baby in a car seat is actually carrying some valuable documents?

Again, the first and foremost other thing was to instill loyalty, and they want to discourage people from questioning orders. They really don't want you questioning that, and they want you to obey their directives. Should people show signs of not doing that, then they go on for tune-ups. Actually people are being programmed all through their life. We used to call them tune-ups. It's a lifelong process for members of the group.

GS: We have a minute here before our break, and we'll get back and get in depth into some of these areas. But what went wrong with you? I mean, the dropout rate probably is very low…

SV: Extremely low. (laughs)

GS: …considering the number of, considering the training. But what went wrong with you? They somehow missed something.

SV: When I was very young I absolutely believed in the goals of [the group]. You never saw a more loyal group member. I thought that they were saving the world. I thought that we were doing a wonderful thing. But the older I got, I started to see the methods that were being used for so long, and that the ends do not justify the means. I became increasingly cynical, partly because I saw what I was doing to people. I was lying to them. I was manipulating them. I was telling them things that weren't true. I remember questioning this, thinking, "I was told lies as a child too, then. I was manipulated."

GS: Wow.

SV: And finally you start to question, as an adult, the things you were taught. (bumper music starts)

GS: Okay. We're going to take a break, Svali, we'll be back in three minutes on the Republic Broadcasting Network.

[commercial break – resume 8:27]

GS: Okay, we're back on the Investigative Journal. Svali, I wanted to ask you a question. Before we get into how you finally left the group, and what happened to you afterwards in your life now – tell us. You wrote an article that is very interesting – A Day in the Life of a Trainer for the Illuminati. Tell us what you went through in a normal day in your role at the Illuminati. Go ahead.

SV: Okay. Basically I would get up. At the time that I described in that article, I was teaching at a Christian school. And so I would get up, I would get my two children dressed and ready for school. Just like a normal mom, you know, go through the day, come home. We'd have little friends over and play, and stuff like that. Then, you know, have dinner. I was a good mom. I was your average American housewife – on the surface.

But underneath the surface, then my husband and I would remind each other on nights when there was a meeting. And then what we would do is when we would go to sleep, I had programming in place that would allow me to wake up within ten minutes of the specified time. If I knew there was a meeting that night, I would wake up ten minutes before it was time to get ready and go. A lot of times we would even go to bed with our clothes on. And I never really thought that was abnormal, you know?

GS: Mm hm.

SV: I thought everyone went to bed with their clothes on. I didn't even question it, you know, on nights when we had meetings. I thought, "Oh, it's warmer." (Laughs)

GS: Okay.

SV: And then we'd get up and go, and drive to the meeting. I was also very involved in Military in San Diego. In fact the group has a lot of military orientation. So on top I would take the kids to their area, there was an area where the kids would go and change. They had a room and we would have like baskets of clothes, and we would change our clothing. You'd pick out your clothing, it had your name on it, and put on your uniform. Or whatever you wore that night. The kids would wear these little miniature military uniforms.

Then they would go out and do their training exercises. They were learning how to march, how to shoot. All kids in the Illuminati, at least in that area, know how to take apart a gun, put it together and shoot with deadly accuracy by the age of eight years old. Martial arts, there's a lot of martial arts training. Sometimes I'd help supervise that, or fill in if there's a military trainer [who] was [absent]. Everyone had to be – there was a lot of cross training. But most of the time I supervised the training. I would be working on implementing programming, or what we'd call tuning up – reinforcing previously installed programming in adults.

At that point I was normally supervising the younger trainers. They would be doing it, and I would be there watching and making sure they did it correctly. Or I would be also evaluating whether – sometimes every once in a while we'd be working on something that was somewhat experimental, and then I would be taking a more active role, assessing the person's responses to the new protocol, recording it and if there was any difference between established parameters for that protocol or expected responses, I would be flagging that.

GS: Give me an example of someone you were working on. What… how would they be introduced, what would be the reason? Would they be military, what is, how does someone get sent to you?

SV: No, these were all members of the group!

GS: Oh, okay.

SV: Oh! I can tell you that in San Diego, twenty percent of the active members of the group were active military.

GS: Okay.

SV: Okay? And think of military intelligence. Think high-ranking officials, colonels, (laughs), commanders. My ex-husband was a lieutenant commander in the Navy, getting ready to become a commander, okay?

GS: All right.

SV: These are not stupid people.

GS: So you were basically working on the programming of the members involved.

SV: (crosstalk) Yes. Oh yeah. Yeah.

No, we didn't program people who were not members of the group. You CANNOT install significantly traumatic mind-control programming in a person who is not a member of the group.

GS: (crosstalk) Good.

SV: Now there are certain… what you can do is what we call passive programming, which is basically through media means. If someone's watching a television program, they go immediately into alpha state. Everyone in the group, even a baby in the group knows that, because these people are very much into behavioral psychology. That's a trance state, almost, a very relaxed state where messages can be implemented.

And that's why I very strongly suggest people be very careful about the TV shows they watch! That's all I will say about that.

But no, you cannot take an adult who is not a member of the group and do what we did to them. They would go psychotic, or they wouldn't survive it, probably. They wouldn't be able to psychologically handle it.

GS: Tell us some examples of what you were doing. Program techniques.

SV: (sighs) Sometimes, (sigh) it would involve, normally we would start with a hypnotic induction or even sometimes we would inject a medication. A lot of times especially young children have a lot of fear when they are going into programming, but adults do too. We want them to relax. We give them a very short-acting medication to relax them.

We would then invoke a hypnotic state in them. If it was an older person I would be checking that the codes are already installed. If I was getting ready to install programming in like a young child, I would tell them, explain to them very patiently exactly the behavior expected. I'd say, "I want you to do this, and this, and this." I break it up into steps. Then I'd say, "First we're going to practice this."

I would show the child what I want them to do – I would model it. I would then tell the child, "DO IT." The child would then do it, okay? But, normally they won't do it well the first time, so she would… she or he would get shocked. That was called, because the group very much uses what they call positive and negative reinforcement. Okay?

If a child did not do it perfectly the first time, they are shocked. That's the negative reinforcement.

Then I would say, "DO IT AGAIN." They would show me the behavior.

Now at this point we start associating the behavior with an external stimulus or cue, too. Now a lot of times a child… If this is a behavior, though, that we want associated with a specific code, the child will often then traumatize very heavily first, to create a fragmentation in their personality. Then the behavior and the associated cue are given.

You might hear a tone, like "ding ding ding." [I say,] "All right, I want you to do this." Ding ding ding. The child hears the tone, they get up and they do the behavior. Once they can perform it perfectly, they are rewarded with praise. Good job, or a hug. Children like hugs, or something like that.

Then you do it over, and over, and over. That's why trainers have to be very patient people. Because then maybe after the child has done it fifty times, then they hear the cue, they get up, [and] they do it. It's not even a conscious [decision]… it's reflexive. At that point it's considered installed.

For very, very important programming, I'm talking about like end-level assassin programming, because we did train people how to assassinate people, and that's a whole other topic I don't want to go into here…

GS: Okay.

SV: We would then do a ritual to seal the programming afterwards.

GS: (Final-sounding) Okay.

SV: Okay?

GS: Just something, I was looking at some of your articles. One was "Christmas in the Cult." Just to get off on a different subject here…

SV: Sure.

GS: You say this is quite different for you, when you were growing up, than it is for most children. Can you just kind of briefly tell us what you meant by that?

SV: Yeah, um… (sighs) I mean, we had trees and presents and things like that. But for most children, Christmas is just happy time, you know, lots of presents. But in the group, there are some very high ceremonies that are celebrated. Several times, in fact many times, I flew into Germany. And there, there wasn't a Santa Claus. They had a figure called Father Yule…

GS: (crosstalk) Mm hm.

SV: …who represents Christmas there. But he is not the kind of benevolent Santa that you see here. This is a man with a golden scepter dressed in a white robe and a golden sash around.

I was once at the German Father's house, where there was a gathering with children and adults, and Father Yule was present. He raises the scepter and basically strikes down a child in front of everyone.

GS: (laughs in disbelief) Oh my God!

SV: I know!

GS: (shocked) He strikes down a CHILD? I just…

SV: I know. Yes. He struck down the child with his, his scepter. And that… that is not what you call a happy Christmas, you know?

GS: No. (sighs)

SV: And at the same time, yes, we did have a tree, you know, and fruitcake and all that, and decorate the house, but there is another side to Christmas. It's, it's…

GS: (in shock) You know, I'm just listening and I just can't believe, you know, we're, you know, we have leaders in our country that have probably gone through this kind of stuff. I mean, uh, it's just incredible, this group. I know they've been around for a long, long time, thousands of years, and gone through it, came here. George Washington was a 33 rd degree Mason…

SV: (crosstalk,) Oh, YEAH!

GS: …and we go on. Uh, the quest… you know, I just, I want you to understand, just from my point of view, I just wonder how… you know, you write a story, "The End of the Illuminati." How do we get rid of these people? I know, you're out of it. You couldn't take it any more. You think we can inspire more mid-level people to just LEAVE, like you, so they have no one to DO this kind of INSIDIOUS… CRAZY… PROGRAMMING and lifestyle! What do you – what do you think?

SV: Well, I believe that, as strongly as a Christian, that it's a spiritual warfare as well as an emotional and psychological warfare. I believe that, by the grace of God.

But I will also say that when I was in the group, a lot of the members are not happy. You have people in the group that are there because they love it, because they believe in our goals, they are totally dedicated. But to be honest, a lot… I often knew as many people who would have left in a minute if they thought that they could get out, and make it.

GS: You know, about your husband, uh, just to break in and then go back into that. Do they marry you to somebody in the group, or is that forced on you?

SV: (crosstalk) Yeah. Yeah. No. In the group, the marriages are always arranged, in my experience. In my 38 years in the group, I never knew of a couple, in the Illuminati, that did not have an arranged marriage. It can't be…

GS: (crosstalk) You just mentioned a couple that I, I suspect. Clinton and uh, Bill and Hillary.

SV: Oh, well, YEAH! (Laughs)

GS: (Laughs)

SV: YES! Definite. Definite.

GS: Yes. Bill?

SV: Yeah.

GS: Go ahead.

SV: Yeah. A lot of times, these marriages are arranged for compatibility, but also for bloodlines – to bring the right bloodlines together.

GS: Okay, good. We're going to be back in three minutes. I want to continue this, and then we're going to get into Svali's life after the Illuminati, on the Republic Broadcasting Network.

[commercial break – resume 23:17]

GS: Okay, we're back on the Investigative Journal. I'm your host, Greg Szymanski. And let me tell you, as an interviewer, and someone who has researched the Illuminati for a long time… it started way back when, when I was a young reporter in Rome…

It's a whole different ballgame when you're actually talking to someone with experiences like this. It takes it out of that realm of what is quasi-fiction fact, into the realm of reality. It's – it's really shocking.

And, uh, I'll be honest with you. This is a story, uh, that folks, you have to listen to – because this is going on in our country. All the things you're seeing regarding our rights being taken away, the police state, the war in Iraq, 9/11 – all these things have to do with this powerful group.

Svali, you know, we're talking about mid-level people. Now we're going to talk about some of the lower-level people. I'm interested in who they are. But you said they weren't happy, but a lot of them probably stay because it's very… I mean, this is a… it's a very lucrative way to live, I imagine.

SV: Oh, yeah!

GS: …families?

SV: Oh, yeah! That's the main thing, that's one of the factors that keeps people in. The reason more people don't leave is because leaving means giving up your husband, your children, your entire family on both sides, your money. And basically, for a lot of people, leaving the group means giving up everything, and starting out penniless and alone.

Not only that, but you're combating child programming to recontact, to go back, to be loyal, to be a good member.

GS: Mm hm.

SV: And I know many people have tried to leave and went back, because they just couldn't take it.

GS: Do you, uh, do you want to take a phone call right now? Break it up?

SV: Sure!

GS: Okay. Marilyn, in California. You're on the Investigative Journal. Marilyn?

Marilyn (ML): Yes, I've been a part of this. I lost part of it, I've been listening on the Internet. I didn't quite catch it. How did this woman become involved in this Illuminati training?

GS: Uh, go ahead, can you explain that, Svali?

SV: I was taught it from early childhood. I was mentored into it. Trainers in the group are mentored. You wok with older adults and they show you, and you are given increasing responsibility. And so by the time you are in your teens, you are basically doing adult training responsibilities. You've been taught for years.

ML: Your parents put you in it, or… ?

SV: Yes, they were members.

ML: Oh, I see, so it comes down through the parents – one parent to another.

SV: Yeah. Or from both.

ML: (shocked) Are they private SCHOOLS?

SV: Through what?

ML: Are these private SCHOOLS?

SV: Well, my children were schooled at private Christian schools. They were all Illuminati. (Laughs) Okay?

ML: (surprised, "Now I get it" voice tone) Oh, you're saying that the CHRISTIAN schools are Illuminati!!

SV: SOME of them are. Not all – but some.

ML: Yeah, obviously.

SV: No, no. The ones that my children in were, specifically. But no, there's a lot of good Christian schools that have nothing to do with the group, but some can be. Now I went to a public school, but what's interesting is, out of three public schools I went to as a young child, two burned down. (sadly): So there's no access to any school records.

ML: (completely shocked) I'll be DARNED.

GS: Marilyn, just to get you up to speed. You're born into this, then you're trained as a young child. You go through an induction ceremony in the Vatican. And this is going on with one to two percent of our population, according to Svali. Very serious, in all levels. Government, and everything else. Go ahead, Marilyn, do you have another question?

ML: Yeah. When you said the Vatican, now that is not a Christian religion, okay? Now I'm a Christian. Catholics is a Christian religion, we look at them as the precursor of the New World Religion. So…

GS: Well, you know, if I may just break in. I grew up a Catholic. I don't get involved in the splicing of the religions. I'm basically stating that when I started researching the Illuminati as a reporter in Rome, and I realized there was a bad portion of the Church, I looked at it. I had to deal with the evil and the good. So that's the way I reconciled it. The evil WITHIN the Catholic Church, at the high level of the Vatican , which seeps down into many, many areas. Go ahead.

ML: Okay, well I won't argue that point.

SV: (crosstalk) Now… Now… Now…

ML: I won't agree with it, but it sounds like you have become possibly Born AGAIN to get out of this? Would I be correct in that?

SV: Yes. Yes. Now I very much… Now first, I do want to say I am not slamming the Catholic Church or the average Catholic. I have many good friends that are Catholics, that are strong Christians. I became a Christian, and that was the only way I could get out. But just so you know, too, a lot of card-carrying Illuminists, well we don't really carry cards, but I'm using that term…

ML: Yes.

SV: …are members of the Baptist church, are members of Pentecostal churches. It… This… I was on a worship team for a Wesleyan church in San Diego … in my day life. Okay?

ML: Oo-kay. Uh, yeah. Very, very confused. I mean, I, uh, I think this is interesting. Many people say that the Catholic Church will be the forerunner of the New World Religion. There's some very good books out. In fact, I think you may have interviewed one of these men – the Grand Plan Design by John Daniels?

GS: Uh huh.

ML: You remember that?

GS: Uh…

SV: But, but…

GS: Go ahead.

SV: The average Catholic has no idea of what's going on in the Vatican.

ML: Yeah, yeah. I think that's interesting that, that the average Catholic would not know what's going on. That's just my take on it. (laughs)

GS: Well, I'll tell you something. As an average Catholic going to Rome my first time in 1980, I didn't know what was going on, and I grew up as a Catholic, went to Notre Dame High School. It was quite a learning experience for me.

ML: I think the Catholics, when they find out how evil the church is, stay in it! I mean, they really… why would they want to stay in it? That's what bothers me. I know some good people who are like that. And I don't get it! (Laughs)

GS: Well, the only answer is… it doesn't… (bumper music starts) (laughs) I don't know. There are many Catholics who aren't actively practicing.

ML: Yeah. Thank you!

GS: But anyway, we'll leave that for another time. Thanks, Marilyn. We'll be back on the Investigative Journal in three minutes, with Svali.

[commercial break – resume 33:20]

GS: Okay! Uh, you know, they're not going to get me. That's for sure. My house is anti-Illuminated. It's not going to happen, folks. Just to end that, Svali, before I get back to you, just to end that conversation we had with Marilyn about Catholicism. I look back at it, and I really thank my dad. And I do it in kind of a way, I'm just thinking about it now. I didn't know what the Church was about.

But you know, something strange did happen when I was young. My mom died, and I was ten years old. My brother was six months old at the time she died of leukemia. It was a very, very tragic affair – left my dad and me and my brother alone. And I remember my dad literally took a priest, a head Monsignor in our parish. And I won't even tell you where. Saint John Rebove (ph), right outside of Chicago.

This man came into our house, I'll never forget it. He said that he was going to put ME and my little BROTHER in an ORPHANAGE. My dad literally picked him up and threw him out the door! Literally.

SV: Wow.

GS: And from that point on, my dad never went back to church again. My brother never went to a Catholic school. I of course asked if I could finish, only because I had friends there. But you know, who knows what would have happened, you know, looking back on the craziness that goes on in the Church.

But anyway, Svali, you were talking about, uh, you know something? These people that are too… that do not want to get out because of the financial ties. But let's go back to when you were in the Illuminati. How did this happen? How did you finally leave? Tell us this whole story about you leaving the Illuminati. We haven't touched on that yet.

SV: Sure. Well, I do want to say one thing that I agree with Marilyn on. Without faith in God, I couldn't have done it. I became a Christian, and that was for me revolutionary. It made me question again more of what I was being taught, or had believed all my life. I, for the… I began to realize that what I was doing was wrong. I became increasingly cynical.

I also then started standing up to the head trainer in the county who despised me. He would do things that were just blatantly cruel for no reason whatsoever. I'd say, "You're wrong". Well, people don't like that. (Laughs)

He took it out on me in a lot of horrible ways. I finally made the decision to run. I ran to this… to another state, because I knew that my chances of getting out while still staying in that area with people I knew, surrounded by people who were in the group, was not going to be very good. So I went to another state.

GS: You had to leave your family and everything, right?

SV: Everything. Well, my children were with their grandparents. At that point I thought that was better than them being with my husband. I was going to go get my kids. But my husband then called and he said, "I want to reunite with you." And I said, "Okay, that's wonderful." And I said, "But you have to get help. You have to get some treatment, because we can't go on. You've got to get out of the group." He said, "Okay. Help me get the kids and I'll meet you in a week."

So the day before, he called and said, "I'll be there tomorrow," blah blah blah. And so I was excited, thinking, "Oh, he's getting out, he's getting out, that's wonderful!" Instead, he went… he had gotten the kids several days before. He was lying to me, and I didn't know it. He had gone to a judge.

And the day that he was supposed to arrive, there was a knock on my door. It was a policeman serving me DIVORCE papers, and also a restraining order, saying that I could not come within a hundred yards of my husband or my children.

And at that point, I felt slightly punished (sigh) for leaving the group.

I fought that, and it… (sighs) I fought for four years with a court system that said things like this didn't occur, because my husband would go into court and say, "This woman is psychotic. She's making it all up. There's no way. Ha, ha, ha. This stuff doesn't happen in this day and age." And the judge would say, "You're right." Slam. Full custody to their father. And I had to have supervised visitation for four years with my own children, so that… because I was considered a kidnap risk.

Through a lot of prayer, I had my whole church praying for me here in Texas, and through Lambley Research and miracles, my children were finally allowed unsupervised visitation with me, after four years. During that time, I said to my daughter, who was fourteen, I said, "I want so badly for you to get out". And she looks at me, and she starts going…

(hyperventilating, extremely terrified): "Oh! You shouldn't have said that, Mom! You shouldn't have said that, Mom!" You know? She just… she just freaked out. She just totally lost it.

GS: Mm hm.

And I realized that it was her programming cycling, because she was just terrified. You know, she's like, (terrified, very rapid): "Why did you say that, why did you say that", and I said, "It's okay, it's okay, honey, calm down, calm."

And the following… she was just shaking and shaking. And then finally she said, "Well, I don't want to go back and get hurt." And then I said, "YOU DON'T HAVE TO."

And at that point I faced several prison sentences, but I called my ex and I said, "I will face… I will not let those children go back and get hurt again."

GS: Okay.

SV: And he flew out to get them, and he could have put me in prison at that time, because I was breaking the custody visitation. And you know how strong the courts are on that!

GS: Mm hm.

SV: And I said to him, "Please… Look." Because it was so nice. My daughter and son both said, "We don't want to go back, Dad. We don't want to get hurt. We don't want to do this anymore."

He looked at them, and he said, "I want to go think about it." He went home, and I was praying for him at the time.

And then that night he called me, and he said, (delirious, hyperventilating): "Oh my God. Oh my God." I said, "What is it?" He said, "We've gotta get out! We've gotta get out!" (Laughs) And I said, "YES! You do!" And then he said… and then he made the decision to get out.

At that point he went to a Notary Public. He gave me… he did a legal case document giving me full custody of my children. And then he said he was so sorry for, he put me through, the H, E, L, L he had put me through for years.

GS: Now, have you had any reprisals from people in the group since you were leaving, or any warnings?

SV: Yes.

GS: To keep quiet, or anything like that?

SV: (crosstalk) Yes. Oh, yeah! Oh… yeah, of course! There's one time when I did write one article that named some specific dates and times. I got hurt afterwards, and it made me very cautious. That's why I don't give a lot of radio interviews, and why I don't do a lot of this. That's one reason why…

GS: Well, I appreciate this, because you know, the number of people you're going to help, by… maybe, maybe waking up the American people to what is really going on. Sometimes you can wake up many more people by a person like you, than talking about a hundred million different generalities.

Let me take a call. Chris, in Washington, you're on the Investigative Journal.

CH: (calm, relaxed cadence): Hi. Svali, I just want to say how much I appreciate your bravery, in presenting this information in the way that you are. I've read your website recently. And my question is very simple. Based on the information that you're presenting, I'm wondering what timeline the organization of the larger Family that you're describing has for implementing the New World Order?

SV: Okay. I was told it would occur during my generation. I was told that by the year 2050 that they would be revealed. Now again, their timelines change, though. In fact, I jokingly referred to them as being like the Soviet Union, because you know how they had their five and ten year plans, and then things always got changed? In my own lifetime I saw several different timelines for things that were supposed to occur and change.

But as Greg noted, I've also heard of, from different people, that actually there is a HUGE push in the last few years. It's like, "It's CLOSE. It's CLOSE. Let's make things happen more quickly."

CH: Mm hm.

SV: So I couldn't begin to guess whether that's an accurate timeline or not. I know what I was told.

CH: I have a follow up question and that's it…

GS: Go ahead.

CH: …and this will be it for me. I have recently, against my own resistance to doing so, investigated, started to investigate fringe matters, if you will. Among them, the upcoming date on the Mayan Calendar of 2012.

SV: Uh huh.

CH: And as I've done this research, I've allowed myself just to be open to this information without believing anything I'm reading. One of the ideas that is presenting itself is that around 2012, not just according to the Mayan Calendar but many other theories out there, that we will be undergoing, as a planet, a revolutionary shift, if you will, of some kind or another.

And I'm wondering in the back of my mind if there might be any kind of race against the clock on THAT scale, if you will – especially if we're talking about a potential spiritual warfare…

SV: Oh, yeah.

CH: …using your words in play here. Do you see a possible relation there?

SV: Yes, I do. And, 2012 IS an important year. But again, I was not told that the final Revealing would occur then. But I believe that probably… what will happen is that there will be events taking place that will help to set the stage.

CH: Okay.

SV: But it's going to be… I was told… again, I'm telling you what I was told while a member of the group, so please take it with a grain of salt. As I know, these people aren't always honest or trustworthy – they are deceptive. But I was told that there would be an enormous economic collapse prior to the Revealing. That basically the stock market would destabilize.

CH: Well, that appears to be already happening.

SV: Yeah. Yeah. And I was told it would make the Great Depression look like Sunday school. And at that time, it's going to… they're going to really be manipulating finances to bring about chaos, confusion, warfare, and then…

But see, I don't like to be so negative. But I am telling you what I was taught when I was in the group, you know?

CH: Well, I so appreciate it.

SV: Yeah.

CH: And I'm sure we all do.

SV: Yeah. I…

CH: You're a great voice.

SV: Well, thank you! I appreciate that very much. But out of this chaos they said would come order. You see, the group believes that out of chaos comes order.

CH: Well, I don't want to take any more time…

GS: (crosstalk) Well, as far as I'm concerned, I'd rather, you know, let things… Svali, these guys want to bring down this country financially, in whatever way possible. And right now, your voice is important in that.

And Chris, I really appreciate you saying that, because we want to stop these guys! I mean, come on! Let's get the American people to get together and just put an end to this. We have a powerful group in numbers. We may not have the money, but we can take it back. And I don't want to be bullied by these kind of people. That's my feeling.

SV: Yeah.

GS: Let me take another call. Uh, Harper in Canada. Harper? Go ahead.

HP: Great, thanks Greg. And Svali, I read your expose when it came out on Suite101.com a few years ago, and I always wondered what happened to you, because you vanished from Suite 101. So it's great to hear about you. A couple quick questions, I'll make them real fast. First is the term Moriah Conquering Wind. I'd never heard that before or since I read it in your expose. I wondered if you could elaborate on that term a little bit.

I also wanted to ask you if this cult, as far as you know, claims to or believes to derive any of its heritage from Atlantis or any other lost civilization. Okay?

SV: I'm not sure about the reference to Moriah (pronounced like "Mariah" Carey) you're describing, because Moriah is… is our name.

But I certainly can address the second question. The Illuminati completely believe that Atlantis is real. They teach it to their children as part of the oral history. They believe that it was one of the greatest civilizations that ever existed, and one of the most advanced.

What they teach… their take on it is that Atlantis was a great race of highly intelligent people who had a highly advanced faith, and who were highly enlightened.

But what they teach the Illuminati children is that then this prophet of the enemy, who was a prophet of God, came and foretold their destruction if they didn't change their ways.

They were definitely Occultists. They were Luciferians on Atlantis. That was the religion. And in fact, a lot of the advances that Atlantis enjoyed was passed down to them through supernatural means… that is what I will say.

So they laughed at the prophet. In fact they killed him. And, he… I guess sometime afterward, we were taught that a few inhabitants escaped, but that tragically the great city was lost.

The Illuminati to this day mourn the loss of Atlantis, because they feel that these were… that the few survivors that left were among the great people who helped found the Free… what you would call the precursors of Illuminism.

HP: One more quick question, if I may.

GS: Go ahead.

HP: And I wanted to ask you if you have any reason to believe that people, men and/or women at the top of the pyramid, so to speak, practice a kind of magic where they are kind of skipping through time, in other words…

SV: (excited crosstalk) Oh! Oh! YES! Oh, without even being at the top… Oh, yes!

HP: …their body leaving, their soul or spirit leaving one body and coming and being born into another one, and therefore, you know, living through time.

SV: (excited crosstalk) Oh yeah! Yeah! Oh, yes! Yes, All the time. In fact, see, now this, now I didn't go there in this interview. You start telling wackos, you start discussing things like that. But in the spiritual side, they very much teach things like time travel, traveling out of body, you know, psychic battling, things like that – things that cannot be explained by logic.

And I saw things that I cannot explain through human intellect or reasoning, that were highly supernatural, and involved all of that… and more.

[Svali has reported in 2-3 different articles seeing a group of people levitate an animal and choke it to death, though here she seems to refer to more than just that.]

HP: Okay, great. Pleasure to speak with you, Ma'am, and God bless you.

SV: Okay, God bless you too.

GS: Okay, I think we have Dave Wilcox called in. I think you know Dave through emails, Svali.

SV: Yes.

GS: Dave, uh, you want to say hello? And do you have a question for Svali?

DW: Sure. Uh, Svali, it's great to have you on the air, and I'm really glad you decided to do it. So thank you very much.

SV: Oh thank you, Dave. It's good to talk with you. Yeah.

DW: Yeah, I feel like you're an old friend. I've been reading your stuff for so long, and you share so willingly and openly about yourself. It's a real honor to be able to speak with you in person like this.

SV: Well, thank you!

GS: All right, well Dave, you may have something you want to say to Svali. Go ahead. You have a question?

DW: Sure. I think one of the things I'd really like to have covered here is [this]. You shared with me in an email recently about these stages of enlightenment that they try to guide people through?

SV: Yes.

DW: I would like you to try to sketch out for people how the behavioral conditioning that's coming through the media, the movies and so forth might have affected them.

In other words, what personality characteristics would you see in a person when they have been influenced by these teachings? How would the average person, who is not really a bad person, start to be leaning, if the Illuminati teachings were actually having an effect on them? What would they be like? What would start happening?

SV: Well, again, as I said, the average person is not going to be a member of the group…

DW: Right.

SV: …so the influence would be much less. But the media, I believe that… well, I KNOW. I don't believe, I KNOW that some of the media that we're seeing nowadays is specifically targeted towards teaching people their philosophy or goals. All you have to do is watch the children's cartoons on Saturday morning, and almost across the board you'll see morphing, power battles, occult. And that's intentional.

Movies coming out. Basically, if a person is being influenced by their teaching, that person will learn to not trust their own instincts, their own feelings, their own body, their own perceptions. They will be looking outside for guidance.

Second of all, they will be moving towards a heavily occultic worldview – that leaning upon the occult is heavily encouraged. All you have to do is watch Harry Potter! (Pause – laughs) You know?

DW: Yeah, I mean, the whole idea that…

SV: (crosstalk) I mean, not to slam one of those Potter movies, or the Matrix.

If you want to know pure Illuminist philosophy, the Matrix shows it. Definitely. The entire philosophy.

DW: Oh yeah. Right down with Morpheus being broken down with the injections, and they said that it's like hacking a computer. (bumper music starts)

SV: Yeah! That's an excellent [example…]

GS: (crosstalk) Okay, let's take a break. We'll come back with our final segment. A big finish on the Investigative Journal, with Svali, on the Republic Broadcasting Network.

[commercial break – resume 54:21]

GS: Okay, we're back with our final segment with Svali. She's telling us about her experiences… thirty years with this insidious group called the Illuminati, how deeply penetrated and infiltrated they are in our culture and our country.

Svali, we talked about the higher levels, the mid-levels you were involved in as a head trainer. How low do they go? I said all along they're involved in gang stalking, the MK-Ultra program, infiltrating truth organizations, infiltrating groups that are trying to do good. How far down DO they go?

SV: Well, they go down to the sister group levels I mentioned. The sister groups have anywhere from, usually roughly around 30 members. And those are what a lot of people would consider the… what you would consider the satanic cults, with a high priest and priestess. That would be the local level, the lower level.

But those people are also very active in their community. And so, they WILL be involved in intricate infiltrating activities when possible. Because to them, it's not infiltrating… it's helping. They think they're helping the group, or helping people by becoming a member and spreading the influence.

GS: Let me squeeze in one more caller, Roger, a faithful listener. Roger, you're on the Investigative Journal.

RG: Uh, yes. Thanks. I had so a big question and so little time that maybe I'll just squeeze it in…

GS: We've got a couple minutes. Really try to work it in, Roger.

RG: Yeah, uh, well, you will enjoy this first, and that is that I recall when Charlotte Izerbie (ph) was here on the local Clear Channel radio show. The host was, of course, dismissive of an Illumi-Nazi agenda. It was great to hear Charlotte say, "You're telling me? My own father was a high-level"… and she, of course, was a first or second-fiddle secretary at the department of Ed. And she said, "You're telling me my own father on his deathbed was telling me, "You go get 'em, girl," and he was one of 'em."

GS: (Laughs)

RG: So that was great. Anyway, my question was towards the philosophical / religious motivators, if you will, which you have been dwelling on. I've been trying to form it up into a more cohesive, integrated…

GS: Try to make it quick, we're running out of time. Go ahead.

RG: Yeah. To expose the ethos of the, you know, it's like the Neocons serve as the pseudo-intellectual rationale for the Illumi-Nazi agenda. And I don't presume that it turns on such fine distinctions, so much as it is a bare-knuckled lust for power. But, everybody has sort of a worldview that they use to justify their actions. And of course, it's a most un-conservative, humanistic social engineering agenda on a far larger scale.

Now you mentioned about these people, basically, and it's as rare as hen teeth…

GS: Quick, Roger…

RG: …yeah, to find somebody that's not oxymoronically both a spiritualist and an occultist, and also a, what do you call, a hardcore rationalist. Or maybe that's just [a] Republican assumption, right?

SV: (sighs)

GS: (slight laughing in delivery): I know there was a question in there somewhere, Roger…

RG: Yeah.

GS: But anyway, thanks for calling. Let me, I've only got a minute. I've got to finish with Svali.

Svali, tell us in your own words, you've got about a minute or two left here. You went forward, you came forward, (bumper music begins) you're now living a life completely away from them. What's your hopes of the future in our country right now?

SV: My hope is that people will realize that this is happening, and that they will start doing something about it – that they will start looking at it. Now again, we're talking about people who are mentally wealthy, but it won't be easy. But if people could rise up in prayer, and just say, "THIS ISN'T OKAY"…

If people would become informed enough to learn more about it, be aware they exist… and then, possibly, PRAY. Pray that people will take action against the things that are happening. Because these people…

GS: Okay, Svali, I'm…

SV: Okay. All right.

GS: We're all out of time. We're going to end on that prayer. I really thank you for coming forward. You're very courageous. We'll talk again, and I'll be back tomorrow on the Investigative Journal. Same time, same place.

SV: Goodbye.

[END OF BROADCAST]

Greg Szymanski

Greg also has his own daily show on the Republic Broadcast Network. Go to http://www.rbnlive.com Greg Szymanski is an independent investigative journalist and his articles can been seen at http://www.LewisNews.com. He also writes for American Free Press and has his own site http://www.arcticbeacon.com

Listen to my Radio Broadcast live Monday night at 8pm Pacific time on LewisNews, returning Jan. 1 2006 Radio http://webs.lewisnews.com/radio/index.htm. Greg is also regular on Rense.com the first Thursday of every month at 9-10 pm pacific time.

Posted in Other Authors | 6 Comments »

svalispeaksagain 3:29 pm on August 30, 2021

Tags: healing (43), Jesuit (10), mind control (69), occult (13), ritual abuse (65), Vatican (10)

III. How are the Jesuits financed?

The Jesuit Order is financed through the offices of the Vatican, the wealthiest organization on earth. Most people have no idea of the vast wealth that this epicenter of the Roman Catholic Church holds. The Vatican Library alone holds books that are priceless, many of which have never been publicly catalogued for security reasons (the Vatican has private, highly secure records of their assets such as these. The assets reported publicly are only a tiny fraction of this organization's true wealth which is greater than the finances of all the world's billionaires combined).

Beneath the Vatican Library are secret vaults with treasures such as priceless art confiscated during the crusades and the World Wars (the Vatican shared the treasures confiscated from wealthy Jewish families with the Nazis, for instance). There are vaults dedicated to holding jewel-encrusted icons, gems, and priceless artifacts from the beginning of time, because the Vatican has a huge collector of ancient statuary and jewelry. Cups, jewels and golden idols from Mesopotamia and Babylon share space with treasures from the reigns of the Pharoahs (many of the earliest raids on the tombs of the pharaohs by Egyptians years before archeologists began exploration caused the empty tombs that were often found; these artifacts were often sold to wealthy Vatican representatives over the years who were highly interested in collecting them for spiritual as well as investment purposes).

Wealth and treasures from every great civilization are stored in these secret, highly secure vaults that only the privileged few are allowed to know even exist, much less to enter. The physical wealth these represent could buy the world's greatest corporations several times over, but this is not where the day-to-day income comes into the Vatican. Instead, there are other, darker sources.

Sex Trafficking

The Jesuits oversee the worldwide center for infant and child sex trafficking, which is located in South Amsterdam in the Netherlands. South Amsterdam, known as "sin city" to pedophiles and decadents in Europe, is where the largest brokers in the sex industry live. These brokers regularly send out agents throughout the world, targeting China (where female infants are often given to them free), Asia, Malaysia, the Ukraine, and Euro-Russia.

Follow

A common misconception is that sex slaves are mostly female. In Amsterdam, both male and female infants and children are equally bought and sold, since pedophiles unfortunately seek both. The agents bring in literal truckloads of infants they have gathered by going to poor families or orphanages. These nicely dressed, wealthy, friendly westerners promise placement in good homes and a better life through adoption for the infants, and will often give good donations to the orphanages that provide “pretty children” and infants on a regular basis.

The trucks of infants and young children cross national lines through routes that have been bought, with guards sympathetic (and well-paid). The infants are cared for by women who give them drugged bottles to keep them quiet during the journey. These women are told to never disclose what they are doing, under pain of their entire families being killed.

Once in Amsterdam, the brokers come and inspect the infants and children. They then place bids on them (based upon the infamous “broker’s list” which lists the current black market value of these children as if they were commodities). The brokers are purchasing infants and children for the large, wealthy exclusive brothels, which are often franchises that they work for, and for the private auction houses, the largest of which is located in a suburb of Paris, France.

It is a common sight for those ‘in the know’ in South Amsterdam to see the sex trade brokers gathered at their favorite (and very private) coffeehouse in the morning, discussing the ups and downs of “the trade” and their evaluation of the latest ‘shipment.’

During these coffee discussions, they will also whisper about another pet peeve: the fees that must be paid “upstream” to the representatives of the person who oversees the entire sex industry in South Amsterdam: the Jesuit Father over Amsterdam. His offices are located in a palatial private mansion with walled gardens, where he also lives. This man is kept well-informed through his various agents of exactly how much money each broker has brought in during the week, and of how much they owe him (and the Vatican) for the privilege of operating in a city that looks the other way at its most infamous income source.

Failure to pay this “tithe” once can result in a warning; twice, in the death of the broker. Few are foolish enough to even think of trying to cheat the Father over Amsterdam of his dues. This man has agents throughout Amsterdam, in sources that the brokers would never suspect, who regularly check their books and report income, and any discrepancies.

The sex trade in Amsterdam brings in billions of dollars each year. This is because of the high price placed on infants and on children with “specialized training” in sexual skills. These children are often auctioned at the highly exclusive auction houses of Europe, where they are purchased by procurateurs who work for the wealthy families of Europe.

There are auction houses in Brussels, Belgium; Berlin, Germany; Amsterdam, Geneva, Moscow, and other locations. But the largest is located in Paris. Located in a large mansion, the evening begins with members of the wealthiest families in Europe and their consorts gathering for a gourmet dinner at 10 pm. At midnight, the auctions begin, starting with preteen children who often have specialized sexual skills. Twins are especially prized. As the night goes on, the children get younger and younger, until by 4 am the infants are auctioned. The procurateurs purchase these children for use by their wealthy clients during private parties (which the children rarely survive). The clients come to oversee these purchases, and also for amusement, since many enjoy watching the auction process.

Some infants are kept in Amsterdam, which is known for the availability of children of every age. Many people are aware that in Amsterdam, the prostitutes dress up and sit in the windows to advertise their availability. What is less publicly known is that in the early morning hours, some of these window displays used to include a woman holding an infant. To the unknowing, this is a touching display of maternal care. But the residents of South Amsterdam knew that this is actually a signal that this house offers infants and small children to its customers.

Assassinations

There is a huge, ongoing worldwide market for the use of agents with specialized training in quietly and anonymously killing targets, without leaving any trace evidence (or, with skill in leaving a false trail). Premiums are paid for those who can take out political figures, and especially targets with bodyguards and those who utilize high security measures.

By far the most sought-after assassins have MI6 (military intelligence level six) training. The Jesuits have each of their agents go through MI6 training and hire them out to other organizations or individuals for fees. The contracts are actually brokered through third parties, and the contractor has no idea that the agent they have hired works for the Vatican. This often serves Vatican purposes; the agent earns them top dollar, but they also gather important intelligence at the same time about the operations and goals of other organizations, governments or individuals when their agent returns home and discloses to them.

Since the 1300s, when the Borgia family regularly poisoned their enemies in order to gain political and spiritual power in Rome, the Vatican has also conducted its own assassinations. These are never traced back to Rome, unless they want a message sent to the survivors. Many times, the assassinations are not simply conducted physically; their agents are also skilled in theta, or spiritual, assassination techniques (this will be discussed further in the spiritual programming section of this book).

Intelligence

One of the most valuable commodities in the world is information, especially about an organization's competitors and enemies. Good intel about certain organizations or individuals can be extremely difficult to obtain, and those that can provide it can ask and be paid top dollar.

The Jesuits use their vast network of worldwide operatives with specialized training to obtain this information. The term "Vatican Spy" became infamous during the middle ages, when the monarchs of Europe became aware that there were secret agents unknown to them reporting their most hidden activities to Rome. This spy network has only grown since then, and the Vatican relies on the intelligence they provide for its own protection and planning, as well as to help further their goals. If they believe that intel will help their cause, they will arrange for it to come to the attention of the individual or organization they want it to – for a hefty fee, of course.

This intel will never appear to come from Rome. Roman agents never appear to work for Rome, but instead for other organizations or causes. The purchaser may believe that they are gathering intel from a valued Arabic contact, from an Israeli sympathizer, from a Russian mercenary, or a Templar Knight in Canada. They will not suspect the Jesuits, because their agents are always programmed to have several layers of unbreakable covers

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

Vatican Book Part 1
August 17, 2021
In "healing"

The Hierarchy of the Occult
May 3, 2018
In "mind control"

Vatican Book Part 11 (final section)
September 8, 2022
In "healing"

Pingback: Child Sex Trafficking by the Jesuits | cathy fox blog on child abuse

Pingback: AMSTERDAM: Hoofdstad van de mensenhandel. Mogelijk gemaakt door het Vaticaan. | De Binnenlandsche Bataafsche Courant

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Vatican Book Part 1

book part 4 →

Blog at WordPress.com.

Svali Speaks!

The Life of Svali – an Ex-Illuminati Mind Control Programmer

Cults that Abuse

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Before I address survivor's stories in later articles, I believe it is important to understand how groups that ritually abuse operate. Cults can be abusive or non-abusive, and there are many fairly benign cult-like groups that exist today. But for the purposes of my article, I want to look at cults that abuse, specifically, in the sense of ritual abuse.

What are the characteristics of an abusive cult? There are many studies that have defined controlling cults. Dr. Margaret Singer, Phd, U.Ca. Berkley, has written one of the definitive articles on cults that employ mind control and their characteristics (1).

She states that thought reform, as employed by controlling cults, involves the entire anthropological/social spectrum of behaviour, including language use, social environment, and influence of the leader and peers on the member. This often involves attacking the person's self concept.

I would like to take the six conditions that she has identified as being pre-requisites to exerting mind control, and compare them to experiences of survivors in ritualistically abusive groups. The two correlate completely.

1. CONTROL OVER TIME : this is Singer's first condition. The cult group must get some of the person's time, as much as possible, and have the individual think about group idealogy. Survivors report spending time during the week in contact with the cultic groups that abuse them. Contact is by phone; by verbal discussion, or going to meetings. Survivors state that group meetings often occur weekly, monthly, or as frequently as two to three times a week for intensive training sessions. The group that I was involved in (the Illuminati) met two to three times a week for normal teaching times, and had large group meetings on a monthly basis ("ritual times") as well as leadership meetings once a month to plan the activities for the next few weeks.

2. CREATE A SENSE OF POWERLESSNESS Most groups involved in ritual abuse do this to the nth degree. Through pain, degradation, tying up victims, and experiences created to show there is "no escape" from infancy on, the victim of cult control soon comes to believe that he/she is trapped, can never break free, and should just "give in" to what is asked of them.

Search

Categories

- Interview with Svali – The Illuminati in America
- Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali
- Multiple Personalities – Brokenness
- Other Authors
- Other Illuminati Articles by Svali
- Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali
- Svali Answers Questions
- Svali's Personal Life
- The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People

Betrayal programming brain wave programming color programming Complex Polyfragmentation cult Cult Abuse Cult Safety Cult Secrecy Denial Programming DID dissociation end times Illuminati plan end times scenario Escaping from the Cult government programming Having needs Healing from Ritual Abuse Hiding from the Cult History of Ritual Abuse Illuminati bankers Illuminati jobs jewel programmming linked programming Memory

Privacy & Cookies: This site uses cookies. By continuing to use this website, you agree to their use.
To find out more, including how to control cookies, see here: Cookie Policy
Close and accept

3. MANIPULATE REWARDS, PUNISHMENTS, EXPERIENCES IN ORDER TO SUPPRESS OLD SOCIAL BEHAVIOR BEHAVIORS REWARDED: Participation, conformity to [illegible] of rewards and praise, as well as punishment have a name: training. Cult type groups believe strongly in the use of praise if the person does well, including merit badges, ceremonies of reward, and high status if the person conforms to the expected behaviour, and severe punishment, even death threatened if the person refuses to perform. Often, abusive and coercive groups will take this concept to its outermost extremes.

4. MANIPULATE REWARDS, PUNISHMENTS, EXPERIENCES IN ORDER TO ELICIT NEW BEHAVIOR Models will demonstrate new behavior Conformity: dress, language, behavior Using group language will eventually still the thinking mind I will discuss this from the point of view of my experiences in the Illuminati in San Diego, Ca. Again, "training" in the Illuminati and other highly controlling groups (outside people call it "programming") is meant to create behaviour that helps the group to continue. The goal is a member who is absolutely committed to the group; who never questions leadership, who strives to excel, and who scoffs at the weak. Weakness is the displaying of emotion during ritual events; the refusal to perform an act, or the inability to keep up with others in the group during activities. "Weak" members are brought forward, and punished in view of all. During military exercises (the group had a strong military basis, with forced marches at night, and mock "battles" and "hunts") if a member did well, they were highly praised and rewarded. This could be being excused from a difficult maneuver, or sexual rewards, or moving up in status at the next award time. Members were highly conscious of their standing in the group, and were constantly seeking to "move up."
5. MUST BE A TIGHTLY CONTROLLED SYSTEM OF LOGIC There must be authoritarian leaders in control, who inspire confidence and punish questioning behaviour. In San Diego, as well as several Illuminati groups that I belonged to across the country, the leadership looked like a "pyramid", with the top person being head of "leadership council", then a group of two "advisors" below him. Below these two were six administrators who coordinated finances, meeting times, and running the groups logistically. Below them were six head trainers. Underneath were the "sister groups" of about 50 members each, with priests/priestesses, and others. All aspired to a leadership role, to being allowed to move up the rigid hierarchy. Questioning of leadership was unthought of, and considered quite dangerous. From earliest childhood on, members were taught that seeking to leave, or questioning the group's philosophy, would mean isolation, beratement, punishment, and possible death, with "deaths" being staged to convince children of this reality. Survivors of groups outside the Illuminati have also reported similar activities to control members, with a hierarchy of leadership and leaders being given the right to severely punish or discipline nonconformers.

6. PERSONS BEING THOUGHT REFORMED MUST BE UNAWARE THAT THEY ARE BEING MOVED THROUGH A PROGRAM TO MAKE THEM DEPLOYABLE AGENTS

A person is hard to manipulate if they KNOW they are being manipulated. That is why techniques used by ritualistically abusive groups are often based on a sophisticated knowledge of human behaviour and psychology. The member's peers including family, closest friends, and spouse are ALL members of the group in generational cults. These people all reinforce for the member that the group is good; has the member's "best interests" at heart, no matter how abusive the behaviour. That they want to "help" the member. Trainers and behaviour programmers also use these techniques, including "bonding" with the victim, convincing the victim that they "care for them" , that "no one else could possibly understand them the way their 'family' (the name the Illuminati go by) does", etc. As a former trainer in this group, I used those phrases frequently during sessions.

suppression metal programming military programming MPD Origin of the Illuminati Ritual Abuse Roots of the Illuminati Shell Programming Spiritual Abuse Spiritual Programming suicidal programming Survivors of Ritual Abuse Svali is Alive Svali is dead Svali is missing Svali is Safe Svali poem Svali questions techniques Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse Therapists VR programming

Blog at WordPress.com.

At one time, I even believed them myself, until I began questioning what I was doing (this will be the focus of another article: why I left). Surrounded by members who all dress alike, act alike, the person in an abusive cult will often question themselves instead of the cult group, if they question at all. After all, in generational cults, this is the ONLY reality the person has known, from infancy on, and not everyone questions what happens to them.
In later articles, I hope to be able to incorporate survivor accounts of the types of groups involved in this kind of abuse. On a personal note, the group that was involved in my ritual abuse was known as the Illuminati, although day to day they called themselves "family", "the Order", or "the Society" depending on the circumstances. For thirteen years, at times my abuse occurred in a Masonic temple in Alexandria, Virginia and some of the abusers were Masons, although most of the membership of that group had no idea that some of the members were using the temple for that purpose. All Masons are NOT abusers, most are not, but SOME in my experience were members of the Illuminati and abused me in that context. I was also abused in a small abandoned Baptist church in the country in northern Virginia. One of the abusers was a deacon in a local baptist church. All Baptists are NOT abusers, but in this one instance, some members of the local church were members of a group that abused during the night hours.

In the daytime, these people were respected members of the community, churchgoers, and appeared benevolent. This shows that a person's daytime "persona" can be quite different from how they act at night or in a different setting. All of the members of the group that abused me were generational themselves, and had been abused in the same way when they were children. This shows how the cycle of abuse, if not healed, will continue generation after generation in some families.
References: (1) Singer, Margaret T. "Conditions for Thought Reform

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali, Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Cult Abuse, Spiritual Abuse | Leave a Comment »

Ritual Abuse: Modern Hysteria or Ancient Practice?

September 29, 2008 by koniword

 If you are a survivor of ritual abuse , please be in a safe place before reading the following article, as it mentions groups that practice ritual abuse as well as the historical groups that they are descended from. *****

In this article, I will be discussing ritual abuse in a historical context. Later articles will share about ritual abuse from the perspective of its effects on the survivor as well as significant others.
1. Ritual abuse: modern hysteria or ancient practice?

Ritualized forms of abuse have been practiced since the dawn of human history. Violence in the name of a religious or ideological belief is not new; it has been practiced for thousands of years.

Here I will discuss a few groups that have been documented as practicing secret, esoteric, or abusive rites to place modern ritual abuse in a historical context. Please be aware that this is only some of the documented ritualized abuse that we know of from ancient until modern times, and is by no means complete.

The ancient Assyrians and Phoenicians worshipped the sun god, Baal, who they depended upon for the continuance of their crops. The antiquity of the worship of the god or gods of Baal extends back to the 14th century BCE among the ancient Semitic cultures. Worship of Baal extended from the Canaanites to the Phoenicians who also were partially an agricultural people. Baal, the sun god, was fervently prayed to for the protection of livestock and crops, and the rites also included animal and human sacrifice.

Another co-current deity was Molech, whose rituals were also costly to human life. (excerpted from Alan G. Hefner).

Many of these rituals were adopted by the ancient Hebrews, as mentioned in the Bible (Leviticus 20 and 2 Kings 23) These rituals were carried out for over a thousand years, both openly and secretly.

Ancient Babylonia also practiced Mystery Religions, which involved worship of the sun god, and sacrifices to this deity.

In Europe and Indo-asia, the ancient Druids also were known to engagein human sacrifice and rituals before the coming of Christianity to the areas occupied by the celts in Europe and Britain. Caesar commented upon this practice:

"The whole nation of the Gauls is greatly devoted to ritual observances, and for that reason those who are smitten with the more grievous maladies and who are engaged in the perils of battle either sacrifice human victims or vow to do so, employing the Druids as ministers for such sacrifices…"

(Gallic War, 6, 16)
By the medieval ages, Christianity had entered Europe, and groups were formed who practiced rites that were the antithesis of the organized religion of the day. Many of these groups claimed roots founded in the rites of the ancient druids and Canaanites. The Knights Templar were one such order. They were founded by medieval lords and barons to protect pilgrims who visited Jerusalem, which had been captured during the First Crusade. They were also quite wealthy,and financed the leading kings of Europe at the time, creating the modern banking system of lending at interest. They were disbanded in the early 1300s by the Pope and the King of France because of fear due to their power,as well as their esoteric religious practices. The Knights Templar began corrupting their Catholicism, and incorporating elements of mystery religions, which included rituals with candles around the body of a young virgin, and homosexual practices. They also began summoning demons during these rituals. Although officially disbanded, the Templar knights continued practicing their rites in secret, founding the thirteen orders, each with their own symbol.

Rosicrucianism. This group was publicly founded in the 17th century in Germany, supposedly by an individual in a novel known as Christian Resenkrutz. The order was based on the traditions of the "Rose Cross" order. This group emphasized the need for "enlightenment" through following certain spiritual principles,and had both a public and covert philosophy.

Meanwhile, in South America and Mexico, the Incas and Aztecs were also performing rituals which involved tbe taking of human life. This has been documented in the annals of the early Spanish conquerors.

Up until modern times, esoteric, hidden practices have continued around the world. Brutality, and sacrifices in the name of religion are not limited to one locality or one time in history.

In Africa, ritual murder is still ongoing, and has been extensively documented. (see articles by Oke(1989) for more information. In Thailand, India, and Malaysia, sacrifices and rituals are still conducted, similar to those of ancient times, and has been documented in articles by Newton (1993) and Constantine (1995).

Modern Europe has also reported incidences of ritual murder in recent years (see articles by Newton, 1993a for discussion of cases of ritual murder that have been convicted in Dusseldorf and Spain).

In strife-torn Peru, human sacrifice remains a daily fact of life, dating back to the time of the Incas. For some practitioners, the ritual offering of human lives is believed to insure bountiful crops, control the weather, and prevent such natural catastrophes as floods and earthquakes. These rituals, called "paying the earth," are also employed by wealthy businessmen, including mine owners and beer distributors,to insure continued prosperity.

In neighboring Chile, human sacrifice is such an established tradition that the courts recognize "compulsion by irresistible psychic forces" as grounds for acquittal in cases of ritual murder. (Tierney, 1989)

There is much, much more evidence of documented continuing ritual sacrificearound the world. It would take a strong denial system to refute both the historical and circumstancial evidence that ritual abuse has been a reality throughout the ages, and continues to be until this day.

Why am I sharing about the history of ritual abuse? One of the things that often perplexes survivors of ritual abuse is the denial with which their memories or accounts are often met. They are told: "ritual abuse is a modern-day witch hunt," "Things like that don't happen in this day and age" (as if man's entering the Industrial Revolution changed human nature), or "I don't believe you." Comments like these can be devastating both to the survivor of ritual abuse, who often WISHES the memories were not true, and the family and support people for the individual, who know the individual, and that they are NOT lying.

Comments like these only reinforce what the individual was told by the cult group: "If you tell, no one will believe you," or "You will be laughed at, or shunned." The survivor courageous enough to not only remember, but then disclose their abuse, will be faced with a society that often appears in denial. "Why isn't anyone doing anything about this?" the survivor wonders, as they share the atrocities. "Why isn't it stopped?" "Why do more children have to be hurt?"

Societal denial is complex. People often do not want to think about or hear about painful topics. Thirty years ago, teenage girls who shared that their middle class father was sexually abusing them were told that they were "lying", or worse, "delusional". Twenty years ago, medical professionals who suspected that battered children were being seen from not only the poverty levels of society, but also the middle class and well to do, were told it wasn't possible. Society closed its eyes to the facts before it, until enough people finally came forward and disclosed.

Hopefully, placing ritual abuse in a historical context will help the reader see that:

Ritual abuse is NOT a "new" phenomenon, or a modern day "hysteria"

Human beings have been capable of great cruelty throughout the ages, and to believe otherwise refutes the historical record.

Those who are abused tend to abuse. Why would this well known psychological fact be different in the context of familial, generational ritual abuse? Where the abuse has been passed down for generations, in a codified manner?

That ritual abuse is occurring around the world. It is NOT a phenomenon limited to the United States, or to people "recovering memories" in therapy. Newton, Ryder, and Lockwood ("Other altars") have resarched and proven this.

My hope is that at the least, this article has helped raise some questions about a topic that is often overlooked and misunderstood. – Svali

References: Crowley, Aleister, The Book of Lies (Weiser, 1988)

Howard, Michael The Occult Conspiracy (1989)

Shaw, Jim and McKenney The Deadly Deception (1988)

Ryder, Daniel ;article: Satanic Ritual abuse: The evidence surfaces: …(1999)

Newton, Michael: Excerpt from essay published in the Journal of Psychohistory 24 (2) Fall 1996,"BLOOD ATONEMENT" IN 19TH-CENTURY AMERICA

Out of Darkness:Contoversy over satanism and ritual abuse ;Sakheim, Devine

(1998)

Smith, Margaret; Ritual Abuse; (1993)

James, Simon: The World of the Celts (1993)

The Book of Illumination (age unknown)

Posted in Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged History of Ritual Abuse | 1 Comment »

Ritual abuse: The Under-Recognized Problem

September 29, 2008 by koniword

If you are a survivor of ritual abuse, please be aware that reading about it may be triggering. Please take care of yourself, and be in a safe place before reading Ritual Abuse The words conjures up images of people in robes, chanting, or perhaps a grade D horror flick. But what is the reality?

First, let's look at a definition of ritual abuse:

Ritual abuse is the systematic, repetitive abuse of both children and adults by either an individual or a group. It may involve psychological, sexual, physical and/or spiritual abuse, and the effects are devastating on the individual who undergoes it. Often survivors of this type of extreme abuse cope by dissociating, and as adults may continue the cycle of amnesia and abuse. The key word here is : repetitive. Ritual abuse is done repetitively, in a consistent pattern, over time. This may be done in the name of a religious belief, or simply out of patterned cruelty. Any idealogy can and has been used to justify the pattern of abuse. Most of the victimization begins in early childhood, and is done by adults who were themselves abused. The cycle continues because people often do not realize that they can stop it; often, they feel "trapped" in the pattern of abuse. What is the incidence of ritual abuse today? Statistics vary, depending upon the source. When I lived in a large metropolitan city in the Southwest, population close to 2,000,000 , the group that I was affiliated with, known as the Illuminati, had 24 sister groups. Each group had roughly 50 members, so they had approximately 1,200 members in this area. These numbers are reflected across the United States and European countries. And this was only one group.

In the next few months, I will be sharing different perspectives on the reality of ritual abuse. I hope to address the following questions:

1. What kinds of groups engage in what is known as ritual abuse? What motivates them?

2. How do these groups maintain their "cloak of secrecy?" How do they operate? What kind of security do they use?

3. How do they program their followers? Why? How does a person break free from this kind of programming?

4. What is the opinion of experts in the field?

5. Has there been documented, physical evidence that ritual abuse occurs? What evidence?

6. What about spouses and friends: what can they do to help survivors of ritual abuse? What is helpful, and what isn't?

7. What can the general public do to help?
These are all valid points that need to be addressed in order to understand ritual abuse. As a survivor of ritual abuse myself, as well as a former cult programmer, or trainer, I have a vested interest in sharing both from my own experience, and the wealth of published information about ritual abuse that is available now.

I also hope to be able to share some survivor stories (with names changed to protect the people involved) about the reality of ritual abuse, and the ongoing effects that it causes in the life of the survivor, as well as things that have helped them in their healing journey.

I will be sharing internet links that relate to the topics that I have addressed. They are there, and are well worth reading for the person who desires to learn more, and is willing to approach this subject objectively.

Best wishes,
Svali

Posted in Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Ritual Abuse, Spiritual Abuse | Leave a Comment »

On Having Needs

September 29, 2008 by koniword

This is a guest article by someone who has written expressively and eloquently on how the survivor of cult abuse feels. Her name is niid la'i and she speaks for many of us about the isolation and loss of identity, the need to protect oneself after a lifetime of betrayals. The desire to learn to trust and be open. She calls it:

On Having Need

by Niid La'i

This is an essay on need. Need is frightening to me. I don't want to have need! The voices of programming inside start to shout at me when I acknowledge that I have needs. I am not supposed to have needs. I have always existed to serve others. I am supposed to be compliant, understanding, and forgiving, no matter what anyone does to me, or says to me. I am never supposed to express an opinion, or discontent or dissatisfaction.

As a child, I learned to have a "nothing face." This face was devoid of all expression. It was a face that hid a million feelings. Sometimes, even this expression was unacceptable. If it was misconstrued as sullen, then punishment descended on me anyway. I had to have at least a suggestion of a smile and contentment blended in with the nothing face. It was used when cult members were present and in the home with the mother and father.

I also have, what I call, "outside faces." Outside faces are more readable. They were created to present a pleasant, calm, and amiable appearance to all people. The outside faces went to school, and to relatives' homes, and to public places. As a small child people would comment on how quiet I was. As a teen-ager, and even now, many friends and acquaintances tell me I am so, "laid back!" What a joke! But it proves how well everyone inside has hidden behind the acceptable faces that afforded some safety.

One problem this has created is a numbing affect. In order for the outside faces and the nothing face to function, needs and feelings had to be literally forgotten. If alters, which I call, "others, " inside were too upset or anxious, there was a possibility of their emotions breaking through. Often in a cult gathering, members of the group would convince little others that if they had feelings inside, the members could tell. So, even if their facial expression was as it should be, the cult members would punish them for the feelings these "little people", my name for little alters, were supposedly having. Because of this, others learned to deny their feelings and more others were created to hold feelings in far away worlds. Their needs were not recognized anymore either. Eventually they were as "nothing" inside as their faces learned to be on the outside.

When one of my others was 6 years old she was being taught not to cry. I'm sure there were lots of other "lessons" already ingrained about showing emotions, but this is just one description of those indoctrination sessions. The memory, and I'm sure it is not complete, is of this small child standing naked in front of a male adult. He was sitting in a chair and all of a sudden he slapped her very hard on the cheek. Of course, she grabbed her cheek and started to cry. He removed her hand and hit her again and said simply, "Don't cry!" She tried to stop but couldn't. He continued to hit her cheek and repeat the words until her tears stopped and the only evidence of the pain was her labored breathing. I'm sure that at some point this little person inside fragmented into more others who could hold the sting of the slaps and even the tears away from the six year olds consciousness. Eventually she was able to stand dry eyed in front of her abuser and not even flinch. By the time this was accomplished her cheek and eye were so swollen and bruised that she could not go to school for more than a week.

Certainly, everyone who lives on the earth has the need to cry many times in his/her life. But for me, because of countless, repeated episodes of controlled programming such as the one just described, my need to cry was effectively shut off. Now, as an adult, though I need to cry, there are many times I can't. I will feel tears begin to fill my eyes and my throat tighten up, but then all the symptoms just go away. I am left with an overwhelming sadness, a stomach- ache and extreme anxiety.

Can I then tell anyone I am anxious, or sad, or feel sick? NO! Others inside have been taught equally well that they are not supposed to ask for relief or comfort. They should not even feel sad, or anxious or sick. If they do have these feelings, they think they are bad and evil for having them. They experience tremendous guilt and shame.
In the present day, I find I don't understand what is happening with my emotions. I go to the Dr. and get so anxious when I have to tell him/her what is wrong that I get tongue-tied and confused. The Dr. gets impatient and frustrated because my explanations are so disjointed. He/she misunderstands.. I try again, but I still can't be clear. I am then judged incompetent and a hypochondriac. I am treated with lack of respect and in a mocking way. I don't understand why I can't talk to Drs. I feel stupid and ashamed for being so evasive and indirect.

This happens because I am not supposed to need. If I am sick, I am not supposed to need help. I am not supposed to tell anyone I don't feel good. I am not supposed to GET sick in the first place. This is ludicrous when considered logically. Everyone gets sick. But, the lessons are still so much a part of me, I think I am bad and evil for wanting medicine to feel better.

Let's say I go to a therapy session. I am going to therapy because I am trying to resolve the conflicts I sense inside. Even being there is a serious breach of "the rules." Again, I am admitting I have needs, and I am trying to talk to someone about them. Talking is akin to murder. It is a capital offense, and carries major consequences if broken. Therapy is all about talking! If I sit silent in front of my therapist then nothing is accomplished. If I speak to him I am buried in angry, shouting inner voices, pleading voices, scared voices. My body starts to hurt in various places. I cannot think again, and what I say comes out jumbled and incoherent. I get frustrated and panic-stricken. If my therapist shows even the slightest indication of impatience or perceived anger, everyone inside withdraws. All the others inside willing to watch and listen are so hyper alert they notice every movement, twitch and voice inflection the therapist has. This can seriously impede progress in therapy.

Many times I have left a session thinking the therapist has labeled me needy and draining. This is because if I ask him/her for anything; reassurance, understanding, support, I think I am being overbearing and demanding. The very act of walking through the door of the office and being seen feels like asking for more than anyone should ever be asked to give. Indeed, I am supposed to go in there and figure out what the therapist needs and start supporting and taking care of him! Paradoxically if the therapist cannot return a rare phone call, or cannot be as supportive as I need him/her to be, I feel rejected and abandoned. So, I find myself in one of those double binds so common to survivors. If the therapist is supportive, etc. I feel bad and evil. If he is not supportive I feel bad and evil. This is all because I am not supposed to have any needs.

What can happen, is that I get so worried about being needy, that I become needy!! By skirting around what I really want to say or ask for, those who are working with me have to guess at what I am really trying to ask or say. They can end up feeling manipulated, or like they are being forced to play some strange kind of game. Though this is not my intent, especially if they do not know me very well, my "halftalk," as I call it, can create the very drain I am trying so hard not to inflict on others.

It's another trust issue. In order to heal, I have to trust before trust is really there to be able to learn to trust! I have to risk from the very foundation of my being. I wear the lessons of the past like a second skin. To begin removing this skin leaves me feeling touch tender and naked once again. I often feel like I am metaphorically standing in the middle of a busy freeway daring the cars not to hit me. That's how vulnerable I feel as I try and shed the beliefs that have ruled me from the day I was born. I hate it when I am told I am comfortable living within the boundaries placed on me from the past. But, it is true. I have only known what I was so methodically programmed to believe.

Learning new ways is filled with as much pain and anxiety as the original abuse. As I discover and then acknowledge that I have needs, and attempt to trust these needs to "outsiders," "big people," i.e., therapist, Drs. and friends, I open myself up to the possibility of more hurt and misunderstanding. Though these people are not abusers, human beings are subject to making mistakes, responding from their own set of rules. The everyday problems in relationships that are bound to happen when people get together can seem as intense as the former abuse.

Can the voices of programming ever be silenced? I hope so. At this point, I have to rely on my therapists and other caregivers to instruct me and guide me. I cannot offer concrete ways to implant trust in barren soil. What this essay offers is insight. I NEED those who read it to understand and be able to step beyond my walls of resistance and help me. I hope that as other survivors relate to these barriers that affect their healing they will also seek out people that can assist them to shed their old skins of the past. Now how's this for breaking programming! Copyright 2000 Niid la'i:

Thank you for your courage in opening your heart and sharing with others here. May what you wrote open the eyes of both therapists and support people to the tremendous issues that a survivor of ritual abuse struggles with in the healing process. -Svali

Posted in Other Authors | Tagged Having needs | 1 Comment »

Chapter Fifteen: Core splits, Denial programming, the last Five Steps of Discipline

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Virtual Reality Programming

Virtual reality programming (VR) is a form of programming that has become more and more widely used in the past few decades. It involves the person being placed in VR headsets and suit while a cult created VR disk is used to run the program. It can be used to create 3D and holographic images, and especially is useful in scripted programming, and target practice sequences for assassin training. Under hypnosis , the person will really believe they are in the scene.

Virtually any scenario can be recreated. Images to be "burned in" will be shown on the VR disk, and reinforced repetitively during the programming sequence. Some trainers feel it removes the element of "human error" in training, and use it quite extensively. VR programming, like any other programming, means going inside and finding out the distortions that were placed in the parts that went through the programming, allowing them to see how they were deceived, and dealing with the trauma associated with the programming.

Denial Programming:

Denial programming begins with the first experiences the infant goes through in life. The child has been horrendously wounded and traumatized, yet the next morning, the adults around him are acting normally, as if nothing had happened. They are modeling a lifestyle of denial for the infant and young child. This is reinforced later by the child being told:

"It was just a bad dream" (oh, how the child wants to believe this lie. It makes the pain less to think it didn't really happen)

"It's just your imagination; it isn't really happening" (which is again embraced as an escape from the horror). Denial will also be fed by the adults around the child telling them that they will never be believed if they disclose. There will be set ups to teach the child what they see and hear, and to teach the child to trust outside adults to tell them their reality.

A typical set up will go like this:

The adult will hold an object such as an orange in their hand, and ask the young child, about age two or three, "what is this?". The child will quickly respond, "oh, an orange!" The child will be shocked, and told, "no, it's an apple." The child will be confused, because what they are looking at is obviously an orange. It is the color orange, smells like an orange, looks like an orange. The question will be repeated. The child may answer again," an orange," and will be shocked again. Finally, the child, unsure and not wanting to be punished, will say, "an apple," and be praised.

The purpose of this exercise is to teach the child to not trust their own reality, and look to outside adults or leaders to tell them what reality really is.

That is the basis of denial: the person learns to not trust their own reality, because of punishment and fear when they have spoken the truth.

Alters will be created as the child grows, whose purpose is to deny the cult abuse. If any leakage or breakthrough occurs, the denial alter's job is to create a plausible explanation: it was a nightmare, a book the person read, a movie they saw, etc. These alters will read and quote literature that refutes SRA. THESE ALTERS OFTEN BELIEVE THAT THEY ARE SAVING THE LIFE OF THE SURVIVOR. They have been told that if the survivor remembers, and believes the abuse, the survivor will be killed, or the denial alter will be severely punished or shattered for not doing their job. These parts have a vested interest in their job: they believe their very existence and they body's survival, depend upon them.

Suggestions:

Arguing with a denial alter will not work, since they are not motivated by logic, but fear. A better approach is to ask them what they fear if the person remembers. This will open up the deception and lies that were ground in. They may be protecting the survivor from suicidal alters behind them, who are programmed to kick in if denial is broken through. Allowing them to vent their concerns, and enlisting the aid of helpers or cognitives who do not have suicidal or denial programming will help. Showing them reality in a gentle way, allowing them to "listen in" on others who share will go a long way.

Some denial is the natural consequence of self protection from the horrors of abuse; not all denial is programming. But if denial is constantly blocking therapy, and causing it to come to a complete standstill; if the person becomes highly suicidal every time denial is set aside briefly, then the possibility needs to be considered. Safety, inner cooperation, and patience will go a long way in decreasing denial. As denial backs down, you can expect an immense amount of grieving as the truth is realized. Denial protected the survivor from the horrendous pain of the truth, and should be let go of extremely slowly and cautiously, with plenty of support during the grieving stage.

Core splits:

Core splits are intentional traumatic splits created from the core personality.

The core may be literally "splintered" by overwhelming psychological and physical/spiritual trauma. The trauma needed to create a core split must be very early and psychologically devastating. Fetal splits may occur, but they are rarely a core split; instead, the core creates an alter, but remains.

Core splits are done between the ages of 18 months and three years. Usually at least one parent or main caretaker is involved in the trauma, because this creates the psychological devastation necessary to split the core. Physical trauma alone rarely causes core splits. The torture is intense and prolonged, until the child collapses. It may be shocking, stretching, being hung in a high place, or a combination of several techniques. Being placed in "shock boxes", or near drowning are also used.

The techniques that create core splits are also dangerous, since they can also cause autism if the child cannot endure the programming. When I was in the cult, I fought to stop core splitting because occasionally children were lost or the foundational personality was too weakened.

The core may split into two, three, or up to eight splits internally. Each split will be a piece of the "core child". The original core will not resurface after splitting. These splits are used by cult trainers to be used as templates to create systems within the child. A core split, or a split from one, will be a strong alter, and can be re-split many times in the programming process, to create a multifaceted and diverse system within.

Suggestions:

Core splits represent intense foundational trauma. They will be the basis for later systems, which may be completely dissociated from the split as time goes on. Work on core splits should go very slowly, and only late in the therapy process when there is immense intrasystem cooperation. The survivor will need every internal resource to deal with these traumas, and plenty of outside therapeutic support.

It may mean hospitalization unless the survivor can keep the trauma from emerging too quickly, and the therapist and survivor can go extremely slow.

Other, less dissociated systems and fragments should be integrated.

Acknowledging the abuse cognitively will be the first step in dealing with core trauma. Letting more dissociated parts grieve about "hearing about" what happened may come next. Allowing feelings near the core to come close, a little at a time, with helpers and internal nurturers offering support will help.

These feelings should be titrated, and looked at a little at a time. Splits may be different ages, and may need to express themselves in different ways.

There may be "dream programming", a "fantasy world", or other flight from reality surrounding the core splits, that protects them from contact with the outside world, which is perceived as brutal and cold. Parts may be completely disconnected from outside reality in an effort to buffer pain.

Slow, patient nurturing and reality orientation will help these tremendously traumatized parts begin to join outer reality. Some parts will always have been aware of what happened, but won't care to join the outside world.

Patience, allowing them to vent, will help most.

Steps of Discipline:

Step seven: Not caring

This step will take the child further into a perpetrator role. The child will be forced to hurt others and prove their ability to not care during the process.

Step eight: Time travel

The child will be taught spiritual principles of "traveling" both internally and externally, with set ups, role playing, and guided exercises reinforced with trauma. The goal will be to reach "enlightenment", an ecstatic state of dissociation reached after severe trauma.

Steps nine, ten, eleven:

These will involve programming that will vary according to the child's future role in the cult. Sexual trauma, learning to dissociate and increase cognition, decrease feeling will be emphasized in these steps.

Step twelve: "coming of age"

A ceremony of becoming at age twelve to thirteen, the child will be formally inducted into the cult and their adult role in a ceremony of "coming of age". They will prove this ability by performing the role/job they have been training for, to the satisfaction of the trainer and leaders; by undergoing a special induction ceremony. The ritual and ceremony will be held with other children of the same age, who are dressed in white and given a prize as acknowledgement that they have completed the basics of their training successfully.

They will continue to be abused, even as adults, but the major traumatization and creation of system templates will have occurred by this age. Future training will refine what was already placed in the child by this age, or build upon the foundation.

Suggestions:

Grieving the abuse, acknowledging the feelings associated with undergoing the trauma will be important. It will be necessary to deal with perpetrator guilt, since by this time the child will be a perpetrator, and will have identified with the adult role models around them. This can be difficult to do, since perpetration will horrify the survivor when they remember this. Supporting the survivor, remaining non judgmental, and encouraging acceptance of these parts is important. Pointing out that at the time, they saw no other options available will help. Realizing that perpetrator alters saved the child's life, and that they had no other way to act, especially originally, the first time, will need to be pointed out. The survivor may feel hostile towards, or reviled by perpetrator alters, but they are the expression of the abuse and limited choices they were allowed. Grieving being a perpetrator will take time and caring support by others.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged Denial Programming, VR programming | 1 Comment »

Chapter Fourteen: Spiritual Programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Note: this chapter includes discussion of both cult and Christian spirituality; do not read if these themes are triggering

Any discussion of Illuminati programming would be lacking if it did not address spiritual programming. Most of the previous chapters have dealt with scientifically based, organized, structured programming.

But the Illuminati are first and foremost not scientists, but spiritual. The very foundation of the group is based on the occult. And they go to great lengths to grind in these occult beliefs in their people's systems.

The amount of spiritual programming in the person's systems will vary from person to person, and depends on the individual group, their religious heritage, the leader's beliefs, and the trainers in the group.

All children go to rituals, where they are dedicated from before birth as well as at intervals throughout their life. In these rituals, demonic entities are invoked, to coerce the person into servant hood, loyalty, and secrecy; as well as reinforce the programming being done.

Trainers will invoke demonic layering during programming sessions. This is done after acute trauma. The person is asked if they want more pain, and they will always say "no". The trainer then offers them a way out: if they will accept a "protector" or "protectors" they won't be hurt any more. The trainers will want this, knowing that with these "protectors'" they can shorten the training sessions. The protectors, or guardians, will reinforce the programming internally, without outside help. This concept will seem controversial to people who do not believe in spiritual realities, but I am only describing what the Illuminists believe, and their trainers practice.

Spiritual programming will also include: being forced to memorize rituals, THE BOOK OF ILLUMINATION, and other books which contain cult beliefs. The person will be saturated from infancy on, in classes and training sessions, with cult beliefs. They will go to rituals where the adults participate in spiritual worship, wearing robes, and giving obeisance to the group's particular guardian deity. Moloch, Ashtaroth, Baal, Enokkim are demons who are commonly worshipped. The child may see a sacrifice, either real or a set-up, to these deities; animal sacrifices are common. The child will be forced to participate in the sacrifices, and will have to go through blood baptism.

They will be forced to take the heart, or other internal organs, out of an animal that has been sacrificed, and eat them. The adults, and leaders of the group, will place their hands on the child's head, while it is drugged, and invoke demonic entities.

One ritual which is actually programming is the "resuscitation ritual". In this ritual, the child may be heavily drugged, and shocked or tortured, to the point that his heart may stop. The head priest will then "resuscitate " the child, using drugs, CPR, and incantations. When the child comes back, and is awake, he or she will be told that they were "brought back to life" by the demonic entity that the particular group worships, and that now the child owes it their life. They are told that if they ever tell, or try to get the demon to leave, they will return to the lifeless state they were in prior to resuscitation.

Spiritual "healings" due to the demonic are also common. Injuries caused by torture, or programming sessions, or even military exercises, will be healed almost instantaneously during invocations.

Jewel programming will often have demons loyal to the generational family spirits layered in. These are called the "family jewels". The demons "guard them" and help protect the programming surrounding them.

In a sense, every ritual that a young child is part of, is an intense programming experience, as the child observes the adults around them, and imitates their behavior. The child will be severely punished if it falls asleep, and will be told that demons will kill it if it goes to sleep again during a ritual.

They are taught to be completely silent, no matter what they witness during the rituals. The child will witness things that seem utterly unbelievable, including faces appearing transformed by the demonic, channeling, other voices coming out of a leader's mouth, reading of members, telling the future. Group guidance will often be given through channeling of a strong spirit or principality; members who can channel powerful spirits and survive are respected, and their guidance will be looked for.

Some groups will use scriptures negatively or program the child to hate Christian symbols and theology. Other groups will encourage the amnesic front to embrace a Christian lifestyle, while forcing the back alters to renounce and blaspheme the choices the front has made, to separate the two alter groups even further. The cult alters will be told that since they renounced Christianity, they have committed the "unpardonable sin" and can never be forgiven. They will be shown scriptures that supposedly back this up.

In moments of despair, during intense torture or isolation, a person will often cry out to God for help. The trainers or other cult members will often mock the person, telling the person that God has forgotten them, or ask "where is God now? He must hate you….."

Any negative experience the person undergoes, will be used to reinforce the concept that they have been abandoned by God. The cult will gleefully point out the contradictions between what the person experiences, and what Christianity teaches should happen to them.

They may distort scriptures, or use false scriptures. They may distort Christian hymns, or use them in programming. A favorite hymn is "may the circle be unbroken", since it can have two meanings.

Suggestions:

Spiritual programming can be some of the most damaging programming within a person's systems, since it attempts to cut them off from the source of real healing. It is an intentional distortion of truth, with events calculated to teach and reinforce wrong concepts of God. Many survivors are unable to hear Christian terms, or are intensely triggered by any religious discussion.

The survivor and therapist need to realize that these negative reactions are the result of years of false teaching, pain, punishment, distortion and set-ups. It is important not to judge the parts of the person that are negative towards spirituality, or come out, proclaiming the power and benefits of cult spirituality. The survivor's front may be horrified to hear or learn about parts that have these feelings, especially if they are a strong Christian. These parts inside are sharing the only reality they have ever known, and need time and patience to ground, and experience reality outside of the cult setting.

Demonic oppression may need to be dealt with, and even deliverance, to bring relief to a system that is being terrorized by the demonic.

Each therapist and survivor will need to come to terms with their own spiritual beliefs. I personally believe that a therapist needs to consider the possibility of the demonic, since this is what the survivor has been exposed to all their life. The cult certainly does believe it is real, and anyone who has been involved in a cult setting will have had experiences that are in-explainable by normal rational scientific principles.

The survivor needs hope, and healing. A positive spirituality based on love, gentleness, forgiveness, that is the opposite of the coercing, punitive, negative spirituality the survivor has known, will help immensely in the healing process. A spiritual belief system that offers hope, healing, grace, mercy, and affirmation will often give the survivor the support they need to go on during the often difficult process of healing.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged Spiritual Programming | 4 Comments »

Chapter Thirteen: Shell programming, Internal Councils, Human Experimentation, Function Codes

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Shell programming, Internal Councils, Human Experimentation, Function Codes
Parts of this chapter could be extremely triggering, please read with caution and only with a therapist if a survivor.

Shell programming is a form of programming used to create a "shell" on the outside, that other alters inside speak through. This is a designed to hide the person's multiplicity from the outside world, and works extremely well with highly fragmented systems. It also takes a person with the ability to dissociate to a great degree.

How it is done: with shell programming, the trainer will often take a clear plastic or glass mask, and put it in front of the subject. They will be extremely traumatized, shocked, drugged, and told that they (the alter or alters in front) are the "mask" that they see. Their job will be to be a shell, or voice, to cover for the others behind. These parts will be so traumatized that they literally see themselves as only a shell, with no real substance or body.

Others inside will then be directed to come next to the "shell" alters, and use their voice to cover their own. This allows greater fragmentation of the person, while being able to hide it from outside view, since the internal alters will learn to present through the shell. Shell alters always see themselves as "clear", and will have no color if color coding is present in other systems.

Suggestions

It is important to realize that what the system is actually doing is co-presenting, although not co-consciously. For a shell program to work, the shell alters have been taught to allow co-presentation with the other alters in the systems. Other alters in the back may not always be aware that this is what is happening, and the front shell especially will not know that they are being "gone through" for co-presentation.

Recognizing the trauma that occurred, and finding out where the shell fragments came from, will help. Allowing both the shell alters and the other alters to recognize that this is how they have been presenting, and why, will be an important step. Back alters may then begin presenting without going through the shell, and the person may look "more multiple" than they ever have for a period, with accents or young voices coming through. What is actually happening is that the back is presenting without masking who they are through the shell. Meanwhile, the shell alters may decide to coalesce, for greater strength, and may decide to change jobs. Each system will decide what is best for them.

Internal Councils:

Survivors of Illuminati programming will always have some type of hierarchy inside. This is because the cult itself is very hierarchical, and puts this hierarchy inside the person. What better way to inspire loyalty to leadership than to put the leadership inside the person's head? Trainers are also very hierarchy conscious themselves. They know that a system without hierarchy and head honchos inside to direct things will be a system in chaos. They will not leave the person's system leaderless inside.

Many trainers will put themselves in the person, over the internal programmers or trainers. This is because they are egotistical, but also because it uses a well known phenomenon of human nature: PEOPLE TEND TO INTERNALIZE THEIR ABUSERS. The survivor may be horrified to find a representative of one of their worst perpetrators inside, but this was a survival mechanism. A tenet of human behavior is that often people will punish someone less who mimics them. A brutal nazi will be less likely to punish another brutal nazi, but will look down upon and punish a weak, crying person. So, the survivor will internalize the rough nazi inside, to avoid being hurt. The survivor may mimic accents, mannerisms, even claim the perpetrator's life history as their own.

The ultimate form of internalization comes with internalizing hierarchical councils. The person, under pain, hypnosis, and drugs, will be taught to incorporate a highly dissociated group inside to lead the others. These will often be created from core splits, because the trainers want them to be extremely strong, stable alters in the system.

Triads of three elders may be seen

Platinum's may have a head council of three

Jewels will have a triad, made up of ruby, emerald, diamond in many systems, to rule over the others

And, of course, an internal "leadership council", "System Above", "Ascended Masters", "supreme council", regional council, world council, etc. may be found. The councils found will vary with each survivor.

These internal groups will correlate roughly to the outside group. Often the child or youth at age twelve will be presented to these groups in a formal coming of age ceremony. This ceremony is considered quite an honor, and will involve the child being traumatized and accepting the leadership of the council for the rest of their life. Undying loyalty is promised. There may be other occasions the person will be forced to come before the councils throughout their lifespan, either for judgment, to pass tests, for punishment, or elevation. These councils will be seen as holding power of life or death, and the child or youth will do anything to gain their favor. The child will internalize them. The trainer will help with the internalization, using photographs or holographic images of the people to "burn them in". Each member of the group will be given different leadership tasks.

It is not uncommon for the survivor to incorporate a parent, both parents, or grandparents, into their internal leadership hierarchy in a generational survivor.

High priests and priestesses may sit on ruling councils inside.

Suggestions:

Internal leadership councils will often be some of the most resistant to, and hostile towards therapy, especially in the early stages. They will verbally banter with, or refuse to speak to, the therapist, as being "beneath their notice." They are mimicking the haughty, hierarchical attitudes they have been exposed to all their lives.

They also have the most to lose, if the survivor leaves the cult, and may fight this decision tooth and nail. They will often be the alters with an "attitude".

Both the survivor and therapist need to recognize that these parts had powerful needs that were met in the cult setting. To ignore this and argue with them will only entrench their belief that therapists are stupid and unknowing people. Acknowledge their internal role while gently pointing out reality. Try to enlist their aid in helping the survivor strengthen. Discuss honestly the pros and cons of leaving the cult. These are highly intellectual alters, and they need to express their concerns and doubts. Setting good boundaries and not allowing verbal abuse of the therapist is important. These alters are used to "pushing people around" verbally, and have been rewarded for it prior to therapy. Now, they need to learn new coping skills and behaviors, and the process may take time. Allow them to vent their anger, displeasure, and fears about the decision to leave the cult. Offer them new jobs inside the person of leadership over safety committees, or even decision making committees.

Sometimes, a system that has broken free from the cult, and has no external hierarchy that they are accountable to will go through a short period of chaos as word gets out: we're free, and don't have to do what the cult tells us to do any more! Hundreds of internal arguments may break out as to: what do we do for a living? where do we live? what do we eat? what hobbies will we have? Everybody wants to come out, see the daytime, and live this new, free life. But the freedom may cause imbalance with all of the switching going on inside. Enlisting the aid of the internal hierarchy, and creating a limited democracy, with ground rules, may help during this time. Don't dismantle the internal hierarchy overnight, or the systems will be rudderless. Enlist their aid in helping direct which direction the survivor goes. Things will settle down after a period, as the systems learn to listen to each other, vote on ideas, and begin going together in the same direction.

Human Experimentation

This is one of the most grievous things that still occurs in the Illuminati today. The Illuminati were famed for deciding years ago to "go scientific" and incorporate scientific experimentation into their training principles. This is one area where they broke with other, more traditional groups, who still followed "spiritual principles". The Illuminati decided to use scientific data, especially in the psychiatric and behavioral sciences, to drive their training practices. This became known openly during W.W.II, when the world heard about the experimentation on Jews and other groups in the concentration camps, but human experimentation had been quietly going on for years before underground.

It also did not stop at the end of the war. German trainers and scientists were scattered around the world, and hidden, where they continued teaching others the principles they had learned, and continued with ongoing experimentation.

Some of this experimentation occurred with government funding through groups such as the CIA and NSA. The Illuminati had people infiltrated throughout these groups, who used the principles discovered and shared them with their own trainers.

Experimentation is going on, even to this day. It is done secretly. Its purpose is to help improve and create more sophisticated training techniques. To prevent "programming failures", or "pfs" as they are called in the cult.

Many, many survivors, if not all, will have been told that they are only an experiment. This may or may not be true. Trainers like to tell their subjects that they are experiments, even if they aren't, for several reasons:

1. It creates immense fear and helplessness in the subject (the thought is, if this is an experiment, I will have to work really hard to survive this)

2. It devalues the person immensely. They will feel that they have no real value as a human being, that all they are is an experiment. Someone who feels devalued doesn't care, and will be willing to do things they wouldn't if they felt some value, some humanization.

3. It gives the trainer added power, as they are the one who can begin or stop the "experiment". Almost always, when the person is TOLD they are an experiment, it isn't really true. When trainers and cult members really do experiments, the subjects are never told, because it could bias results. The fear could interfere with drug effects, and skew the results. Most recent cult experimentation has been in the area of: drug effects: using different drugs, both alone and in new combinations and dosages, to induce trance states and open the person to training. Drugs are looked for which will shorten the time interval needed to induce trance state, which are quickly metabolized, and leave no detectable residues the next day.

Behavioral science: watching and recording data on different environmental parameters on human behavior. Modifying the environment.

Praise and punishment as motivators.

Isolation techniques: recording data both physiological and psychological from different isolation methods. Removing, adding, combining different methods of sensory isolation, and the effect of each.

Effectiveness of virtual reality in implanting programming.

Effectiveness of new disks created to put programming in. Cult graphics and computer experts will work to create better and more effective VR disks, which are tested on cult subjects for their effectiveness. The cult wants more and more standardization, and less room for human error and weakness, in its training techniques, which is why it is going more and more to high tech equipment and videos. Attempts to break programming, cause program failure; recording what is effective, what isn't and develop new sequences to prevent pf. Subjects under hypnosis are ordered to try and break certain internal programming sequences. The ways they go about this, and what seems effective, are shared with the trainers, who then create new programs to prevent degradation of programming from occurring.

Harmonic/light, sensory deprivation and over stimulation and the effects neurologically and physically. New combinations of sensory input are always being tested to see which achieve the most lasting results, and can be done rapidly.

The cult is always trying to find new, better, faster methods to break down subjects, put programming in, and prevent the programming from failing.

This has been the emphasis in most research it has done. The results of this research is shared worldwide, both by internet, phone calls, and international trainer conferences, where trainers worldwide share the results of what they are finding. New techniques are incorporated by other groups which are eager to find out what is being discovered.

Suggestions:

If you have experimental programming, realize that the alters who were used in it are heavily traumatized. They also will feel devalued, less than human, and this was reinforced heavily by the trainers who worked with them. They probably weren't used in initial experiments, as described above, but may have been used in second level experimentation.

I will explain what those terms mean.

Top trainers and leaders will initiate an experiment with a new drug. They will learn to triturate dosages, and record all observable facts on hundreds of subjects. After enough data is gotten, they will then clear it for use by trainers in local groups. It will then still be considered experimental, but will be second level, instead of first level experimentation. At this point, all trainers in local groups will be told to record and report any adverse reactions to the drug, any usual dosages needed, etc. This data is collected in databanks (yes, the cult is now in the computer age), inside of encrypted files, which will then be sent to a central base in Langley, Virginia.

Alters used in experiments, or told that they were experiments, need to realize they are valuable. They will need to realize they went through intense programming, and be allowed to vent and discuss their experiences. The fear related to believing they were an experiment needs to be vented appropriately. They will be angry at the dehumanization, intentionality, and coldness of what they went through, and quite rightly so. They may rail against the effects in their life now of the experiments and procedures they went through, and need to grieve over loss of body image; loss of trust in people; the sense of betrayal and helplessness that they felt during the procedures. They may want to journal, or draw pictures of their experiences.

A warm, empathetic therapist, who listens, and believes, and does not discount what they went through, is invaluable at this point. Allowing internal cognitives and helpers ground parts who went through bizarre sensory experiences, and creating "grounding committees" inside will also help. Extra support may be needed while dealing with experiences and feelings of this intensity.

Function Codes:

Trainers will place within the subject's systems a special way to organize the fragments that are related to the job they were trained to do. These are called Function Codes, and there are three main types:

Command Codes: these are irreversible commands, put in at the limbic level of conditioning. The first code always put in is the "halt " command, which stops the person in their tracks, and is the first code any new trainer learns. This will stop the subject from assassinating their trainer, if they have MK ULTRA or other assassin training in place.

Other command codes will include: system destruct codes (suicide); shatter codes; erasure codes; and antisuicide codes.

Access Codes: these are specialized codes, often coded into short messages, or numerical codes, that allow access into the person's system. A trainer will always begin a session by repeating the person's personal complete access code, which will allow authorized entry into the system without setting off booby traps and internal protectors. These codes may also depend and be set up on sight recognition and voice recognition of the person giving the codes. In other words, the system will respond to the codes only if a person who appears to be an authorized person, such as the person's trainer, gives them. This is to prevent unauthorized access or using of the person by others outside of the person's local cult group.

Function codes: these are the "job codes" or work codes within the system.

Often, several will be coded to link together to perform a task. These are usually a letter, such as a Greek alphabet letter, combined with a numeric sequence that corresponds to their place on the internal grid or landscape.

Suggestions:

If the survivor has function codes, or the other codes internally, it will help if the different system controllers can share these with the person. The person can then get to know the fragments, hear their history, and help them begin coalescing with other parts internally. It may help to find the template these codes were fragmented from, and help the template realize how they were traumatized to create these fragments.

About deprogrammers:

Often people who call themselves deprogrammers will attempt to find these codes and help the person. This is an individual decision of each survivor and therapist. There may be excellent deprogrammers, but I have always felt extreme caution, and never used one myself for two reasons:

1. I would never ever give away the locus of control away to an outside person again. It would remind me to much of my own abuse, and I believe the survivor should be self empowered in therapy as much as possible.

2. There are no quick cures, or miracles, or short cuts in the process of undoing the extensive amount of abuse that has occurred with Illuminati programming. Even the best deprogrammers will admit that after they are done, the person will usually have an idea of what was put in them, but must finish with years of therapy dealing with how they FEEL about the programming that was done. Illuminati programming takes YEARS to put in, with extensive, methodical abuse, and a realistic therapist will realize that it will take years of patience, support, and hard work by both therapist and survivor to undo a lifetime of conditioning and pain. This is not to say that deprogrammers don't help people; good, reputable, safe ones have been reported to be of great help. But the person can also undertake the process themselves of undoing their own programming, and often the survivor is the best "internal deprogrammer" of all. They know their inside people and what motivates them, better than anyone else.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged Shell Programming | 1 Comment »

Chapter Twelve: Preventing Reaccessing of the Survivor

September 29, 2008 by koniword

This is by far one of the most important chapters I have written in this book. Why?

Deprogramming cannot be consistently successful if the person is still in contact with the abusers. Survivors will take one step forward, then will find themselves knocked down internally. All the hard work in therapy will be undone or set back. They and their therapist will find that they have trouble finding internal alters. Whole systems may shut down. A child presenting system may come out. Confusers and scramblers will take over therapy sessions and blockers will block therapy.

No one chapter can ever be totally comprehensive in how to prevent reaccessing. What I will share are some of the more common ways that the cult and trainers will try to reaccess individuals, and give some techniques on avoiding this.

The cult has a vested interest in keeping its members. After all, it has spent generations telling its members that if they leave they will die, be killed, or go psychotic. It makes them quite unhappy to see someone who is quite alive and very clearly not psychotic leave. It also makes their more restive members question the truth of what they have been told if they see someone get out. Having a member leave may break the hold of some programming in other members. Trainers especially hate to see anyone leave, and grind their teeth over this problem at night. People leaving the cult is considered a training failure and the trainers may be punished severely.

So, the cult has come up with certain ways to keep their members with them, willingly or unwillingly. These include, but are not limited to:

E.T. phone home (phone programming) : the individual will have personalities whose sole job is to call and report to the trainer or cult leader. These are often young child alters who are eager to please, starved for attention and nurture, and who are heavily rewarded for calling back in. Any survivor who attempts to leave the cult must deal with the urge to phone home. To phone their abusers. To phone their friends who are in the group. To phone their parents, siblings, cousins, or aunts. This urge may become overwhelming at times and worst of all, the survivor may be totally amnesic to the fact that the people they are calling are cult members who are urging them, in code, to come back. Common phrases used include: your 'family' loves you, misses you, needs you. So and so is ill and needs to see you. You are so special to us. You are so valuable. You need to come see us. Why are you so distant? Why haven't we heard from you lately?

The list goes on and on. Sweet, kind phrases with double meanings, placed in the person during training sessions. Trainers are not stupid and know that if cult members said "come to the ritual meeting at midnight next week", the survivor would run the other way, and be validated as well that they are not making things up. So, they ingrain code messages behind innocuous phrases such as described above. These, and other messages, are meant to trigger recontact programming.

In recontact programming, (ALL ILLUMINATI MEMBERS HAVE RECONTACT PROGRAMMING, IT IS NEVER LEFT TO CHANCE) the person has parts whose only job is to have contact with their trainer or cult leader, or accountability person (person one step above them in the cult). These parts are heavily programmed under drugs, hypnosis, shock, torture, to have recontact. The individual will feel restless, shaky, weepy, afraid if they try to break this programming. It will often be linked or joined in to suicidal programming (see previous chapter for more on suicidal programming). They may experience PTSD symptomology, or even flood programming, and internal self punishment sequences, as they fight this programming internally.

Siblings are often cross trained to access each other with special codes. Remember when…. may initiate this. I love you, or, your family loves you, can also be used. Phrases will be individual, depending on the person's family members and background.

Certain clothing or jewelry worn can be used to draw a cult loyal system, such as a color coded system, or jewel system , to the front. The person must physically resemble the person the individual was "keyed into" during the programming sequence, to prevent inadvertent popping out of alters by anyone wearing a ruby pin, for example. This kind of cueing will be based on sight recognition of a person, plus the clothing color or jewelry being worn a certain way.

Phone calls from concerned family members, friends, and cult members will flood the survivor's phone lines and answering machine, especially during the initial getting out phase.

Hang up calls, three or six in a row, or calls where a series of tones are heard, may be used as cues to recall the individual and fire off internal programming.

Birthday, holiday or we miss you cards, or letters, may be sent with trigger codes imbedded in them.

Flowers with a certain number of flowers, or color may be sent. Daisies may fire off daisy programming internally.

The possibilities are almost endless, depending on the trainers, the group the person was with, and the people they are most bonded to in the cult. Special training sessions will be given, with code words and cues built into the system's programming.

If all else fails, hostility will start. "You don't love us" will be heard, even when the survivor has stated repeatedly that they care. Boundaries drawn with cult members will be misinterpreted as lack of concern, or withdrawal. Accusations, guilt, and anger as well as manipulation will be used as hooks to make the survivor feel guilty for withdrawing from the cult.

Isolation programming may activate, as the cult support system is withdrawn in the survivor's life, and they try the difficult task of developing healthy, appropriate relationships outside of the cult. Often, the therapist will be the survivor's lifeline and sole support at first. The individual may fall into codependent relationships quickly, or relationships with other survivors to fill the void in their life. At worst, desperate for caring and feeling isolated, they will make friends with the first kind person they meet. This person could be a cult set up, sent to initiate a friendship quickly. Survivors should be wary of "instant friendships" or instant bonding with others. Most good relationships take time and effort.

Suggestions:
One of the most difficult tasks, but most important safety wise, will be for a totally amnesic presenting system to realize who their abusers really are. It will seem unbelievable, when back parts come up in therapy, and disclose that beloved, or even barely tolerated family members are in the cult. Believing these parts and listening to them will be crucial to safety. Protectors will be important to the survivor's safety, especially if they are willing to give up cult allegiance and help keep the person safe. Outside accountability with safe persons is extremely important. The problem is that generational Illuminati survivors have often been surrounded all their lives by a network of other cult members. Unknown to them, their closest friends and family members are part of the group. Amnesia poses the greatest danger to the survivor in the beginning stages, as they will trust people before they remember that they are unsafe.

A survivor may remember the father taking them to rituals, and believe that their mother or grandparent is safe. Only later in therapy will they remember that mother or granny was actually their trainer, since the most painful memories tend to come later. The survivor may only remember ritual abuse in early childhood, and think they were let go at a certain age. This is extremely rare, since the group has put in years of effort into training them. Almost never will they just "let someone go" in generational families. But they may be given false or screen memories, especially if they are in therapy, to confuse the survivor and the therapist.

The client will need to listen to and believe internal parts who have more information than they do, and take appropriate steps to be safe. This will probably mean cutting off contact with perpetrators at this point. Again, outside accountability is paramount. Safe houses, a women's shelter or a safe church family may be alternatives. One of the worst things the survivor can do is isolate, or go out walking late at night alone, or go camping in the woods by themselves. Abduction will often occur in these scenarios, when the survivor is alone and vulnerable. Safe roommates can help keep the survivor safe.

Locking up the phone in the trunk of the car may help if phone programming is intense. This gives the survivor the chance to wake up or stop phone calls, if an alter has to get up, find the car keys, turn on the light, go outside, and open a car trunk, bring the phone inside and hook it up again before making a phone call.

Building a support system through safe support groups, a good therapist, church, or work can also help. Whenever possible and practical, moving away from the town or state where the survivor was active in the cult can help. Why? Remember the survivor's whole support network was the cult in their old town. The trainers and/or family members have invested time and effort into the survivor and have a big stake in their coming back. If the survivor moves far enough away, a cult group in the new city or state will not know them as well, and will not have a lengthy history with them. This can help decrease the chance of reaccessing by the cult, in conjunction with good therapy and a safe support network.

The survivor will have to rebuild their support system anyway, so why not do it as far as possible away from people they have known who might hurt them? It can be intensely triggering to the survivor to see their old trainer walking down the street towards them, and inside alters may destabilize or feel unsafe. This is one case where distance is good.

One caution though: even if the survivor moves, they will need to work intensely on blocking internal recontact programming at the same time, or they may be quickly reaccessed. Trainers will often send the person's system codes and grids over the internet to cult groups in the new city, and will try to send someone who physically resembles the trainer or a family member to initiate contact with the survivor.

Internal communication and letting inside alters know that they can change their jobs will help. Reward internal reporters for changing allegiance and committing to keep the survivor safe. The cult used to reward them for doing their job; now the survivor can reward them for changing jobs. Develop new interests, work or hobbies that can help the survivor meet new, safe people. The survivor may want to practice friendship skills in support groups, as long as they are run by reputable, safe therapists.

Be aware that holiday dates are often important dates for reaccessing. Calendars are available that show important holidays for SRA groups. Birthdays are also dates when the individual is expected to return and there may be programming surrounding this.

Callback programming (where the person is given a specific date or holiday when they are to return to the cult, or be punished) may need to be broken as well. Allowing the alters who went through the programming to share their memories, acknowledging their needs, and trying to meet those needs in healthy ways will bring healing.

The survivor will need to go through a period of grieving for loss of contact with family members and friends in the cult. No matter how abusive, how disliked, it can be very difficult to cut off with perpetrators, especially if they were the only people close to the survivor. The survivor needs to acknowledge the difficulty of creating a new, healthy, cultless support group. The survivor needs to recognize that learning new skills and developing healthy friendships will take time.

One issue often brought up by survivors is: how much do I tell others about my past? This is an individual decision that the survivor and therapist need to look at together. In general though, caution in sharing is best, since sharing too much about the survivor's past may draw the wrong people to them. These people may be dysfunctional, or possible cult members. It is usually best to base new, non cult friendships on healthy aspects of the person at first and very gradually share small bits of information as the friendship progresses, and sharing seems appropriate. With time and opportunities, the survivor will learn the importance of appropriate boundaries and will want healthier relationships in their life.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged Reaccessing of the Survivor | Leave a Comment »

Chapter Eleven: Suicidal Programming

September 29, 2008 by koniword

I have decided to write an entire chapter about suicidal programming, since it is often the most dangerous programming that the survivor will face during their healing process. ALL ILLUMINATI SURVIVORS WILL HAVE SUICIDAL PROGRAMMING PROTECTING THEIR SYSTEMS. I emphasized this to also reiterate the need for good therapy and a strong support system for the survivor.

The Illuminati know and realize that with time, individuals in their group may start to question what they are doing. Or they may become disenchanted with their role. They may even desire to leave the group or try to dismantle their own programming.

The trainers are well aware of this possibility and to prevent this, will always program in suicidality. The suicidality, or suicidal programming, may surround one or more systems internally. It may be layered into more than one system.

From earliest childhood, survivors have been conditioned to believe that they would rather die than leave their "family" (the Illuminati group). This is the core, or basis of suicidal programming. It will be closely linked to loyalty to one's family as well as the group (remember, this is a generational group and leaving it may mean giving up contact with one's parents, spouse, siblings, aunts, uncles, cousins and children, as well as close friends). These people will all try to contact the survivor, and try to draw them back into the cult, asking "don't you love us anymore?", or even becoming accusatory and hostile if the survivor does not respond the way they wish. The survivor will be told that they are "crazy". Or delusional. That their family loves them and would never be part of a cult. The family members will all still be amnesic, unless something happens to trigger their own memories.

One of the most frequent suicidal programming sequences placed internally will be "come back or die " programming. A family member may activate it by telling the survivor that they are missed and their family wants to see them. If the survivor fails to return, the programming will start running. It can only be deactivated by a code word from the person's trainer or cult contact person. This ensures that they will recontact. If the survivor tries to break this programming, they will need assistance, both internal and external, for safety.

Hospitalization may be needed in a safe facility that understands DID and programming, as well as suicidality, as the alters inside will begin fighting if the person tries to break the programming. They have been programmed to commit suicide, or be shattered internally, or at the very least, severely punished, and are afraid of the repercussions of not obeying. The survivor will need to get to know these internal alters, and reassure them that they no longer need to do their jobs.

Chronometric suicidal programming is another type placed within. This does not need contact with family members to activate. In fact, it is activated automatically after a certain amount of time WITHOUT cult contact. Controller alters and/or punishing alters will have been programmed that if a certain period of time goes without contact with the trainer, they are to commit suicide. They will be told that the only way to prevent this is recontact with the trainer, who knows a command code to halt the program. The time interval may be anywhere from three months to nine months, each system is different. Call back programming may have this type of programming as a back up, to ensure that it is followed through on.

Systems layered programming is a particularly complex form of suicide programming where several systems (up to six at a time), are programmed to fire off suicide programming simultaneously. This always needs hospitalization for the survivor's safety.

Honor/dishonor programming is common in military systems. In this, the military parts are told that an "honorable and courageous" soldier will take his life, rather than reveal secrets or leave his unit.

"No tell" programming will often be reinforced by suicidal programming.

Access denied programming, which prevents unauthorized access both externally and internally, will often be reinforced by either or both suicidal/homicidal programming.

Almost all suicidal programming is put in place to either ensure continued obedience to the cult's agenda; to ensure regular recontact; or prevent the individual or an outside person from accessing the person's system without authorization (i.e. the correct access codes, which the trainers are careful to use at the beginning of each session). It will frequently block therapy, as the survivor will be terrified, and rightly so, of dying if they reveal their internal world, or disclose their history.

Suggestions:
First, both the survivor and the therapist need to find out what suicide programming is present (it's a safe bet it's there, no need to ask IF it is present). Internal communication, and finding out which alters or fragments hold suicide programming will be important. Physical safety, whether with a safe outside person, or inpatient hospitalization, while working on suicide programming is extremely important, as this programming may either drive the survivor to self destructive behavior, or back to the cult. Dealing with suicide programming assumes that the survivor and therapist have initiated good system communication internally. This is extremely important, since the survivor will need cooperation inside with dismantling suicidality.

Letting alters inside know that they no longer have to do their job, that they can change, may help. Reality orientation, letting them know that if they kill the body, that they will die, may also help (many times, these parts have been deceived into believing that they themselves will not die, if they do their jobs. This means they need to hear the truth). Having controller alters, high alters with pull inside the system, agree to help the therapist dismantle the programming will help. But be aware that SOME INTERNAL SUICIDE SEQUENCES WILL BE PUT IN THAT EVEN CONTROLLERS CANNOT DISMANTLE. Creating a safety committee inside whose main job is to keep the body safe and ask for help if suicidal programming begins to kick in, BEFORE ACTING OUT OCCURS, will also help tremendously.

As the survivor develops trust with their therapist and realizes the value of life, and that life can be much better than it has ever been before, they will become more willing to reach out and ask for help if they become suicidal. The survivor may also find that they encounter core despair. This despair may have been used by the cult to run suicidal programming, but it is not programming itself. A very young core split may have taken many of the feelings of despair, hopelessness, failure to thrive and desire to die, that the child felt growing up in a horribly abusive atmosphere. This is not programming but true feelings, and it will be important to differentiate this from programming. If core despair comes up, the alter containing this may also report having been trained to NOT SUICIDE, or give up. The trainers will do this, if despair begins overwhelming the subject at an early age, to prevent the child's suicide.

The survivor's cognitives, helpers, nurturers, will all need to be gathered together to help this part of the core heal. There will be intense, and rightful, grieving and anguish for the immense pain that the young child suffered. Hopelessness will come out. It can help if alters with happier memories can try and share their memories with this very young part. External support and caring can also make a big difference. Healing the immense pain held by this core split will take a long period of time and should not be hurried. Antidepressants can help, as the depression may be shared through all systems. Messages of hope, new and positive experiences can all help the survivor work through this type of programming, as well as journaling, poetry, artwork and collaging the feelings. Time, patience, support, the ability to vent feelings in a safe manner and physical safety when needed, will all help immensely as the survivor works through these issues.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged suicidal programming | Leave a Comment »

Chapter Ten: The Sixth step of Discipline: Betrayal; Twinning, Internal walls, Structures, Geometry

September 29, 2008 by koniword

This chapter will address the sixth step of discipline in the Illuminati:

Betrayal programming.

Betrayal programming will begin in infancy, but will be formalized at around ages six to seven, and continue on into adulthood. The sixth step can be summarized as : "betrayal is the greatest good." The Illuminists teach this to their children as a very important spiritual principle. They idealize betrayal as being the true state of man. The quick witted, the adept, learns this quickly and learns to manipulate it.

The child will learn this principle through set up after set up. The child will be placed in situations where an adult who is kindly, and in set up after set up "rescues" the child, gains its trust. The child looks up to the adult as a "savior" after the adult intervenes and protects the child several times. After months or even a year of bonding, one day in a set up the child will turn to the adult for help. The adult will back away, mocking the child, and begin abusing it. This sets in place the programming: adults will always betray a child and other adults.

Another set up will involve twinning, which deserves special mention here. The Illuminati will often create twin bonds in their children. The ideal is to have a set of real twins, but of course this is not always possible. So, the child is allowed to play with, and become close to, another child in the cult from earliest childhood. At some point early on, the child will be told that the other child is actually their "twin", and that they were separated at birth. They are told that this is a great secret and not to tell anyone, on pain of punishment. The child, who is often lonely and isolated, is overjoyed. It has a twin, someone who has a special bond to them by birth.

The children do everything together. They are taught together, do military training together. They tell each other secrets. They are also frequently friends in the daytime as well. They are taught to cross access each other just as real siblings would be.

But at some point, they will be forced to hurt each other. If one "twin" is considered expendable, the ultimate set up will be one in which one twin is forced to die while the other watches. One twin may gather secrets from the other twin, be forced to disclose them to a trainer or cult leader, then may be forced to kill the other. One twin may be forced to hit, or hurt the other. If they refuse, the other twin will be brutalized by the trainer, and the refusing twin told that the child was hurt because of their refusal to comply. Many setups will involve one twin being forced to betray the other, turning on the other child after intense programming. This betrayal set up will devastate both children, and they will learn the true lesson: trust no one. Betray, or be betrayed.

The children will also have adult role models on every hand, since the cult is a very political, hierarchical, back stabbing society. Adults are constantly betraying each other, stepping over each other to move up. The children will watch one adult being praised, advanced, because they betrayed others below them, or set them up to fail. The children will learn quickly to mimic the adults around them, and both adults and children can become quite cynical as to human nature. They will have seen it at its worst, whether in training sessions, the brutality of a C.O. in military, or the gossip and back stabbing that occurs before and after rituals. They also incorporate the message internally: play the game, or be run over. Even the youngest children learn to manipulate others adeptly, at a very young age, while the adults laugh at how quickly they are learning adult ways. People manipulation is considered a fine art in the cult, and those who do it best, as in any group, often win out.

Suggestions:
Betrayal programming may have totally shattered the survivor's trust in outside people. It will take a therapist a long, long time to gain the survivor's trust. These are people who were taught over and over again that talking, sharing one's secrets, would be punished harshly. Inside littles will be very cautious at first, not trusting that the therapist is not just another trainer who will one day shout "aha!" and betray them if they begin to trust. This trust building takes time and patience, and must be earned through session after session where the therapist shows trustworthiness and non abusiveness. Survivors will test therapists over and over again, to see if they really are what they say they are. This is a normal part of the therapy process. Survivors may even try to back away from therapy, or outside support, as true caring support will "wig them out", i.e. conflict incredibly with their world view and experiences prior to leaving the cult.

Both survivor and therapist need to realize that some amount of distrust is healthy, based on what the survivor has experienced, and may be life saving, helping to protect them from outside accessing. Honor this need and be patient while the survivor tests over and over. The survivor can try to reason with inside alters who may have been betrayed to the point of legitimate paranoia. They may ask them to watch, and see what the therapist, and/or support person is like. To take their time, check them out. To be aware that what they went through may magnify normal feelings of caution. Helping orient these parts to outside reality, and especially positive experiences of trusting a little, and not being harmed, will help make great strides in undoing this. The survivor may feel confusion and internal conflict, as they experience a world where trust is possible. They may pull away, or the reverse, become highly dependent on the therapist and share too quickly due to a longing for safe intimacy that has never been met. Setting healthy boundaries while acknowledging needs will help the survivor through this stage.

Another type of programming involves the deliberate creation of internal structures within the cult member.

Internal structures: temples, eyes, mirrors, carousels etc.

The Illuminati trainers will try to create internal structures within the person's personality systems. Why? They believe this creates better stability. It also gives the alters and fragments a place to "hang on to" inside, and creates a convenient way to call them up. If a fragment is indexed inside to an internal helix, for example, the trainer knows how to locate them more easily.

Internal structures will vary greatly depending on the trainer, the group, the region of the U.S. or Europe and the goals for the individual. Common internal structures will include, but are not limited to:

Temples: these are often consecrated to principle Illuminati deities, and spiritual alters will congregate here. This may represent actual temples, Masonic or private, that the subject may have visited.

Temple of Moloch will be created out of black stone with a fire burning internally.

All seeing eye of Horus: one of the most common structures in an Illuminati system; universal. Horus is a deity revered by the Illuminati, and the all seeing eye internally represents the fact that the cult can always see what the individual is doing. It will also represent being given to Horus in a high ceremony. The eye may be closed, or open, depending on the system's status at the time. This eye will also be linked to demonic watching of the person's activities at all time.

Pyramids: the Illuminati revere ancient Egyptian symbology, especially "mystery religion" and Temple of Set teachings. Pyramids will be placed internally both for stability (a triangle, and/or pyramid represents strength and stability), and as a calling place for the demonic. Pyramids and triangles, and the number three, represent calling up the demonic in Illuminist philosophy.

Sun: represents Ra, the sun god

Geometric figures: configurations of circles, triangles, pentagons, etc. Geometric patterns are considered sacred, and are based in ancient philosophy. There may be hundreds overlapping in a training grid for complex systems, which will house fragments in each one.

Training grids: these may be simplistic, such as cubes with patterns on them, rows of boxes, or more complex such as helixes, double helixes, infinity loops. Each trainer will have favorites classified as simple, medium and complex, depending on the child and its ability to recall and memorize.

Columns: Greek Doric, ionic columns. Often hold "time travel" programming, with a portal between two columns.

Computers: complex, highly dissociated systems with alters and fragments held within a computer system.

Robots: may be seen in older systems

Crystals: gems, balls, multifaceted. Used in spiritual systems to enhance occult powers. Alters and fragments may congregate on facets of a large ball.

Mirrors: used internally to reinforce other programming sequences, internal twinning, and distortion of reality programming. May create shadow systems of functional systems. May also lock in demonic programming.

Carousels: used in some programming sequences to confuse alters inside. Often linked to spin, confusion programming internally. May be used to punish internal alters; they will be spun on the carousel if they tell.

Deck of cards: this can include cards from a deck, or complex configurations made of hundreds of card inside. Dominoes programming is similar. All touch each other and if person tries to dismantle programming, the deck will "fall".

Black boxes: represent self destruct and shatter programming sealed off into a black box to protect system. Should not be opened without careful preparation and good therapy.

Mines, booby traps: see above

Spider webs: represent linked programming, with a spider (internal programmer) who continuously reweaves the web and reinforces internal programming and punishments. The web also communicates with other systems. Can also represent demonic linkages internally, woven in.

Internal training rooms: used as punishments for internal alters. Will represent external training rooms person has been in.

Internal walls: these will often represent very large internal amnesia barriers. The walls may be very thick, impermeable or semi permeable. A typical use for a wall will be to maintain high levels of amnesia between "front" or daily living, amnesic alters, and "back" or cult active alters that contain more of the person's life history. The back may be able to selectively see over and cross past the wall, but the front will be completely unaware that there is a wall, or what lays behind it.

Seals: usually in a group of six or seven, represent demonic sealing, and may cover end times, shatter programming, as well as role within cult in new hierarchy.
These are some common programming structures. Again, there are many, many other types of internal structures used and the number and type are only limited by the trainer's and survivor's creative abilities. The way that these structures are placed within the person are fairly similar. Under drugs, hypnosis and electroshock, the person is traumatized into a deep trance state. In the deep trance they will be told to open their eyes and look at: either a projected image of the structure, a 3D model of it, or a holographic image using a virtual reality headset. The image will be ground in, using shock and bringing the image closer and closer to the person's visual field. It may be rotated, if graphics are available, or a 3D is used. They may be told that they are entering inside it, if it is a temple or pyramid, under deep hypnosis, that they (the alter being programmed) will now "live inside" the structure/box/card, etc. This will also be used to reinforce amnesia and isolation programming internally, since the structure will be used to reinforce walls between the alter/ fragment and other alters and fragments internally.

Suggestions:
If the survivor finds structures inside, it will help for them first of all to try and realize WHY they are there. What purpose do they serve? To reinforce amnesia? Isolation? spiritual programming? punishment? To hold dangerous programming sequences? This is important, since some structures such as internal walls or barriers may have been created not only by the cult, but reinforced by the survivor as well, as a means of internal protection. The survivor may not want to dismantle internal structures too quickly without knowing their purpose and what they contain. Both the survivor and the therapist will need to go slowly. Learning how the structures were put in and which alters are linked to the structure, will be a first step. Long, slow and careful preparation, with lots of system cooperation, will be needed to look at some structures. This may only come after years of extensive therapy. Each survivor will progress at their own pace. If a wall is present, taking it down slowly, one brick at a time, or allowing part of it to become semi permeable, may be first steps in healing. Training rooms can have the equipment turned off and dismantled; it can be turned into a safe room, redecorated and refitted with toys and safe objects. Computers can slowly begin to realize that they are human, and gradually allowed to take on human characteristics.

Survivors can use their creativity to reclaim themselves, with the support of their therapists, and undo what was done.

Posted in The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People | Tagged Betrayal programming | Leave a Comment »

Svali Speaks!

The Life of Svali – an Ex-Illuminati Mind Control Programmer

SVALI IS ALIVE! – Update on her Whereabouts

October 11, 2008 by koniword

Welcome to Svali Speaks!

This is a blog dedicated to Svali, who is/was a former mind control programmer for the Illuminati. She was groomed from birth to have a key role in the Illuminati and back in the 1980's was forced against her will to marry another generational Illuminati member. They had two children from this marriage and they also were raised and tortured by the cult until Svali fled the cult in the early 1990's.

She was severely warned by the cult to keep quiet about her past. She had been writing and speaking out against the cult and their activities. She has not been heard from since November, 2006.

There is no known verifiable evidence of her being alive or has there been any known contact with Svali by anyone that I know of. All traces of her have disappeared. I am a personal friend of Svali's and I have not been able to reach her or find out where her husband or children are. She and her family have vanished. If you have any information on the whereabouts of Svali please leave me a comment with your email address and I will contact you. Thanks!

It is my desire that no matter what happened to Svali I want her writings to be available online for everyone to read. As you read them you will sense the validity of her story. I know Svali was telling the truth as I saw the struggle she went through to break free from the cult. Her story lives on through these writings.

(This is Svali's intro from other sites posted several years ago. She has not been heard from since November, 2006)

About the author:

Hi, my name is Svali. Both I and my entire family were involved in a cult group until several years ago, when we broke free. I used to be a programmer in the Privacy & Cookies: This site uses cookies. By continuing to use this website, you agree to their use.

To find out more, including how to control cookies, see here: Cookie Policy

Close and accept

freedom.

I have been a consultant to an on-line survivors group that helps people dealing

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com

Search

Categories

Interview with Svali – The Illuminati in America
Mind Control Programming Articles by Svali
Multiple Personalities – Brokenness
Other Authors
Other Illuminati Articles by Svali
Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali
Svali Answers Questions
Svali's Personal Life
The Illuminati: How the Cult Programs People

Betrayal programming brain wave programming color programming Complex Polyfragmentation cult Cult Abuse Cult Safety Cult Secrecy Denial Programming DID dissociation end times Illuminati plan end times scenario Escaping from the Cult government programming Having needs Healing from Ritual Abuse Hiding from the Cult History of Ritual Abuse Illuminati bankers Illuminati jobs jewel

amming
D Origin of the Illuminati
programming programming

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.

Svali Speaks!

with issues related to cult programming and becoming free, for the past year and a half. I myself have been in therapy for ritual abuse and DID for nine years, with the last five being aware of the recent cult abuse.

I am also a writer, and a registered nurse. I currently work as a diabetic educator in Texas 20 hours a week.

I have also self-published a book on breaking free of cult programming, which several experts in the field have said has "invaluable information" for the survivor of ritual abuse.

Both my ex-husband and my two children broke free of cult abuse last year. My children are living with me while my husband is working on healing. They all have DID (dissociative identity disorder, formerly known as multiple personality disorder) as well, which makes life at home interesting! I am currently married to my second husband, who is also a recovered DID and who got out of the cult five years ago.

I am a survivor of both ritual abuse and governmental mind control. My greatest hope in sharing on these pages is that the information will be helpful to others in breaking free of coercive cult control and help them realize that it is really possible to become free. My other goal is to help educate therapists and supporters of survivors so that they can better understand what survivors have gone through, and things that have helped others in their healing journey. – Svali

Svali on: Healing from the Trauma of Cult Programming

Ritual abuse is the systematic, continued, repetitive abuse of both children and adults by either an individual or a group. It can involve psychological, sexual, physical, and spiritual abuse. This abuse is often done in the name of promoting an agenda, or a group's religious idealogy.

The victims of ritual abuse are often children, although adults are often abused as well. The victim is an unwilling accomplice in the perpetrator's goals, although they may eventually learn to comply with, and even learn to perpetrate themselves as they grow older. Increasing numbers of survivors of ritual abuse are beginning to speak out, to give voice to the atrocities which occur. Whether the survivor was traumatized within an organized group, or by individuals, they must often overcome years of conditioning to be silent in order to speak and disclose their abuse. This abuse may have included torture, mind control, cult programming, or other methodologies to ensure the victim's silence.

This page is dedicated to the bravery and courage of these people who are in the process of breaking free from cult abuse. To the courageous adults and children who are overcoming fear, and disclosing what their lives have been like. May others learn that they, too, can become free.

The Importance of Overcoming Denial

Often times it is much easier for the average person to look away when the subject of ritual abuse comes up. To believe that it is extremely rare. Or even to wonder if it is real, in spite of the extensive documentation that has been done that proves its existence. For more information on this subject, please go to some of the links provided on this page.

Ritual abuse is not going to go away, in spite of the desire of many to minimize its impact both on the survivor community, and their supporters. The more people become aware of this problem, the more hope that this type of abuse can be stopped, and that no more children will be wounded in the war that is being waged for their hearts and souls.

There is currently legislation that has been passed in six states outlawing ritual abuse, with other states pending. Legislators are becoming educated in the reality of this type of abuse, and are beginning to take measures to ensure that it is stopped.

techniques Reaccessing of the Survivor Remembering Abuse Ritual Abuse Roots of the Illuminati Shell Programming Spiritual Abuse Spiritual Programming suicidal programming Survivors of Ritual Abuse Svali is Alive Svali is dead Svali is missing Svali is Safe Svali poem Svali questions techniques Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse Therapists VR programming

There have been extensively documented cases of ritual abuse which have gone to court and been proven. Anyone who denies the reality has not read the current literature available on the subject. (See links for further info)

Resources for Ritual Abuse and Mind Control Please note that all of the sources below can be found on line. I regret that MSN will not allow the URLs to copy here (the editing tool erases them automatically). You may look up the addresses by typing in the name in any web search engine.

A.C.A.A. (American Coalition for Abuse Awareness) Mailing Address: ONE VOICE, PO Box 27958, Washington DC 20038-7958 Phone: (202) 667-1160

A.C.H.E.S.-M.C. (Advocacy Committee for Human Experiment Survivors – Mind Control)

I.S.S.D. (International Society for the Study of Dissociation) now ISST-D (International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation) Mailing address: 4700 W. Lake Ave., Glenview IL 60025 Phone: (847) 375-4715

M.A.S.A. (Mothers Against Sexual Abuse) Contact: Claire Reeves Mailing address: 503-1/2 S. Myrtle Ave., Suite 9, Monrovia CA 91016 Phone: (818) 305-1986

Sidran Foundation A non-profit organization aiming to raise awareness about dissociative disabilities and multiplicity.

Survivorship.org An international publication and organization for survivors of ritualistic abuse, mind control, and torture.

Ritual Abuse Ritual Crime and Healing

Persons Against Ritual Abuse Torture

North American Freedom Foundation

Posted in Svali's Personal Life | Tagged end times Illuminati plan, end times scenario, Svali is Alive, Svali is dead, Svali is missing, Svali is Safe, Svali poem | 12 Comments »

The European Roots of the Illuminati

September 30, 2008 by koniword

Until recently, I have mainly written about programming and methods to work through and attempt to resolve it. But as I am working on my own healing, I am coming to realize that while breaking programming is important (and often life-saving), that eventually it becomes important to deal with core issues. Core issues go beneath and behind programming, and often not only drive it, but sabotage the therapy process as the survivor attempts to heal.

These issues will be different for each survivor, since we each have a unique history. I have received emails from survivors from around the world, and have found that: *The Illuminati is certainly not the only occult group in the world; there are many other well-organized groups that do methodic, repetitive abuse of an occult nature. But in these groups, often the core issues are different than for the Illuminati *Even within the Illuminati, each individual will need to discover their own personal history, since parentage, bloodlines, and programming methods will differ, as well as the child's eventual role in the group. This article is not meant to address all methods, or all survivor's histories in the group.

I can't speak for everyone who was abused in the group; I can only speak of what I myself am discovering about my own personal history, in the hopes that it will help other survivors through either validation, or to help supporters better understand some of the issues that they face during the process of remembering and healing.

The Illuminati are based in Europe, which is where their power base has always been. I remember being told as a young child that America was basically considered their "mission field" or the "land of opportunity" by those whose roots extend for hundreds of years or more into the ancient European dynastic bloodlines.

This is why their power hierarchy around the world, whether in the U.S., Asia, Australia, Canada, or elsewhere will always point back to Europe, where the 13 rulers (they also call them "lords") are based. Each ruler represents an area of Europe held under his sway; and each one represents an ancient dynastic bloodline.

For example, the Hapsburg bloodline (Merovingian) is still active in Europe, although hidden, as well as the Rothschild and Battenberg bloodlines . In many modern European countries, the heirs of these bloodlines are immensely wealthy, and secretly are the "power behind the throne", if not the actual rulers.

This is one reason why those of high Illuminati rank/descent in the U.S., for example, can always trace their bloodline or parentage to members of this ruling cabal in Europe; members of leadership councils in the States are always direct descendants, whether legitimate or illegitimate.

Whether at the lowest levels, or the highest, though, this group operates with the same methods: instilling intense fear and terror to control their members. Often this is done through the fear of death, and at the core level, the person who has undergone their training will have an immense fear of dying because of the "death and resurrection" experiences, or near death experiences, that they have undergone.

During these experiences, the very young child or even infant core will be faced with intolerable choices: to allow themselves to be extinguished, or to embrace the demonic and the beliefs of those in their bloodline parentage. I believe this is dissociation at its deepest level, since the desire to survive is one of the deepest instincts that God has given us, and will override intellect, cognition, and even well-thought out beliefs in an adult-much less in a very young child. When faced with certain death and terror, or life, albeit at a price that is much too high, the infant or child almost always chooses life (I have never heard of one that hasn't to date, although my own knowledge and experience are limited).

Then the one who offers life to the infant becomes their "savior", and worshipped virtually as a deity in the child's mind and heart for "saving" them in one of the most wicked set ups imaginable.

In many cases, this is one of the child's parents, and most often, their biological father. The biological father may not be the person that the child consciously remembers raising them during childhood; and once again, this encourages deep dissociation: the consciously remembered "Daddy" may not be the survivor's real father.

Identity confusion is also layered in. The name the child goes by during the daytime may be quite different from their "real" name, or even the name on their birth certificate. A child of high lineage may discover that they weren't born in the United States, but in Europe, if the ties to the European bloodlines are great enough; or even that their American birth certificate was forged, to cover their European one.

Each situation is different, and different bloodlines practice different methods of raising, mentoring, and training their offspring. For instance, those of German descent may be taken to Germany, and spend time with those of this bloodline learning the ways of this country, and developing a loyalty to what they consider their "true homeland", before going back to another country to live under a different identity. Because above all else, children are called back to their European roots at frequent intervals to develop loyalty to their family home and name, and to undergo ceremonies meant to instill terror and ongoing cooperation, alternated with loving bonding experiences meant to instill deep love for the parental figures.

A child may live in Japan, but they will always know that their true home is in Germany or France; the child in Canada may know that their true home is the U.K., or Russia, and the child in the U.S. will long to return to "home" in Europe with the loyalty that is instilled, whether "home" is Germany, Bavaria, France, Moscow, the UK, Spain, or another country ruled by one of the 13.

This terror, this training, and the bonds of not only loyalty, but caring and nurturing that the child experienced through their true parentage, are often the most difficult and insidious to break. Deep terror combined with loving rescue and nurture create deep loyalty through trauma bonding, and breaking these ties at the core level is the most difficult task that many survivors face.

My prayer is that by explaining some, it can help others know that this does occur, which is the first step to uncovering it and working on it. I believe that deep prayer and support from others are the only methods of both uncovering these ties, and of breaking their hold. I am still working on these issues, and welcome others to share their experiences of undoing the hold of loyalty at this core level to the original perpetrators, and of breaking the spiritual and emotional ties to them. I will be more than happy to publish here anonymously any articles on this topic, as an encouragement to others who are breaking ties to the power centers in Europe. Because, ultimately, these men must lose in their bid for power. Scripture tells us that there is only one king on the throne: Jesus Christ, and that eventually, even the European roots of the Illuminati and their coming "prince" or antichrist, will be cut down, when Christ reigns over the earth.

Blessings to you, Svali

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Tagged Origin of the Illuminati, Roots of the Illuminati | 2 Comments »

Q & A: Svali Answers Readers' Questions – Parts 1+2

September 30, 2008 by koniword

Q: Can the Illuminati's family trees be traced back to specific towns in Europe?

A: Yes, and this depends on the branch. There is the German branch, the French branch, the UK branch, and the Russian branch. Each has roots in different areas of Europe. The towns of central Germany and Austria were the beginning for the German branch. They trace their roots from the Knights Templar who united the European nations during the crusades.

Q: Do they consider the Christian God real, but a liar?

A: The Illuminati believe in the deification of men through knowledge. They know that there are supernatural beings who help them in this process, but they don't necessarily divide things into "good and bad", rather "enlightened" or "unenlightened". They believe that the Christian God is real, but that adherents of Christianity are one step short of enlightenment, that they do not know the "full picture" as they do. They see Christians as sheep who follow a nice story created to help them feel better, because they are "too weak" to want to know the "full truth". (This is what an illuminist would say in describing the difference). They tend to be cynical towards the Christian God, to see him as a placebo for the weak.

Q: Do they consider their own god a liar, even if for "good"? If so, how do they trust their god?

A: They do not consider their gods (they have several) as liars. These "gods" have given them power, wealth, status, and everything that they have asked for. Yes, at a price, a horrible price, but they believe that nothing comes cheaply, and the higher the price they have paid, the more they value the gift. It is hard to explain this type to thinking to someone outside the group, because mainstream society wants to see them as evil satanists, and opposed to Christianity. They themselves wouldn't put it quite that way. Oh, they will mock and downgrade Christianity, but only because they want its followers to see that they are the 'deceived ones". The god of this world has truly blinded their eyes. Do they "trust" their gods? As much as they trust anything. Remember, trust is not a concept in this group, where "betrayal is the greatest good" is a maxim taught since childhood. If you asked them, do you"trust" your deity, they would look puzzled, and say, "only a foolish person trusts what they cannot know" or some other maxim.

Q: Do they consider the Christian God to be a God of naive love?

A: Yes, yes, very naive, and setting His followers up for a fall. This is the extent of their arrogance.

Q: If they use torture and terror on those they love who are of lower rank, how do they distinguish between love and hate?

A: They don't. They tell their children as they are torturing them, "I am doing this because I love you." To them, the greatest love is to make a child strong, and fit to lead or to move higher in the group, by whatever means it takes.

If a leader sees a child, and wants it as a prostitute, the loving parents will give it away, happy that their child will rise in status. Also, again, they view betrayal as the greatest good. They will do set up after set up to teach their children to never openly trust others.

I remember hundreds of agonizing set ups and betrayals, and hearing when I was betrayed or wounded, "And such is the heart of man." Those doing this to me thought they were teaching me something of value, that would help me. And because of the vicious and political nature of the group, in one sense they were right; the naive get stepped on and wounded. I have known parents who tried to spare their children some of this out of love, but often they were overuled by other family members, who viewed these parents as "weak" and "unfit" to teach their child.

Q: Can you list their religious beliefs in some detail? e.g. re-incarnation? Heaven and hell? Sin? Absolution? Elves?

A: Which part? Spiritual has many branches, including: celtic druidism, rosicrucianism, Babylonian mystery religion, Egyptian mysteries, and traveling the planes. A child will have to learn each of these disciplines, and others, as part of their training. They also have theta, or psychic training, as well.

The Illuminati have taken the best (or worst) of each of these religions, and incorporated them. Also, there is NOT just ONE religion that every group follows. In Washington DC, my main trainers were celtic druids and adherents of babylonian mystery religion. In San Diego,the Egyptian mystery religion is emphasized, in part because Col. Aquinos oversees that group, and is heavily into Temple of Set.

Here is a brief overview, doing my best to incorporate these beliefs. They believe that reincarnation is possible, because of the time travel that they do, but they don't emphasize it in their teachings. They believe in a final sphere of white light, which to them is total enlightenment, and their concept of heaven. They believe that they are immune from hell, which is for the unenlightened. Their concept of hell is different than the Bible's; they believe that it means being lower and never reaching higher in the afterlife (they believe there are levels there, too, determined by how one progresses here on earth).

To them, sin is being weak or stupid, and not using the intelligence or abilities you were given, or failing to progress. I never heard any discussion of absolution. If you fail, you are punished or killed. That simple. There is some belief in elves, sprites, and other small beings in the druidic branch, who also see life in each of nature's creations.

Q: Some researchers claim that various items that people are commonly exposed to in society are part of the means to weaken their enemies. Therefore, I wonder if the Illuminati allow their own leading members to be exposed to these, i.e. the following:
a. chlorine and fluoride in water and foods;
b. vaccines;
c. medical drugs;
d. junk food;
e. microwaved food;
f. dietary supplements;
g. biochips;
h. mercury fillings;
i. HAARP;
j. chemtrails?

A: In general, true leadership is protected from much of the above. They are ORDERED to not: drink, do drugs, or anything harmful to themselves. They don't go as far as junk food or microwaved food, since they don't worry about that, but at meetings, healthy food such as granola or trail mix are given out during exercises, and they know the importance of good nutrition.

They will NOT put their top leaders through the extensive use of mind control experimentation, or implants, etc. because of the risk involved. These children and adults ARE dissociative, but they go through a special program that is different than for the lower levels. They do get vaccines, since even if the child became ill, a healer could fix them. And they do take medications if needed, such as antibiotics, etc.

Do they claim to use vaccines or medical drugs for genocide? I had not heard that when I was in the group. Everyone I knew was vaccinated and took medications, although vitamins and good diet were also important.

Q: Some claim that Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, Charismatics, Pagans, the New Age Movement, Satanists, etc. were founded by the same plotters. Are these groups, or at least their leaders, considered allies of the Illuminati by their members?

A: Some of these groups have affiliated themselves secretly with the Illuminati (because of the money and free training offered), others are sympathetic, or at the least, respectful of them. The Mormons affiliated years ago in a meeting with Illuminati leadership in the 1950s. The same with the Jehovah's Witnesses. I have not heard that Charismatics or Pagans were affiliated, the pagans are considered "dabblers" by the Illuminati. The New Age and Satanists are sympathetic to them.

Q: Do they respect real science or history in favor of "faith" in their own beliefs?

A: No. They will respect science, but they will try to rewrite history in set ups and dramas for children (where they purport to show them "real history" behind the scenes). Also, they will do time travel through portals, but I cannot say how accurate what occurs is, since I believe it is facilitated demonically.

The Illuminati teach their children that powerful occultists who were enlightened have been secretly behind the thrones of Europe, and down the ages behind the kingdoms of this world, since time began. True or propaganda? I don't know. They teach their children that underneath Stonehenge there is a great room filled with the skeletons of sacrifices. Fact or fiction? I don't know, and cannot fund the archeological expedition it would take to verify this or not.

How accurate their teachings are, I do question, since they also leave out the role of faith in God, and His ability to hold back evil. I believe that ultimately, God has been in control of human history, not evil.

Q: I'm very concerned about the New World Order scheme and my questions are meant to help me find possible ways to proceed in helping to defeat the scheme.

A: I know I sound cynical, but good luck! I really do wish you the best in this. I believe that it would take a LOT of people joining together, with immense wealth and excellent lawyers, to stop them.

I personally do not have any experience with any groups dedicated to stopping them, since I live in a small rural community and have no contacts of this nature. I do wish any groups dedicated to stopping this horrific abuse of small children the very best, and will pray that they succeed. But this is also a spiritual battle, and anyone who takes on this type of occult evil would also need to be aware of spiritual warfare. The Illuminists certainly use it against others, and anyone stepping into this arena without prayer would be very vulnerable, in my opinion.

Q: Have you considered starting a 12 step group like AA for ritual abusers and cult victims? I know from personal experience that the spiritual 12 step program works.

A: I believe that there are already groups such as this out there. I know that there are AA groups for incest survivors, and many also have branched off into RA [Ritual Abuse] support as well. Since I live in a rural area (population 100 unless you count the squirrels and cows), I would not be close enough to lead any groups such as this. They are usually found near large metropolitan areas. In fact, I drive two hours once a month to therapy, since that is the closest to where I live.

Q: Were you allowed to read and listen to what you wanted while you were in the Illuminati, or was everything censored? If it wasn't censored, it seems like members could notice that Illuminati teachings about betrayal being a human attribute are false. Right?

A: Wrong. I was never censored what I read, but you have to understand their mind set. As a small child, my parents told me that everyone was secretly a member of this group, and that the daytime was a "facade" or "pretense' that all maintain.

They would take me to friends' houses for dinner, and afterwards a ritual would occur, so I believed them. I grew up since infancy believing that this was just how the world operated for all: people act one way in the daytime, another at night. I knew that there was mention of love, caring, and trust in books, but believed it was a "daytime" quality, and that the people who wrote of these things were writing from their daytime personas.

There was a complete and utter division between day and night from my first days of life. To question something, you have to be able to step outside it, and I never had the maturity, or any reason to question the teachings, until I was much older. Think about it. All around were movies reinforcing what the cult taught, the Disney films, etc; I listened to heavy metal groups, whose values echoed what I was taught at night. In fact, outside of Christian literature, there is not much out there that would engender trust in other human beings.

Q: I was shocked to hear you say you were forced to shoot a friend of yours. Are many members forced to shoot or kill someone, or is this just for punishment training? Is it just outsiders who are killed? Are you able to discuss the shooting, or is this too hard to discuss?

A: The friend was not an outsider, she was part of the group, and considered expendable. In this group, people are one of two things: "useful" or "expendable". Everyone works quite hard to be useful. It is not a common punishment, in fact rare, but my mother was an unusually driven and ambitious person.

She was a head trainer, and sat on the regional council over the Washington DC area in the spiritual seat (the other seats on the council were military, held by her boss at the Pentagon, where she worked, his cult name was "Ashtoth", a goverment seat, leadership, scholarship, and sciences seats).

Usually, they bring in outsiders for rituals or killing, but this was an unusually harsh punishment to teach me an unforgettable lesson (it did: I never made a friend after that. I didn't like those higher than me, and had no wish to make friends with those she considered "worthy" of a "leader" and other nonsense).

Very rarely, in military exercises, those who were weak or kept a unit behind consistently were shot to teach the others a lesson (I saw it happen once). This never happened to the children of leaders, only those from lower levels.

Q: You say you begged God for a better home every night, but became embittered against God for not providing it. Were you praying to a benevolent God or to the Illuminati god? If the former, then where did you get your idea of a benevolent God?

A: This is a great question. I was NOT praying to the Iluminati deities, because to me, they were cruel and sadistic and frightening. I was praying to my child's concept of a good God, from my reading, watching of TV, and also the innate knowledge that all children have in their hearts that somewhere, up there, is a good God.

I also had a few experiences with angels, and being protected as a child during horrendous trauma, and this also formed my concept that good existed. They never actually tried to stop me from praying, since positive spirituality gives hope, and can help prevent suicide.

In fact, I was forbidden to read about or seek any knowledge about the occult in my day life, because otherwise too much would be given to the occult and the risk of suicide would have increased. They are believers in "balance', even in this area.

Q: You said "Papa Brogan" [see previous article] was the only kind adult in your life growing up. Do you mean he showed you affection? In what way?

A: Dr. Timothy Brogan was a professor at George Washington University. He was a specialist in neuropsychology, and one of the top Illuminati trainers in the DC area. He was also close friends with Sidney Gottlieb (another of my mother's "friends").

Anyway, he could be very kind as well as cruel. He would hold me on his lap, call me his "little one", and praised me highly when I did well. He taught me chess, and would read works of literature to me. He told me I was his "adopted daughter" and that he was proud of me. We would hold intellectual discussions until late at night, and he imparted his views of leadership and training to me. Not all Illuminati activity is cruel or inhumane; he could be caring and loving as well. I would play with his children, who were older than me, and he would patiently answer my questions about science, geography, and other topics. I bonded completely to him, which made the torture and sexual abuse especially painful and betraying.

Q: You say you had a core split, over 7,000 fragments and 16 internal systems. You mean you developed split personalities who weren't aware of each other? If so, did any of these personalities seem to have a fairly nice life?

A: Yep, split personalities. Most of the people I knew in the Illuminati were fairly fragmented (in fact, I cannot think of anyone who was not dissociative to some degree). Even the local and regional leaders all come in for regular "programming tune ups" as Jonathan and I used to call them. The largest split was between the front and back; ie. daily life and night life. Most, but not all, of the night alters could communicate, or at least the controllers and the higher parts inside could (and relay information to those beneath them). And yes, many of my personalities had a wonderful life. I had 140 created to deal with daytime life, such as work, friends, and fun (who have coalesced).

Many of my back people had good experiences, such as the ones I described above with Dr. Brogan. Others were pampered and praised, told that I would be a leader in the coming "New Order" (of course, they tell everyone that….). I was to be a mediator between governmental figures in different nations because of my language abilities and people mediation skills. Many of my internal parts were quite proud of their abilities and accomplishments in the group, and grieved heavily when I left.

Q: Are the non-German Illuminists not Nazis, racist white supremacists, or genocidal maniacs? And, if the leadership in all countries is Illuminati, that must mean they're of all races, which seems to mean the white supremacists oppose the non-white Illuminati. Is this right?

A: Not all Illuminist groups are as fanatically anti-racial as the German branch is, although many are. These people are racist in the extreme, but they are also very practical, and realize that world domination is not possible without the aid of non-white races. That is why loyal figures in these countries are being promised leadership positions for their area, under the supervision of Illuminist commanders.

They also view orientals differently than other nonwhite races, because of the long history of occult mysticism in many countries (such as Tibet, for example), the long history of culture, and the high intelligence. This is why the oriental branches are highly regarded, even in Europe. But they do believe that Europe will be the center of world government and leadership.

Even in non-white countries, the top leadership is still white, or nearly so. For example, in South America, the top leaders are European in descent, with less of the mestizo mixing. In Africa, many of the leaders behind the scenes are whites, although there are local black leaders who have demonstrated extreme loyalty. They are using them, though, since these members will never be able to hold top leadership in the world. (Those positions are already taken).

All this said, I believe that the racist and hateful policies of the Illuminati are despicable in the extreme. One of my biggest quarrels with leadership was this position, among others. I hope this has answered some of your questions. – Svali

Posted in Svali Answers Questions | Tagged Svali questions | 8 Comments »

Therapists Speak Out on Ritual Abuse

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Several months ago, I sent a questionaire out to the professional community to find out the opinions of therapists who work with ritual abuse. I contacted the ISSD as well as several therapists whom I had heard of in the field. Why? Because I wanted a chance for the dedicated professionals who work in this field to have a chance to speak out, and I was also interested in their opinions.

I have changed all names, and used pseudonyms to protect the identities of these individuals and the clients that they work with. But these are very real people, who often work long hours, at times under threat from outside people, to help survivors break free. I cannot imagine a group of people that I admire more, next to the survivors themselves. The therapists who answered live both in the United States, and several countries around the world.

First I asked what percent of the therapist's practice was ritually abused clients. The answers varied.

Jenny, a female therapist, answered: Yes.I never figured percentages. I saw several clients whom I suspected were RA but they never claimed memories of such.

Fran, another therapist, stated: Ritually abused clients have made up about 10% of my practice in the past six years. I consider it a sub-specialty.

Joann, who works in a group practice, stated: yes – though many only openly admit to being DID Is this your specialty area of practice? yes It is about 70% of my practice and 100% of my partnert's practice

Alice states: Yes…usually they do not enter my office and announce that, however. It usually unfolds in the course of therapy, or they are referred following that disclosure. DID is one of my specialty areas of practice. It comprises about 1/5 of my caseload…and at one time was about 1/3.

John states: I work primarily in and with trauma survivors, mainly people over the ages of 35 and split about 45% 55% male to female. Yes I see a number of people who were ritually abused. Of those I work with about 30% were classic ritual abuse survivors…

I then asked: Do you believe your clients when they tell you they were ritually abused? If so, why? The responses were very interesting.

Jenny states: I believe that it is possible that RA memories are true. I cannot determine truth for clients.

Fran makes some points about her client's memories: I generally believe my clients' accounts of ritually abuse because:

1. I have obtained very convincing corroborating evidence.

2. Their emotional reactions and psychological symptoms make complete sense in relation to their accounts of abuse.

3. In one of my cases, relatives of the ritual abuse victim were incarcerated for multiple counts of sadistic sexual assault.

4. I am a member of a professional co-supervision group in which my colleagues have also obtained significant clinical and corroborating evidence of ritualistic abuse and mind control programming.

5. I am familiar with the professional research and clinical literature.

There are some aspects of some clients' accounts that I believe may not be completely accurate, due to abuse perpetrated on drugged clients or deception by their abusers.

Joann shares her opinion: Absolutely. Who would make up those stories???

Alice makes a point here: I have never seen anyone I thought was fabricating. I have also NEVER told anyone of my clients that they "met a profile", nor have I shared any of the "theories" that were prevalent in our field for awhile regarding conspiracy, programming, etc. I treat their memories with respect and, when needed, assist them in looking at the BEHAVIORS of their abusers and how it was abuse, regardless of the belief system. I see DID as an elaborate defense system involving all levels of personality.

John shares his view: I believe that initially they will tell me what it is that they have to to unburden the past. And they will tell me often times from the child's prospective in an adult voice. It is variation on the truth. it is how they recall it at the time in my office, and it may not even be close to what happened but it does define the starting gate so to speak and it is my job to help work them through their processes not decern the truth of the matter. I am the professional listener not the detective…. I think many of my contempories get lost here.

I think it is important to note here that contrary to what some vocal groups in the media say, these professionals listen to what the client brings into therapy. They are NOT suggesting memories, instead, they are listening to their clients.

My next question was: What sort of groups are your clients reporting that "ritually abuse"? Are these organized groups with a religious/philosophical base, or are they isolated incidences? Have you seen any common denominators between groups, if this is what is reported? Any elements that make individuals or groups different in how they work?

Jenny states: Satanic cults; Christian sects, U. S. Government Are these organized groups with a religious/philosophical base, or are they isolated incidences? Both Have you seen any common denominators between groups, if this is what is reported? Any elements that make individuals or groups different in how they work? Pedophilia, sadomachistic tendencies
Fran shares from her experience working with survivors: My clients report abuse by Illuminati, KKK, and Fourth Reich. My Illuminati victim also reports abuse by national and international governments. None of my ritually-abused clients have single-incident abuses. All endured long-term abuse within inter-generational Satanism. Some appear to be more motivated by Satan-worship, others by obtaining world power. Common denominators: Satan worship is reported by all clients. Disgusting and horribly painful torture is reported by all, and there is consistency in the specific kinds of torture used, e.g., being hung upside down, skinning people alive, use of hooks, and more that I can not recall right now. Differences: Sexual abuse seems to have been more frequent and the perpetrators appeared to have stronger pedophiliac interests in my survivors of KKK and Fourth Reich than the Illuminati survivor, who appeared to be high up in the power heirarchy, where it appeared more specific to particular rituals. Only the Illuminati survivor reported abuse by political figures.

Joann's clients also have shared with hertheir experiences with SRA: Most are isolated. some are offshoots of other groups (example – Masonic, Greek orthodox, illuminati) All involve abuse though the type varies – sexual, physical, emotional Alice's clients have also shared different types of abuse: A wide range of groups from aryan nation stuff ,to christian groups, to ancient fertility stuff, to the "chinese menu" approach. The only thing they all have in common is the abuse of power and children.

John shares his perspective: Variation on a theme of religion, although I have one at the moment that is focused on healing and not religion… oddly enough, and they as an organization are subject too a major investigation by the local Medical authorities/….

My next question was: Have you ever seen evidence that seems to corroborate client's stories? Such as bruising/evidence of abuse physically; or testimony of siblings or family members? Threats against yourself from outside members of the group?

Jenny states: 3 clients of different age groups naming same group leader spanning a period of three decades. Also naming same ritual sites. To my knowledge these clients, being in different generations had never met each other.

Fran has also seen corroborating evidence: I have seen corroborating evidence, including mutiple survivors identifying the same perpetrators, and incarceration of perpetrators.I have had numerous phone hang-ups, for periods a few a day. I had one call at midnight – a woman's voice said "She's dead you know, you killed her". Nobody I know died.

Joann states: Such as bruising/evidence of abuse physically; (physical pain or sensitivities – ie body memories) Changes as a result of access by others including family members(this may be done knowingly or unknowingly). Threats against yourself from outside members of the group? No threats – just being followed

John has received threats because of his work with survivors: By the time that I see people generally speaking the abuse has long since stopped, but I have seen scars that seem to corroborate clients stories. Yes I have had death threats by the acting out brothers of three young ladies who came in for help. Their old brothers who now live as hermits in the bush, threatened to shoot both me and them if and I quote: Anymore talk of this sexual abuse thing keeps going end quote

I want to thank the courageous professionals who shared their opinions in this article. Part two will include: healing from ritual abuse, what helps and what doesn't.

Posted in Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Theapists reveal truth about Ritual Abuse | Leave a Comment »

Therapists Speak out on Healing

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Important note: This article does not, and is not meant, to take the place of work with a qualified therapist, which is essential to healing from severe trauma. The comments in this article are in general terms only, and are only opinions.

Healing. That is the goal in the journey of healing from abuse, and I have a confession to make. The question I asked therapists in this article was totally self serving. I really wanted to hear what they had to say on healing, what helps, and what doesn't. As a survivor, I was extremely interested in the answers.
Each therapist was careful to say that they were speaking in generalities, that each client is different and unique. That each person's healing will following the path best for them. But there are some excellent insights that they shared from their observations over the years, and I felt that this deserved an article of its own.

The question I asked was: Which factors have you seen in clients that help them progress in their healing process from ritual abuse? Which factors have you seen that tend to retard progress? (I know this is a complex question, just a few key elements)

Ritual abuse often makes the survivor feel they are worthless, or have no rights. Jenny had some thoughts on this topic:

Aura of spirituality; sense of humor, lack of feelings of entitlement, strong support system Which factors have you seen that tend to retard progress? (I know this is a complex question, just a few key elements) Opposite of the above

Fran had comments based on many hours of work with her clients. Her response shows her commitment, and her client's commitment, to the healing process:

Factors that facilitate progress:

1. Patience by the therapist.

2. Hard work, journaling, art, between sessions.

3. Having a greater purpose of helping others

4. Having helpful, loving, and protective support persons.

5. A religious base of hope and protection.

6. Valuing both their own knowledge and the suggestions of the therapist.

7. Crying, grieving.

Factors that retard progress

1. Maladaptive relationships

2. Being re-accessed or abducted.

3. Substance abuse

4. Over-dependence, looking for the perfect new mother.

5. Lack of support persons

6. Lack of a religious support network and belief system.

7. Lack of looking inward for answers, over-reliance on the therapist

8. Resistance to crying.

Those who have been ritually abused have often had negative spiritual experiences. Joann shares her perspective that includes her belief system:

Which factors have you seen in clients that help them progress in their healing process from ritual abuse? strong Christian beliefs, strong desire to heal, submission to the healing process Which factors have you seen that tend to retard progress? denial, unwilling or unable to commit time or money, fear, trust issues, emphasis on presenting alters rather than on programming/structures/systems , lone ranger counselors who burn themselves out

Survivors of ritual abuse have often had a multitude of painful betrayals in their lifetime. Alice shares her thoughts on this painful topic:

It always helps to process betrayal…all the betrayals from spiritual to parental. It also helps to label specific behaviors as abuse in the framework of healthy parenting and group dynamics.Sometimes clients have difficulty with their corrupted belief systems as regards themselves…i.e.- "I have no soul"

Survivors of ritual abuse often have difficulty trusting others, and John shares his perspective on this issue:

What helps the most is the solid listening and them coming away from session after session with a strong sense of being listened too. The second mostimportant eliment is to treat the presenting problem properly and that is usually a deep seated depression that masks itself in some other format. ODD or BiP or BPD etc. and to gain releif here and build trust over time….

One of the facinating things that I have found is that in the fourth or fifth year of treatment sometimes the depth of the dissociative aspect jumps out and you have alters in your office who have watched you for a very long time and they can finally trust you to share. I had one lady who had been treated for 8 and half years before I got to her and it was late in our third year when I meet the first alter. The Alters knew the truth of what happened to her and it was ritual abuse by her mom. It went on every day and on several occasions nearly resulted in the clients death, and all this happened per age three. Mom later confirmed this. I had used the principal of the ISH and garnered its support in the healing and the client now 39 has her child back, is holding down a full time job, is in a relationship that she is happy with and is clean and sober drugs and alcohol 6 years..She is on Rx for her depression and probabily will be all the rest of her life… but she is having one now.

I found these responses helpful and insightful. These are caring people, who have invested hours and hours into helping survivors in the often painful, but also rewarding, journey of healing. The fact that they took time from their busy practices to share some thoughts is awesome, and I appreciate and thank each and every one. In my thoughts, these people are heros, along with the people that they help. Ritual abuse is one of the most traumatic abuses to heal from, but the therapists and survivors discussed in these articles are doing just that. Healing.

Posted in Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Healing from Ritual Abuse, Therapists | 2 Comments »

Breaking Free of the Cult

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Breaking Free of the Cult

One of the most important but also one of the most difficult steps that a survivor of generational cult abuse can make is the decision to leave the group that they were raised in.

Those who are naive, or don't understand the nature of being raised in a group may wonder, "Why would it be hard to leave abusers? Wouldn't a person WANT to get away?" The reality is a little more complicated, and my hope is that this article will help both survivors, therapists, and support people as well as those who wish to understand ritual abuse have a better idea of the issues that survivors getting out face, as well as some helpful ideas on safety.

BARRIERS TO GETTING OUT:

I want to address these first. This is not to be discouraging, but to help identify the issues involved. If a person understands the obstacles to leaving, they can then begin developing a plan to overcome these problems.

Paramount is PERSONAL SAFETY. Threats against those who try to leave are real, and the person has been conditioned by witnessing the punishment of those who have tried to leave (see my article on how the cult programs people for more info); or even punishment for questioning the group or its leader. The psychological intimidation of a lifetime is real, and the person must be assured of physical safety before they will consider leaving a group that could literally brutally punish them (or worse) for attempting to leave.

It is very, very difficult to consider leaving, or worse yet, to discuss leaving in therapy, then have reporter alters "telling on" the person to the group leaders. This happened to me in San Diego, and the results were devastating. My inside parts who wanted to get out, who were working hard in therapy, were being physically brutalized at night to punish them for talking and remembering. This created a great deal of what therapists call "intrasystem conflict" , to put it mildly. Some parts became hostile at other parts who wanted to leave, and they began punishing them as well. In addition, suicide commands were put in by the head trainer.

The reality is that if a person truly wants to break free, they may become "expendable" in the eyes of the cult, or considered a security risk, and will often be told to suicide. In breaking free, a survivor and their support system needs to be aware of these realities. To not be aware that this is/could be happening will cause therapy to be sabotaged.

Even if the person finds physical safety, other issues need to be addressed as well. One is ISOLATION. Often in transgenerational groups, the survivor's entire family of origin, as well as their closest friends, and spouse will be part of the group (the Illuminati arrange almost 100% of their marriages, I have never personally known of a person in the group whose spouse was not also involved, as well as the children.) These members of the immediate family will be the ones most likely to reaccess the survivor. I will give a personal example, again.

When I lived in San Diego, I was in therapy for DID. All that I remembered at the time was a period of three years of ritual abuse with my father and his mother. I thought my mother "rescued" me from him when she divorced him. But my therapy was at a standstill. The more I remembered, the WORSE I became, and decompensated. I would go to therapy, talk, try to help my inside people, then would feel immense panic and fear, as well as suicidal urges afterwards.

It wasn't until later that I learned that my mother was my cult trainer the first five years of my life; that my husband was taking me back to cult meetings where I was severely punished and programmed to NOT tell in therapy. Once I had physical safety, and broke off contact with cult members, I immediately began stabilizing psychologically. But the price was high. My husband divorced me when I told him I remembered; I told him his cult name, mine and the children's, thinking he, too would want to get out. Instead, I lost custody of my two children in a long and expensive court battle with a justice system whose attitude was that ritual abuse was a delusion. (Fortunately, 1 1/2 years ago, my ex decided to leave the group, in part because of seeing me alive and well and working full time; and I now have full custody of my children, who are doing well in therapy).

I am sharing this to help people be aware that the price of leaving a transgenerational group may include (although each situation is different):

giving up contact with members of family of origin giving up contact with close friends (the survivor has often been surrounded by cult members in their social group, including at church; my five closest friends were all members of the Illuminati and I had no idea). Often "cult twins" are best friends in day time life learning that a spouse and children are all members

The enormous psychological pain of giving up these relationships will often make it difficult for the survivor, but if they continue in them, the chances of being reaccessed are great. MOST REACCESSING OF THE SURVIVOR COMES FROM MEMBERS OF THEIR IMMEDIATE FAMILY. This is one of the hardest tasks for the survivor to attempt as he or she learns good boundaries. What those boundaries need to be will differ from person to person, and their individual situation.

Another real, and powerful pull back to the cult, will come from the perception that NEEDS inside the person are being met by the group. The person will likely be dissociative, if they have been raised in a transgenerational group, and they will often have alters inside who have never known or experienced the abuse, who will be considered "high alters" inside.These part's reality is that they were praised and told that they were special, often unaware or not caring that other alters inside endured the abuse. These higher alters may identify strongly with their perps and are often the alters that want recontact with the group and help drive internal recontact programming.

Frequently, when a person leaves a cult group, there is a real period of grieving. Social relations have been changed. Alters with special needs will feel that their needs are no longer being met, whether for belonging, for sexual activity, for power, or other personal agendas. The survivor needs to recognize this reality. A person will often unconsciously recontact a group if they believe that deep needs are being met by this group. Teaching themselves to meet their needs in a healthy and appropriate way will take time and patience, working with a qualified safe therapist who understands ritual abuse.

There may be PROGRAMMING to recontact the group. The survivor will need to identify if this is present, and take steps with the help of their therapist and support system to deactivate it.

IDEAS ON BREAKING FREE

While breaking free can be difficult, as I have discussed above, it is possible to escape a cult group and maintain personal safety. I will share from both my personal experience and that of other survivors things which have proven helpful in breaking free.

1. Safe outside accountability:

If the person attempting to break free can live with someone who is NOT a member of the group, who is a safe person, that will increase their own personal safety exponentially. Cult members from groups such as the Illuminati will hesitate to harrass or try to access someone while they are with a safe person, one who is not dissociative. One of the most dangerous set ups is when a survivor is living alone, or in isolation, or if they talk long walks at night or in areas where there are no people around. Abductions, kidnappings, or reaccessing may occur in these situations. The more safe outside accountability the survivor sets up, the less chance that this will occur. This could mean a safe roomate who is not dissociative; staying with members of a church, finding a safe house, or even a women's shelter (although there are reports that some shelters and safe houses are being infiltrated by cult members; the survivor needs to be cautious in where they go and whom they trust). One grievous problem today is the relative lack of safe houses for people trying to break free of the cult.

One precaution: often survivors will quickly make friends with other survivors, since they feel isolated and alone without the cult group. The survivor may want to exercise caution about rushing into friendships, since many survivors, especially at the beginning of their therapeutic process, may still be in contact with a cult group. Each person will need to make decisions on an individual basis in this area to maintain safety.

2. A good therapist:

There are excellent therapists who specialize in working with ritual abuse. While qualifications among therapists will vary, a survivor can try locating one by contacting reputable people in the field for referrals, by contacting the ISSD (link is on the welcome page for my articles), or by referral from people the survivor trusts. Not all therapists who advertise that they work with DID are safe, but if the survivor checks out references and asks careful questions, their chances of finding a good therapist will be higher. I have personally had therapists who worked with DID who ranged from : a pastor in San Diego who told me he could "integrate me" in 3 months if I had enough faith (this did NOT happen and was completely unrealistic); a therapist who was the referral for a national christian counseling group for DID who told me that her brother had tortured her as a child, and that I was not DID because she, the therapist, often "lost time" and went through personality changes and SHE wasn't DID (I stopped seeing her after two visits); a therapist associated with a ritual abuse and trauma program who was very knowledgeable, compassionate, and helpful. The last one, needless to say, was the only helpful one in my healing process! A good therapist will be knowledgeable about DID and ritual abuse; will BELIEVE the survivor and not discount memories shared; will help the survivor with achieving inter-system communication; and will have good boundaries. A therapist like this is well worth the time and effort it will take to locate, and can help the survivor immensely in the process of breaking free of cult control.

3. Stopping telephone access:

The telephone is one of the first avenues used to access someone trying to leave the cult. Hang up calls; calls with tones played, or with a tape or hidden message, will be used. Also, survivors often have recontact programming to phone their trainer or family members. One way to deal with this: take the telephone and lock it in the trunk of the car. This way, if a part of the survivor tries to get up in the middle of the night and make a phone call, they will have to find the car keys; unlock the trunk, plug the phone in,and make the call. Hopefully, the survivor will have time to "switch out" another part who will stop the call, especially as they work in therapy to block cult access.

Use of caller i.d.; answering services, or an answering machine (calls can be checked with a therapist or support person present in case an access message is left) can also help prevent phone access. Eventually, the survivor will find the parts inside with a vested interest in recontact, and can negotiate with them not to call or recontact. An unlisted phone number may help for a short period of time. Phone numbers can also be blocked to prevent calls from certain numbers, such as those of known perps.

4. Alarm systems:

Some survivors will have alarm systems to prevent unauthorized entry into their home. Again, this is best combined with a safe living situation, as described above. These alarm systems can also be coded by an outside safe person so that the survivor themself cannot decode it if internal parts try to leave in the middle of the night.

5. Share info with safe outsiders:

This could be a lock box with names of perps, and information, which the safe person will distribute if the survivor is harmed or access is attempted. The survivor can then mail a letter to this effect to known perps, to help prevent accessing or abducting of the survivor.

6. Go public

Some survivors have chosen to go public to maintain safety. The thought is that if they are harmed, they have shared enough info that an investigation will be done into the causes, and the cult group will risk further exposure, which they hate. Sharing information with law enforcement, with legal advisors, therapists, social workers, and child protective services can all also help maintain safety, IF the law enforcement officers, etc. are not members of the group. The problem here is that at times, cult members will infiltrate legal and law enforcement organizations, even CPS, to prevent cult members from escaping. The survivor will need to go to reputable, known safe people, if they choose to go this route.

7. Work on undoing recontact programming

This will take time, with a qualified therapist. It means looking at the trauma that placed the programming in, a difficult task psychologically. It will also mean addressing the powerful needs addressed above as well, and grieving when contact with cult members is stopped.

8. Prayer support

As a Christian, I believe that this can be a survivor's strongest protection. A strong, supportive faith system, and prayers for safety can protect the survivor during the spiritually and emotionally trying times while breaking free of the cult.

These are just a few ideas on breaking free. Many, many survivors have broken free, and have used their creativity and strength, as well as the help of noncult members who wish to help, to maintain safety. My hope is that this article will be a beginning place for both survivors and their support people and therapists to look at maintaining safety. I welcome any comments or andecotes on ideas that other survivors and support people have found for maintaining safety.

copyright 2000 svali

Posted in Other Illuminati Articles by Svali | Tagged Escaping from the Cult, Hiding from the Cult | 1 Comment »

Complex Polyfragmentation: A Coping Mechanism for the Survivor

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Important note: this article is not meant to be therapy, or to replace therapy with a skilled and qualified person, which is essential in healing from severe trauma. These are only the opinions of a survivor. Trigger warning: mentions cult abuse, dissociation, and trauma

In order to survive ritual abuse, a child will often learn to dissociate, and dissociate heavily. The child has undergone some of the most horrific abuse humanly imaginable, and most find a way to cope. One of the ways that is encouraged in certain groups, such as the Illuminati, is to create an elaborate defensive system. In psychological terms, the child fragments, then fragments again. Eventually, the child has polyfragmented.

What is polyfragmentation? The term comes from the root poly, meaning many, and fragments. In complex polyfragmenatation, the survivor will have not only alter systems, but hundreds or even thousands of fragments, isolated parts of their mind created to do a job, and do it well and unthinkingly. Often the job is one that would be abhorrent to the main personality or presenting system. The further away from core beliefs, the greater usually the dissociation and fragmentation that must occur. In other words, a LOT of trauma has to happen to make a person do something that they really don't want to do. And the person has to feel very far away from themselves as well when doing it. The cult will purposely try to create a polyfragmented system for this very reason. The person is more dissociated from themselves, and is often easier for them to control.

How are polyfragmented systems structured? These are individual, and will vary from not only person to person, but also with the group the person belonged to, the trainers, the abilities of the child, and tasks involved that the child must do. There is no "cookie cutter approach" in most cults to creating polyfragmented systems, but there are certain characteristics that are common.

What might a polyfragmented system look like? I will share some based on my memories as a trainer in this group, plus insights from my own healing process.

1. Protectors: these are parts that were created to do the jobs that had to be done, and saved the life of the young child. Cult protectors had to look mean and scary, like the child's perpetrators. They also become perpetrators when the child grows into an adult, since they have no choice. They can be ruthless, angry, or may believe that they are demons. Some growl, some hiss, some believe that they are powerful animals. And all were a little child who was asked to do the unthinkable, forced to act in ways that he or she didn't want to. They laugh at vulnerability, and trust no one. And with good reason, based upon their experiences in the cult. With therapy and time, they can also help keep the person safe from their perpetrators, as these parts will "kick butt" if they feel threatened.

2. Intellectuals: the cult WANTS intellectual alters who can observe, go between systems, learn information quickly and download it to outsiders. These might be recorders, computers, scholars. They may know several languages, and versed in different philosophies. Brilliant, cognitive, they often believe that they can outwit those around them, including therapists. But they also know much of the life history that the others don't, since they rarely have strong feelings. These parts can "read the life history" without a tear or emotion. When they are out, the person appears "flat" to say the least, in psychological terms.
3. Denial people: these are intellectual, and are created to deny that anything bad ever happened. Life was wonderful, the parents perfect and loving, and the suicidality and PTSD symptoms are just strange artifacts without "any reason," according to these parts. A person can have a full blown abreaction, and five minutes later, a denier will come out and say it was all "made up." They are often afraid of punishment if the person remembers, and have severe trauma motivating them.

4. Controllers/head honchos/"top dogs": these are the system leaders. They know what is going on at all times in their system. In a military system, it might be a general, in a protector system, the most powerful protector; in a metals system, the platinums, or in a jewel system, the highest jewels, such as diamond, ruby, or emerald. Usually there are several leaders in a system that share the responsibility. They can also become invaluable helpers over time if they choose to give up cult loyalty.

5. Child alters: these want praise from the adult leaders, and often come out for rewards, or sweets. They will report on others inside unless they can learn that it is safe to NOT do so, since they are motivated both by fear of punishment, and wanting praise from those above them. They are also often the "heart" of a polyfragmented system, and can feel love, joy, or fear and trembling. Often, they want hugs and to be told that they are "okay".

6. Punishers: why wait for an outside person to punish you if you can create someone inside to do it first? Children will often identify heavily with their perpetrators, and if the punishment is severe and frequent, they will internalize the perpetrator to try and keep themselves "in line" and avoid punishment externally. The cult will capitalize on this, and often trainers will leave as their "calling card" an alter named after themselves. This one will be an internal trainer, or punisher, or enforcer. Their job is to keep things in line, and will often try to sabotage therapy. They are often fearful of external punishment if they don't do their job. Internal punishers will also activate self punishment sequences inside (such as flood programming/ suicide programming, or other self harm sequences) if the person begins breaking away from the cult and the old rules. These parts may take time to conivince that they can change their old way of doing things, since they were often accountable to the outside handler/trainer if things weren't kept in line.

7. Feeling alters: the feelings were overwhelming and infinitely traumatizing in childhood. It threatened the child's survival and sanity. The solution? Parcel them out over several internal parts and/or fragments. Divide the feeling up so that it feels more manageable. Feeling alters often get locked away inside, and when they come out in therapy, the feeling may hit "full force" at first. A child alter may come out screaming, or terror stricken, or wailing in uncontrollable grief and pain, until they are grounded in the here and now. Often, feelings were heavily punished in the cult, so it was psychologically necessary to bury them deeply within the psyche in order to survive. These parts may be very separated from the parts that know what happened to cause the feelings in a highly fragmeneted system, so that the feelings seem to come out of nowhere, without any cause. With time and healing, they can hook up with the intellectuals inside who observed, and other parts who went through the same trauma, giving meaning to the feelings and helping to resolve them.

8. Internal councils: most cults have leadership councils of some sort. And many people internalize them inside. It's another example of internalizing perpetrators, and these have a vested interest in "keeping things in line" until they realize that they can leave the cult and be safe. Then, they can become an immense strength for healing. A personal may have a local leadership council internalized, or spiritual councils that represent outside people, such as an internal druidic council or group of ascended masters that help run things inside.

9. Sexual alters: created to handle the overwhelming trauma of early childhood sexual abuse, they took the feelings it was too painful for a young child to understand. Some had to learn to enjoy the abuse, or pretend to, and were heavily rewarded for this response.

10. Amnesic alters: these are known as the "front", the "clueless ones", "those who don't know anything", etc. These have the job of not remembering. Otherwise, as a child, they were heavily punished. Usually, they are very glad to not remember anything, and the other parts who were abused at times envy them or dislike their "protected life history." This can create a lot of intrasystem hostility or warfare, until the amnesic parts begin accepting that abuse did occur. Reminding abused parts that the amnesia saved the child's (and their life) helped my system with this.

11. The workers: these do the jobs of daily life, and usually are part of the presenting systems. These take care of the house, got married, take care of the children, and may hold a highly responsible job as well. These are the competent parts created that hide the fact that the person has undergone a lifetime of traumatic abuse and degradation. These parts can also be a great strength, as they share that life can be good with other more traumatized parts inside.

12. Hosts: there may be a "day host" (see presenters), a "night host" for the cult, or hosts for various systems or times in the person's life. Occasionally, the survivor of severe generational cult abuse may find to their dismay that a greater portion of their life was invested in and given to cult activities than day ones, and the "night host" is stronger than the "day host"! This happened to me. Fortunately, my "night host" was the one who left the cult, so she had plenty of strength and pull to give to staying safe and away from the group. I also had a "host" that had handled the summers spent in Europe, during those times in childhood, and a "hidden host" who never fully presented to protect herself from others (she manipulated the presenters to sit in front of her, telling them what to do). Each person's system will handle this task differently. In general, the greater the trauma, the greater the distrust of outside people, and the more likely that the host will be a facade, or heavily protected.

13. Core splits: can be created from severe and psychologically threatening very early childhood trauma. This used to be done intentionally by some cult groups to create larger and more dissociated systems.

14. The core: this is the original child, the one who created all of the others inside. The child's systems will depend upon the traumas and the creativity of the original child, as well as her need to protect herself from the abuse of others that might have destroyed her. In some systems, the core will be very young, or an infant, if the abuse was extremely early and severe. Core issues surrounding her will usually involve parents or parental figures who caused severe trauma. This might include abandonment, torture, or other forms of cruelty to a young child.

15. Function codes, access codes, halt codes, system codes: these are fragments that might be put in to do certain jobs, and are created to only do that job when called out by triggers such as letters, numbers, phrases, or other auditory stimuli. These are created with deep trauma and are very intentionally done by perpetrators.

16. Spiritual parts: these may have a variety of beliefs that cover different spiritualities internally. There may be one over-riding spiritual belief for the system, or several. For example, a spiritual system created by the cult may include aspects of Luciferianism, druidism, Temple of Set teachings, Ancient Babylonian mystery religions, etc. The host or presenters may have a completely conflicting religious belief system, and there may be hostility between the parts that hold opposing beliefs. In my own life, my presenters were strong Christians, and this gave the stability and comfort needed to bring healing to the parts inside. It also opened the way to begin forgiveness, one of the most difficult and important tasks in the healing process.
This has been an overview of just a few of the types of personalities that might be found in a complex polyfragmented system. It is important to be aware that each person is unique; that many people will have coped with trauma in their own way. This is not meant to say that every cult survivor has all of these personalities, but are one survivor's opinion based upon her experiences and memories. My hope is that this article will help to educate others about this issue.

Copyright 2000 – Svali

Posted in Multiple Personalities - Brokenness, Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Complex Polyfragmentation, DID, MPD | Leave a Comment »

Survivors Speak Out on Remembering: part two

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Survivors of ritual abuse come from all over the world. This is not a phenomenon limited to the United States or Europe.

John, a survivor outside the U.S., shares his process of remembering: I did not always remember. As with many sexual assault survivors and because of the violence and threats done to them, I was not able or allowed to remember. In 1974 I was 16 and I saw the movie, The Exorcist. It triggered an uncomfortableness and because of the brainwashing and lies "my family would be killed" I couldn't get consciousness and clarity. I ran away though on this subconcious and yet still powerful fear. I then got brainwashed again and it blotted out all my memory and the abuse that was happening then. In 1992, I met a ritual abuse survivor in an incest survivors group and after about six months of listening to her, I realised that I had been, and was then also being, ritually abused. The brainwashing was so strong that it took six months of listening to another survivor to assist me to have consciousness and clarity.

Abigail is another survivor who has always remembered some things: We always had part memories indicating such, though we didn't know what to label it, i.e. going to grade school and then my father would show up with an excuse to take me out of school. He would take me to the grocery store he worked at and sit me in the cooler room to sort numbers for pricing. Even though it was very cold in that room, he would tell his co-workers that I was sick and he was taking me to the Doctor. We would leave at noon time and then there would be no memory for the next 3 days. I know it was 3 days because the note my mother wrote for me to give my teacher always said that I was absent with a 3 day flu. Other things were almost life-long inexplicable fears and reactions to things that are otherwise pretty much commonplace. Still can't light a match but do ok with a lighter. The fear with an unlighted match in my hand is overwhelming panic and terror feeling very young. There are many others, too long to list here but they are this specific rather than general. Definition of ritual abuse came later in adulthood during a support group for sexual abuse survivors. We, as a group of survivors, were reading and working out of a book together. There were lists for identifying sexually abused girls and boys and then a chapter and list for identifying ritual abuse. All our fears were listed, our reactions, our body pains. All never had explanation before were now explained within the context of ritual abuse and as things fell into place, things began to make sense. Our reaction to this was more, "Oh no, no, that can't be so!" then it was the "Ahhh, now it makes sense." For us, memories have surfaced more in an age-based chronological order with only few exceptions, i.e. related issues at a later age.

Ian, an eleven year old child, shares his experience: I always knew I had inside people. I could see them and talk to them. One time, I remembered something, and two nights later, one of my inside people told my leader that I remembered, it was an inside kid who "squealed" on me. They hit me, and then they shocked me, yelling at me I was to never remember, ever, or it would be worse for me. They then made me run, shooting bullets over my head, and laughing. I was really afraid then, when I first remembered again, when I got away from them. I was sure someone was going to come and get me, or hurt me. In fact, at night, I need someone with me so I can fall asleep. Night is the worst, because that is when we would go to meetings. Daytime is great for me.
Svali also remembered gradually: I had struggled with depression all of my life, but without a reason. I was labeled "endogenous" depression. My ex-husband and I entered marriage counseling for conflicts. One day the therapist told me, "Won't it be good when the tremendous guilt that I see in you is gone." Guilty was out then, and I ran to a corner and crouched, saying "But if the guilt is gone, then I will be gone." I then had a spontaneous memory of being hurt. The counselor had no idea what it was, and neither did I. That night, when I got home, while washing the dishes, I remembered my father abusing me. I ran into my bedroom, stuffed a pillow in my mouth, and screamed as the memory came out. The rage, the hurt, the pain were all there. As time went on, other memories came forward, all spontaneously, usually at home. I had always remembered my family's dysfunctionality: that my stepfather was an alcoholic, that my mother would beat her children, that my sister and brothers and I all tried to commit suicide many times growing up. They had to cut my 8 year old brother down when he tried to hang himself. But other things I had blocked, because it hurt too much until I felt safer and was older, able to deal with it.

Frank remembers: I knew I was different. I would find things in my room that I had never bought, or would wake up in a strange city with no idea how I got there, would find out I had a job for several months, a bank account, a girlfriend! I moved around a lot, was afraid to get close to anyone, or they would find out my "secret". But one day, I was in drug rehab several years ago, and it happened. My grandfather, one of my biggest perpetrators died, and I had flashback after flashback about him. I was given his masonic ring, and just looking at it, I remembered more. I went into therapy, and right away inside people came out and started talking. They figured that once he was dead, it was safe to talk.

Alex, a survivor from the West Coast, shares: I had no idea that it was happening until last year when I started to remember. I'm over 50, so there's a lot to remember! I don't talk about this with my family, I don't want to hurt them. I have all of this stuff about my life growing up that makes sense now. I always knew my family wasn't normal, that things weren't right. I always had a lot of rage, I would throw things against the wall and scream and yell without knowing why. But now, I'm finding out where the rage came from. I am getting better now, and feel better than I ever had in my life, because before all that rage was bottled up inside, and now it is getting released and healed. Someday I will tell my sister, because I want her to get out too, but it isn't time yet. I need to heal more.
As clearly illustrated by these accounts, many survivors HAVE remembered some things all of their life – or had indications that something traumatic happened. Others have progressed through a more gradual process of remembering. All, however, are courageously working at dealing with some of the most overwhelming abuse that a young child or adult can experience (and still survive): Ritual Abuse. I am greatly inspired by their courage and honesty in sharing here.

copyright 2000 Svali

Posted in Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Survivors of Ritual Abuse | Leave a Comment »

Survivors Speak Out on Remembering: part one

September 29, 2008 by koniword

Part one: Important: part of this article contains discussion of survivor memories. If you are a survivor of ritual abuse, please be aware that reading about it may be triggering, and do not read if you become uncomfortable A significant aspect of the ritual abuse subject is the testimony of survivors – those who are seriously engaged in the healing process. The uninitiated reader can scarcely begin to comprehend the journey upon which many such people from around the world have embarked. They are all ages, both male and female. They are working hard at exchanging old belief systems for a different world-view and an entirely new way of life. This is the first in a series of articles based on survivor responses to a questionaire I distributed.
All quoted passages herein have the express permission of the respective survivor and, for obvious reasons, I have substituted pseudonyms in order to protect their true identities. These are, however, very real people and each has a genuine story to tell.

Memory retrieval is a strenuously debated topic. There are groups (well chronicled in the mass media) who assert that repressed memories cannot be accessed as an adult, while other groups or professionals argue that yes, it is possible and does in fact happen. I thought it wise to go to the source – the survivors themselves – and discover what their first-hand experience has been. They know best how they remembered.

My hope is that upon experiencing what is shared here, you will be inspired by their sincerity, truthfulness and conviction. These are NOT people "fabricating memories" as is sometimes alleged. Several people have always remembered at least some of their abuse. These are people whose determination to escape from an abusive environment (both receiving abuse and inflicting it upon others) has cost them dearly. They are paying a very high price for living in a culture which continues to wallow in a state of collective denial. Here, survivors speak out on how they remembered:

Joanne, a survivor of generational abuse, states: I was about 12yrs old when I realised what was going on wasn't "normal" but I never came out and said anything, I was the typical abused kid who acted up, but no-one would believe me when I first tried to say anything at the age of 16yrs. The memories, well some I have always known, generally the more traumatic the event the better recall of them that I have, although there are still some major injuries that I remember having but can't recall what lead up to the injuries, I know when and where they took place but as to what precipitated the actual injury, I don't remember.

Ellen, another survivor, did not dissociate her memories: I was in a cult which started in 1994 evolving from alleged apparitions of Mary in this area of the country. These apparitions, called Our Lady of Light, I now believe to be luciferian in nature. There was a visionary who claimed to be receiving messages from Jesus to renew the Church and the world with a particular emphasis on the priesthood. A Jesuit theologian became the spiritual director of this group through messages from Our Lady of Light. I was deeply involved in this cult from it's inception in 1994 until I was able to escape in June of 1998. I am not DID; but was well on my way by the time I left. I remember feeling as if there were 2 different realities while I was in that cult…… I dared not remember my former life…….. but glimpses would come through at times which I would quickly shut down. It was not until after I left that cult and began healing and studying that I came to the realization of the symbolic satanic rituals involved in this cult. The understanding would come little bits at a time. The depth of the evil was so intense that I could only have tolerated little pieces at a time. If I would have come to a full understanding immediately, I do believe that I would have shattered or died. I knew that I had to keep battling for the truth. It was through the struggle to sift out the truth from the lie that I came to the understanding of the nature of the evil of the group. Children as well as adults have remembered abuse: Vicky, a 15 year old, shares: I had bad dreams at night. I would dream that I was going somewhere and things happened, but the next morning, everything was normal. I didn't really start remembering until I went to be with my Mom, when she got out, and it was safe. They don't let you remember, you get hurt if you do. I didn't want to get hurt. I started remembering, and inside people started sharing stuff. But most of the time, I try to ignore it. I'm busy at school, and being a teenager. It happened, but I try not to think about it. Except at night I get scared because then I can't help but think about it. That's when my Mom and Dad would wake me up, they were all cold and impersonal, and get me and my brother out of bed to go to a meeting. I have trouble sleeping at night, I keep waking up all night to make sure I'm safe and at home even now.

Posted in Ritual Abuse Articles by Svali | Tagged Memory suppression, Remembering Abuse | 2 Comments »

Why the Cult Doesn't Get Caught

September 29, 2008 by koniword

When confronted with the possibility that ritual abuse may occur, one of the first questions people ask is: "But if it's real, why aren't they caught?". In other words, how can an organized society meet and execute rituals in secret, yet not leave any incriminating evidence which may lead to a conviction? How can such secrecy possibly be maintained in this day and age? Surely they would leave behind a 'trail' that would alert others as to what was happening.

I will address these questions from my own experience with one cultic group and also provide a link to articles about other ritually abusive groups who HAVE been 'caught in the act' and subsequently convicted in court. I would first, however, like to discuss one other secret society that has continued to operate in the US since the early 1920s (approx.). A secret society that commits acts of brutality including not only physical beatings, but also cold blooded murder. A criminal group that engages in a variety of illegal activities. An organization with members who are born into it and thus can be termed 'generational'. One who prior to the 1970s enjoyed the official FBI position of non-existence, despite those who were reporting its reality (sounds much like ritual abuse today!). I am referring, of course, to 'La Cosa Nostra' aka 'The Mafia'.

In 'Who Is The Mob Today?' (2/25/1996), Peter Maas quotes FBI Director Louis J.Freeh admitting the terrible past mistake made by the FBI in rejecting accounts of the Mafia's existence: For decades under the late J. Edgar Hoover, the FBI's official position was that the existence of Cosa Nostra was a myth. "We cannot allow the same kinds of mistakes to be made today", Freeh told Congress. "The failure of American law enforcement, including the FBI… permitted the development of a powerful, well-entrenched organized crime syndicate (that required) 35 years of concerted law-enforcement effort and the expenditure of incredible resources to address."

The current 'official' position of the FBI is that organized, secretive societies that ritually abuse and participate in illegal activities do not exist, despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary. The bureau appears to have a consistent track record in this department.

What kind of evidence? Ritual abuse does occur and is being successfully prosecuted in courts today, despite the claims of those who deny this fact. Evidence such as pentagrams and assorted paraphernalia IS being found in many of these instances. The following URL is an excellent link to such cases and I would strongly encourage anyone interested in learning more about the reality of ritual abuse to visit this site. It is an eye-opener.

http://members.tripod.com/Curio_5_/ra.htm
Survivor memories: More and more survivors are coming forward and sharing memories of ritual abuse. These accounts are specific in terms of dates, times, individuals present and events which transpired. Such disclosures have been made by both children and adults from around the world.

How security is maintained: One group's methods

In the remainder of this article I will share my knowledge of how one group operated its internal security in order to prevent detection. I cannot speak of other groups or their security measures. As previously stated, I was a member of the Illuminati for the first 38 years of my life, spanning from 1957 to 1995. Based on this experience I will now discuss exactly how security was maintained both in Northern Virginia and San Diego, Ca.

1. Telephone Tree: General meetings were scheduled by the leadership council well in advance (usually several months) during their private meetings. In turn, these dates were then given to ranking leaders in the group who, several days prior to a meeting, would activate a telephone tree. Higher members first called their peers, then those beneath them in the group hierarchy. Those at the lowest level were notified just one night before the meeting date, since they were considered 'higher security risks'.

2. Conditioning To Remain Silent: From the age of 24 months, ALL children in the group were taught the importance of not discussing group activities during the daytime. Teaching methods included 'set-ups', in which a member 'told' and was then 'punished' by the administration of torture. Set-ups were designed to look very realistic, with the 'betrayer' loudly screaming throughout his 'punishment' – which may have included drowning, burning or even murder. This graphic experience of what happened to those who 'tell', served as an unforgettable lesson to young children.

Other methods included beating the child if he spoke of night-related activities in the daytime. The adults around the child also modeled this behaviour by NEVER discussing night activities the following morning. If the child mentioned something he would be told "you were dreaming" and to "forget it". Severe and brutal physical punishment of children was also used. Set-up scenarios such as fake burials, where the child is then retrieved from a coffin and told he will stay below ground forever should he even think of talking about group activities was done. I was put through that scenario as a young child and in turn, as an adult, saw it perpetrated upon young children. The child is always screaming and swears to never ever tell.

3. Expert Clean-up Crews: Many rituals involving murder were set-ups (no, the cult was not murdering its children – however they did create very realistic set-ups that had powerful psychological effects on the children present). More commonly, an animal was used during spiritual rituals (as I will discuss in another article, there were many other kinds of meetings. Spiritual was but one of six areas of group activities, the others being military, sciences, scholarship, leadership and government). Members were trained in post-meeting clean-up techniques from childhood. Wooden tables were taken apart, bleached,cleaned and then loaded into vans. Clothes were folded in preparation for laundering later. If the site was outdoors then the area was raked clean. If inside a large private home then the site was thoroughly washed down.
4. Restriction Of Meeting Size: In order to avoid overly large meetings, the San Diego group was divided into 24 sister groups (each approx. 60 members) that met on alternating days at alternating sites. Some groups met on Mondays and Thursdays, others on Tuesdays and Fridays, and yet others on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Usually two groups (occasionally three) would meet together at one site. Only at major annual meetings would large numbers congregate. As mentioned above, meeting times were coordinated by telephone trees.

5. Clandestine Times: Meetings were held between 12:30am and 2:00am and on occasion were extended to 4:00am. Traffic would be light. Members often lived in communities where everyone was a member of the group (oh yes, there are 'cult communities' because like attracts like, and often whole neighborhoods are comprised exclusively of cult members). People would leave quietly in the night, with car lights off until they were out on the street. The adult non-driver would be the 'watcher', checking that they were not being followed.

Each family had a cover story to be used in the event of an outsider catching them leaving. Typically the story would involve an urgently hospitalized relative, which would satisfactorily explain the lateness of the hour and the presence of small children . Normal clothes were worn enroute to the meeting and people would change once on-site. In my family we would sometimes go to sleep in our clothes, which saved time when we got up in the middle of the night. I never considered it unusual to go to bed in my clothing two or three nights a week.

6. On-site Security: The group had several security perimeters around meetings. The first checkpoint (outermost perimeter) was at the five mile mark. There were always at least two roads leading into the meeting site and both would be manned by members possessing a list of approved license plate numbers. All vehicles (incoming and outgoing) were checked. Vehicle flow was minimized as families often car pooled. In the event of an unauthorized vehicle breaching the perimeter, a hidden security person (they would stand behind a tree, watching) would radio ahead and the meeting was immediately packed-up and the people quickly dispersed. Meanwhile, the incoming vehicle would be delayed by the non-hidden security who would pretend to be stranded and in need of assistance. They were taught how to engage the outsider for several crucial minutes. If that ploy failed then they would alert the next perimeter where logs would then be positioned to block the roadway. Of the three-man security team, one would be responsible for alerting members while the other two executed delaying tactics if required.

This security procedure was repeated at both the three mile and one mile perimeters, meaning members had to pass through a total of three checkpoints before arriving at the meeting. To avoid boredom or staleness, security members were rotated on a bi-monthly basis.
Often, on private property, indoor meetings or trainings would occur on large multi-acred estates appointed with securely fenced perimeters. The site would be located in a downstairs basement which could be closed-off from the rest of the house by a false wall. These estates usually had at least one private roadway at the rear and the customary security perimeters in place. As you may by now appreciate, it would be extremely difficult to 'crash a meeting' considering the security measures utilized by the group. Given that an outsider was able to discover the time and date of a meeting, he would then have to travel in a vehicle with approved plates. Short of breaking the law, this would require the cooperation of an active group member (which is quite difficult to arrange as they are taught to report to their leader anything like this).

The above has been shared with police departments and they have said that I describe a "highly sophisticated security system". It is the only one I ever knew while part of this group.

What about the bodies? As mentioned above, the reality is that many of the 'ritual killings' (although not all) were set-ups. Fake. Some involved filling a corpse (obtained prior to the ritual) with warm blood. The child would be allowed to play with a living infant before a ceremony, then the switch would be made while the child was in a room 'preparing'.

Children NEVER question set-ups (they are too frightened) and truly believe they actually killed someone. The group wants them to believe this because the perpetrator guilt will then bind the child to them, and make it less willing to disclose group activities. The child is told it is now a murderer and will go to jail should it ever talk about the meetings. There are real ritual killings, but I believe that set-ups inflate the figures somewhat. Homeless people, and runaways were also used on rare ocassions.

At times animals are used, however they usually belonged to group members. When living in San Diego I had four cats and three dogs mysteriously 'disappear' as well as most of my chickens (I lived in the country). These pets were undoubtedly used in ceremonies. After that I quit having pets – the trauma was too great. Goats, chickens, cattle and deer are all used on occasion. The carcasses are are subsequently torn-up, buried or thrown to the dogs in order to make the killings appear to have been done by wild dogs. Sometimes the skins are incinerated and the ashes buried.

It is not my intention to be gruesome. I am merely attempting to explain the mechanics of how this group maintained its secrecy. No doubt other groups use different methods.
>In closing, I would like to offer a comparison upon which to ponder. The Mafia, comprised of thousands of members and openly killing people, maintained its secrecy for over fifty years in the US. Today nobody doubts their existence, yet those same people question that other groups could successfully remain secret. Secrecy is not difficult. The Mafia used their own code of silence – 'Omerta'. The Illuminati cult also maintains its own silence to this day.

copywrite 2000 svali

svalispeaksagain 6:18 pm on August 17, 2021

Tags: mind control (69), new world order, occult (13), programming (60), ritual abuse (65), Vatican (10)

Vatican Book Part 1

Six years ago, I wrote a book about the Vatican for therapists, and have only shared it privately until now, except for 1 excerpt in a blog post awhile back. Over the next few weeks and months, I will be posting the book here online. I believe that in this time, this information needs to be known in order to help others. This is the preface and first two parts. Please be aware that the information in this could be extremely triggering for survivors. It also contains Christian content.

The Vatican and the New World Order: Methods, Purpose and Overcoming Their Agenda

(c) 2015 svali

Table of Contents

I. Who Are the Jesuits? p.2

II. What Does the Jesuit Order Believe? p.4

III. How Are the Jesuits Financed? p.8

IV. Programming Methods p.12

```
A. Infant Programming  (fetal - 1)                    p.14

B. Early System Organization                           p.27

C. Toddler Training (Ages 1 - 3 )                      p.31

D. Punisher Training                                       p.39

E. Jesuit Master Controllers                             p.43

F. Anti-Christian and Anti-Semitic Training            p.48

G. Early Childhood Training (Ages 3 - 6)              p.53

H. Middle Childhood Programming (Ages 5 - 11)     p.63
```

Follow

V. The Goals of the Vatican: Alexis Paves the Way p.72

VI. The Current State of the World p.75

The Vatican and the New World Order: Methods, Purpose and Overcoming Their Agenda

This book is an overview of the Vatican and its military/black ops arm, the Jesuits, and how they work, by a survivor of Jesuit training. It is meant to be helpful to therapists who work with dissociative individuals, since many of the methods used by the Jesuits are used by all of the international occultic societies in the world to some degree. Please take note that this is not a complete description of the programming or belief systems of the Jesuit order. It is an overview of several aspects of Jesuit programming and teachings.

My prayer is that as difficult as this material may be to read, that it will help educate those who help survivors break free of occultic abuse as to the nature of the programming that their clients may have undergone, and the spiritual underpinnings of this programming.

I. Who are the Jesuits?

The Jesuits, or the Society of Jesus, is the “black ops” and military arm of the Vatican. The Vatican is the wealthiest business entity on earth, and is wholly dedicated to bringing in the New World Order, and its coming leader, known in former years as “he who is to come,” and since 2000 as “he who has come” (the individual called the “antichrist” in the Bible).

This book is in no way a reflection upon most Catholics, who have no idea of what the top leadership of their church believes or practices in private. The public face the Vatican shows, and the private, hidden face that very few know about, are quite different.

Jesuit History

While today, the Jesuits attempt to publicly portray themselves as benevolent, their roots go back to the beginning of the Christian church. The first gnostics attempted to corrupt the teachings of the church in the first century, and taught the first theories of “ascenscionism” and “descensionism” (which the Jesuits still teach today).

By the third century, the Christian church had grown at what to the early Roman pagans seemed an alarming rate. The pagan leaders, advised by their oracles, came up with a plan to corrupt and destroy the church from the inside. Christianity was declared the “state religion,” the persecutions stopped, and the move began to mainstream it into the paganistic beliefs of the Roman Empire.

At the same time, a secret cabal of leaders within the early leadership arose. Their goals were to gain political and financial control of the church and to promote their doctrines, which included many of the early gnostic beliefs.

The ideas of penance, self-flagellation, and “salvation by works,” took root. As the centuries passed, the divide between early biblical Christianity, and the actual occultic practices of the leadership hierarchy grew greater. Indulgences (buying “forgiveness”), confession to a priest, and the angling for political power at the highest level of the Roman hierarchy became more pronounced.

By the early middle ages, powerful Italian families such as the Medicis and the Borgias began using methods such as poisoning and assassinations, and spying upon enemies, to consolidate their power and gain election to the papacy.

The term “Vatican spy” was born during this period. The monarchs of Europe were well aware that the Pope in Rome had agents in their courts who spied upon them and reported their activities to the Vatican – including whether the required tithe monies were being sent to Rome. These Vatican spies and agents became consolidated under the military power of the Roman Catholic Church: the Jesuit Society. This Society was responsible for the establishment of the opium trade between China and Europe, among other less than savory acts.

During the late middle ages, the Jesuits began sending “tutors” to instruct the monarchs of Europe in Latin, mathematics and higher learning. They were considered the finest instructors in the world, and this gave them access to the children of the monarchy and wealthy during the 1500s and 1600s, where they could accomplish their real agenda: putting these royal children under their sway through secret occultic training. This is one reason why all the royal families of Europe became heavily involved in the occult and in serving the Vatican through membership in at least one of the twelve secret societies, such as the Illuminati and the Knights Templar.

The Jesuit Society is extremely hierarchical, and military. They are headed by a man known as the “Black Pope,” or Superior General, and this man is the REAL leader of the Vatican. He is feared by all within its corriders, and is at the center of a web of intrigue, vice and power that is difficult for many to comprehend.

Directly beneath him are three generals, known as the “First General,” “Second General” and “Third General.” These are part of a council of twelve top generals in the order. They are quite proud of the fact that they are the actual physical generals of satan’s army on earth, and each commands thousands of troops throughout the world ready to do battle for the one they honor: satan himself, and his seed. These generals believe they have been directly commissioned by satan himself.

II. What does the Jesuit Order Believe?

The Jesuits are occultists of the highest level (mages). Each member has been dedicated to satan from birth, and trained in occultism from infancy on. The Jesuit monasteries are used as training grounds for the young Jesuits, who are brought in at birth. Those who survive the rigors of the first months of infancy (when “weeding out” is done, and only one in ten infants survives) undergo extensive training in all the occultic arts, and in all of the intrigues and deceptive practices that the Jesuit Order is infamous for.

The Jesuits believe the oldest lie man has believed since the Garden of Eden: they believe in the ability of man to ascend and to achieve “god” status through acts of devotion and service to “gods”, specifically, what they call the gods of the Pantheon that rules over Gaia (earth dimension). Failure to obey the Directives of the Order, or disobedience to this pantheon, results in descending into hell in their belief system. They believe that ascending is the act of overcoming the flesh and any human feelings and emotions; it is the act of moving to a higher spiritual plane where feelings and needs are left behind.

This is often accomplished through the act of physical dying and resuscitation (this will be discussed more later). The process of undergoing repeated deaths during their training as mages is supposed to help a Jesuit overcome the fear of death, and promote the ability to travel through the dimensions.

The Jesuits believe in numerous dimensions (13), just as most deep occultists do. These dimensions reflect the spiritual travels outlined in Greek mythology, which are actually records of spiritual travels, such as the Iliad. The beings who inhabit these dimensions are considered "enlightened" and the goal of dimensional travel is to achieve enlightenment, to shed mortality, and to ascend. These travels are quite painful and dangerous, and the Jesuits celebrate those who are able to travel to the highest levels and become an "ascended master."

AntiChristian, Anti-Semitic

An important aspect of the Jesuit belief system is their utter hatred of Christianity and the Jewish race. Their beliefs are in direct opposition to the commands of God as outlined in the Bible, and they directly teach their followers from infancy on to hate and fear the Christian God, Jesus, and Scripture, and to hate the Jewish race. Their hatred is so great, that the Vatican helped fund the nazi cause behind the scenes, and actively supported Hitler during the Second World War, until public opinion caused them to do so secretly. They funded Mengele's experiments in the concentration camps (this will be discussed in more detail later in this book) and created the "Vatican ratline" that helped Mengele and other infamous nazi war criminals to escape to Argentiina and other countries.

Satan's Throne

The Vatican was built over the original spiritual center for early Rome, a cave that was inhabited by the beings "Roma" and "Vatus" who gave it its name (these were later changed to Romulus and Remus). While there are several public levels to the Vatican, there are also several levels beneath the ground that the public is completely unaware of, where spiritual ceremonies are conducted. These ceremonies revolve around the worship of the four entities that the Fathers venerate:

Althea (the "tree of life" which also gave the name "Aborae de Vitae" to the primary Jesuit training monastery north of Rome), and who also represents "The Spirit";
The Beast, whose room and alter are five levels below ground, hewn out of stone and where sacrifices occur both on the alter and in the cave-like room beneath the alter;
Satan: Satan's Throne is a magnificent room that sits at the lowest level.
"He who has come" (Satan's physical Son)

Satan's Throne

The stories at the Vatican say that it took over forty years of work by several crews of workmen to hew out Satan's throne, which is a large room, and to polish the bare rock into a room of great beauty. Trompe d'leoil paintings of windows adorn the walls, lit by recessed lights; and the smooth, marble-like floor is covered with designs painted in gold and black ebony. The long hall has a long red carpet that leads up to a raised dais, and on this dais is a huge throne, one that would require a giant to fill: Satan's throne. After it was built, the work crews were all killed, to prevent their leaking the secret of what lies beneath the upper levels of the Vatican.

Satan's Throne is the spiritual center of the Vatican, the "heart" of its activities.

On specified days, a long red carpet is strewn with ground shards of glass, or nails, and when the doors are opened, the hall is lined with Jesuit Fathers on both sides, who consider it an honor to be present. Petitioners then arrive, and must crawl on their hands and knees over the glass in order to kneel at the throne. Inhabiting it is a huge shadowy being whose ring the petitioner kisses, then arises when told and asked their request.

If their request is considered favorable, it is granted, but always at a huge price. The death of an enemy may be given, but the petitioner must first offer a huge sacrifice, and undergo enormous pain. Information regarding future events; or the secret machinations or plots of others may be provided, but there is always a price.

At times, those coming to the throne come there for judgment. They have been found to be traitors to the Fathers or the coming order, or to have wandered from "the path of obedience" because Satan is the worst legalist on earth, and punishes heavily any who even think disloyal or disobedient thoughts towards him and his cause. The judgments may vary from an extremely painful and expensive penance, to actual death, which is executed within the throne room.

Sacrifices within the throne room are frequent, bloody and dramatic. This is an integral part of the Jesuit worship system, because at its heart, the Roman establishment is occultic.

Satan's Son

For years the Jesuits called the expected leader "he who is to come," "the anointed one," and considered him the bringer of the New Order they have longed for over the centuries. The Jesuits specifically had an antichrist breeding program, in which they took young women who were mated to satan himself in order to carry his child. The fetuses were spontaneously aborted in most cases; or else killed the mother prior to birth.

In 2000, an infant was born, and the word was out: "he who is to come" had arrived, and is being carefully raised and tutored by the Jesuit Fathers at the Vatican.

While he is still a child, he is extremely physically beautiful, and filled with evil. At this time, he sits on satan's throne, and makes judgments, since he is his direct seed, or so the Jesuit Fathers believe. Because of their deception, the Jesuits completely discount the Christian God, or the fact that in His Word He states His complete knowledge of these activities and plots. Psalm 2 shows that the LORD knows all about the plots and machinations going on in Rome, and the worldwide influence they hold over world leaders. It is interesting to see that the LORD finds these plots laughable, because His power is so much greater. Unfortunately, this fact does not deter the ongoing planning and deception that occurs in the Vatican.

Helping the Survivor

A Jesuit is an individual who has been deeply steeped in the darkest levels of occultism since infancy; and they will have made direct vows to Satan and/or the antichrist to serve in their armies. In order to heal, these vows and covenants (made to the death) must be broken and the demonic entities within that represent them expelled.

Every Jesuit will have representation of the Tree of Life, The Beast, and Satan within their systems, and a large system dedicated to the New World Order. They will have been assigned a leadership role within the NWO, and may find it difficult to give this up, since this role gave meaning to their (extremely) painful childhood.

The core beliefs will be based upon Order Directives; the Jesuit survivor will believe that any transgression must be painfully punished, in order to prevent the systems from “descending into hell.” These beliefs will need to be addressed again and again, since they run throughout every system, all the way to the unconscious and core level. Controllers in one system may decide to give up this belief, but at the next level in, it must be addressed again.

Until these beliefs are addressed at core level, the systems will attempt to continue contact (to prevent going to “hell”); or the survivor will be heavily punished within, and will suffer greatly. This and other topics will be addressed in more detail later in this book.

It can help to see that the Vatican, and its antichrist system, are already known to the LORD, who will overthrow it. In Revelations 17,:1-6, there is a perfect description of Rome:
Then one of the seven angels who had the seven bowls came and talked with me, saying to me,[“Come, I will show you the judgment of the great harlot who sits on many waters, 2 with whom the kings of the earth committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth were made drunk with the wine of her fornication.”
3 So he carried me away in the Spirit into the wilderness. And I saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast which was full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. 4 The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and adorned with gold and precious stones and pearls, having in her hand a golden cup full of abominations and the filthiness of her fornication.[b] 5 And on her forehead a name was written:
MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT,
THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS
AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH.
6 I saw the woman, drunk with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. And when I saw her, I marveled with great amazement.
The Meaning of the Woman and the Beast
7 But the angel said to me, “Why did you marvel? I will tell you the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carries her, which has the seven heads and the ten horns. 8 The beast that you saw was, and is not, and will ascend out of the bottomless pit and go to perdition. And those who dwell on the earth will marvel, whose names are not written in the Book of Life from the foundation of the world, when they see the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.[c]
9 “Here is the mind which has wisdom: The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sits..

Share this:

Twitter Facebook

Loading...

Related

The Hierarchy of the Occult
May 3, 2018

III. How are the Jesuits financed?

Vatican book part 10
June 11, 2022

In "mind control"

August 30, 2021
In "mind control"

In "healing"

AB 11:57 am on August 18, 2021

Thank you xx

★ Liked by 1 person

Pingback: Targeted by Jesuits – Lifting the Wool

Pingback: Targeted by Jesuits - Veronica Swift

Leave a Reply

Enter your comment here

← Are Vaccinations the Mark of the Beast?

III. How are the Jesuits financed? →

Create a free website or blog at WordPress.com.